BURWELL, J. A husband has a right to administer the estate of his deceased wife, both in the event of her death intestate, (Code, § 1376,) and also in the event that she leaves a will, but names no one as executor, (Code, § 2166.) The script which has been propounded as the will of Mrs. Sarah Ellick Meyers does not appoint any one to execute it. Therefore, if it be found, upon the trial of the issue devisavit vel non, that it is the will, that cannot have the effect of depriving her husband of the right to administer the estate. Hence, while it is true that there is a contest pending, there is no controversy in regard to the right of administration. Nor can there be one. The statutory provisions are plain. Little v. Berry, 94 N. C. 433. It has been decided by this court that one who has the prior right to administration may transfer that right by appointment. Little v. Berry, supra. If the husband could have lawfully transferred his right to administer his wife's estate to another, he may certainly cause another to be associated with him in the administration. If it was proper to appoint the husband, it was proper to appoint the husband and his chosen associate, Webb, to be coadministrator. From what has been said, it follows that the husband's right to letters of administration, and the clerk's power and duty to appoint him and his chosen associate to be coadministrator, were not at all affected by the filing and probating, in common form, of the script which purported to be the will of Mrs. Meyers, for, as has been noted, that instrument named no one to administer the estate under its provisions. Suttle v. Turner, 8 Jones, (N. C.) 403, is overruled in Little v. Berry, supra. The duties and responsibilities of these administrators are not in any degree changed by the fact that a will has been, or may be, probated, that will guide them in their distribution of the assets that remain after payment of debts and charges of administration. They must take notice of that. The clerk has power to issue orders touching the administration, and they must obey. If they are guilty of misconduct, they may be removed. But they should not have been ousted by the clerk for the reasons set out in the petition upon which his order of removal was founded. His honor should have directed the clerk to revoke his order of removal. It is so ordered. Error.

LYMAN et al. v. RAMSEUR et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

APPEAL—RECORD—CONFIRMING JUDICIAL SALE.

1. Where there is no case settled by the judge, and it does not appear that appellant's case or appellee's counter case were ever served, the court can only look at the face of the record proper.

2. A judgment confirming a commissioner's sale, and directing the purchaser, by a certain date, to pay into the clerk's office $3,000, to be applied, etc., and that on the purchaser's payment to the commissioner of the amount of his bid, to wit, $3,000, the latter shall make him a deed, is not ambiguous or inconsistent, as directing the $3,000 to be paid twice.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; Graves, Judge.

Action by Julia E. Lyman and another against H. M. Ramseur and another. Motion by plaintiffs to confirm a sale of lands made by D. C. Waddell, commissioner, to William M. Cocke, Jr. Sale confirmed, and judgment rendered requiring said Cocke to pay into the office of the clerk of the superior court $3,000, to be applied as by judgment directed, and that upon Cocke's payment to D. C. Waddell, commissioner, of the sum bid by him at the sale, to wit, $3,000, said commissioner should execute and deliver to said Cocke a deed for the land. Ramseur and Cocke except and appeal. Affirmed.

Thos. A. Jones, for appellants. F. I. Osborne and Batchelor & Devereux, for appellees.

CLARK, J. There is no case settled by the judge. There is before us simply the "case on appeal" prepared by appellants, and the "counter case" of the appellees. If it appeared that these had been served, or that service had been accepted, within the time allowed by statute, the appellees' counter case would be held the case on appeal, since the appellants acquiesced in the same by not referring it to the judge to settle the case. Owens v. Phelps, 92 N. C. 231; Jones v. Call, 93 N. C. 170. But it does not appear from the record that either case on appeal was served in time, and hence the court must disregard both, unless such service in time is admitted. Cummings v. Huffman, 18 S. E. 170, (at this term.) As this is not admitted, the judgment below must be affirmed, unless there is error upon the face of the record proper, and the argument here was restricted to that point. Clark's Code, (2d Ed.) 580, and cases there cited. The only error upon the face of the record which is suggested on the argument, or which appears to us by inspection, is that there is a possible ambiguity or inconsistency in directing the $3,000 purchase money to be paid into the clerk's office, and also directing that, upon the payment of said sum by the purchaser to the commissioner, he shall execute to the purchaser a good and sufficient conveyance. It seems to us that the exception is hypercritical. There is but one $3,000 that is claimed. That was directed to be paid by the date mentioned in the judgment, and thereupon the commissioner was directed to convey the title. No error.

STATE v. AIKEN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

CONTEMPT—JURISDICTION OF MAYOR TO PUNISH DEFAULTING WITNESS.

Under Code, § 3818, providing that the mayor of an incorporated town is hereby constituted an inferior court, with the jurisdiction of a justice in all criminal matters arising under the laws of the state or under the ordinances of such town, and that the rules regulating proceedings before a justice shall apply to proceedings before such mayor, a mayor has jurisdiction to punish a defaulting witness in a criminal case for contempt. In re Deaton, 11 S. E. 244, 105 N. C. 59, followed.

Appeal from superior court, Transylvania county; Armfield, Judge.

James P. Aiken was fined eight dollars for contempt in disobeying the subpoena of the mayor of the town of Brevard, and appealed to the superior court. The proceeding was dismissed, and the state appeals. Reversed.

The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. The defendant—or, more properly, the respondent—was a defaulting witness in a criminal proceeding before the mayor of Brevard against one Dock Rhodes for violation of a town ordinance. A notice issued to show cause why he should not be fined for contempt in disobeying the subpoena of the court. The respondent appeared, but the court adjudged that he had not shown good cause, and fined him eight dollars. Upon appeal to the superior court, his honor dismissed the proceeding, upon the ground that the mayor had no authority to impose the fine. In this there was error. In re Deaton, 105 N. C. 59, 11 S. E. 244, in which (on page 65, 105 N. C., and page 245, 11 S. E.) the express point is decided. The power given justices of the peace by Code, § 651, is extended to mayors by Code, § 3818.¹ But in fact the power to punish for contempt is inherent in all courts, and essential to their existence. The courts of our cities and towns would become nullities if they did not possess the power of procuring the attendance of witnesses under suitable penalties for contempt upon willful disobedience of the subpoena of the court. The fine imposed (eight dollars) was not excessive, and was probably fixed from analogy to the penalty against a defaulting witness, and in favor of the party at whose instance he is summoned, which is allowed by a court of a justice of the peace in a civil action. Code, § 847. In the present case the fine is simply for contempt, and to be disposed of as other fines and penalties. It is a matter of no special importance, but from analogy to cases in which prosecutors are taxed with costs this proceeding should properly be entitled "State v. Rhodes. Appeal by Aiken, Defaulting Witness." The judgment dismissing the proceeding is set aside, and the cause remanded, that the facts may be found by the judge, for the findings of fact by the mayor are not conclusive. In re Deaton, supra. If the facts found justify it, the judge will impose sentence for the contempt. Error.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

EXECUTION SALE — ALLOTMENT OF HOMESTEAD — DOMICILE—HEARSAY EVIDENCE — PRESUMPTIONS — ADVERSE POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE—DEED FROM TENANTS IN COMMON.

1. The sale on execution of the interest in land of one entitled to a homestead, without allotment of homestead, when he had no homestead already allotted in other land, is void.

2. On an issue as to residence, testimony that it was generally reputed in a person's family, and in the neighborhood in which he had lived, that he had become a resident of another state, is inadmissible, being hearsay.

3. The presumption is that one's domicile remains unchanged.

4. It will be presumed that the obligation to satisfy which a sale of land was made, without allotment of homestead, was incurred after the enactment of the constitutional provision for the homestead exemption.

5. All but one of the tenants in common of land which had descended to them gave a deed purporting to convey the entire interest in the land. Prior thereto, one of the grantors had received a conveyance of all the interest in the land acquired by the grantee in a sheriff's deed given pursuant to an execution sale of the remaining cotenant's interest, which was void, for the reason that homestead was not allotted him. Held, that the grantee of the tenants in common could acquire adverse title to the cotenant only by possession for the period necessary, where there is no color of title.

Appeal from superior court, Cherokee county; J. F. Graves, Judge.

Action by Mary E. A. Ferguson, as heir of Samuel C. Ferguson, against Samuel C. Wright and others, to be let into possession as a tenant in common with defendants in certain land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

G. S. Ferguson, for appellants. Edmund B. Norvell and C. M. Busbee, for appellee.

AVERY, J. If Samuel C. Ferguson was a resident of the state of North Carolina on the 4th of October, 1869, when his land was sold upon a justice's judgment rendered on the 11th of August, 1869, and docketed in the superior court on the 14th of October, 1869, he was entitled to a homestead; and, unless he had a homestead already allotted to him in other lands, the sale of his interest in the land in controversy, under such execution, was null and void. It was conceded that no other land had been allotted to him. He resided in North Carolina in 1866, and the summons was served on him in the case wherein judgment was rendered, and execution and sale followed, in the summer of 1869. We find positive and direct testimony tending to show these facts, and nothing more bearing upon the question of his domicile, though it was stated in general terms that there was additional testimony offered for the defendants.

The court, upon objection, properly excluded the testimony offered that Samuel C. Ferguson was generally reputed in his family, or in the neighborhood in which he lived, in 1866, to have removed to, and become a resident of the state of Georgia, where he died, in August, 1870. Evidence as to the residence of a person falls within the general rule that hearsay testimony is inadmissible, and no sufficient reason can be adduced for making it an exception, like testimony as to pedigree. The other evidence upon the same question seems to have been fairly submitted to the jury. It being conceded that Ferguson resided in Cherokee county in 1866, the presumption was that he continued to make this state his home, and the jury were left to determine whether the evidence was sufficient to rebut it, since, in the absence of such proof, the law assumed that his domicile remained unchanged. 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 971; Lawson, Pres. Ev. p. 172, rule 30. The defendants offered no testimony tending to show that the judgment was recovered upon a debt created prior to 1868, and, as we must assume that the sale was made to satisfy an obligation incurred after the ratification of the constitution, and without allotting a homestead, it was void. Long v. Walker, 105 N. C. 90, 10 S. E. 858; Loyd v. Loyd, 18 S. E. 200, (at this term.) Whether the defendants, or those under whom they claim, entered upon the land in 1869 or 1870, is not material. If the execution sale of Samuel's one undivided eighth was invalid, the deed to Brittain, under which they claimed, passed only the seven-eighths of the land which had descended on the death of Robert Ferguson to his other children. The defendants had not been in possession 20 years when this action was brought, in 1889, and therefore the presumption had not arisen that the plaintiff, as a cotenant, had been evicted. Caldwell v. Neely, 81 N. C. 114; Ward v. Farmer, 92 N. C. 93. The cases of McCulloh v. Daniel, 102 N. C. 531, 9 S. E. 413, and Amis v. Stephens, 111 N. C. 172, 16 S. E. 17, which were relied on by defendants' counsel to sustain his position, were carefully distinguished by the court in both opinions from those already cited in support of the view of the question which we have taken. The distinction was that in the one case the occupant entered and held under title derived mediately or immediately through conveyances from a portion of the tenants in common, to whom the land had passed by descent or purchase; while in the other he had bought at sheriff's sale a claim purporting to be adverse to all of such tenants, and had entered and held adversely for more than seven years.

The deed of Thomas M. Ferguson and others to Brittain, though it purported to convey all of the interest in the land, had only the effect of putting Brittain in the relation to Samuel Ferguson previously occupied by his grantors. Thomas C. Ferguson, after procuring a conveyance from King for such interest as had passed to him by the sheriff's void deed, joined the heirs of Robert Ferguson in conveying to Brittain. As to the individual interest of Samuel Ferguson, Thomas Ferguson and Brittain stood in the same relation to him as had been sustained by King. The occupation and undisturbed enjoyment of the rents and profits by Brittain, or those claiming under him, for a less time than 20 years, though under a deed purporting to convey the entire estate, did not bar the action of the heirs of Samuel Ferguson, if the sale by the sheriff was void. Breden v. McLaurin, 98 N. C. 307, 4 S. E. 136; Hicks v. Bullock, 93 N. C. 164, 1 S. E. 629. But a case more directly in point is Page v. Branch, 97 N. C. 100, 1 S. E. 625, where Justice Davis, delivering the opinion of the court, laid down the principle that one tenant in common cannot make the possession adverse to his cotenant by conveying the entire estate, because his bargainee only acquires such estate as the bargainor can convey. We see no reason why the registration of the deeds from the sheriff to King, and from the latter to Thomas Ferguson, should give any additional force or effect to the subsequent conveyance to Brittain. There is no principle which we can invoke that would give to the registration at that date the effect of an ouster. For the reasons stated, we conclude that there was no error.

STATE v. ALSTON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

BURGLARY—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A court cannot charge that, because all the evidence was that the family was in a house at the time defendant entered, he should be found guilty of burglary in the first degree, as it was for the jury to pass on the credibility of the evidence as to the presence of the family.

2. Defendant in a criminal case cannot complain of the error in a charge that permits of his being convicted of a less degree than the evidence warrants.

Appeal from superior court, Franklin county; Hoke, Judge.

Dock Alston was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

N. Y. Gulley, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. The defendant was indicted for burglary. The court charged the jury that, "although all the evidence was that the family were present in the house" at the time it was alleged to have been entered, they might find the prisoner guilty of burglary in the first degree, or they might find him guilty of burglary in the second degree. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of burglary in the second degree, and the prisoner assigns the above instruction as error. The court should have charged the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the family were present in the house at the time of the felonious entry, as charged, they should convict the defendant of burglary in the first degree. Under such circumstances the jury are not vested with the discretionary power to convict of burglary in the second degree. The power to commute punishment does not reside with the jury. This very point was passed upon and decided in State v. Fleming, 107 N. C. 905, on page 909, 12 S. E. 131, on page 132. But there was no prayer by defendant for such instruction. The court could not have charged, as this exception implies, that because "all the evidence was that the family was in the house at the time of the felonious entry," etc., the jury should find the defendant guilty of burglary in the first degree. It is only when the jury believe that to be the fact that they could return such verdict. The jury must pass upon the credibility of the evidence, and although all the evidence was that the family were then present, still if the jury did not believe that part of the evidence, but believed only the evidence tending to show that the prisoner entered the dwelling in the nighttime, with the felonious intent, as charged, a verdict of guilty of burglary in the second degree was proper. There is nothing which indicates how the jury found as to the truth of the evidence of the presence of the family. There was no exception as to the charge in other respects. Besides, the appellant, in any case, civil or criminal, cannot complain of any error which is not injurious to him. State v. Frank, 50 N. C. 384; Ray v. Lipscomb, 48 N. C. 185; Hobbs v. Outlaw, 51 N. C. 174; Moore v. Parker, 91 N. C. 275; State v. Dick, 60 N. C. 440. If there was error here, the effect was to cause a verdict for a lesser offense to be found against the appellant than should have been rendered. It does not lie in the prisoner's mouth to complain that he is to be sent to the penitentiary for seven years,—the sentence imposed in this case,—when the evidence might have justified a verdict and sentence against him for the capital offense charged in the indictment. No error.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—NATURE OF ESTATE.

A devise of land to the daughter of testator in trust for her separate use during life or maidenhood, with an executory devise over to her brothers and sisters, should she die without issue, vests a fee simple in the daughter upon her marrying and having issue.

Appeal from superior court, Yadkin county; E. T. Boykin, Judge.

Action by W. L. Kelly, administrator of the estate of Martha J. Fulp, deceased, against N. G. Williams and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A jury trial having been waived, his honor found the following facts: "(1) That Tyre Glenn died in Yadkin county in the year 1875, seised and possessed of the lands described in the petition, leaving a last will and testament, which was duly proven and recorded * * * in the office of the clerk of superior court of Yadkin county; * * * and the lands described in the petition, under proper proceedings between the devisors, were allotted to the plaintiff's intestate in the year 1882. (2) That the plaintiff's intestate intermarried with Peter Fulp in the year 1884, and had issue, one child, Mittie Fulp. (3) That Peter Fulp died in March, 1891, and Martha J. Fulp, the plaintiff's intestate, died in September, 1891, and Mittie Fulp, her only child, died without issue in March, 1892, all intestate. (4) That the plaintiff, W. L. Kelly, was on the 27th day of November, 1891, duly appointed and qualified as the administrator of the estate of Martha J. Fulp; that the personal estate is insufficient to pay the debts and costs of administration. (5) That the plaintiff's intestate is the person referred to in the will of Tyre Glenn, deceased, as Martha J. Glenn; that Thomas Glenn, the trustee, died in the year 1876. (6) That the defendants Mary Duskin and Glenn Duskin are the children and only heirs at law of Harriet E. Duskin, who died intestate; that N. Glenn Williams and Mary B. Daniels are the children and only heirs at law of Lou Williams, who died intestate; that Bynum Glenn, Nettle Glenn, Thos. Glenn, and Ashton Glenn are the children and only heirs at law of W. B. Glenn, who died intestate." The case turned upon the construction of the third clause of the will, which is as follows: "Item 3rd. After my death, and the payment of all my just debts, I give, will, and bequeath and devise to my daughters, Martha J. Glenn, Harriet E. Duskin, Bertha Glenn, Fanny Glenn, and Lilly Glenn, and to my sons, Wm. B. Glenn, Thos. Glenn, and Tyre Glenn, all my real estate not herein disposed of to Fanny and Lilly, to be equally divided between them, to have and to hold the same to them and their heirs forever; and the lots given to Fanny and Lilly, as before mentioned, to be estimated at a fair valuation in equalizing the shares, so as to make all of the above-named children equal in my real estate: provided, however, that that portion of my real and personal estate that falls to Martha J. Glenn I give, will, bequeath, and devise to my son Thos. Glenn in trust, to be held, controlled, and managed by him as in his judgment he may deem best, for the sole and separate use and behoof of my daughter Martha J. Glenn, so long as she remains unmarried, or so long as she may live; and, if she should die without issue, then her share to be equally divided between all my children." The court held that Martha J. Glenn took a fee-simple estate upon her marriage and birth of issue, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff, from which the infant defendants, by J. H. James, their guardian ad litem, appealed.

A. E. Holton, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. We are of the opinion that the ruling of his honor was correct. The proper construction of the will of Tyre Glenn, in respect to this controversy, is as follows: It devises a fee to Martha J. Glenn, with a proviso that it shall be held in trust during her life or maidenhood, for her separate use, with an executory devise over to her brothers and sisters, should she die without issue. As soon as she married and had issue, the fee became absolute. Sadler v. Willson, 5 Ired. Eq. 296; Davis v. Parker, 69 N. C. 271.

Affirmed.

NEWBERN GASLIGHT CO. v. LEWIS MERCER CONST. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

ATTACHMENT—WHEN ALLOWED—ACTION FOR NEGLIGENCE.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 347, subsec. 3, which provided that an attachment might issue in an action for damages for "any other injury to personal property in consequence of negligence, fraud, or other wrongful act," a gas company is entitled to an attachment in an action for damages caused by the wrongful breaking by defendant of its gas pipes, which extend from its own land and works, under the streets throughout a city, and the escape of its gas.

Appeal from superior court, Craven county; Bryan, Judge.

Action by the Newbern Gaslight Company against the Lewis Mercer Construction Company and the Newbern Sewerage Company for damages caused by the wrongful breaking of plaintiff's gas pipes by defendant

Lewis Mercer Construction Company. Plaintiff obtained a writ of attachment against such construction company, which was by the clerk ordered to be vacated. From a judgment of the judge reversing the order of the clerk, and refusing to dismiss the attachment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

It is agreed that the facts are that plaintiff, a corporation, is engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling, in the city of Newbern, illuminating gas, and that it furnishes said gas to the citizens of said city for pay for the same; that it owns a lot of land in fee simple in said city of Newbern, and that its machinery and works used for the purpose of manufacturing and storing said gas are situated on said lot of land; that the said gas is conveyed to plaintiff's patrons by means of iron pipes laid from and attached to its said works on said lot of land, through the streets of said city, said pipes being laid in the soil of said streets about two feet from the surface, and so laid in said streets by grant of an easement to plaintiff from said city, to continue for 99 years from the 9th day of May, 1859, as set forth in the deed from the commissioners of Newbern to the Newbern Gaslight Company, filed in the record; that the said defendant the Lewis Mercer Construction Company is a foreign corporation, and has property in this state; that said defendant, in putting down a system of sewers in the said city of Newbern, did, prior to the commencement of this action, negligently and wrongfully break and injure the said pipes of plaintiff, and by reason of so breaking the said pipes did wrongfully and negligently injure and destroy the gas of the plaintiff by escape through the pipes broken as aforesaid, which damage plaintiff alleged was in the sum of $2,000, as set forth in plaintiff's affidavits, and that this action is instituted to recover said damages from the said defendant; that said pipes can be disconnected from the said lot of land owned by plaintiff in fee as aforesaid without in any manner injuring said lot of land.

Owen H. Gulon, for appellants. M. De W. Stevenson, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. Upon a careful investigation we are of the opinion that, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, the ruling of his honor, refusing to dismiss the attachment, should be sustained. In view of the recent amendment to section 347 of the Code of Civil Procedure¹ extending the right of attachment to cases where the injury is to real as well as personal property, we do not think an elaborate discussion of the law as it previously existed can serve any useful purpose. Affirmed.

McLEAN v. BREECE et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

LUNATIC—PAYMENTS BY GUARDIAN—SETTLEMENT—WAIVER OF PLEADING—JURISDICTION—AMENDMENT OF PROCESS.

1. A guardian of a lunatic, who, in good faith, pays just debts, without prejudicing the ward's estate, will be allowed credit therefor.

2. Plaintiff cannot object to the entry of a final judgment on the ground that there are no pleadings in the cause, where it has theretofore been referred, and judgment entered in it, without objection.

3. The jurisdiction given a clerk of court by Code, § 1619, over settlements between guardian and ward, includes settlements between the guardian and the ward's personal representatives.

4. Where an action begun before a tribunal not having jurisdiction is appealed to a court having jurisdiction, the process may there be amended, or it may be amended on further appeal to the supreme court, when a presumption, from long pendency of the action, that the amendment has been made, does not obtain.

Appeal from superior court, Cumberland county; Spier Whitaker, Judge.

Action by John P. McLean, guardian, against Mrs. James Breece and others, to compel a settlement of plaintiff's accounts. From a judgment for plaintiff, allowing only part of his claims, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

N. W. Ray, for appellant. J. W. Hinsdale and C. W. Broadfoot, for appellees.

CLARK, J. When this cause was here before, (109 N. C. 564, 13 S. E. 910,) the court said, in reference to "vouchers numbered, respectively, in the account stated by the referee, Nos. 2, 5, 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17," and those for "sundry trips to Raleigh on account of ward," that "the referee must be required to inquire more particularly as to the nature and purpose of, and the necessity for, the expenditures and disbursements embraced by them." This the referee proceeded to do. On the coming in of the report, the court allowed defendants' exceptions to vouchers 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, and ordered a reference to reform the account. As no appeal lay from such interlocutory order, (Wallace v. Douglas, 105 N. C. 42, 10 S. E. 1043,) the plaintiff properly caused his exceptions to the ruling to be noted in the record. It is now brought up for review on the appeal from the final judgment. The referee found from the evidence that these vouchers (11 to 17, inclusive) were debts against the estate when the guardian (plaintiff) took charge, that he paid them in good faith, and that they were correct and just claims against James Breece. The defendants excepted because those disbursements were not "for the support and maintenance of the lunatic or of his family, nor for necessary expenses of the ward or his wife and child, nor for their benefit, nor authorized by law or any previous order of court." In sustaining this exception to the vouchers mentioned, (11 to 17,) there was error. This court had already ruled in this case (109 N. C., on page 567, 13 S. E. 910) that "when he, [the guardian,] in good faith, pays debts that ought to be paid, and by so doing the ward's estate suffers no prejudice, he will be allowed credit for disbursements of assets in his hands in such respect." To same purport is Adams v. Thomas, 83 N. C. 521. It does not appear that the ward's estate, or the maintenance of himself and family, suffered any prejudice by the payment of these just debts incurred by him anterior to his lunacy. It is true, both that the courts will not order payment of a lunatic's anterior debts, if it will deprive him or his family of maintenance, (Smith v. Pipkin, 79 N. C. 569,) and that he is entitled to his personal property exemption. But none of these questions can arise. The lunatic is dead, and the only child is of age. The question is not as to reserving a sufficiency for maintenance, but whether, in this final settlement, the guardian shall be allowed for just debts paid in good faith by him. These credits were therefore erroneously stricken from the account, and should be restored to it.

The plaintiff's second exception was made at January term, 1893, for that, in reforming the account, the referee had failed to make a deduction of $41.75 allowed by the court in voucher No. 10 from the sum total of the debts. It seems to us, from inspection of the account, that the deduction was made. But as the account must be reformed by reinstating vouchers 11-17, inclusive, the inadvertence, if such there be, in regard to this $41.75, will be corrected.

The plaintiff further excepted at the final judgment to any judgment being entered, upon the ground that there are no pleadings in the cause. This proceeding was instituted by the plaintiff seven years ago. It has been referred three times, with four reports made. There have been numerous orders, and two final judgments, in the court below, and the case is now for the second time in this court. The objection came too late. Stancill v. Gay, 92 N. C. 455. This court might permit pleadings to be filed here nunc pro tunc, (Code, § 965,) but we deem it unnecessary, as it would serve no useful purpose.

The plaintiff further excepts in this court, for the first time and ore tenus, on the ground of a want of jurisdiction, in that the action was instituted before the clerk originally. This he can do. Rule 27 of this court. 12 S. E. vii. But the objection is unfounded. Donnelly v. Wilcox, 18 S. E. 339, (at this term.) The clerk has jurisdiction of settlements between guardian and ward, and, of course, of settlements between the guardian and the ward's personal representative. Code, § 1619; McNeill v. Hodges, 105 N. C. 52, 11 S. E. 265. But had the action been "begun wrongly before the clerk. It having gotten into the superior court by appeal or otherwise, the latter has jurisdiction of the whole cause, and can make amendment of process to give effectual jurisdiction." Capps v. Capps, 85 N. C. 408; Cheatham v. Crews, 81 N. C. 343; Robeson v. Hodges, 105 N. C. 49, 11 S. E. 263. The court here, in such case, would amend the process, if necessary, (State v. W. U. Tel. Co., 18 S. E. 389, [at this term;] Code, § 965,) or might remand the case that the amendment might be made in the court below. Where, however, a cause has been so long pending as this, without exception on that ground, it would be presumed that the requisite amendment of process had been in fact already ordered in the superior court. The judgment, thus modified as indicated, is affirmed. The costs of this court will be taxed against the appellees. Code, § 540.

STEVENSON et al. v. FIDELITY BANK OF DURHAM.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

BANKING—COLLECTIONS—CORRESPONDING BANKS.

Plaintiff deposited a draft with the Bank of H. for collection, which forwarded it for collection to defendant bank, and defendant collected it after the Bank of H. failed. The arrangement between the banks was that each should daily remit to the other every collection as made, but this was not strictly complied with by the Bank of H., and the final drafts sent by it to defendant in payment of balance were dishonored. Held, that defendant was liable to plaintiff for the collection, defendant not being a purchaser of the draft, but merely a subagent for its collection.

Appeal from superior court, New Hanover county; Henry R. Bryan, Judge.

Action by J. C. Stevenson and others against the Fidelity Bank of Durham for the proceeds of a draft collected by defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Manning, for appellant. George Rountree, for appellees.

MacRAE, J. The ingenious argument of defendant's counsel is based entirely upon the assumption that the defendant was a purchaser of commercial paper for value, and without notice of any equities between the original parties thereto, and before maturity. If such had been the case, there can be no question that the defendant would have been entitled to hold the avails to its own use. If the course of dealings between the two banks had continued as it had been prior to June, 1891,—the forwarding by the one to the other of commercial paper for collection on account of the bank so forwarding, the charging and crediting each other with said items upon a mutual running account, and the remission by the debtor to the creditor bank of balances from time to time,—the question would have arisen whether one bank became the purchaser for value of the paper received by it for collection, by reason of the fact that the balance of account was against the remitting bank. Even if this were the case presented to us, we should be inclined to adopt the rulings of the New York court of appeals in McBride v. Bank, 23 N. Y. 450: "It is not a purchaser for value by reason of its having a balance against the remitting bank, for which it had refrained from drawing, and from having discounted notes for the latter upon its indorsements, in reliance upon a course of dealings between the banks to collect notes for each other, each keeping an open account of such collections, treating all the paper sent for collection as the property of the other, and drawing for balances at pleasure;" or that of the supreme court of the United States in Bank of the Metropolis v. New England Bank, 6 How. 212, where the above-stated principle seems to be somewhat modified. In substance, the court say that the receiving bank is not entitled to retain against the real owners, unless credit was given to the transmitting bank, or balances suffered to remain in its hands, to be met by the negotiable paper transmitted, or expected to be transmitted, in the usual course of dealings between the two banks. See 2 Morse, Banks, § 591 et seq., where the subject is largely discussed. If this were an open question, it would not affect the case before us. By the case agreed, it appears that up to June, 1891, there had been such a course of mutual dealings and running accounts between the two banks as is referred to above, but some time prior to June 1, 1893, there was a change in the arrangement between these banks, and it was mutually agreed to close the mutual accounts, and that each bank should remit to the other, daily, the respective items when collected. However, in fact, the Bank of New Hanover did not remit daily each item when collected, as appears by the appended statement; and it further appears that by this change of the course of dealings between the banks, although the agreement was not strictly complied with by the Bank of New Hanover, the said bank did remit to the Fidelity Bank its drafts on New York in payment of the balances against the former, and in favor of the latter bank, and that the draft in question was sent for collection. It was by the dishonor of the New York paper sent in payment of balances that the defendant became the loser; and we are of the opinion that the defendant was acting in the capacity of subagent in the collection of the plaintiffs' draft. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 148 Mass. 553, 20 N. E. 193. Under the arrangement that then existed between the two banks, the defendant could in no sense be considered a purchaser for value of the draft in question. The defendant was the agent of the Bank of New Hanover to collect the draft, and, if it had authority to credit the said bank with the avails of the collection, it was only so while the bank was a going concern; but the bank became insolvent before the agency was completed and the money received, so that no authority existed to credit the money on general account. 2 Morse, Banks, § 568. As we hold that in no event was the defendant a purchaser of the draft, it will not be necessary to follow the argument of counsel upon that line. There is no error.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

NOTES—TRANSFER—MORTGAGES—LIMITATION OF ACTION—PARTIES.

1. A note may be transferred by delivery and without indorsement, (Code, § 177,) and, though such transfer does not pass the legal title according to the law merchant, the transferee is the equitable assignee thereof.

2. The transfer of a note carries with it a mortgage given to secure it, without any formal assignment or delivery, or even mention, of the mortgage.

3. The lien created by a mortgage given to secure a note is not impaired by the fact that the statute of limitations has run against the note.

4. Where a note is given and a mortgage transferred as collateral to the cashier of a banking firm for the benefit of the firm, he holds the collateral as trustee for the firm, and, under Code, § 179, an action to foreclose the mortgage is properly brought in his own name.

Appeal from superior court, Lincoln county; Armfield, Judge.

Action by L. L. Jenkins, cashier, against L. A. H. Wilkinson and others, to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

It was in evidence that on the 5th day of January, 1888, the defendant L. A. H. Wilkinson executed a note to the plaintiff in the sum of $800, bearing interest after maturity, and that M. A. Wilkinson indorsed the said note, and became surety therefor. It was in evidence that at the time the $800 note was executed, and at the time M. A. Wilkinson indorsed it, the defendant M. A. Wilkinson placed in the hands of the plaintiff the $900 note and mortgage set forth in the pleadings as collateral security for the payment of the $800 note, and thereupon the plaintiff paid over to the defendant L. A. H. Wilkinson the money.

First. When the plaintiff offered to show that the $900 note and mortgage were placed in his hands as collateral security, and were a part of the same transaction as the execution of the $800 note, the defendants excepted. Exception overruled. Evidence allowed by the court.

Second. It was in evidence that the defendant L. A. H. Wilkinson was sued on the $800 note at the fall term, 1890, of Gaston court, and that judgment was obtained for $752 and costs, which said judgment has never been paid.

Third. As will appear in the pleadings, the $900 note and mortgage placed by M. A. Wilkinson as collateral in the hands of the plaintiff was executed by L. A. H. Wilkinson and wife, the principals in the $800 note.

Fourth. It was in evidence that the $800 note belonged to a banking firm by the name of Craig & Jenkins, and that the plaintiff, to whom the note was made payable, was cashier of the firm at that time.

Fifth. It was in evidence that no suit had been brought against M. A. Wilkinson except the present, and that no relief has been asked as against him except the foreclosure of this mortgage, as the $900 note and mortgage in question were executed to M. A. Wilkinson by L. A. H. Wilkinson and wife.

Sixth. It was in evidence that there was no written transfer of the $900 note and mortgage to plaintiff, but at the time it was given him it was stated that it should be held as collateral security for the payment of the $800 note given by L. A. H. Wilkinson, and indorsed by M. A. Wilkinson at the same time.

His honor submitted the following issues to the jury, to wit: (1) "Did L. A. H. Wilkinson and Nannie Wilkinson make and deliver to M. A. Wilkinson the $900 note and mortgage described in complaint? Ans. Yes." (2) "Did M. A. Wilkinson deliver the $900 note and mortgage to the plaintiff to hold as collateral security for the payment of the $800 note on which judgment was obtained? Ans. Yes." (3) "Is plaintiff's action barred by statute of limitations? Ans. No." The defendant tendered the following issues, which were not submitted to the jury by the court, to which defendants except: (1) "To whom was the money loaned?" (2) "Is this action barred by the statute of limitations as to the indorsement on the note given by L. A. H. Wilkinson?" (3) "Was there any writing passed between M. A. Wilkinson at the time of this loan as to the note and mortgage?" Defendants contend that, inasmuch as there was no written assignment of the note and mortgage to plaintiff, nor any stipulation in said mortgage that it was made to secure the note to plaintiff, the plaintiff could not be subrogated to the rights of defendant M. A. Wilkinson; that a mere verbal transfer from the mortgagee to the plaintiff, and no judgment had against the mortgagee, would not authorize the plaintiff to subrogate the plaintiff to the rights of the mortgagee; that, inasmuch as the note indorsed by the defendant M. A. Wilkinson is barred by the statute of limitations, and the plaintiff has no claim against the mortgagee, M. A. Wilkinson, he has no right to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee aforesaid. The defendants further contend that the plaintiff could not maintain this suit, because the note given by L. A. H. Wilkinson and indorsed by M. A. Wilkinson belonged to the firm of Craig & Jenkins, and not to the plaintiff.

MacRAE, J. 1. The first exception is to evidence offered by plaintiff to prove that the $900 note and mortgage were delivered to plaintiff as collateral security for the other note. We suppose that the ground of the objection by defendants was a contention on their part that the note and mortgage could not be transferred by delivery and without writing. A note may be transferred by delivery and without indorsement. Code, § 177. Such transfer does not pass the legal title, according to the law merchant, but the transferee is the equitable assignee thereof. Miller v. Tharel, 75 N. C. 148; Jackson v. Love, 82 N. C. 405; Kiff v. Weaver, 94 N. C. 274; Carpenter v. Tucker, 98 N. C. 316, 3 S. E. 831. The debt is the principal thing; the mortgage to secure it is the incident or accessory. "Equity puts the principal and accessory upon a footing of equality, and gives to the assignee of the evidence of the debt the same rights in regard to both." The transfer of the note carries with it the security without any formal assignment or delivery, or even mention, of the latter. Carpenter v. Longan, 16 Wall. 271. See, also, Coleb. Coll. Sec. § 144, where a multitude of authorities are cited.

2. The issues submitted by his honor seem to cover all the real contentions in the case. As to the first issue tendered by defendant, it made no difference to whom the money was loaned, if any money was loaned. The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage made to secure the payment of a note under seal, and transferred to the plaintiff, who, as we shall see, was the proper party to bring the action. The question of the statute of limitations could be fairly presented in all its aspects under the third issue, and it seems that the note itself was not barred. In deed, although an action upon the note was barred by the statute, the lien created by the mortgage is not impaired in consequence of the running of the statute of limitations on the debt. Wood, Lim. § 222; Clark's Code, § 152, (3), and cases cited page 45.

3. The defendants contend that the plaintiff could not maintain this suit, because the note given by L. A. H. Wilkinson and indorsed by M. A. Wilkinson belonged to the firm of Craig & Jenkins, and not to the plaintiff. It appears to have been made to the plaintiff L. L. Jenkins, cashier. It is found that plaintiff was cashier of the banking firm for whose benefit the note was given and the collateral transferred. He was the holder of the collateral as trustee of the firm, and the action was properly brought in his name. Code, § 179. No error.

KELLY v. OLIVER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

CONTRACTS—PAROL EVIDENCE—ACTION.

1. In an action on a written contract, by which defendant agreed to furnish pupils if plaintiff would continue his school, defendant may show that it was agreed that the instrument should not go into effect until plaintiff should procure 20 signatures, as this does not contradict the terms of the instrument, but shows a collateral agreement postponing its legal operation until the happening of a contingency.

2. Where a contract to furnish pupils for a school is signed by a number of persons, it cannot be claimed that those who signed first signed in reference to the last signer's becoming a party, so as to prevent his showing that the instrument was to take effect as to him only on the happening of a contingency.

3. Nor is he prevented from so showing on the ground that his release would increase the liability of the other signers, where no specific sum was to be raised.

4. A contract by which a number of persons each agree to send a certain number of pupils to a school, if it shall be continued by another, at a certain sum for the scholastic year, must be fully performed by the latter before he can recover thereon, and an action against one of the signers who refused to send pupils, brought before the end of the scholastic year, is premature.

Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; R. F. Armfield, Judge.

Action by J. E. Kelly against Frederick Oliver on a contract by which defendant agreed to send pupils to plaintiff's school. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The contract, which was signed by defendant after it had been signed by 16 others, was as follows: "In order to secure the continuance of Prof. Kelly's school in Charlotte, we, the undersigned, agree to furnish the number of scholars opposite our respective names for the scholastic year beginning in September, 1891, at the sum of eighty dollars for the scholastic year." At the trial, defendant proposed to prove by a witness that before and at the time of signing the paper it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that the paper should not be binding until plaintiff should procure 20 signatures thereto, but the evidence was excluded. Defendant asked the court to charge the jury that plaintiff could not recover, as his action was brought before the cause of action had accrued, the action having been commenced in April, 1892, and the paper showing that the scholastic year did not terminate until May or June, 1892, and that therefore the money was not due, if at all, until May or June, 1892, when the service contracted for was fully performed. The court held that the money was due when the contract was made, or at least at the beginning of the session, according to the legal construction of the said paper, and refused to give the instruction, and also refused to charge that the action was prematurely brought.

Walker & Cansler, for appellant. Jones & Tillett and F. I. Osborne, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. As the name of the defendant is the last on the instrument, it cannot be claimed that the other parties signed it in reference to his becoming a party. Neither does it appear that any specific sum was to be raised, so that the release of the defendant would increase the liability of the others. This being so, it was competent for the defendant to show that, although he signed the instrument, it was not to go into effect as to him until the plaintiff had procured the signatures of 20 others to the same. This does not contradict the terms of the writing, but amounts to a collateral agreement postponing its legal operation until the happening of a contingency. Penniman v. Alexander, 111 N. C. 427, 16 S. E. 408. The contract sued upon is a special and entire contract, and must be performed before the plaintiff can recover. The scholastic year ended on the 1st of June, 1892, and this action was brought in April of that year. We think the action was prematurely brought. Brewer v. Tysor, 3 Jones, (N. C.) 180; Lawing v. Rinties, 97 N. C. 350, 2 S. E. 252. We have examined the authorities cited by plaintiff's counsel, and are of the opinion that they do not sustain his contentions. There must be a new trial.

BURWELL, J., having been of counsel. did not sit.

BAIRD v. RICHMOND & D. R. CO.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—ALLOWANCE BY STATE COURT.

Plaintiff being a resident of the state and judicial district, defendant, a nonresident corporation, obtained from the United States circuit court a writ of certiorari to remove the cause from the state court on the ground of prejudice and local influence, filed a certified copy of its petition and affidavit in the state court, and there moved for an order adjudging that the court would proceed no further in the cause, and that the clerk should certify the record to the United States circuit court. The judge declined to sign the order or permit the removal. Held that, the record showing on its face good ground for removal, defendant's procedure was correct, and the court should have granted an order for removal.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; Armfield, Judge.

Action by W. L. Baird, administrator of the estate of Rufus Hemphill, deceased, against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, for damages for personal injuries. From an order refusing to permit removal of the cause to the United States circuit court, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Busbee & Busbee, for appellant. J. D. Murphy, for appellee.

EVERY, J. Where it appears by affidavit and petition, as prescribed by the act of congress, that the circuit court of the United States has jurisdiction of the parties to, and subject-matter of, a suit pending in the state court, and that on account of prejudice and local influence the petitioner will not be able to obtain justice in the court in which the action has been brought, or in any other state court to which it may be removed under the laws of the state, the federal court, if satisfied as to the sufficiency of the proof of prejudice and local influence adverse to the petitioner, may grant the order of removal. In reference to the practice in such cases, Foster, after calling attention to the fact that it is not clearly settled by the adjudications of the courts how much of the Revised Statutes relating to removal had been repealed by implication by the act of 1888, makes the following suggestion: "The prudent practitioner, when seeking to remove a cause for prejudice or local influence, will comply with the provisions of the Revised Statutes, and also with the practice in ordinary removals. It seems that the petition should be presented to the federal court, and a certified copy of the same, with the proceedings thereon, filed in the state court." 2 Fost. Fed. Pr. § 386. It would seem that the defendant has acted upon the foregoing suggestion in filing a certified copy of the petition and affidavit in the state court, but has gone further in procuring a writ of certiorari, and moving for a formal order for the transfer, founded upon the record so filed. The judge below, after reciting the order offered for his signature, declined "to permit the removal of the cause to the circuit court of the United States, and to sign the order presented by the defendant." The material part of the order which the court was asked to make was as follows: "It is considered and adjudged that the court will proceed no further in this cause, and that the clerk of the court certify to said circuit court, before the next term thereof, a copy of the record in this case." The plaintiff is a resident and citizen of the district in which the action was brought, while one of the defendants is a nonresident corporation. The circuit court, in the exercise of its discretion, has found, prima facie, upon the defendant's affidavit and petition, that, on account of prejudice and local influence, the foreign corporation cannot obtain a fair trial in the court where the action was brought, or in any other state court to which it might by law be transferred, and has ordered the removal to the federal tribunal. There is no ground for questioning the power of the circuit court to make and enforce such an order, since it had jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter, upon its unreviewable finding that the necessary conditions existed for its exercise, to wit, prejudice and local adverse influence. The only points presented for adjudication by this appeal are (1) whether the court below was authorized to declare that it declined "to permit the removal;" (2) whether the proper practice was to recognize the fact by a formal order, the cause having already been transferred to the federal tribunal, that the court would not proceed further, and thereby give notice to parties and witnesses that they would not again be called; (3) whether, conceding that the circuit court had already acquired jurisdiction, the defendant could insist upon an order from the state court to certify the record.

We do not understand why the learned counsel for the defendant should have pressed the point that there was any conflict between the decision of this court in Lawson v. Railroad Co., 112 N. C. 390, 17 S. E. 169, and an opinion of one of the circuit judges of the United States, since no such conflict appears to exist; and, if it had been shown, we claim the right, nevertheless, to hold to our own construction, until the supreme court of the United States shall have interpreted the meaning of the statute otherwise. If, in the case at bar, it had appeared from the petition that the plaintiff was a citizen of a state other than North Carolina, then the circuit court would have had no jurisdiction of the case, and we would have adhered to our rulings in the Bostian Bridge Cases, and unhesitatingly have sustained the judge below in declining to desist from further proceeding, and to have the record of the cause certified to a tribunal which, upon the face of the record transmitted from it, appeared to have no authority to take cognizance of the controversy. In order to confer jurisdiction upon the circuit court, by the terms of the law as amended, all of the plaintiffs must be citizens of the state where the suit is brought, and at least one of the defendants must be a nonresident. 20 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 909; Thouren v. Railroad Co., 38 Fed. 673; Niblock v. Alexander, 44 Fed. 306; Pike v. Floyd, 42 Fed. 247; Jefferson v. Driver, 117 U. S. 272, 6 Sup. Ct. 729; Young v. Parker's Adm'r, 132 U. S. 267, 10 Sup. Ct. 75. On the other hand, it is only where the petition and affidavits show that the cause is one which the federal tribunal is empowered to remove, and to try, that the jurisdiction of the state court is ousted, ipso facto, upon the making of the order by the other court. Whether the petition for removal be based upon the allegation of local prejudice, diverse citizenship, or other grounds recognized as sufficient by statute, if it appear from the application itself that the circuit court cannot lawfully take cognizance, it is both the right and the duty of the state court to ignore an order of removal, and proceed as though it had no notice of it. Stevens v. Nichols, 130 U. S. 230, 9 Sup. Ct. 518; Railway Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379, 4 Sup. Ct. 510; Gibson v. Bruce, 108 U. S. 561, 2 Sup. Ct. 873. "A state court," said Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinlon in Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 430, 6 Sup. Ct. 799, "is not bound to surrender its jurisdiction on a petition for removal, until a case has been made which on its face shows that the petitioner has the right to the transfer. * * * The mere filing of a petition for the removal of a suit which is not removable does not make a transfer." Steamship Co. v. Tugman, 106 U. S. 122, 1 Sup. Ct. 58; 2 Fost. Fed. Pr. § 385a. The constitution of the United States, and the statutes enacted, and treaties made, in pursuance of its provisions, are the supreme law of the land, and when one of its courts, in the exercise of its rightful jurisdiction, issues an order to one of the judicial tribunals of a state, it is at least a breach of judicial courtesy in the state court to refuse compliance. Id. § 385a; State v. Hoskins, 77 N. C. 530. It was error to "decline to permit" the removal upon the affidavit offered therefor, and we think that it is the usual practice, and is proper, to enter a formal order that the state court will not proceed further, to the end that parties and witnesses may understand that they will not be required to attend, unless upon notice that the cause has been remanded. State v. Hoskins, supra. In all cases where the circuit court has the power to remove, and exercises it by making an order, it may issue a certiorari to the state court, or, without asking for such writ, the parties may, upon filing a certified copy of the affidavit, petition, and order of the federal tribunal in the state court, demand a certified copy of the record. 2 Fost. Fed. Pr. § 390. It has been generally held that, upon the filing of the certified copy of the record of the state court, the federal court may proceed to hear and dispose of a civil cause. Id. Where a criminal action is removed, it is the practice to issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa. State v. Sullivan, 110 N. C. 518, 14 S. E. 796; State v. Hoskins, supra. It is not error in the state court to refuse to order the record to be certified, because the clerk was required, on request, to furnish a certified copy, and it was his duty to certify it to the federal court, in obedience to the writ of certiorari, without any motion or order made in his own court, though comity to the federal tribunal might dictate a different course; but it was clearly error in the court below to resist the order after the record had been certified, showing sufficient ground for removal. We think, also, that, when the jurisdiction of the federal tribunal attached, the order that the court would not proceed further should have been made, on motion of the defendant, for the reason already stated. State v. Hoskins, supra. If the application had been made to the state court, and founded upon an affidavit or complaint alleging only diverse citizenship as a ground of removal, as in the case of Douglas v. Railroad Co., 106 N. C. 77, 10 S. E. 1048, it would have been properly refused on the ground that the controversy was not wholly between citizens of different states, and was not a separable controversy. 20 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 995-998. But, as we have already shown, where the petition is filed in the federal court, and founded upon prejudice and local influence, if the plaintiff is a resident of the district, it is sufficient, under the amended act, if either of the defendants be a nonresident. Id. p. 999, and note 5; Fisk v. Henarie, 32 Fed. 417. Where a removal is asked upon the ground of prejudice or local influence, the order may be granted, upon a proper showing as to other matters, at any time before the cause has been effectively tried, unless a trial be in progress, when the motion is submitted, "and undetermined." Fisk v. Henarie, 142 U. S. 460, 12 Sup. Ct. 207. So that the order was made by the proper tribunal and in apt time, and the defendant took the precaution to procure a writ of certiorari, and file a copy of the record in the state court, (2 Fost. Fed. Pr. p. 832,) and afterwards submit his motion, thus conforming to the construction of the law, which was most exacting in its requirements. The order declining to permit the transfer of the cause was erroneous. Error.

STATE v. SPRAY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—DISTURBING SCHOOL—SPECIAL VERDICT.

1. To take possession of a schoolhouse when there are no pupils present, and forbid the teacher to use the building, though the school is thereby prevented from assembling, is not a violation of Code, § 2592, making it a misdemeanor to willfully interrupt or disturb a school.

2. Where the jury render a special verdict, and the court, on the facts found, adjudges defendant not guilty, no formal verdict of not guilty is necessary. State v. Ewing, 13 S. E. 10, 108 N. C. 755, followed.

Appeal from superior court, Swain county; Boykin, Judge.

Prosecution of N. W. Spray and others for disturbing a school. The jury rendered a special verdict, on which the court adjudged defendants not guilty, and the state appeals Affirmed.

The special verdict was as follows:

"The jury find that Big Cave Indian schoolhouse was built, as to the walls and roof thereof, by the Cherokee Indians, and the building thus made was paid for out of the common school fund. That the building was finished and furnished under the direction of the Society of Friends, and paid for partly out of the church fund and partly out of the money furnished by the United States for that purpose. There was in the house a box of books, the property of the defendant Spray. The schoolhouse had been under the supervision of the Society of Friends as a day school, and had been leased, so far as their right extended, to their agent, Spray. There had not been any school taught since May, 1892. The house was after that taken possession of by the committee men of the common school had in December, 1892. The school committee employed Lula Hayes to teach the school for Indians in that house, and she went in, and began to teach. After she had taught three or four days, the defendant Spray went to the schoolhouse, and notified her that she could not occupy the house to teach in until the property rights therein were adjusted. That for a few days she, the said Lula Hayes, did not teach therein. That she began to teach in the same house on the 8th of December, and taught three days. That on the morning of the 12th of December she went to the schoolhouse for the purpose of continuing to teach her school. That on that morning, when she went there, the schoolhouse was occupied by the defendants, and she asked to be allowed to occupy the house, and to teach her school, and the defendant Spray forbade her,—the defendant Blythe being in the house. That she was prevented by the conduct of the defendants from occupying the house, and teaching therein. That there were no pupils present at the time of this occurrence, and none came before she left it; but, on leaving, she met three scholars on their way to school, about a mile from the schoolhouse. If, upon these facts, the defendants are guilty in law, we find them guilty; but, if otherwise, we find them not guilty."

The Attorney General, for the State.

BURWELL, J. We concur with his honor in the opinion that the facts found by the special verdict do not constitute a violation of section 2592 of the Code,¹ which makes it a misdemeanor to willfully interrupt or disturb any public school. The act of the defendant may have prevented the coming together of the school, meaning thereby an assemblage of pupils and teachers; but it cannot be said that it interrupted or disturbed such an assemblage. The statute was contrived to put the schools of the state under the protection awarded by the law to religious assemblages, and the principles that govern the prosecution of persons charged with disturbing religious meetings (State v. Jacobs, 103 N. C. 397, 9 S. E. 404) must control this.

There was no formal verdict of not guilty, in accordance with the opinion of the court, as seems to be required by the ruling in State v. Moore, 107 N. C. 770, 12 S. E. 249, and State v. Monger, 107 N. C. 771, 12 S. E. 250. This is not necessary, since the decision in State v. Ewing, 108 N. C. 755, 13 S. E. 10, which has established what is the better practice. No error.

SPRAGUE v. BOND et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

EQUITY—ACCOUNTING—JOINT LAND SPECULATIONS —INTERVENTION—WITNESS.

1. In an action for an accounting, a judgment for plaintiff on the pleas in bar, ordering an account, is appealable.

2. When a party's declarations, made soon after the transaction in question, are admitted to corroborate his testimony, it is error to refuse to charge that such evidence is not substantive evidence of the truth of the matters alleged, but only competent to corroborate the testimony of the declarer.

3. Plaintiff alleged that he prospected and bought lands for joint account with defendant, she advancing the purchase money; that he, being about to leave the county, was induced by her agent to deed the lands over to her, she to sell and account to him for a share of the profits; that she had sold the lands, but had failed to account; and prayed a receiver for the proceeds, and for an accounting. Intervener claimed an interest in certain of the lands under an unrecorded deed of plaintiff prior to that to defendant, and as having advanced the price of such lands. Held, that she was entitled to intervene.

4. In an action for accounting for an interest in the proceeds of land conveyed by plaintiff to defendant and sold by her, his deed having been made, as he alleges, under an agreement with defendant's agent reserving him such interest, plaintiff is not estopped to show his equities in the land by his prior deed of an undivided one-half of the same to said agent personally.

5. In an action against a principal, founded on contracts made with plaintiff by a deceased agent, plaintiff may testify as to his transactions with said agent, and the latter's declarations as a part thereof.

Appeal from superior court, Caldwell county; James D. McIver, Judge.

Action by W. D. Sprague against Louisa N. Bond and another for receiver, and accounting for the proceeds of certain lands conveyed by him to said Louisa, and sold by her, in which plaintiff claims an equitable interest. Rebecca B. Adams intervened as to certain of the property, claiming under an unrecorded deed from plaintiff prior to that to defendant, and as having advanced the purchase money for the lands conveyed to her. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

S. J. Ervin, for appellants. M. Silver and Avery & Ervin, for appellee.

BURWELL, J. The motion to dismiss the appeal must be denied. The case of Clements v. Rogers, 95 N. C. 248, is decisive of the point. In that action, as in this, there was a verdict for the plaintiff on the trial of the pleas in bar, and an order for an account. An appeal from that order was not considered premature, because, if the pleas in bar were established, the plaintiff would not be entitled to an account, and the action would be at an end. The reason of the rule applies with full force here. Upon the trial, certain evidence was offered on plaintiff's part to corroborate his own testimony in regard to the matter in controversy. This evidence was not competent for any other purpose, consisting, as it did, of declarations made by him soon after the transaction, corresponding with the statements made by him on the witness stand. When this evidence was offered, it was conceded that it was only competent for this purpose, and for that purpose alone did his honor admit it. Among the instructions asked for by defendants was the following: "The evidence of the declarations of the plaintiff in regard to the matters in controversy are not substantive evidence of the truth of said matters, and are only competent in evidence for the purpose of corroborating the witness Sprague, and can only be considered by you for this purpose, and you can give it such weight as you think it is entitled to." The case states that this instruction was refused. In this there was error that entitled the defendants to a new trial. It is settled by Bullinger v. Marshall, 70 N. C. 520, that it must follow, from a party's being allowed to be a witness, that, if his testimony be impeached, he may be corroborated by showing that he had, soon after the matter occurred, made the same statement in regard to it. The rule was there established as a necessary corollary of the statute which allowed a party to be a witness in his own behalf. The learned justice who delivered the opinion of the court in that case was evidently loth to yield to this innovation, as he considered it, foreseeing, as he no doubt did, that it would be most difficult to restrain the effect of such evidence, and prevent it from operating on the minds of the jury as substantive proof of the facts in dispute. Because there is this danger of its exercising an improper influence upon the jury, it is incumbent on the judge presiding at the trial where such corroborative evidence is introduced, to see to it, even without any request for special instructions, that the jury fully understand the use they are permitted to make of it; and we must hold that the failure to caution them in this particular when such a request is made, as was done by the defendants here, entitled them to a new trial.

¹ Code, § 2592, provides that "every person who shall willfully interrupt or disturb any public or private school, or any meeting lawfully and peacefully held for the purpose of literary or scientific improvement, either within or without the place where such meeting or school is held, * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," etc.

As this cause, for the reason above stated, must be tried again, we deem it proper to say that, upon the allegations made by Mrs. Rebecca B. Adams in her pleadings filed, we think she is a proper party to this action, and that the truth of the allegations made by her, and controverted by plaintiff in his reply, should be inquired into. Issues should be framed to cover all the controverted transactions between the plaintiff and each of the defendants, L. N. Bond and R. B. Adams, in relation to the land, the proceeds of sale of which are here in dispute, to the end that, if the facts alleged by the plaintiff are found to be true, an account may be ordered; and, if the facts alleged by Mrs. R. B. Adams are found to be true, the court may be in position to adjudge the rights of the respective claimants, and to mold the order of reference accordingly. If, at the time of the alleged contract between the plaintiff and the defendant L. N. Bond, through her agent, H. F. Bond, by the terms of which the plaintiff conveyed the land to said defendant in consideration of her agreement, made for her by her said agent, that when she sold the land she would pay to the plaintiff one-half or other part of the proceeds, after deducting certain expenses pertaining to the business, the defendant Rebecca B. Adams had an equitable interest in said land, or a right to call for a deed therefor, which she had acquired from the plaintiff, and which she then held, and now holds, by titles or contracts good against him, but not valid against her codefendant, Louisa N. Bond, or her vendees, because of want of registration or other notice, it would surely be unjust to allow him to take the proceeds of the sale, and appropriate them to his own use. It seems to us that, if Mrs. Adams' allegations are true, the plaintiff, at the time of the alleged contract with H. F. Bond, agent, held whatever interest or estate he had in the land in trust for Rebecca B. Adams. As between the latter and him, if her allegations are true, he had no right to make this sale and contract. It was valid between him and L. F. Bond, because she had no legal notice. But Rebecca B. Adams may ratify that transfer, contract, and subsequent sale, and contest, as she does here, the plaintiff's right to the fund, claiming that in equity it is hers.

It is proper for us to say, further, that, as the pleadings now stand, we do not think that the defendants are entitled to have the first issue tendered by them on the late trial submitted to the jury. The third paragraph of their answer, upon the allegations of which this issue is founded, does not set out as a fact that the alleged contract, if made, as stated by plaintiff, with H. F. Bond, agent, was made to defraud the creditors of plaintiff, he being insolvent. Its phraseology seems rather to indicate a purpose to assert the high character of Mr. Bond, as proof that the contract was not made as plaintiff alleges, because, under the circumstances, it might have been a fraud on plaintiff's creditors, than to plead the fact that plaintiff, if he made the alleged contract, was thereby intending and contriving to defraud his creditors. If the defendants intended to raise such an issue, their allegations should be distinct and unequivocal. If they state on the trial that such was their purpose, they will no doubt be allowed to amend this paragraph so as to entitle them to this issue. If it is admitted or proved that H. F. Bond was the agent of the defendant L. N. Bond

In the negotiations and transactions that resulted in her acquisition of the title to the lands which she sets up in her answer, then it would be competent for the plaintiff to testify in regard to transactions that took place between himself and that agent within the scope of his agency, and also to the declarations of the agent as a part of those transactions. This right of the plaintiff so to testify is not destroyed or restricted by the death of the agent. Howerton v. Lattimer, 68 N. C. 370. With like restrictions he may testify to transactions with, and declarations of, H. F. Bond, that concern Mrs. R. B. Adams, if the latter's agency for her is proved or admitted. Nor can this right so to testify be affected by the deed from plaintiff to H. F. Bond, dated in 1873, and registered in 1891, for an undivided half of the land, the proceeds of the sale of which are here in controversy. The defendants in their answer set up no claim to the land as heirs of H. F. Bond, but, on the contrary, assert title adverse to him. They decline, as it seems to us, to contest with the plaintiff in their capacity as heirs of H. F. Bond, but insist that they can stop his mouth by producing a deed from plaintiff to said Bond which can have no relation to this controversy, except, perhaps, to throw light for the jury upon the subsequent transactions between plaintiff and defendants through their agent. Because, for the reasons heretofore stated, there must be a new trial, we do not deem it best to discuss with more particularity the question presented about the admission or exclusion of evidence. New trial.

AVERY and CLARK, JJ., did not sit.

WESTERN CAROLINA BANK v. ATKINSON et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

ACTION ON NOTE—PLEADING—FRIVOLOUS ANSWER.

An answer to a complaint in an action on a note, which denies that plaintiff is the owner and holder of the note, is not frivolous.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; R. F. Armfield, Judge.

Action by the Western Carolina Bank against Natt Atkinson and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Patton appeals. Reversed.

The complaint was as follows: "(1) That the plaintiff is a corporation duly chartered and organized under the laws of North Carolina. (2) That heretofore the defendant Natt Atkinson made his promissory note in writing, in words and figures as follows: '$1,284.00. Asheville, N. C., Jan. 14, 1893. Five months after date, without grace, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of P. F. Patton, twelve hundred and eighty-four dollars, borrowed money, negotiable and payable at the Western Carolina Bank, Asheville, N. C., with interest after maturity at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. Natt Atkinson. Due June 14, '93,'—and thereby promised to pay to the order of the defendant P. F. Patton the said sum of $1,284, as aforesaid, on the 14th day of June, 1893. (3) That thereafter the defendant P. F. Patton indorsed the said note, and delivered the same so indorsed. (4) That thereafter the defendants C. E. Graham and N. A. Reynolds indorsed the said note, and delivered the same so indorsed; and thereafter, and before its maturity, the said note lawfully came into the hands of the plaintiff, for value, and the said plaintiff is now the holder and owner of the same. (5) That at the maturity of said note it was duly presented for payment, but was not paid, of all which all the defendants had due and sufficient notice. (6) That no part of said note has been paid. Wherefore the plaintiff demands judgment against the defendants for the said sum of $1,284, with interest thereon from the 14th day of June, 1893, and the costs of this action."

The defendants Atkinson, Graham, and Reynolds filed no answer. The defendant Patton answered as follows: "The defendant P. F. Patton, separately answering the complaint of the plaintiff, says: (1) That as to the allegation contained in the first paragraph of said complaint he has no knowledge nor information sufficient to form a belief, and he therefore denies the same to be true. (2) That the allegations contained in the second paragraph thereof he admits to be true. (3) In answer to the third paragraph of said complaint this defendant says that he admits indorsing the note referred to in the second paragraph of said complaint, but denies indorsing the said note to the plaintiff, Western Carolina Bank. (4) That as to the allegations contained in the fourth paragraph of said complaint this defendant has no knowledge nor information sufficient to form a belief; therefore he denies the truth of the same. (5) That the allegations set forth in the fifth paragraph of said complaint are not of this defendant's knowledge, nor has he sufficient to form a belief as to the truth thereof. He therefore denies the same to be true. Wherefore the defendant P. F. Patton prays judgment that he be allowed to go without day, and recover his costs, to be taxed by the clerk."

This answer was adjudged to be frivolous, and judgment was rendered against all the defendants, according to the prayer of the complaint, and Patton alone appealed.

Thos. A. Jones, for appellant, Patton.

BURWELL, J. In Hull v. Carter, 83 N. C. 249, it is said that "an answer should never be held frivolous, and judgment given in disregard of it, unless, as stated in some of the New York cases, it be so clearly and palpably bad as to require no argument or illustration to show its character; or, in other words, such as to be capable of being pronounced frivolous, or indicative of bad faith in the pleader on bare inspection." It cannot be said that this answer on bare inspection indicates bad faith in the pleader, for in the fourth paragraph it formally denies that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of the note sued on, and thus properly put him to proof of that fact, which is essential to his recovery. True, that fact may be established by the mere production of the note on the trial of the issue thus raised, (Pugh v. Grant, 86 N. C. 39;) but by the rules of evidence, under the pleadings in this action, that formal act must be done before the defendant is required to rebut the presumption of ownership which arises from the mere possession of the instrument. Pugh v. Grant, supra. Error.

MORRISON v. McDONALD.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1893.)

OPENING JUDGMENT ON VERDICT—RETROSPECTIVE LEGISLATION.

Code, § 274, authorizing a judgment taken in defendant's absence to be opened for mistake or excusable neglect, did not apply to judgments on verdicts; and hence Acts 1893, c. 81, extending this provision of the Code to judgments on verdicts, applies only to judgments rendered after its passage, and cannot be given a retrospective effect, since to do so would deprive plaintiff of his vested right in the judgment.

Appeal from superior court, Moore county; Connor, Judge.

Motion by defendant, K. M. McDonald, to open a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff, Levi Morrison. The motion was denied, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant for $150, with interest, before a justice of the peace, from which the defendant appealed to the superior court. At the December term, 1892, of the superior court, in the absence of the defendant, the case was tried, the following issues having been submitted to the jury, viz: "Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff? If so, in what amount?" To which the jury responded: "Yes; $150, with interest from the — day of August, 1891,"—whereupon the following judgment was rendered: "This cause coming on to be tried upon appeal from justice's court, and being tried, and the jury having found all issues in favor of plaintiff, on motion of Douglass & Shaw it is adjudged by the court that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, with interest from — day of August, 1891, and the cost of this action; hereby affirming the judgment of the justice's court. Robt. W. Winston, Judge, presiding." Said cause had been continued the preceding term for the defendant, on account of his absence. At August term, 1893, the defendant moved to set aside judgment and verdict of the jury upon his affidavit and the certificate of his physician showing that when said judgment was recovered at the December term the defendant was sick, and unable to attend court. His honor refused to grant said motion, for the reason that said judgment was rendered and duly docketed previous to the passage of the act of the legislature authorizing the setting aside the verdict, and therefore refused to set aside the judgment and verdict.

SHEPHERD, C. J. While it is true, as a general proposition, that laws may be passed so as to operate retrospectively upon existing remedies or procedure, it is also well established that, where such legislation has the effect of disturbing vested rights, it must be construed as prospective in its operation only. In accordance with this qualifying principle, it is laid down by Black in his Constitutional Prohibitions (sections 198, 199) that "the legislature has no constitutional power to grant to a party litigant a right to an appeal or writ of error in cases where no such right existed when the judgment was pronounced, or where the right has been definitely forfeited. * * * It is well ruled that a statute authorizing the opening of judgments rendered since a certain anterior date impairs vested rights, and infringes on the judicial department of the government." Wade, in his Retrospective Laws, (section 171,) says: "The rights secured to either party to a suit by an adjudication of the matter in controversy between them are proprietary rights, which the constitution will protect. * * * If the constitutional provisions referred to were insufficient to protect judgments, final and conclusive, under the law as it existed at the time of their rendition, because there was no appeal, then they would be equally insufficient to secure the rights of judgment creditors after affirmation by the court of last resort. Litigation would have no end, so long as the legislature maintained the power to reopen a case in which possible errors may have been committed." In Black on Judgments (section 298) it is said: "While a statute may, indeed, declare what judgments shall in future be subject to be vacated, or when or how or for what causes, it cannot apply retrospectively to judgments already rendered, and which had become final and unalterable by the court before its passage. Such an act would be unconstitutional and void, on two grounds: First, because it would unlawfully impair the fixed and vested rights of the successful litigant; and, second, because it would be an unwarranted invasion of the province of the judicial department. It is therefore held by a majority of the decisions that a statute vacating, or directing the courts to vacate, a particular judgment or class of judgments already rendered and become final before the enactment of the statute, and granting new trials in such actions, is unconstitutional and invalid." 1 Freeman. Judgm. § 90; Sedgwick St. & Const. Law, 195; Potter, Dwar. St. 162, note 9. In support of the foregoing propositions many decisions are cited, but we will refer to only a few, and these simply by way of illustration: In Stewart v. Davidson, 10 Smedes & M. 351, it was held that a statute giving to probate courts the power to entertain bills of review of its own decrees and judgments had no retrospective operation, so as to allow the entertainment of a bill to review a decree of the court rendered prior to the passage of the act. Chief Justice Sharkey, in delivering the opinion of the court, said that the judgment was liable to be reversed by appeal or writ of error upon exceptions; but, as no such course had been pursued, the parties interested in the judgment had acquired rights under it, which could not be impaired by subsequent legislation. In Atkinson v. Dunlap, 50 Me. 111, it was held that a statute allowing previously adjudicated cases to be opened by a petition for review, if retrospective and intended to apply to cases in which existing remedies had been exhausted, and the judgments had become final by the expiration of the time limited for appeals or reviews, was "manifestly unconstitutional." In McCabe v. Emerson, 18 Pa. St. 111, it was held that a statute allowing a writ of error, in cases where none lay before the passage of the act, could have but a prospective operation; and this, on the ground that, as to existing judgments, it would be unconstitutional and void. In Ratcliffe v. Anderson, 31 Grt. 105, it was held that an act authorizing the reopening of judgments rendered prior to its passage was in conflict with the fundamental law. The court (Christian, J.) said: "Both upon principle and authority we conclude that the legislature has no right, directly or indirectly, to annul, in whole or in part, a judgment or decree of a court already rendered, or to authorize the courts to reopen and rehear judgments and decrees already final, by which the rights of the parties are finally adjudicated, fixed, and vested; and that every such attempt of legislative action is plainly an invasion of judicial power, and therefore unconstitutional and void." In another part of the opinion the learned justice said: "At the time the act under review was passed the money adjudged to be paid to the defendant in error was his property in a legal sense, and of this he could not be deprived, and his vested right therein could not be impaired by subsequent legislation. 30 Barb.; Wood v. Oakley, 11 Paige, 400; Den- ny v. Mattoon, 2 Allen, 361; Van Rensselaer v. Smith, 27 Barb. 154."

The application of the above principles affords an easy solution of the question presented by this appeal. At the December term, 1892, of the superior court of Moore county, a judgment was rendered against the defendant in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $150. This judgment was based upon a verdict, and there was no appeal; nor is it contended that the judgment was in any respect irregular. The defendant, therefore, can only seek relief under Code, § 274, on the ground that the judgment was taken against him through his mistake or excusable neglect. It is well settled that at the time of the rendition of the judgment it could not have been set aside under the above-mentioned provision of the Code, as it has been decided that it was not applicable to cases in which a judgment had been rendered upon verdict. Brown v. Rhinehart, 112 N. C. 772, 16 S. E. 840. The plaintiff then had an absolute and final judgment, duly docketed; and, as the law then stood, no court had the authority to set it aside. This judgment, according to the foregoing authorities, was "property," or a "vested right," and could not be disturbed by the legislature. Some time after the judgment was rendered and docketed an act was passed extending the said provision of the Code to cases in which a verdict had been rendered, (Acts 1893, c. 81,) and it is under this amendatory act that the defendant prosecutes his motion. This certainly comes within the principles we have stated, and we think his honor was correct in holding that the amendatory act was applicable only to judgments rendered after its enactment. The result thus reached is all the more satisfactory when it is considered that the plaintiff, by having had his judgment docketed, had acquired a lien upon the real estate of the defendant. Affirmed.

CURTIS v. PIEDMONT LUMBER, RANCH & MIN. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1893.)

CORPORATION—CONTRACT—REQUIREMENT TO BE IN WRITING.

In an action against a corporation for its breach of a verbal contract to purchase logs, evidence by plaintiff that he delivered the logs to it, but that it did not receive them, and that he subsequently sawed them into lumber, does not so clearly show an executed contract of sale by delivery and acceptance of the logs as will take the case out of Code, § 683, requiring contracts with domestic corporations to be in writing; and it is error to instruct the jury to find for plaintiff, though his evidence is uncontradicted.

Appeal from superior court, McDowell county; E. T. Boykin, Judge.

Action by A. T. Curtis against the Piedmont Lumber, Ranch & Mining Company for the price of logs alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. T. Curtis was introduced as a witness in his own behalf, and testified as follows: "Had contract with John L. Martin, treasurer of defendant, and resident manager of the company. He had the general management of the defendant's business in this state. He told me he was manager. Mr. Claywell so told me. He gave me the checks of the company on New York bank, and they were paid. In June, 1888, delivered 24,000 feet of logs there. These logs were paid for. I delivered 90,000 feet of large logs at $12 per thousand, 40,000 feet of small logs at $10 per thousand, at Old Fort, N. C., according to contract with Martin. I complied with all instructions given me by Martin. These were reasonable prices for the logs. He was paying more than this for other logs of same kind further up the road. He ordered me to brand all logs with his brand, P. I did so. They paid me $150 and $125 on these logs. Claywell said they were the finest logs he ever saw, and that the company would pay me soon. The large logs were hewn on two sides. They stayed on yard there from June till September. They were damaged very much. There were great cracks in the logs. They were soft, yellow poplar logs, liable to injury by exposure. Claywell said they would be shipped at once. This was in October. He did not ship the logs at once. Claywell was an agent of the defendant. I sawed the logs into lumber and sold it. I got $1,200 for the lumber. Had to move logs about a fourth of a mile. It cost $400 to saw and haul logs. The amount now due is $455. The market price for sawing is $3 per thousand. The hauling was done as cheaply as possible; so was the sawing. I handled lumber carefully, and sold it for a good price. I made all I could out of it. The first suit was brought 27th July, 1890. The plaintiff took nonsuit, and brought this action 10th August, 1892. The company never refused to receive the logs. I delivered them as directed, and branded them as directed. It was under this same contract I sold four car loads to company, and the company shipped them. I was paid $275 on the logs not shipped. Martin was there, and saw logs a number of times. The logs were to be paid for at a certain price per thousand feet. Martin never measured logs, nor did Claywell. I measured the logs as I bought them from different parties. Neither Martin nor Claywell were present. I was paid for all the logs I shipped. All these logs were for shipment. It was arranged between Martin and me that I should measure. I sawed the logs into lumber in order to get my money out of them. I swore in the complaint in the first action that the company refused to receive the logs. They have never received them. I tried to get the company to take the logs. I notified the company if they did not take the logs in thirty days I'd take them. They did not do it, and I sawed the logs into lumber. They paid me the $275 on general account. The company did not receive the logs. They did receive them by instructing me to brand the logs as I delivered them, which I did. I sawed up the logs because the company would not pay me for them. If they had accepted the logs, I could not have had them sawed. They accepted the logs by not paying for them. The company did not take the logs. Martin said he would pay for the logs when he sold them. When I say the company did not receive or accept the logs I mean that they did not ship them." J. G. Neal was introduced as a witness in behalf of the plaintiff, and testified: "I saw the logs at Old Fort. The logs were cracked open from exposure. Curtis said he was getting logs for a company, and they would not ship them and pay him. They were badly damaged. They were large, poplar logs of good quality. Plaintiff's character is good. Curtis said they had not paid him for the logs. It was in 1888, 1889, or 1890." Sheriff Burgin testified in behalf of plaintiff as follows: "I saw logs at Old Fort. They were poplar logs, large and small. They were considerably damaged. I think they lay there from June till September of the next year. Curtis said that Martin would not take the logs. Curtis' general character, good." Curtis recalled: "I measured the logs that were shipped." The following letter from John L. Martin to the plaintiff was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff: "Piedmont Lumber, Ranch and Mining Company, Morganton, Burke County, N. C. John L. Martin, Treasurer and Resident Manager. J. D. Cheever, President. C. A. Cheever, Vice-President. Victor E. Burke, Secretary. 15 Park Row, New York City. Owners of the Piedmont Sulphur and Chalybeate Springs and the Piedmont Springs Hotel. July 16. 1888. A. T. Curtis, Esq., Old Fort—Dear Sir: I inclose you check $70.58, to close out balance on last four car loads as per bill. Also one check, $100, on logs on yard. Will send order soon as possible. In great haste. P. L. Martin, Treasurer. 15 Park Row, N. Y." Here the plaintiff rested.

The defendant introduced no evidence. The defendant, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, and in apt time, asked the court to give the following special instructions to the jury: Charges requested: "(1) The defendant corporation having pleaded the statute of frauds, which requires all contracts of domestic corporations to be in writing and signed, the court charges you that the said contract was void, and you will therefore answer the first issue, 'Nothing.' And if this is refused, then: (2) The defendant corporation is not liable on the contract sued on unless the logs contracted for were actually delivered to, accepted and received by, the defendant, or some one lawfully authorized by

It. Here there is no evidence that the logs were actually delivered to or received by the defendant, and you will therefore answer the first issue, 'Nothing.' (3) The court charges you that the title to the logs did not pass to the defendant until the logs were measured, and the amount which was to be paid ascertained, and that the defendant had a right to participate in such measurement; and, there being no evidence that the logs were measured, or the amount to be paid ascertained, you should answer the first issue 'Nothing.' (4) As there is no evidence that the defendant corporation actually received and used the logs for the purchase money of which this action is brought, you will answer the first issue, 'Nothing.'" The court declined to give any of said instructions, and the defendant excepted to the refusal of the court to give each and all of said instructions.

It was admitted that the contract sued on was not in writing, and the defendant, at the time of the introduction of evidence in regard thereto, objected to the same, on the ground that the same was not in writing, and was void under section 683 of the Code. His honor stated that he would charge the jury that if they believed the evidence the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The defendant's counsel stated that under this intimation they did not desire to argue the case to the jury, and that they conceded that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover anything, he was entitled to recover $455, with interest; but that, in their opinion, plaintiff was not entitled to recover any amount, and they asked his honor to so charge. The court charged the jury that if they believed the evidence the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and the defendant excepted to this charge.

MacRAE, J. This is substantially the same action as that which was heard in this court at September term, 1891, and is reported in 109 N. C. 401, 13 S. E. 944. It was then held that there was no evidence to go to the jury to prove a contract in writing signed by defendant's officer, and hence the plea of the statute, (Code, § 683,) requiring certain contracts of corporations to be in writing, should have been sustained. After the above decision, the plaintiff submitted to a nonsuit in the superior court, and brought the present action. The cause of action set out in this complaint is nearly identical with that in the former action. The only question open, and which has not already been adjudicated, is whether the contract declared upon is such a one as should have been in writing, under section 683 of the Code.¹ When it was here before, the late Chief Justice Merrimon pointed out that the statute in question applies to executory contracts, and not to those in which defendants have availed themselves of property actually sold and delivered to them. In the present action his honor instructed the jury that, if they believed the evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. To this charge there was an exception, and we think there was error. The testimony relied upon to prove that there was an executed contract, a sale, and delivery, was that of the plaintiff himself, and was not clear upon this point. If the plaintiff had testified to the sale and delivery of the logs, there being no testimony to the contrary, the instruction given by his honor would have been undoubtedly correct. But, without meaning at all to reflect upon the plaintiff, his testimony still leaves it unsettled whether the contract was an executed one or not, and is not so direct as to warrant the instruction given. New trial.

AVERY, J., did not sit on the hearing of this appeal.

STATE v. RAMSOUR.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1893.)

CARRYING CONCEALED WEAPONS — JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT—RECORD ON APPEAL.

1. Where, on appeal in a criminal cause, there is a repugnancy between the record and the case stated, the record will control.

2. The superior court does not acquire jurisdiction over a prosecution for carrying a concealed weapon by the fact that at the time of the presentation of the indictment therefor it had exclusive cognizance of such offense, where, at the time of the commission of the offense, sole jurisdiction was in justices of the peace.

Appeal from superior court, Lincoln county; McIver, Judge.

John Ramsour was indicted for carrying a concealed weapon. From a judgment quashing the indictment, the state appeals. Affirmed.

The Attorney General, for the State. D. W. Robinson, for appellee.

AVERY, J. There is a conflict between the record proper and the statement of the case on appeal. The judge states that the judgment was suspended after a trial and verdict of guilty, it being admitted that the offense was committed in December, 1892. From the record proper it appears that no jury was impaneled, but that the defendant was brought to the bar of the court, and arraigned upon an indictment (in the usual form for carrying a concealed weapon) which was found on the 16th of October, 1893, whereupon the following entry was made: "Motion by defendant to quash bill of indictment. Admitted by the state that the offense was committed in the year 1892. The carrying admitted by the defendant. Motion to quash allowed. Defendant discharged. State excepts, and appeals to the supreme court." "Where there is a repugnancy between the record and the case stated, the record will control." State v. Keeter, 80 N. C. 472; Farmer v. Willard, 75 N. C. 401. We must, therefore, consider the case as though it had been found on a special verdict on a plea in abatement that the offense was committed on the 25th of December, 1892, as charged in the indictment. The statute which was in force on the 25th of December, 1892, (Laws 1887, c. 68), by limiting the punishment for carrying a concealed weapon so that it could not exceed a fine of $50 or imprisonment for 30 days, gave courts of justices of the peace exclusive cognizance of the offense; and the act of 1891 (chapter 26) left the jurisdiction still in the same tribunals. The later statute, (Laws 1893, c. 10), by repealing the act of 1887 and the amendatory act of 1891, restored vitality to section 1005 of the Code, which leaves the punishment for carrying a concealed weapon to the sound discretion of the court, and again makes the offense solely cognizable in the superior court. This statute took effect on the 2d day of February, 1893, and is still in force. The superior court, therefore, has no authority to try one who carried a concealed weapon prior to the enactment of the statute now in force; and, as all laws giving jurisdiction to justices of the peace have been repealed without reservation or saving clause, it would seem that offenders who violated the act of 1887, as amended by that of 1891, are not now liable to indictment. State v. Massey, 103 N. C. 356, 9 S. E. 632. The legislature has no more authority to give a retroactive effect to a statute making the punishment for an offense already created more severe—even though it is so provided in express terms—than to subject persons to punishment under a criminal statute passed after the commission of the act for which they may be indicted. The provision of the federal constitution which forbids the enactment by a state of any ex post facto law could, in either event, be invoked for the protection of the person charged. Ordr. Const. Leg. p. 223. The judgment quashing the indictment is affirmed.

REDMOND et al. v. MULLENAX.

EJECTMENT—ISSUES—BOUNDARIES—COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION.

1. In an action to recover land, the controversy being as to the right location of plaintiffs' southern boundary and adverse possession by defendant, the court submitted the issues: (1) Are plaintiffs owners, and entitled to possession of the land? (2) Is defendant in unlawful possession of any part thereof? (3) What damages are plaintiffs entitled to? Plaintiffs submitted similar issues, with two others, viz.: Where is plaintiff's southern boundary, as described on the plat? Has defendant had such possession as to ripen his color of title into a perfect title? These were refused. Held, that plaintiffs, not having shown that they were prevented from fully enlightening the jury on the law applicable to the facts, could not question the sound discretion of the court in making up the issues.

2. Code, § 2769, requires the county surveyor, on receiving an entry and order of survey for any claim, to survey its boundaries, and make two plats; one to be attached to the grant when issued, and the other filed with the secretary of state. Held, that such plat is evidence of the true shape and location of the land.

3. Where plaintiff's attorney procures a blank summons from the clerk, fills it out, and also the cost bond on its back, and, after procuring the signatures of the sureties to the bond, hands the paper to the sheriff, without giving the clerk opportunity to pass on the bond, as Code, § 200, requires him to do, there is no process, and no subsequent amendment can be effective.

4. Where the case does not purport to set out the charge in full, and the propositions which are set out as charged are abstractly correct, the court cannot reverse for the failure to give more specific instructions, in the absence of any exception on that ground, taken below.

Appeal from superior court, Henderson county; J. D. McIver, Judge.

Action by William Redmond and Francis M. Scott against J. A. Mullenax to recover land. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The case settled by the court below states the facts as follows:

The plaintiffs claimed title under a grant from the state of North Carolina to one Tench Cox, dated the 25th day of June, 1796, and mesne conveyances down to themselves. The first call in the Tench Cox grant was: "Beginning at a poplar in the South Carolina boundary line, and runs north," etc. It was admitted that the poplar was the beginning corner. The last call but one was: "Thence south 106 chains to a stake in the South Carolina line." The last call: "Thence east with the South Carolina line to the beginning." The defendant claimed title under a grant from the state to one Kuykendall, dated the 2d day of February, 1882, and thence by mesne conveyances to himself. The grant recited that the money to secure the same was paid into the state treasury on the 31st day of December, 1881. The plaintiffs claimed that their southern boundary line was a direct line from the terminus of the last call but one, "south 106 chains to the beginning," which would include the land in controversy. The defendant claimed that plaintiffs' southern boundary line was a line running due east from a point on the line of 106 chains to the poplar, the beginning corner of the Cox grant, which would not include the land in controversy; that, even if plaintiffs' contention as to boundary was correct, he had been in possession of said land under color of title for more than seven years prior to the commencement of this action.

The plaintiffs tendered the following issues: Are the plaintiffs the owners of, and entitled to the possession of, the land described in the complaint? Where is the southern boundary of the plaintiffs' grant as described on the plat? Has defendant had such possession of the land by him as to ripen his color of title into a perfect title? Is defendant in the wrongful possession of any part of plaintiffs' land? What damage are plaintiffs entitled to recover? The court submitted the following issues: (1) Are the plaintiffs the owners, and entitled to the possession, of the land in controversy? Answer: "No." (2) Is the defendant in the unlawful possession of any part of said land? Answer: "No." (3) What damage are plaintiffs entitled to recover? Answer: "None." The plaintiffs excepted to the issues submitted.

The plaintiffs introduced in evidence certain acts of the legislature of North Carolina from 1803 to 1814, for the purpose of showing that the South Carolina line was not established as contended at the time of the issuing of the Cox grant in 1796. There was evidence tending to show that the land in controversy was west of the termination of the line of 1772. There was also evidence tending to show that the South Carolina line, as it was understood to exist at the time of issuing of plaintiffs' grant, (Cox grant,) was a line west from the poplar to and beyond the line in plaintiffs' grant, and deeds running south 106 chains being next to the last call in said grant.

The plaintiffs requested numerous special instructions to the jury, all of which were given by the court, except the following: "If the plaintiffs, on the 15th day of January, 1880, applied to the clerk for a summons, and filed their prosecution bond, and the clerk issued the summons, even without signing the same, and docketed the case in January, 1889, as shown by the record, this action of the plaintiffs would be sufficient to arrest the running of the statute,"—which was refused by the court, because there was no evidence in support of the prayer asked; the evidence being that a blank summons was taken from the office of the clerk by Mr. Justice, agent for the plaintiffs, which was taken to the office of Mr. Smith, one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, who filled out the summons and bond in his office; that the summons was never in fact issued or served. Plaintiffs excepted. The clerk stated that he did not know when the entry on his docket, "Issued January 15, 1889," was made; that his custom was to make such entry when the summons issued. There was evidence that defendant left the state, and went to South Carolina, 16th of January, for the purpose, as he testified, of putting up tombstones to his child's grave; that he knew nothing about the suit until after his return.

The defendant asked the court to submit to the jury sundry special instructions, all of which were refused except the following: "The original plat in doubtful questions of boundary is evidence of the true shape of the land and of the intent of the contracting parties as to the location of the lines, and such intent, in such cases, determines the true location." Plaintiffs excepted.

The defendant testified that he went into the possession of the land in controversy on the 8th day of January, 1879, and had been in the open and continuous possession since said time. There was no evidence to the contrary.

After the evidence was all in, the plaintiffs moved that the clerk be allowed to sign the summons of the 15th of January, 1889, which motion was refused, upon the ground that the court had no authority to allow the same, it not being an amendment to the process.

Upon the question of location the court charged the jury that the rule is, if the beginning is admitted or approved, and only courses and distances are given, the lines must be run by the course and distance; but if, in addition to course and distance, natural objects, marked trees, or lines of other tracts, are called for, these, when shown, will control; but, if none such can be found, then course and distance must control in fixing the boundary line or lines. "Applying this rule, you are instructed that if you find from the evidence that the last course of the Cox grant but one is the chestnut, (144 on plat,) the course and distance from that point south 106 chains to a stake in the South Carolina line will be controlled by that line as it was recognized and existed in 1776, if found; but, if not found, course and distance south 106 chains must control, and the southern boundary of the plaintiffs' land will be a direct line from that point to the beginning at the poplar, regardless of course and distance. If you find from the evidence and the instructions given that the Cox grant includes the land in controversy, you will respond 'Yes' to the first issue, unless you shall find the defendant has been in the continuous adverse possession for seven years, under color of title, before the commencement of this action; and if you so find you will respond 'No' to the first issue. You are also instructed that this action commenced on the 15th day of May, 1889, and defendant's color of title began February 2, 1882."

AVERY, J. The court submitted the three issues usually adopted in actions for possession of land, and there was no error in the refusal to allow the jury to pass upon the more specific inquiries suggested by the plaintiff. The court settled the issues in the exercise of a sound discretion, which in that case would be reviewable here only on condition that the party complaining could show from the record that the form of the issues was such as to preclude him from having presented to the jury some view of the law arising out of the evidence. Denmark v. Railroad Co., 107 N. C. 185, 12 S. E. 54; Boyer v. Teague, 106 N. C. 576, 11 S. E. 665; Emery v. Railroad Co., 102 N. C. 209, 9 S. E. 139; Bonds v. Smith, 106 N. C. 553, 11 S. E. 322. He has not attempted to show that he was deprived, by the ruling excepted to, of the opportunity to enlighten the jury upon the law applicable to the facts; and it is difficult to conceive how he could have done so.

"An action is commenced as to each defendant when the summons is issued against him." Code, § 161. Though the paper purporting to be a summons may be informal in some respects, or even defective, in failing to contain all that, according to the requirements of the statute, should appear in it, its informality and defects may be cured by amendment, if there is evidence upon its face that it has emanated from the proper office, and was intended to bring the defendants into court to answer a complaint of the plaintiff. Henderson v. Graham, 84 N. C. 496; Jackson v. McLean, 90 N. C. 64. If the paper bear internal evidence of its official origin and of the purpose for which it was issued, it comes within the definition of original process; and the broad discretion with which judges are clothed by section 273 of the Code may be freely exercised, subject only to the restriction that the alteration shall not disturb or impair any intervening rights of third parties. Cheatham v. Crews, 81 N. C. 343; Thomas v. Womack, 64 N. C. 657. But, unless there is something upon the face of the paper which stamps upon it unmistakably an official character, it is not a defective summons, but no summons at all; no more than one of the usual printed blanks kept by the clerks of the courts. The seal of the court is evidence throughout the state of the fact that a paper to which it is attached emanates from the tribunal to which it belongs, and, though the clerk's signature is the prescribed evidence of genuineness as to all process to be served in the county in which his court is held, yet if he issue to such county a summons in the usual form, attested by his official seal, but not subscribed, and containing his name only as printed in the body of the paper, the court has the power, after the defendant has entered an appearance, to amend by allowing the clerk to sign his name. Henderson v. Graham, supra. On the other hand, where a summons was issued to an adjacent county, signed by the clerk of the superior court, but not attested by the seal, and served upon the defendant, it was held that, after an appearance by virtue of such service, the court might, in its discretion, allow the seal to be attached; as it could also to final process upon which property had been sold in another county, and after it had been returned by the officer who sold. Clark v. Hellen, 1 Ired. 421; Seawell v. Bank, 3 Dev. 279; Purcell v. McFarland, 1 Ired. 34. The cases cited mark the extreme limit to which this court has gone in recognizing as valid and perfecting by amendment defective process. We cannot extend the discretion of the court so as possibly to include a case where counsel obtains from the clerk a form of summons, fills the blank in the body of it, and, after procuring the signatures of sureties on the undertaking indorsed thereon, places it in the hands of the sheriff, without giving to the clerk the opportunity to pass upon the sufficiency of the security for costs, as the statute (Code, § 209) requires him to do. The issuance of the summons in such a case is the act of the attorney, not of the clerk; and the paper is void as process, and incurable by amendment. Shepherd v. Lane, 2 Dev. 148. Even between the parties, we cannot, by amendment, give such a paper relation back to the time when, as an unsigned and unattested summons, it issued. The seal, though not required, or the signature, though not imparting authenticity, in the county to which the summons issues, is evidence of the fact that the clerk has approved the prosecution bond, or permitted the issuance on a proper affidavit; and, when the defendant waives the informality or irregularity by appearing, the curative power of amendment may be invoked, but not when there is nothing upon the face of the paper to give assurance that it received the sanction of the clerk before it was delivered to the sheriff to be served. There was no error in the ruling of the judge that he had no authority to amend the summons. Here, however, the appearance was entered after the service of a second summons, of a later date, and in proper form.

The surveyor is required by the statute, (Code, § 2769,) upon receiving the entry and surveying its boundaries, to make two fair plats; one of which is to be attached to the grant when issued, and the other filed in the office of the secretary of state. The original plat is thus made a part of the grant, for the purpose of indicating the shape and location of the boundary, and is, of course, evidence, though not conclusive, to be submitted to the jury as to the true shape and location of the land. Even field notes of the original survey of the boundary line between North Carolina and Tennessee, when properly identified, were declared admissible as tending to show the location of that line, when called for in a grant. Dugger v. McKesson, 100 N. C. 9, 6 S. E. 746. Upon examining the record it does not appear that the plaintiffs excepted to the charge of the court on the question of the location of the boundary lines on the ground that it was not sufficiently specific. The abstract propositions set forth in the record are correct statements of the general principles applicable in such cases, and, in the absence of such exception, it does not appear that the charge did not embody more definite instructions directed to the facts in this case. The statement of the case on appeal does not purport to set forth the charge in full. We can only consider assignments of error made below, and founded upon exceptions submitted in apt time. There is no error.

RUSSELL v. HEARNE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1893.)

APPEAL IN FORMA PAUPERIS—USURY—EVIDENCE.

1. Code, § 553, (Acts 1873-74, c. 60,) provides that when a party to a civil action in the superior court "shall at the time of the trial desire an appeal," and cannot, through poverty, give security, the judge shall allow him an appeal without security on his affidavit of poverty, and advice by counsel of error in law committed, and counsel's written statement that he has examined the case, and thinks that there is error. Act 1889, c. 161, authorizes the clerk to make the order, and allows appellant five days to make his affidavit, provided that the appeal, when granted by the clerk, shall be within 10 days from the expiration by law of the term of court. Held, that the appellant in such case need not intimate his desire to appeal at the time of trial, his timely compliance with the statute being sufficient indication of his desire at the time of trial.

2. In an action under Code, § 3836, to recover twice the amount of interest paid on a usurious contract, the issue being as to the existence of usury, and the parties' testimony conflicting, it is error to allow defendant to ask his own witness if plaintiff has not sued for usury before, and has not the reputation of suing for usury.

Appeal from superior court, Stanly county; Winston, Judge.

Action by J. M. Russell against S. H. Hearne under Code, § 3836, to recover twice the interest paid on a usurious transaction. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This was an action brought under section 3836 of the Code, to recover twice the amount of interest alleged to have been paid by plaintiff to defendant in certain usurious transactions, tried before Winston, J., and a jury, at spring term, 1893, of Stanly superior court. There was a verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appealed in forma pauperis. In this court defendant moved to dismiss the appeal, "because it does not appear that the plaintiff desired an appeal at the time of the trial, according to section 553 of the Code.

MacRAE, J. The term of the court began on the 10th of April, and was by law then limited to one week. The provisions of section 550 of the Code, with regard to entry of appeal and services of notice, appear by the record to have been strictly complied with. The affidavit of inability to give security on appeal, required by section 553, was made on the 15th, and the certificate of counsel, and order of the clerk allowing the appeal to be taken without giving security, were made and filed on the 22d, of April; the affidavit on the last day of the term, if the court continued during the week; in any event, within five days of the trial. And the other proceedings above referred to were within ten days from the expiration by law of said term of court. By the Acts of 1873-74, c. 60, "when any party to a civil action tried and determined in the superior court shall at the time of the trial, desire an appeal from the judgment rendered in said action to the supreme court, and shall be unable by reason of his poverty to give the security required by law for said appeal, it shall be the duty of the judge of said superior court, to make an order allowing said party to appeal from said judgment to the supreme court, as in other cases of appeal now allowed by law, without giving security therefor. Provided however, that the party desiring to appeal from said judgment shall make affidavit that he is unable by reason of his poverty to give the security required by law for said appeal, and that said party is advised by counsel learned in the law that there is error in matter of law in the decision of the superior court in said action. Provided further that said affidavit shall be accompanied by a written statement from a practicing attorney of said superior court that he has examined the affiant's case and that he is of opinion that the decision of the superior court in said action is contrary to law." As the law then stood, an appeal in forma pauperis was required to be perfected during the term at which the judgment was rendered. But by the act of 1889 (c. 161) the authority to make the order was extended to the clerk, and the party desiring the appeal was allowed five days to make his affidavit; and it was further provided "that the appeal when passed upon and granted by the clerk shall be within ten days from the expiration by law of said term of the court." Clark's Code, (2d Ed.) § 553, and notes. We do not think that under the statute it is necessary that there should be an intimation by the party at the time of the trial that he desires to appeal. If he fulfills the requirements of the statute within the time prescribed by law, it is a sufficient indication of his desire at the time of the trial. The motion to dismiss is denied.

It will only be necessary to notice the third exception. The allegations of usury were denied. A clear issue arose upon the pleadings, and the testimony was conflicting; the plaintiff and defendant each testifying. A witness offered by the defendant was asked by defendant's counsel if plaintiff had not sued for usury before, and if he did not have the reputation of suing for usury.

Plaintiff objected. The objection was overruled, and witness answered in the affirmative, and plaintiff excepted. This testimony was entirely irrelevant, and might not have been harmless. Its only object could have been to impeach the plaintiff's testimony, and in this view it was incompetent; for, if it were true, he had a right, under the statute, to "sue for usury," if he had paid for the loan of money a greater rate of interest than was allowed by law. Cox v. Brookshire, 76 N. C. 314. Error. New trial.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1893.)

TRUSTS—ACTION TO ESTABLISH—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The fact that plaintiff consented that the title to land for which he paid be taken in defendant will not defeat his right to have a resulting trust declared in the land in his favor.

2. In an action to establish a trust in land, the title to which is in defendant, the burden of proof is on plaintiff, and only facts strong, convincing, and unequivocal can overthrow the deed.

3. Several years after the purchase by plaintiff of land, the title to which was placed in defendant, the latter prepared a deed to plaintiff. Plaintiff, under a mistaken idea as to his outstanding debts, and for the purpose of avoiding payment thereof, requested defendant not to execute the deed, but to let the title continue in his (defendant's) name. Held, that this fact was not, of itself, sufficient to defeat plaintiff's right to have a trust declared in the land, but that it might be considered by the jury in determining the intent with which the title was originally placed in defendant.

Appeal from superior court, Rutherford county; Armfield, Judge.

Action by W. D. Summers against Eliza Moore and others to establish a trust in plaintiff's favor in certain land. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Justice & Justice, for appellants. P. J. Sinclair and Armfield & Turner, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. It is a well-established principle that where, upon a purchase of property, the conveyance of the legal title is taken in the name of one person, while the consideration is given or paid by another, at the same time or previously, and as part of the same transaction, the parties being strangers to each other, a resulting trust immediately arises from the transaction, and the person named in the conveyance will be a trustee for the party from whom the consideration proceeds. "The rule has its foundation in the natural presumption, in the absence of all rebutting circumstances, that he who supplies the purchase money intends the purchase for his own benefit, and not for another, and that the conveyance in the name of another is a matter of convenience and arrangement between the parties for collateral purposes." 1 Perry, Trusts; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 1201; Bisp. Eq. § 79; Lewin, Trusts, 143. The above quotation from Mr. Perry, which is fully sustained by the authorities we have cited, is sufficient to meet the proposition of the defendant that, if the plaintiff consented that the title should be taken in the name of George L. Moore, the transaction amounted to a gift, and there could be no resulting trust. An examination of the authorities will disclose that in many of the cases the title was intentionally taken in the name of the third person as a matter of "convenience and arrangement" of the parties, and it is manifest that the exception of the defendant in this respect cannot be sustained. Undoubtedly, parol evidence may be received to rebut a resulting trust, but the burden of proof is upon the nominal purchaser, and he must establish by sufficient testimony that it was intended that he should take a beneficial interest. 1 Perry, Trusts, 140; 2 Sugd. Vend. 139. There is no evidence in this case of any such purpose; nor, indeed, is there any evidence from which we can clearly infer that the plaintiff knew or assented to the title being taken in the name of the said Moore. Neither is there any force in the exception addressed to the charge as to the intensity of proof. His honor charged "that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff," and that "the law gave a peculiar force and solemnity to deeds, and would not allow them to be overthrown by mere words, but only by facts, and that these facts must be strong, convincing, and unequivocal." This, we think, was a substantial compliance with the rule laid down in Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. 1, 9 S. E. 445, and the cases there cited. We are also of the opinion that the facts relied upon, dehors the deed, were sufficient to authorize the finding in favor of the resulting trust.

The issue as to whether the title was taken in the name of Moore for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding the creditors of the plaintiff was answered in the negative. Had it been answered in the affirmative, it is clear that the plaintiff would have no standing in a court of equity. Turner v. Eford, 5 Jones, Eq. 106. But it is insisted that this result must follow from the conduct of the plaintiff some two or three years after the creation of the trust. It seems that a deed from Moore to the plaintiff had been prepared, but not executed, and that the plaintiff, under the mistaken idea that he was liable as surety upon a supersedeas bond for $6,000, instead of an appeal bond for $25, wrote the said Moore, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of the supposed liability, not to execute the said deed, but to let the legal title continue in his name. His honor held that this, in connection with other circumstances, might be considered by the jury in determining the issue above mentioned, as to the intent with which the deed was originally made to Moore, but that, in the absence of any fraudulent intent existing at that time, this subsequent conduct of the plaintiff could not defeat his equitable rights in the said land. The principle invoked by the defendant is that, as between wrongdoers, the courts will not interfere, but will leave each in the position which his own acts have placed him. There must, of course, be some act by which his relation to his property is changed; otherwise, there is nothing upon which the principle can operate. In the present case the plaintiff did nothing which in the least altered his relation to the land. The legal title had not been made to him, and by postponing the execution of the conveyance he parted with nothing. The mere intention to defraud, unaccompanied by some change or disposition of property, cannot have the effect of depriving the owner of his interest therein. We have examined the authorities cited by defendant's counsel, but they do not establish his contention. Very clearly, the case of Warlick v. White, 86 N. C. 139, is not in point. In that case a deed had been made by the husband directly to the wife, and, being lost, the court held that it would not be upheld in equity as against the heirs of the husband. There was no valuable consideration, and the court refused her relief because, while her husband was in the army, she had adulterous intercourse with a negro, the fruit of which was a mulatto child, born soon after the death of the husband. In our case the entire consideration proceeded from the plaintiff, and whatever his intentions may have been, in view of his supposed insolvency, he has done nothing, as we have said, by which his equitable rights in the property were changed.

As to the property substituted for a part of that affected with the trust, it is settled that the plaintiff may follow it, as he has done in this case. See authorities cited in Edwards v. Culberson, 111 N. C. 342, 16 S. E. 233. We have carefully examined the whole record, and are unable to discover any ground which entitles the defendants to a new trial. It may not be improper to observe that the conclusion reached is in furtherance of justice, as the plaintiff, it seems, has actually charged this property with a mortgage to secure some of his creditors, while the defendants are relying upon a mere technicality to defeat the rights of those creditors, as well as the plaintiffs, and get the property without having paid for it. FULBRIGHT et ux. v. YODER et al.

DEED—CONSTRUCTION—WORDS OF INHERITANCE.

A deed reciting that the grantors "hath sold unto J., in trust for M., all that tract of land, [describing it,] unto the said J., agent, his heirs and assigns, forever. The said [grantors] hath a right to convey the same, and by these presents doth convey the same, in fee simple, unto J., agent,"—gives M. an equitable fee, though words of inheritance are omitted in the limitation. Holmes v. Holmes, 86 N. C. 205, followed.

Appeal from superior court, Catawba county; Boykin, Judge.

Action by Andrew Fulbright and wife against Daniel Yoder and others for partition of land. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Defendants claimed the land through a deed to their ancestor Z. T. McCaslin, who was an infant at the time the deed was executed. The deed was as follows: "This deed, made the 12th day of October, 1860, between Matthew McCaslin and wife, Margaret, of the first part, and J. C. McCaslin, agent of Z. T. McCaslin, of the second part, * * * witnesseth, that the said Matthew McCaslin and wife, for and in consideration of one dollar to them in hand paid, and of natural good will and affection, hath bargained and sold unto J. C. McCaslin, in trust for Z. T. McCaslin, all that tract or parcel of land on Potts creek, in Catawba county, [describing it,] containing 83 acres, all woods, ways, waters, and water courses, unto the said J. C. McCaslin, agent, his heirs and assigns, forever. The said M. McCaslin and wife hath a right to convey the same, and by these presents doth convey the same, in fee simple, unto J. C. McCaslin, agent."

C. A. Cilley, for appellants. D. W. Robinson and M. L. McCorkle, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. The case of Holmes v. Holmes, 86 N. C. 205, is similar to the one before us, and, according to the principles there laid down, Z. T. McCaslin took an equitable fee, although words of inheritance were omitted in the limitation. It is therefore unnecessary to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence offered for the purpose of correcting the deed. While it must be admitted that the doctrine of the above-mentioned case is not supported by text writers or the previous decisions of this court, yet it is believed to be founded upon more equitable principles in arriving at the real intention of the grantor. It is also in accord with the spirit of recent legislation, (Code, § 1280,) which declares that limitations without the use of the word "heirs" shall be construed as limitations in fee unless a contrary intention plainly appear. In view of these considerations we do not feel inclined to overrule the said decision. Its application to this case, as well, perhaps, as to the great majority of others, very clearly gives effect to the true intention of the parties. Affirmed.

STATE v. LEE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

"PEDDLER"—SELLING BY SAMPLE.

A person who sells stoves or ranges by sample and taking orders is not a "peddler," and is not subject to the tax of $50 annually "on every itinerant person or company peddling clocks, stoves or ranges," provided for by Acts 1893, c. 294, § 28.

Appeal from superior court, Yancey county; Boykin, Judge.

E. N. S. Lee was acquitted of the charge of peddling stoves or ranges without paying the tax or obtaining the license required by Acts 1893, c. 294, and the state appeals. Affirmed.

The Attorney General, for the State. G. S. Ferguson, for appellee.

CLARK, J. Whether the taxing of the occupation of selling "clocks, stoves or ranges" by sample, under the state of facts found by the special verdict in this case, and whether to do so would be an interference with interstate commerce, is an interesting question. There are cases which would seem to indicate that the state could lawfully collect such tax upon the facts here found to exist, if the legislature had seen fit to impose it. Machine Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676; State v. French, 109 N. C. 722, 14 S. E. 383. But we need not, and do not, pass upon that point.

The tax, for the failure to pay which the defendant is on trial, is that which is levied by section 28, c. 294, Acts 1893, which provides: "On every itinerant person or company peddling clocks, stoves or ranges, fifty dollars annually on each wagon (if wagons are used) in each county where he or they may peddle. If wagons are not used the tax shall be paid on each agent." The special verdict finds that the defendant sold the ranges by a sample range which he carried around in his wagon, and that he "did not sell any sample range." The tax is laid only on "peddling," and the defendant did not peddle his ranges. The usual and ordinary signification of that word indicates the occupation of an itinerant vendor of goods, who sells and delivers the identical goods he carries with him, and not the business of selling by sample, and taking orders for goods to be thereafter delivered, and to be paid for wholly, or in part, upon their subsequent delivery. Webster's International Dictionary defines "peddle:" "To sell from place to place; to retail by carrying around from customer to customer; to hawk. Hence, to retail in very small quantities." Also: "To travel about with wares for sale; to go from place to place, or from house to house, for the purpose of retailing goods; as, to peddle without a license." Worcester defines it simply: "To carry about and sell; to retail as a peddler." To the same purport are the other dictionaries. As the defendant did not "carry about and sell" the ranges, but sold only by sample, he did not violate the statute by failure to pay the tax upon the business of "peddling ranges." No error.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—FAILURE TO FILE TRANSCRIPT.

Under Sup. Ct. Rule 17, (12 S. E. vi.) providing that, if appellant shall fail to file a transcript of the record before the call of causes from the district from which his cause comes is concluded, appellee may move to docket and dismiss the appeal, a motion to docket and dismiss for failure to file the transcript, made after the close of the call of the docket of the district to which the appeal belongs, and after the appeal is docketed, is too late, and will be denied.

Action by Joel Triplett against John P. Foster and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Plaintiff moves to dismiss. Motion denied.

Cranor & Buxton, for appellee.

CLARK, J. This is a motion to docket and dismiss, under rule 17.¹ This motion was not made at the close of the call of the docket of the district to which it belongs, but since; and now, during the same term, being the first term of this court after the trial below. the appellant has brought up the transcript of the appeal, and docketed the same. This brings the case directly under Bryan v. Moring, 99 N. C. 16, 5 S. E. 739, as explained in Bailey v. Brown, 105 N. C. 127, on page 130, 10 S. E. 1054. If, notwithstanding his failure to docket in time for argument at this term, the appellant thus obtains a delay of six months, the appellee himself has been negligent in not moving to docket and dismiss at the close of the call of causes from that district, as he might have done. "Vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subveniunt." Motion denied.

¹ Sup. Ct. Rule 17 provides that "if the appellant in a civil action shall fail to bring up and file a transcript of the record before the call of causes from the district from which it comes is concluded, during the week appropriated to the district, at a term of this court in which such transcript is required to be filed, the appellee, on exhibiting the certificate of the clerk of the court from which the appeal comes, showing the names of the parties thereto, the time when the judgment and appeal were taken, the name of the appellant, and the date of the settling of the case on appeal, if any has been filed, and filing said certificate or a certified transcript of the record in this court, may move to have the appeal docketed and dismissed at appellant's cost with leave to the appellant during the term and after notice to the appellee to apply for the redocketing of the cause; and if an appellant shall fail to file transcript of the record of his appeal within the time he might do so, so that the appeal shall stand for argument at the term to which it is taken, the appellee may move, during the week assigned to the district, to dismiss the same as above provided, and his motion shall be allowed unless reasonable excuse for such failure shall be shown within such time as the court may direct, in which case the court may deny the motion and allow a continuance."

WILSON et al. v. CRAIG.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

INJUNCTION—VIOLATION—CONTEMPT—RES JUDICATA.

A judgment overruling a motion to attach defendant for an alleged contempt in violating an injunction, and dismissing the rule to show cause, not having been appealed from, is an adjudication that defendant was not guilty of the contempt charged, and a bar to a subsequent motion to punish for an alleged contempt on an affidavit identical with that used in the first proceeding.

Appeal from superior court, Yancey county; E. T. Boykin, Judge.

Action by J. W. Wilson and others against Locke Craig for an injunction. An injunction having been granted, plaintiffs moved to attach defendant for contempt in violating the same. The motion was overruled, and the rule to show cause discharged, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

T. W. Mason and R. O. Burton, for appellants. W. J. Peele, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. It is conceded that the plaintiffs' affidavit, upon which this motion to attach the defendant for contempt because of an alleged disobedience of an injunction order of the superior court, is identical with the affidavit upon which a similar proceeding was prosecuted against the defendant in 1892, before his honor, Judge Graves. The record shows that that proceeding was terminated by the following judgment: "Motion to attach defendant for contempt of court. Motion overruled. Rule dismissed." From this judgment there was no appeal. It therefore stands as an adjudication in defendant's favor of the very matter which plaintiffs seek again to have considered. The plaintiffs' affidavit filed in that proceeding, the defendant's answer thereto, and that entry constitute a complete defense against the plaintiffs' further prosecution of this matter. It is an adjudication that the defendant was not guilty of the contempt charged against him then and now. If the plaintiffs were for any cause dissatisfied with that decision, they should have appealed from that judgment. No error.

AVERY, J., did not sit on the hearing of this case.

STATE v. WHITT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

JURY—CHALLENGE TO ARRAY—HOMICIDE—AIDING AND ABETTING—ACQUITTAL OF PERSON KILLING—EVIDENCE.

1. The fact that one of the men named on the list of a special venire was dead, and another had removed from the county, is not ground for a challenge to the array.

2. Neither is the fact that the sheriff was allowed to amend his return, showing the summoning of 150 men, so as to show who were summoned, and who not, and the reason they were not summoned, ground for challenge to the array.

3. Nor is it ground for such challenge that one named on the venire was not summoned, or that, by mistake in copying the list of the venire, the name of one was omitted, so that he was not summoned.

4. One may be convicted of murder in the second degree for aiding and abetting, though the person who did the killing has been acquitted.

5. Testimony that, a few minutes after a fight, deceased told witness that he was shot in several places; that he thought he was killed; and that he believed he could feel the blood running inside of him,—though not part of the res gestae, is admissible.

Appeal from criminal court, Buncombe county; Thos. A. Jones, Judge.

George Whitt was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. A. Webb, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. The prisoner was indicted for murder, and was convicted of murder in the second degree. There was a special venire of 150 men ordered and drawn from the box by the court. Code, § 1739; State v. Brogden, 111 N. C. 656, 16 S. E. 170. The prisoner challenged the array: (1) Because one of the men named on the special venire had removed from the county, and another was dead at the time the jury list had been revised by the county commissioners. (2) Because the sheriff had indorsed on the writ and list of special venire, "Received 25th October, 1890, executed 30th October, 1890, by summoning a jury of 150 men." The solicitor moved that the sheriff be allowed to amend his return, so as to show those of the list furnished him by the clerk who were actually summoned, and those of said list not summoned, with the reasons why they were not. The sheriff was permitted to amend his return as moved, and the prisoner again excepted. (3) Because one of those named on the venire was not summoned. (4) Because the sheriff, in copying the list of the venire, by mistake, failed to copy the name of one man, who, in consequence, was not summoned. The jury was selected before the prisoner had exhausted his peremptory challenges.

1. The first ground of exception was expressly held adversely to the prisoner in State v. Hensley, 94 N. C. 1021. The amendment of the sheriff's return was in the discretion of the court at this term, and removed the second ground of objection, if it had any merit. The other two grounds assigned likewise did not "affect the integrity and fairness of the entire panel," and were properly disallowed. State v. Hensley, supra. The prisoner excepted because the court refused to charge the jury that there was not sufficient evidence to go to them to show a conspiracy between the prisoner and John Llewellyn to murder the deceased. A consideration of the evidence sent up justifies such refusal. The prisoner also excepted to the charge of the court, in that the court charged that, "if the jury should find from the evidence that there was no conspiracy between the prisoner and John Llewellyn, it would then be their duty to consider whether he was an aider and abetter in the killing of Charles Brockers,—that is, as principal in the second degree,—and in determining that fact they should not be influenced by the fact that John Llewellyn had been acquitted of the murder of Brockers; that the acquittal of John Llewellyn should have nothing to do with their verdict in this case." Brockers was a deputy marshal, who had arrested John Llewellyn on a warrant, and had been killed in attempting to carry him to jail. John Llewellyn and his father had been tried and acquitted. The prisoner was charged, not as an accessory before or after the fact, but as a coprincipal. What another jury had done as to Llewellyn was inadmissible for or against one charged as a principal. The case of State v. Jones, 101 N. C. 719, 8 S. E. 147, therefore, has no application. A principal in the second degree is not an accessory, but a coprincipal. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 604, (4.) Even if the prisoner had been charged as principal in the second degree, he could have been convicted when the principal in the first degree had been acquitted. 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 222, note 2, and numerous cases there cited; 9 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 574, note 2.

2. The prisoner further excepted because the court charged the jury "that, in order to find the prisoner guilty as a principal in the second degree, the jury must be satisfied, from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he actually aided and abetted John Llewellyn in the killing of Brockers. That if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, from all the evidence, that the deceased was murdered by John Llewellyn; and that, just before the fight begun, the prisoner stood at the northeast corner of the house, with a pistol in his hand; and that John Llewellyn came to the door with a pistol in his hand, and the prisoner then said to him, 'You can go to Marshall if you want to go, and, if you don't you need not. By G—d, I am here;' and that this was said for the purpose of encouraging John Llewellyn to resist a lawful arrest by the deceased; and that, during the fight that ensued, the prisoner had a pistol in his hand, prepared and ready to assist John Llewellyn if it should become necessary; and that he stood near the witness Samuel Cox, cocking his pistol backward and forward twice, either for the purpose of preventing the said Cox from assisting Brockers in the arrest, or for the purpose of showing John Llewellyn that he was prepared to assist him, or encouraging him in resisting arrest; and that, by reason of such action and words and behavior, the said John Llewellyn was encouraged and assured by the prisoner,—that, then, this would be an aiding and abetting by the prisoner, and he would be guilty as a principal in the second degree, whether he fired the fatal shot or not, and could be convicted of murder in the second degree." Wallis' Case, 1 Salk. 334, is an authority exactly in point. He was tried at Old Bailey in 1703. The indictment was against A. for murder, and against Wallis and others as persons present aiding and abetting A. therein. A. was first tried, and acquitted. When Wallis was afterwards put on trial and convicted, Holt, C. J., determined that though the indictment be against the prisoner for aiding and assisting and abetting A., who was acquitted, yet the indictment and trial of that prisoner (Wallis) was well enough, for all are principals, and it is not material who actually did the murder. Brown v. State, 28 Ga. 199; 9 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 570. Indeed, as is said by Dr. Wharton, (1 Crim. Law, 9th Ed., 221:) "The distinction between principals in the first and second degree is a distinction without a difference." To same effect is 1 Bish. Crim. Law, (8th Ed.) § 604, and other authorities.

The solicitor asked the witness Cox: "What did Brockers say to you immediately after the fight about his having a wound?" The prisoner objected, on the ground that, not being a part of the res gestae, and not having been made in the presence of the prisoner, it was incompetent. The court ruled, after preliminary inquiry, that what Brockers then said to the witness about his feelings or the nature of the wound he had received was competent, but anything that he said about the fight was incompetent. The witness then testified that "not over ten minutes after the fight, and about 100 or 150 yards from the place of the fight, as soon as he and Brockers had gotten on their horses, Brockers asked him if he was shot. Witness told him 'No,' and asked Brockers if he was. He said, 'Yes,' he thought he was killed. Witness then asked him where he was shot, and he said through the leg, the arm, and the thigh, and the body, and that he believed he could feel the blood running inside of him." The prisoner excepted. It was also in evidence that Brockers died within 48 hours from the wounds received on that occasion. The court correctly held that the conversation was not a part of the res gestae. Cockburn, C. J., in Reg. v. Beddingfield, 14 Cox, Crim. Cas. 341; Rosc. Crim. Ev. 26, 29, and cases there cited; State v. Frazier, 1 Houst. Crim. Cas. 176; Jones v. State, 71 Ind. 66. Upon the evidence, it would seem that the court might well have held these dying declarations, and have admitted what it excluded, to wit, Brockers' statement of the transaction. State v. Mills, 91 N. C. 581, on page 594. The declarations of the deceased were, however, only admitted by the court as to the statement of his condition,—that he thought he was killed, and believed he could feel the blood running inside, and locating the wounds he had received. The latter were sufficiently proved by uncontradicted evidence, and, as it is not seriously controverted they caused the death, we do not see how the recital of them by the deceased, nor his statement of the intensity of his suffering therefrom, as that he thought he was killed, and could feel the blood running inside, could have possibly prejudiced the prisoner. Besides, such statements, not containing any reference to the transaction in which the wounds were received, are competent as natural evidence. 21 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 103; Insurance Co. v. Mosley, 8 Wall. 397; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 102. No error.

SHEPHERD, C. J., being absent, did not participate in the decision of this case.

WARD et ux. v. SUGG. et al.

USURY—NOTES—INNOCENT PURCHASER.

A note given wholly for usurious interest is void, even in the hands of an innocent purchaser, under Code, § 3836, declaring the taking or charging of usurious interest, when knowingly done, to be a forfeiture of the entire interest. Burwell, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Pitt county; Shuford, Judge.

Action by Lawrence Ward and wife against I. A. Sugg and another to enjoin a sale under mortgage, and to have the note secured thereby declared void. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Jas. E. Moore, for appellants. T. J. Jarvis, for appellees.

CLARK, J. The jury found that the $400 note in suit was wholly given for a usurious charge for the use of money, and that the present holder acquired it before maturity, for value and without notice. The question whether it is valid in his hands is not an open one in this state. Such note is held to be void, into whatever hands it may pass. Ruffin v. Armstrong, 9 N. C. 411; Collier v. Nevill, 14 N. C. 30. Such was also the law in England until the law was in some respects modified by the act of 58 Geo. III., and is the law in New York and other states, except where modified by statute. Rand. Com. Paper, § 525; 3 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 117; Powell v. Waters, 8 Cow. 669; Wilkie v. Roosevelt, 3 Johns. Cas. 206; Solomons v. Jones, 5 Amer. Dec. 538; Onelda Bank v. Ontario Bank, 21 N. Y. 496, cited by Smith, C. J., in Rountree v. Brinson, 98 N. C. 107, 3 S. E. 747; Callanan v. Shaw, 24 Iowa, 441. When the statute makes a note void, it is void into whosoever hands it may come, but, when the statute merely declares it illegal, the note is good in the hands of an innocent holder. Glenn v. Bank, 70 N. C. 191, 206. Hence, it was argued strenuously that the authorities above cited were good under our former statute, which made the contract void, but that the present statute merely makes the contract illegal. It does not so seem to us. The former statute (Rev. Code, c. 114; Rev. St. c. 117) denounced the contract as void as to the whole debt,—principal and interest. The present statute (Code, § 3836) makes it void, not as to principal, but as to the interest only. It provides that "the taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than is allowed * * * shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest * * * which has been agreed to be paid," with a further provision that, if such interest has been paid, double the amount can be recovered back by the debtor. The only difference between the two acts is that formerly the whole note was forfeited and of no avail, and now only the stipulation as to the interest is ipso facto deemed forfeited and void. But the point has already been adjudicated by this court. In two cases this court, and by most eminent judges, has expressly held that the words "deemed a forfeiture," in the act of 1876-77, (now Code, § 3836,) make void the agreement as to interest. If any attention is to be paid to the doctrine of stare decisis, the precedents in our own court do not leave this open to debate. In Bank v. Lineberger, 83 N. C. 454, (on page 458,) Ashe, J., quotes this section in full, and says: "The purpose and effect of this statute were not only to make void all agreements for usurious interest, but to give a right of action to recover back double the amount after it has been paid." Dillard, J., in Moore v. Woodward, 83 N. C. 531, (on page 535,) says: "They [the notes there sued on] are both wholly for illegal interest, if the allegations of the answer be true, and, if so, then the sentence of the law is that they are void;" and further says: "The device of taking a distinct bond and mortgage for the interest does not take the case out of the operation of the statute." The opinions of such judges upon a court constituted as the bench then was are surely entitled to be considered the law in this state until changed by legislation. And in Glenn v. Bank, 70 N. C. 191, (bottom of page 205,) Rodman, J., says that "it is admitted law" that "notes vitiated by a usurious or gaming consideration cannot be enforced in the most innocent hands, but are always, and under all circumstances, void." Our own decisions upon our own statute should govern, even though a court of another jurisdiction, upon a somewhat similar statute, had ruled differently. But in fact the case relied on to that effect (Oates v. Bank, 100 U. S. 239) merely holds that the contract, being not void in toto, but only as to the interest "being legal in part and vicious in part, the former will support a contract of indorsement." But here the note is solely for usury, and, being wholly vicious, this authority is against its validity in the hands of the assignee. In 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 198, it is stated that where the statute provides that when, "in an action brought on a contract for payment of money, it shall appear that unlawful interest has been taken, the plaintiff shall forfeit threefold the amount of the unlawful interest so taken, it was held to apply to the innocent indorsee of a note, who received it in due course of trade; and, as a general rule, all contracts founded on considerations which embrace an act which the law prohibits under a penalty are void;" citing Kendall v. Robertson, 12 Cush. 156; Woods v. Armstrong, 54 Ala. 150. In Kendall v. Robertson the Massachusetts law had undergone a change similar to ours, and Shaw, C. J., says: "The former law extended the entire forfeiture to any holder of the note, though an innocent indorsee. The natural conclusion is, in the absence of express words changing the operation of the law, that it was the intention of the legislation to extend such partial forfeiture in like manner, and attach it, as before, to the note, although held by an innocent indorsee without notice. In both cases the intention of the legislature appears to have been the same,—to suppress a mode of lending regarded as dangerous and injurious to society, by attainting the contract, and attaching the penal consequence to the contract itself, whenever set up as a proof of a debt." And at the last term of this court (Moore v. Beaman, 112 N. C. 558, 16 S. E. 177,) it is said: "The contract, usury being pleaded, is simply a loan of money which in law bore no interest." The note for the usurious interest being in the hands of an assignee, he, and not the maker, must suffer. The law regards the maker, not as in pari delicto with the payee, but as the victim of an oppression which the law has denounced and prohibits under penalty. Bank v. Lutterloh, 81 N. C. 142. If, by passing the note off before maturity and for value, the indorsee may recover on it, the statute is useless, as the protection intended, and the penalty and prohibition, are alike rendered nugatory. The victim would have no recourse but to suffer in silence. The usury would be collected in spite of the law, which had declared the "entire interest forfeited" ab initio, by the fact of "charging or reserving" it. On the other hand, the innocent indorsee has his recourse upon the payee who has indorsed the note to him, (1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 807;) a recourse which would more surely protect him, being against the party who has money to loan, not to borrow. At any rate, the fact that the indorsee's sole remedy as to the interest is against the payee and indorser, not against the maker, will cause such lenders to be more chary of shoudering off upon innocent parties the collection of their usurious contracts.

The only case in our Reports that seems mitigate against the otherwise uniform tenor of our decisions on this subject is Coor v. Spicer, 65 N. C. 401, which held that a mortgage given to secure a usurious bond might be enforced in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value. The case recognizes the general rule, but takes mortgages out of it upon the supposed wording of the statute. Rev. Code, c. 50, § 5, (now Code, § 1549.) Aside from the fact that this is held expressly otherwise in the later case of Moore v. Woodward, 83 N. C. 531, an examination of section 1549 will show that Coor v. Spicer was a palpable inadvertence. The statute cited (Code, § 1549) in fact does not purport to protect the innocent holder of a mortgage note which is tainted with usury, but the "purchaser of the estate or property" at sale under the mortgage, who buys without notice of the usurious taint in the debt secured. It would be a fraud for the mortgagor to stand by and let him purchase without giving him notice, but the maker can give no notice, usually, to the assignee of the note. There is a broad distinction, which runs through all the cases everywhere, between contracts upon an illegal consideration, as to which, the parties being in pari delicto, the courts will aid neither party, but will protect the note in the hands of a holder for value without notice, and a contract which, in whole or in part, is declared void or forfeited in its inception, which can acquire no validity by being passed on to other hands. Henderson v. Shannon, 1 Dev. 147; Glenn v. Bank, supra. As to usurious contracts, the law regards the maker, not as in pari delicto, but as acting "in chains," (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 302;) and to permit his contract which is deemed exacted under duress to come under the general rule in favor of innocent holders for value of commercial paper would be to nullify the protecting statute. The recourse of the holder is against the payee and indorser, who is more likely, by far, to be able to respond than the maker. The statute makes the "taking, receiving, reserving or charging usury when knowingly done," i. e. intentionally done, and not by a mere error of calculation, a forfeiture (not merely forfeitable) of the entire interest which the note carries with it, "or which has been agreed to be paid thereon." The note in this case falls exactly within the evil denounced in the last clause. It is a written promise to pay the usury reserved or charged on the note, and such charging or reserving is ipso facto a forfeiture, which attaches either by the taking, receiving, reserving, or charging, as the lawmakers evidently intended to prevent and head off all casulstry, for which this class of law breakers have in all times been specially noted, and to carry out the legislative intent of bona fide protecting the public, not nominally, but in fact, from evasions of this law. But if, in truth, the forfeiture was limited to the "knowingly receiving," the holder of this note certainly knows now, and doubtless did before suit brought, that this note was given for usury "agreed to be paid," and his receiving it would eo instanti work a forfeiture. Besides, if the maker should have voluntarily paid this note, the receiver of such payment knowing it was for usury, the statute gives the person "by whom it was paid, or his legal representative," an action to recover back twice the amount. Cui bono, then, shall the debtor be compelled by law to pay the usurious note, when instantly he can recover back double the sum of the party to whom he pays it, as a punishment for knowingly receiving it? Such multiplicity of actions was not tolerated under the old practice, and certainly will not be under the present simpler and more practical system of procedure. Bank v. Lutterloh, 81 N. C. 142, was decided under the act of 1866, and, to cure the defect in that act, the wording of the present statute is made explicit, and gives the action to recover back. Under the act of 1866 there was no forfeiture, as now, but simply interest could not be collected, while the "charging, reserving," etc., is now a forfeiture of the contract as to all interest ab initio. The recovery of double the sum paid is necessarily from the party to whom it is paid, for the language is "may recover back" double the sum paid, which can only be from the party receiving the money. With the policy of the lawmaking power the courts have nothing to do, further than as it may throw light upon the meaning of the statute by considering the evil to be remedied. That is thus considered by Taylor, C. J., in Ruffin v. Armstrong, 9 N. C. 411, 416: "It is not less important now than it was then to restrain the power of amassing wealth without industry, and to prevent those who possess money from sitting idle and fattening on the toil of others; it is not less important to prevent those who desire profit from their money without hazard from receiving larger gain than those who employ it in undertakings attended with risk, calculated to encourage industry, and to multiply the sources of public prosperity; nor is it less important to facilitate the means of procuring money on reasonable terms, and thereby to render the lending of it more extensively beneficial." In a matter so capable of oppression as the lending of money, the legislature has deemed it wise to regulate the limit of what is a reasonable exaction for its use, since all interest is the creation of statute. Moore v. Beaman, supra. As to lenders upon a lawful rate of interest, the legislature has looked upon them with a favorable eye, and of late years has raised the limit from 6 to 8 per cent. But there is nothing in the action of the legislature, nor in the circumstances of the day, which indicates that this is a propitious time to relax the restrictions placed heretofore upon the illegal exactions of those who would use their money contrary to law, and yet call upon the law to aid them, directly or indirectly, to secure their unlawful gains. Error.

BURWELL, J., (dissenting.) I cannot agree to the conclusion of the court, and deem it proper to give the grounds of my dissent. By the terms of the statute which was in force in this state before the act of 1866, all contracts founded upon a usurious consideration were declared to be void, and, according to all the authorities, promissory notes thus expressly avoided are void in the hands of indorsees for value without notice. By the act of 1866 the legal rate was fixed at 6 per cent., with a proviso allowing 8 per cent. to be charged for money loaned, if the contract was in writing, and signed by the party to be charged; and it was therein enacted that, if a greater than the legal rate was charged, the interest should not be recoverable. This law, as was said by Justice Dillard in Bank v. Lutterloh, 81 N. C. 144, introduced a new theory. It was an expression of the popular will. It did not declare the contract void in whole or in part. It did declare that the contract, so far as it related to interest, was not enforceable in the courts,—that it could not be collected by law,—and in effect it enacted that so much of the contract as concerned the rate of interest was void, the word "void" being used here as it is in Moore v. Woodward, 83 N. C. 531. Speaking accurately, the contract for interest in excess of the legal rate was made by that act, not void, but illegal. This act remained in force until 1875, when the legislature adopted a law which distinctly declared "void" all contracts, both as to principal and interest, if a greater than the legal rate was charged. When this statute went into effect, what are called "usurious contracts," and all notes, bonds, etc., founded on such contracts, were not only illegal, but void. At January term, 1874, of this court, the case of Glenn v. Bank was decided, (70 N. C. 191,) and Justice Rodman said, in his opinion filed in that cause: "If the statute declares a security void, it is void in whosoever hands it may come. If, however, a negotiable security be founded on an illegal consideration, (and it is immaterial whether it be illegal at common law or by statute,) and no statute says it shall be void, the security is good in the hands of an innocent holder, or of one claiming through such a holder. The case of Hay v. Ayling, 16 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 423, is a notable illustration of the difference. Gaming securities were declared void by 9 Anne, c. 14, § 1, and it was held that they were void in the hands of a bona fide, innocent indorsee. The act of 5 & 6 Wm. IV., c. 41, § 1, modified the act of Anne, and declared they should be illegal. The court held that after that act they could be recovered on by an innocent holder." It is to be presumed that the act of 1874-75, enacted, as it was, one year after that announcement of the rule of law, was framed by men acquainted with that decision, and that it was then provided that all usurious contracts should be void in order that they might be invalid in whosoever hands they might come. In 1876-77 another change was made in the law, and the statute then enacted is in force at this time. That act nowhere, in totidem verbis, declares void a contract for interest in excess of the legal rate. It is to be presumed that this enactment was also framed in distinct recognition of the rule laid down by the learned justice in Glenn v. Bank, supra, and I think much significance is to be attached to the fact that, with this rule thus brought to its attention, the legislature repealed a law which declared all such contracts void, and adopted one which omitted to so declare them. And here it may be well to note the often inaccurate, or rather misleading, use of the word "void," in statutes and reports. Parker, C. J., in Somes v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 184, says, of the words, "void and voidable," that they "have not always been used with nice discrimination; indeed, in some books there is a great want of precision in the use of them;" and he adds that, for the purposes of the case he was considering, "the term 'void' will be used to express that which is in its very creation wholly without effect,—an absolute nullity." In Baucom v. Smith, 66 N. C. 538, Pearson, C. J., said of the bond there in suit that it "was void in the hands of the obligee for the illegality of consideration;" and then he adds: "Had the bond been assigned before it was due, the assignee for valuable consideration, and without notice, could have maintained an action to enforce payment. This is settled. Henderson v. Shannon, 1 Dev. 147." Numerous instances of this use of the word "void" could easily be cited from our Reports. Justice Reade makes similar use of the word in Ooor v. Spicer, 65 N. C. 401. What he there says may well be quoted here: "Except as otherwise provided by statute, a negotiable instrument, void as between the original parties by reason of any illegality in the consideration, was nevertheless good in the hands of an indorsee for value and without notice."

If it be said that the effect of the provision of the act of 1876-77 is to make void all contracts entered into contrary to its provisions, it is to be replied that, in the interest of commerce and trade, bona fide purchasers of commercial paper are favorites of the modern law of every enlightened nation, and, at this day at least, it is not allowable to destroy, by an inference, negotiable instruments in the hands of such purchasers. The rule is, as I understand, that if the maker of a negotiable note contests the right of one who has acquired it by indorsement for value, before maturity and without notice of any defense, to recover of him the amount of the note, he must be able to show a statute that in totidem verbis declares the note to be void, or one that makes the contract illegal, and, expressly or by necessary implication, declares that this illegality shall avoid the contract and all securities given in fulfillment of such illegal contract into whosoever hands they may come, and thus render them unenforceable in the courts. Story, Prom. Notes, § 192; Converse v. Foster, 32 Vt. 828. In sections 807 and 808 of Daniel on Negotiable Instruments it is said that, "in many localities, negotiable instruments executed upon gaming or usurious considerations are upon the same footing as those executed for other illegal considerations,—that is, void between the parties, but valid in the hands of a bona fide holder;" and that "where the instrument was executed upon an illegal consideration, especially if illegal by statute, (but not absolutely avoiding the instrument,) it throws upon the holder the burden of proving bona fide ownership for value; * * * and in all cases where the statute does not declare the instrument void, bona fide ownership for value being proved, the holder is entitled to recover." The reason of this rule is well stated in Bank v. Prather, 12 Ohio St. 497, as follows: "The cardinal principle of the commercial law which protects commercial paper regular upon its face, and negotiated before its maturity, cannot be otherwise vindicated; and this is of much more importance than that one who has received the benefits of the paper should be compelled to perform an engagement which he voluntarily made." In Converse v. Foster, supra, the rule, as I conceive it to be, is thus expressed by Poland, J.: "The English statutes against usury and gaming not only impose a penalty for such illegal acts, but expressly declare that all notes, bills, bonds, and other securities given for such illegal consideration shall be utterly void. All the cases that have been cited, and all that can be, so far as we know, both English and American, upon this subject, turn upon this very distinction and difference between the statutes. In those cases in which the legislature has declared that the illegality of the contract or consideration shall make the security, whether bill or note, void, the defendant may insist on such illegality, though the plaintiff, or some other party between him and the defendant, took the bill or note bona fide, and gave a valuable consideration for it; but, unless it has been so expressly declared by the legislature, illegality of consideration will be no defense in an action at the suit of a bona fide holder for value, without notice of the illegality." A recognition of the principle thus well expressed may be seen, I think, in the chapters of the Revised Code that relate to usury and gaming, and in the act of 1874-75, above referred to. In Moore v. Woodward, supra, the learned justice who delivered the opinion says: "Under our present statute, while the contract is valid as to the principal, a stipulation for usurious interest, secured by a separate bond and mortgage therefor, ought, as between the parties at least, on plea of the illegality, to bar the direct collection of the same by an action therefor." In a former part of the opinion he had remarked that, under the provision of the Revised Code, a usurious contract was void, "in whosoever hands it might come." His subsequent statement, quoted above, seems to indicate that he thought that contracts made in contravention of the provision of the present law, which he was discussing, were illegal, and were void as between the parties, but, being only illegal, were not void in whosoever hands they might come; evidently having in mind the rule laid down by Justice Rodman in Glenn v. Bank, supra. The act of 1876-77, (Code, § 3836,) which we are construing, is in all essential particulars copied from the national banking act, (Rev. St. § 5198.) The words are almost identical. The forfeitures and penalties are the same. The supreme court of the United States has held, in Oates v. Bank, 100 U. S. 239, that that act "does not declare the contract, under which the usurious interest is paid, to be void;" and it is to be noted that this language is used by that court in drawing a contrast between the act it was construing and the law of Maryland, which did declare all usurious contracts void, and therefore not enforceable, even in the hands of bona fide indorsees. We therefore have an adjudication of the point under discussion from the highest court. In conclusion, our statute does not expressly make void notes given for a usurious consideration. It is not a necessary inference from its provisions that the legislature intended they should be so. I think, therefore, that, though the note here in suit is founded upon an illegal consideration, it is recoverable in the hands of a bona fide holder for value and without notice.

DICKEL v. SMITH et al.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 11, 1893.)

CHARGES ON MARRIED WOMAN'S ESTATE DURING INSANITY—VALIDITY OF JUDICIAL SALE—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

1. The real estate of an insane married woman during her coverture and insanity can be charged with indebtedness only to the same extent as if she were not insane, and neither her committee nor a court of equity can subject the corpus of such real estate to debts or claims with which it would not be chargeable if she were sane.

2. If the committee of an insane married woman file his petition under section 44, c. 58, of the Code of 1868, for the purpose of selling, and sell, her real estate for debts with which it is not chargeable, he is guilty of constructive fraud against her estate, and all the proceedings of the court in relation thereto are void for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

3. A purchaser of such property under such void decrees, being a party to the petition, will be presumed to have full knowledge of the fraud vitiating his title, and he will be held to be a trustee of such property for the benefit of such insane married woman.

v.18s.e.no.16—46

Appeal from circuit court, Wood county; A. I. Boreman, Judge.

Action by Hubert F. Dickel, committee of Della Doer, an insane person, against W. H. Smith, Jr., and others to remove a cloud on title. From a decree dismissing the bill as to defendant Smith and those claiming under him, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. N. Miller and John A. Hutchinson, for appellant. Merrick & Smith and Van Winkle & Ambler, for appellees.

DENT, J. The facts in this case are as follows, to wit: On the 1st day of October, 1874, Adam Hettick, now deceased, was appointed a committee to manage the estate of Della Doer, an insane married woman confined in the asylum. She had no personal property, but the only property owned by her was the reversion of a certain house and lot on Third street, in the city of Parkersburg, in which her husband, Anton Doer, held a life estate, and was therefore entitled to the rents and profits thereof, and liable for the necessary repairs and taxes due thereon. Adam Hettick took possession of this property, and collected and disbursed the rents for a number of years. In the mean time the life estate was sold under a deed of trust executed by Anton Doer, and W. H. Smith, Jr., one of the appellees, became its purchaser. Hettick still retaining possession, the purchaser brought suit in ejectment against him, and on the 2d day of January, 1882, recovered the possession and $155.20 damages. On the 11th day of April, 1882, said Hettick, as such committee, under section 43, c. 58, of the Code of 1868, filed his petition in the circuit court of Wood county, asking for a sale of the reversion of said property to pay alleged indebtedness of said Della Doer, she still being insane. The indebtedness set out in said petition was as follows, to wit: Balance due petitioner on settlement, $46; amount due petitioner, $50; amount due petitioner for services, $350; judgment of W. H. Smith, Jr., $155.20. W. H. Smith, Jr., was made a party to this petition. On the 17th day of April, 1882, R. H. Smith was appointed guardian ad litem for Della A. Doer, and filed his answer, and the court referred the case to Kinnard Snodgrass, one of its commissioners. He made his report, and on the 16th day of May, 1882, the court entered a decree confirming said report, and allowing against the estate of the insane defendant the following debts: Adam Hettick, committee, $46.37; M. P. Amiss, executor of William Spencer, deceased, $46; Adam Hettick, committee, $10.50; L. P. Neal, $5; Thomas Murphy, $6.15; G. L. Later, $2.50; Joseph Sefferts, $7; Phillip Dollinger, $5.25; W. H. Smith, Jr., judgment, $155.20, and costs, $36.85; A. Hettick, services as committee, $150.00,—and ordered a sale of the reversion to pay said debts, appointing said Het-tick commissioner to make the sale. On the 10th day of July, 1882, the commissioner sold said property in accordance with said decree, and said W. H. Smith, Jr., became the purchaser for the sum of $525. On the 14th day of July, 1882, the circuit court entered a decree confirming said sale, and ordering distribution of the purchase money on the debts decreed. No notice of the fact that Delia Doer was a married woman, except incidentally, is taken in said proceedings. Some time in 1890, Adam Hettick died, and Hubert F. Dickel, appellant, was appointed to succeed him as committee of Delia Doer. On the 10th day of March, 1890, Anton Doer died, and shortly afterwards said Dickel, as such committee, brought an ejectment suit against W. H. Smith, Jr., and his tenants, to recover possession of said property for Delia A. Doer; and also filed the bill in this cause, setting out all the facts aforesaid, to which he made Louisa Hettick, administratrix with the will annexed of Adam Hettick, deceased, a defendant, and prayed, among other things, that the cloud on the title by reason of the decrees aforesaid, and the deed made in accordance therewith, might be removed, and for general relief. W. H. Smith, Jr., filed his answer to said bill, admitting substantially the facts contained therein, but claiming that the decrees under the petition of Hettick were valid and binding, and that therefore his deed for said property was good, and could not now be disturbed, by reason of section 18, c. 83, of the Code. Louisa Hettick, administratrix of Adam Hettick, answered to the same effect. Some depositions were taken, but are not material to the determination of this case. On the 1st day of September, 1892, the circuit court of Wood county dismissed the bill as to W. H. Smith, Jr., and his tenants, M. L. & M. A. Jones. From this decree, this appeal was allowed.

The law of this state at the time of all these proceedings was that the corpus of the real estate of a married woman could only be affected or charged by a vendor's lien when reserved, or by a conveyance or specific lien created by deed in which her husband has united with her, and which she executed after privity examination. "The common-law disability of a married woman to contract a debt effectually protects all her lands from liability." "The real estate not being her separate property, all her common-law disabilities with regard thereto are in full force and effect." Radford v. Carwile, 13 W. Va. 683; Pickens' Ex'rs v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 15 S. E. 997. The fact that she has become insane does not change the law as to the corpus of her real estate, nor as to the possession and control and sale of real estate not her separate property, and it cannot be subjected by a court of equity, acting under section 43, c. 58, of the Code of 1868, to any other debts than those to which it would have been liable in case she would have been sane. Insanity cannot create a liability on real estate, nor destroy coverture, nor abrogate the marital rights of a husband. This being the real estate of a married woman, not her separate property, her husband was entitled to the full control and possession thereof during coverture, notwithstanding her insanity, and her committee was neither entitled to the possession or control thereof, nor the right to file a petition to sell the same, any more than he would have the right to file a petition to sell some one else's property to pay her debts. Courts of law have no jurisdiction to render judgment against a married woman. Such judgments are absolutely void. Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 685; White v. Manufacturing Co., 29 W. Va. 385, 1 S. E. 572. Equity follows the law herein, except as to her separate property, and then the proceedings are in rem. Pickens' Ex'rs v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 799, 15 S. E. 997. Courts of equity will not entertain jurisdiction to collect debts against a married woman unless there is a plain intention to bind her separate property. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 243, and 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1397. Mrs. Doer, so far as the petition shows, did not contract any debts herself, nor does the law permit her committee to do so on her account. The statute was not designed to change the legal status of a married woman. Hence, these debts, while they might have been good as against her husband, were mere nullities as to her. The law is that the committee could sell real estate to pay her debts. She had no debts, and the petition shows this fact clearly and plainly. It is not a question of doubt, because it is made certain by the plain provisions of the law. The law says the committee may petition for the sale of her real estate; but she had no separate estate, and her existence was merged into that of her husband, so that there was no real estate for the committee to ask to be sold. Being a void debt against an estate or thing not recognized either at law or in equity, following the analogy of the judgments heretofore referred to, the conclusion is unerringly reached that the proceedings and decrees are void, and that the circuit court was without jurisdiction to entertain such petition, and grant the relief prayed; and, had the court's attention been directed to the matter, it would, no doubt, have promptly refused the relief. But the insane woman had no friend at court.

In the commissioner's report and the decree there is included a small debt of $46, balance due P. Amiss, executor of William Spencer, deceased, on a deed of trust executed by Anton Doer and Delia Doer; but it is not shown, or even alleged, on what property the trust was, or whether the debt was the husband's or the wife's, and the husband was not a party to the proceedings, as he should have been if the proceedings were authorized by law. This debt was a charge against, and should have been paid out of, the rents received by Adam Hettick.

In addition to the want of jurisdiction, however, it is plain to be seen that the debts set out in Adam Hettick's petition were not only not debts against the corpus of her real estate, but were not debts against her estate in any event, with probably the small exception of the balance on the trust debt. The committee did nothing for her that entitled him to compensation out of her husband's estate. He took charge of and managed her husband's estate. With this she had nothing to do. The charges for repairs and taxes should have been paid out of the rents. Her husband was liable for her support and the support of her children, and her estate was not. The judgment of W. H. Smith, Jr., was in no sense a charge against her estate. It has been said that "fraud, in the sense of a court of equity, properly includes all acts, omissions, and concealments which involve a breach of legal duty, trust, or confidence justly reposed, and are injurious to another, or by which an undue and unconscientious advantage is taken of another." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 187. In this case this committee, Adam Hettick, though he may have been acting innocently, yet he was guilty of perpetrating fraud, in the sense of a court of equity, in that he instituted proceedings, and subjected estate over which he has no charge to the payment of illegal claims against the same. The law presumes that he was fully informed as to what his legal rights and duties were, and that, in acting contrary thereto, he did so knowingly, and must be held liable for all the consequences of his illegal acts, as "ignorance of law excuseth no one." The decrees, therefore, for the sale and confirmation of Mrs. Doer's real estate, having been obtained by fraud of a tribunal without jurisdiction of the subject-matter, are void.

W. H. Smith, Jr., having been a party to these fraudulent proceedings, and being fully cognizant of the debts allowed, and the beneficiary of the fraud, cannot be held free from guilt, although he may have acted from pure motives, and been entirely ignorant of the law, as this is no excuse. "Property obtained by one through the fraudulent practices of a third person will be held under a constructive trust for the person defrauded, though the person receiving the benefit is innocent of collusion. If such person accepts the property, he adopts the means by which it was procured; or, as Lord Chief Justice Wilmut said, 'Let the hand receiving the gift be ever so chaste, yet, if it comes through a polluted channel, the obligation of restitution will follow it.' This principle, of course, cannot prevail against a purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any fraudulent influence." Perry, Trusts, § 211. W. H. Smith, Jr., being a party to the proceedings, had knowledge of all the facts vitiating the committee's right to have a sale of the property, and is presumed to know the law, although his lawyers and the courts may be ignorant thereof. He therefore must be held to be a trustee of said property for the benefit of Mrs. Doer, and as such he must account according to the rules of law and equity. It is very plain, then, that Mrs. Doer, if she had recovered her sanity, her coverture being removed, would have the right to maintain this suit to annul the fraudulent and void decrees and deed, and for a restoration of her property; nor would she be barred from so doing by section 18, c. 83, of the Code, because there are errors in the proceedings affecting the very right of the case. Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1. Her committee, under the statute, is charged with the duty of preserving her estate, and granted the privilege of suing in relation thereto, and, her husband being now dead, her common-law disability is removed. The conclusion, therefore, is inevitable, that it was not only his right, but his duty, to institute these proceedings to obtain the possession of, and care for and preserve, said estate. This may appear a harsh determination as to W. H. Smith, Jr., but it is the result of the unfailing rigors of a broken law, whether through ignorance or willfulness, which the court can neither obviate nor modify, whatever may be their sympathies, or however harshly they bear on defeated litigants. For the reasons aforesaid, the decree complained of is reversed, the decrees of sale and confirmation entered on the 16th day of May, 1882, and the 14th day of July, 1882, and the deed made by Adam Hettick, commissioner, to W. H. Smith, Jr., in pursuance thereof, are vacated and annulled, and this cause is remanded to the circuit court to be further proceeded in according to the rules of law and equity.

BRANNON, J., (dissenting.) I make this short note to say that I am not satisfied of the correctness of the decision in this case. I do not realize how it can be said that the decree of the circuit court selling the land of the lunatic was void for want of jurisdiction. Under section 42, c. 58, Code 1868, the court had jurisdiction of such a proceeding. The lunatic was served with process, and a guardian ad litem was appointed for her, as might be done in any suit or proceeding under section 13, c. 125, of the same Code, and he filed his answer. Thus, the court had jurisdiction of the person of the defendants, and of the subject-matter,—the sale of an insane person's land; and, this being so, how can we say, in a collateral proceeding, that its action is utterly void for want of jurisdiction? That the lunatic was a married woman is not material, as the section is as applicable to the sale of a married woman's land, for the causes in it specified, as if not married. Of course, a debt sought to be asserted as an incident in the proceeding ought not to be decreed further than it bound the estate of the lunatic; but the jurisdiction does not depend on the validity of the debt. The bill was filed to sell the land because the personal estate and rents and profits of the real estate, after the payment of debts, were insufficient to maintain the lunatic, and the debts come in, not as the sole ground of jurisdiction, but as a mere incident, as the statute required the committee to state them. This provision is made for the benefit of creditors. The fact that a debt not binding the corpus of the married lunatic's realty is involved does not oust the court's jurisdiction of the subject, for that is based on the necessity of a sale to maintain the lunatic. I assert that under that statute an insane feme covert's property could be sold, out and out, and the decree of an improper debt does not divest the court of jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Unquestionably, this suit is a collateral proceeding, in the eye of the law. It is not an appellate proceeding. True, its direct object and effect are to annul the decree; but it is none the less collateral. Black, Judgm. § 252. If there was error in law, it was to be corrected by bill of review or appeal, not by a new bill; and an original bill is collateral. I care not that it was a statutory proceeding. The proceeding was according to the statute, and, when this is the case, the general principles of jurisdiction govern. The Hull Case, 28 W. Va. 1, is different. There the widow could under no circumstances file a bill to sell land. Pulaski Co. v. Stuart, 28 Gr. 872; 1 Black, Judgm. § 279; Cochran v. Van Sur- lay, 32 Amer. Dec. 570. Nor can I see how we can set aside the decree because procured by fraud. Can it be that, because the committee set up debts which in law did not bind the corpus of the estate, it is fraud sufficient to avoid the decree? The very letter of the statute commanded the committee to state the debts against the lunatic. Did he violate law in stating debts merely because they did not, in law, bind the land? He may have thought they did. Does his mistake of law, upon a complicated question of law, convict him of fraud? He and the creditors submitted the debts to the judicial determination of a court of the country, and because mistaken, or rather because the court was mistaken, and decreed debts against the land which did not, in law, bind it, the whole adjudication is fraudulent, and must be annulled. Error in the court it was, we may concede, to be rendered in that proceeding by bill of review or appeal; but it does not show such a fraudulent procurement of the decree as to avoid it, and hurts, not the committee, but the purchaser under that decree, by annulling it for fraud. The fraud consisted in nothing more than error of law in the court. Under this doctrine, how many decrees would be annulled, and titles set aside? Neither of these parties procured the decree by perjury, duress, or other act such as to avoid the decree. In Evans v. Taylor, 28 W. Va. 185, held that the simple fact that a party sued on a false claim—one even which he knows had been adjudged invalid—is not such fraud as entitles him to enjoin the suit. Suing on a false claim is no fraud. What was done was open, in a court of the country, under the color and form of law. However hurtful to the estate of the insane person it may be, I would regard it as many other cases must be; a hard case, it may be, but one done under color of due and orderly proceedings in a public court having jurisdiction, and therefore sheltered under a principle essential to the safety of the highest rights and welfare of person and property. If the decree had been reversed on appeal, the title of the purchaser, he being a creditor and party, might have fallen; but the point I make is that no original bill can be maintained to annul the decree as void. Hall v. Hall, 12 W. Va. 1; 1 Black, Judgm. §§ 170, 244, 261, 269.

ANDERSON v. DOOLITTLE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 9, 1893.)

DEFAULT JUDGMENT—PRACTICE—PLEADINGS—VARIANCE BETWEEN WRIT AND DECLARATION—HOW QUESTIONED.

1. Where the clerk improperly enters an order for a writ of inquiry in an action for debt, at rules, the court may correct the mistake, or disregard the same, and enter judgment as though no such order had been entered.

2. An amendable variance between the writ and declaration can only be taken advantage of by plea in abatement, and not on motion to correct the judgment after it has become final.

3. A judgment will be presumed to be right, unless error affirmatively appear on the face of the record.

4. It is not necessary to make the facts proven, nor the evidence, a part of the record, in case of a judgment by default.

5. If any part of the evidence is referred to in the preamble to the judgment, this, of itself, is insufficient to preclude the fact that other evidence might have been heard by the court, unless it affirmatively appear from the record that this was all the evidence heard by the court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Cabell county; Thomas H. Harvey, Judge.

Action by Joseph Anderson against E. S. Doolittle and others. Plaintiff had judgment, and, their motion to set aside the same having been overruled, defendants brings error. Affirmed.

John B. Laidley and E. S. Doolittle, for plaintiffs in error. Gunn Switzer, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. On the 9th day of May, 1892, E. S. Doolittle, F. L. Doolittle, and C. Molter, after notice given, moved the judge of the circuit court of Cabell county to set aside a judgment by default rendered by said court in favor of Joseph Anderson, and against them, for the sum of $636.27 and costs, in a certain action of debt in said court pending. The judge entered a vacation order overruling said motion, and the defendants in said action obtained a writ of error, and rely on the following assignments of error: "(1) The writ of inquiry awarded at March rules, 1892, in said action, was never executed in the manner required by law. (2) There is a variance between the writ and the declaration. The declaration demands two distinct debts, for which judgment was rendered, while the writ demands one only. (3) The plaintiff did not file with his declaration, or in open court, and before the entry of the judgment, the affidavit prescribed in such cases by section 46 of chapter 125 of the Code of West Virginia, nor did he prove his case in open court. Therefore, the circuit court had no jurisdiction to render the judgment entered in said action on the 24th day of March, 1892."

The first assignment is a mere clerical error. Section 45, c. 125, provides that "there need be no such inquiry in an action of debt;" and section 60 of the same chapter provides that "the court shall have control over all proceedings in the office during the preceding vacation. It may reinstate any cause discontinued during such vacation, set aside any of the proceedings or correct any mistake therein and make such order concerning same as may be just." In this case, entering up the judgment in court, and disregarding the writ of inquiry, was a sufficient correction of the mistake.

As to the second assignment of error, the defendants are barred from relying upon it by section 15, c. 125, of the Code, which provides: "In other cases, the defendant on whom the process summoning him to answer appears to have been served, shall not take advantage of any defect in the writ or return, or any variance in the writ from the declaration unless the same be pleaded in abatement. And in every such case the court may permit the plaintiff to amend the writ or declaration so as to correct the variance and permit the return to be amended upon such terms as to it shall seem just." The court, after judgment by default on a motion to correct, will only look to see if the defendants have been properly served with summons, and, if so, it will not look to the writ to see whether there is any variance between it and the declaration, except to see whether it is such a variance as might have been the subject of amendment if a plea in abatement thereof had been filed in proper time, because it is too late to take advantage of such variance, and the defendants, by their silence, have forever precluded themselves from doing so. To hold otherwise would allow pleas in abatement to be filed after a final judgment. Beckwith v. Molloy, 2 W.

Va. 477; Hinton v. Ballard, 3 W. Va. 582; Roderick v. Railroad Co., 7 W. Va. 54.

The third assignment is founded on the claim that plaintiff did not "prove his case in open court," as required in section 46, c. 125, of the Code. The defendants insist that the judgment of the court must show that this was done, and that the present judgment, on its face, negatives the fact of any proof having been introduced, other than the note. All that is required of the plaintiff is to show to the court sufficient evidence to satisfy it that he is entitled to judgment. It is not necessary to set out such evidence in the judgment, or even to mention it, as it will be presumed that the case was properly proven, unless the contrary appears. The only reference to any evidence is that the judgment recites: "It further appearing to the court from the note sued on in this cause that there is now due from the defendants, E. S. and F. L. Doolittle and C. Molter, to the plaintiff, the sum of $636.27, including principal and interest to date." Then follows the judgment. This recital is not sufficient to negative the fact that there may have been other evidence before the court, and it only seems to have been made to fix the amount for which the judgment should be rendered. Neither did the defendants, in their motion to set aside and correct the judgment, ask the judge to certify that this note was all the evidence that was before him when the judgment was rendered. The notice of protest does appear to have been before the court, both by the defendants' bill of exceptions and the first judgment rendered and set aside, and yet is omitted from the printed record. Section 8, c. 99, of the Code, makes the notice of protest prima facie evidence of all that is therein contained. Hence, taken together with the note, it sufficiently proves plaintiff's case, in the absence of any plea denying it. Nor was plaintiff called upon to prove, negatively, that the defendants had no proper offsets and counterclaims or other defenses to the note sued on. The defendants were summoned, and, if they had any such, they should have presented them, and the fact that they did not do so presumptively establishes the nonexistence of any such defenses. The object of the affidavit required by section 46, c. 125, of the Code, was to prove plaintiff's case, and at the same time prevent defendant pleading that he had any credit, payments, or set-offs, unless he made a counteraffidavit; and therefore, in making such affidavit, it is necessary to strictly follow the language and requirements of the statute. But, when no such affidavit is filed or relied on, the proof need only be in accordance with the rules of the common law. Vinson v. Railway Co., 37 W. Va. 598, 16 S. E. 802. In the case of Ramsburg v. Erb, 16 W. Va. 777, the court holds: "Where the judgment of and action of the court below is definite, and intelligibly presented in the record, and does not appear from the record to be wrong, it is presumed to be right." This judgment fully complies with this rule, and should be and is affirmed, with damages and costs, according to law.

DEFAULT JUDGMENT—DEFECTIVE SERVICE OF PROCESS—WAIVER OF DEFECTS—AMENDING RE-TURN.

1. Upon a motion to reverse a judgment by default for defective service of process on a sheriff by his deputy, the defendant, who was sheriff, says he wishes to take no advantage of such return, if defective. Though he is a plaintiff in the motion to reverse, this is a waiver or retraxit of the motion, and a release of error as to him; and, as he alone is prejudiced by the alleged defect, it is no ground for reversal as to any of the defendants.

2. It is proper, on the hearing of a motion to reverse a judgment by default for defective return of the summons in the action, to allow the sheriff to amend his return, and then overrule the motion to reverse, if the amended return be good. The amended return relates back, and takes the place of the original, defective one.

Error to circuit court Cabell county; Thomas H. Harvey, Judge.

Action by Joseph Anderson against E. S. Doolittle and others. Plaintiff had judgment by default, and a motion to vacate the same was denied. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

John B. Laidley and E. S. Doolittle, for plaintiffs in error. Gunn & Switzer, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Anderson having recovered a judgment by default in an action of debt against E. S. Doolittle, F. L. Doolittle, and E. Kyle, the judgment debtors moved the judge of the circuit court of Cabell county to reverse it for certain alleged errors, and, the judge having refused to do so, they brought this writ of error.

The first point of assigned error is that the service of the writ upon Kyle in the action in which the judgment was rendered was irregular, in that the return of service shows that it was served on Kyle by his deputy,—Kyle being sheriff,—as the deputy cannot serve on his principal; section 1, c. 41, Code, providing that the county court shall designate some one to serve process, where the sheriff is a party. It is unnecessary to pass upon that question, as, on the motion to reverse the judgment, Kyle appeared, and said he desired to take no advantage of the service of process on him, if defective. This is a waiver or release of error by Kyle, and a withdrawal as to him of the motion to reverse, he being the only party prejudiced by the defect. It is acceptance of service of the summons, and relates back to the original service. Moreover, Stewart, the deputy, made an affidavit that he served the summons as an individual, which was filed as an amendment to his return by leave of court on the motion to reverse, which was proper. In Capehart v. Cunningham, 12 W. Va. 750, it was held that even upon the hearing of a motion to reverse the judgment for defective service of process, like this motion, the sheriff will be permitted to amend his return, and the amended return relates back to, and takes the place of, the original return. So there is no ground of reversal for that cause.

The other errors assigned are that there was a variance between writ and declaration, and that the plaintiff did not file with his declaration, or in court, before judgment, the affidavit prescribed by section 46, c. 125, Code. These points are the same as involved in the case of Anderson v. Doolittle, 18 S. E. 724, (decided this term,) and I refer to the opinion by Judge Dent for reasons for holding them insufficient to reverse the judgment. Affirmed.

WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—WHEAT CONSTITUTES.

1. Where a conveyance of real estate is made to a married woman by a person other than her husband, and the purchase money therefor is paid by the wife, partly out of money earned by her by keeping a boarding house, with the consent of her husband, he taking no part in said business, and furnishing none of the means to carry it on, partly by money realized by her by releasing a contract which she had made with another party, and partly with money borrowed on her own individual note, she is entitled, under the statute, to hold the same to her sole and separate use, free from the disposal of her husband, and not liable for his debts.

2. Property purchased by a married woman from a person other than her husband is her separate property, although purchased on credit, and paid for out of profits arising from its use by her, although when purchased by her she had no separate estate.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Taylor county; Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

Action by Allen Stewart, assignee, against James H. Stout and others, to enforce a judgment lien. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dent & Dent, for appellant. John W. Mason, for appellees.

ENGLISH, P. This was a suit in equity brought by Allen Stewart, assignee of Robert Shaw, against James H. Stout and Martha A. Stout, his wife, William M. Gould, trustee, E. W. Koelz, trustee, Robert Shaw, and Grafton Lodge, No. 31, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Grafton, W. Va., in the circuit court of Taylor county, to enforce an alleged judgment lien against a certain house and lot situated in the city of Grafton, in said county, which judgment was for $540.25, and $16.05 costs, with interest from the 7th day of August, 1884, the day on which said judgment was obtained. The bill, among other things, alleges that on the 22d day of March, 1886, the defendant James H. Stout purchased from John T. McGraw a valuable house and lot, situated in Grafton, in said county and state, and made valuable improvements thereon, all of which said Stout paid for out of his own personal estate, but that for the purpose of hindering and defrauding the plaintiff, and to prevent the collection of the judgment aforesaid, the said defendant James H. Stout procured said John T. McGraw to convey said property to his wife, the defendant Martha A. Stout, who had no estate to purchase said property with, save and except that derived from her said husband; and that afterwards the said Martha A. Stout and James H. Stout, her husband, conveyed said property to William M. Gould, trustee, in trust to secure to E. W. Koelz, trustee for Grafton Lodge, No. 31, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Grafton, W. Va., a certain note executed by said defendant Martha A. Stout for the sum of $600, payable one year after date to said E. W. Koelz, as trustee as aforesaid; and plaintiff further alleges that said note had long since been paid off and discharged, and the complainant prayed that said deed from John T. McGraw to said Martha A. Stout be held fraudulent as to said complainant's debt, and that said deed of trust to William M. Gould, trustee, if there should remain anything due thereon, be postponed until the payment of plaintiff's debt, and that the house and lot aforesaid be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the plaintiff's debt, interest, and costs. The defendants Martha A. Stout, James H. Stout, and E. William Koelz filed their separate answers to complainant's bill, putting in issue every material allegation thereof. Several depositions were taken in the cause, and on the 13th day of April, 1891, said cause was heard, and a decree rendered dismissing the plaintiff's bill, with costs, and from this decree the plaintiff obtained this appeal.

The facts in regard to the purchase of the house and lot in controversy in this cause, as disclosed by the evidence found in the record, are as follows: The defendant Martha A. Stout, wife of James H. Stout, was desirous of purchasing and owning a certain house and lot in the town of Grafton, and an ice house in South Grafton, which property was owned by one John T. Whitescarver. This property was purchased by John W. Mason from said Whitescarver, and at the time he purchased said property, for the sum of $420 and certain back taxes and attorney's fees, it was understood that he was to sell the property to Mrs. Stout for the same price he paid for it; and in pursuance of this understanding, on the 29th day of January, 1880, said Mason entered into a contract in writing with said Martha A. Stout, by which she was to pay him $420 for said house and lot and ice house, and Mr. Stout had nothing to do with this contract. Said Mason afterwards sold said ice house for Mrs. Stout for $40. He also rented the house and lot for Mrs. Stout, and paid the taxes, insurance, and repairs, and was to account to her for any excess there might be over and above the interest on the purchase money. At the end of several years, this property, under the charge of said J. W. Mason, had rented for more than enough to pay the interest, taxes, insurance, and repairs, when he proposed to said Martha A. Stout to give her $150 to release said contract, which she agreed to do, and which $150 was paid by said Mason to John T. McGraw, as a part payment of the purchase money of the property sought to be subjected in said suit. The residue of the purchase money for said property was raised as follows: On the 23d day of March, 1886, Martha A. Stout borrowed from Grafton Lodge, No. 31, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, $600, and executed her note for that amount, payable to E. W. Koelz, trustee of said lodge, with interest from that date, payable quarterly. The money borrowed upon this note was paid to said John T. McGraw in the shape of a check, signed by George Brinkham, for said lodge of Odd Fellows, to be applied, as it was applied, as a part of the purchase money on the lot of land in controversy; and $100 in cash, as John T. McGraw states in his deposition, was handed to him on said purchase money at the same time said check was given him, making the sum of $850, the entire amount thereof. Mrs. Martha A. Stout, in her deposition, when asked to state whose money and from what source was derived the $100 paid to John T. McGraw on account of the purchase of this property, answered, "It was mine, my money, that I had taken in when I kept boarding house," and that no part of said fund was derived from her husband. It also appears in the testimony taken in the cause that said Martha A. Stout engaged in the business of keeping a boarding house, out of which said $100 was realized, with the consent of her husband, James H. Stout. As to the house in which she kept boarders, it is apparent from the testimony of J. H. Stout that she lived in a Mr. Cole's house, and boarded his family, and afterwards she moved into Doonan's house, and kept boarders there for four or five years; and Martha A. Stout says in her deposition that her husband paid his board to her like any other boarder, showing that he was not interested in the boarding business. It is clearly established by proof that she alone carried on the boarding business, and did so exclusively upon her credit, paying for provisions and supplies with which it was conducted. The very house in which she first carried on the business was one rented of a Mr. Cole by her,—a leasehold, separate estate. It, if not expressly stated, is a fair, if not irresistible, inference, from the facts established, that she paid the rent by boarding Cole and family, and the tenor of the evidence in other respects.

Our statute (section 3, c. 66, of the Code) provides that "any married woman may take by inheritance, or by gift, grant, devise, or bequest, from any person other than her husband, and hold to her sole and separate use, and convey and devise real and personal property and any interest or estate therein, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried, and the same shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor be liable for his debts." The property in controversy was conveyed to the defendant Martha A. Stout, not by her husband, but by John T. McGraw; and unless the consideration was furnished by her husband, and said conveyance was made to her with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of her husband, the same must be regarded as her separate estate, and not liable for his debts. The proof is clear and uncontradicted in any manner that $600 of the purchase money which was paid for this property was borrowed from the Odd Fellows on the individual note of said Martha A. Stout. This money, so far as appears from the evidence, was raised on her credit, and said note, with the exception of the interest to April 19, 1890, yet remains unpaid. This court, in the case of Trapnell v. Conklyn, 37 W. Va. 242, 16 S. E. 570, has held that property purchased by a married woman from a person other than her husband is her separate property, although purchased on credit, and paid for out of profits arising from its use by her, and although, when purchased by her, she had no separate estate. As to $150 of the purchase money, the evidence shows that it was realized by said Martha A. Stout as the result of a contract made by her individually with John W. Mason, in regard to another piece of real estate, said Mason having paid her that amount to release or rescind the contract; and the remaining $100 were realized by her by keeping a boarding house, and paid as a part of said purchase money. There is nothing in the evidence taken in this cause that tends to show that the credit of the defendant Martha A. Stout was in any manner aided or increased by her husband, or that he in any manner furnished any portion of the $600 or the $150 paid by her on the purchase money of said property. Had he any claim to the $100 realized by her from keeping a boarding house? The facts disclosed by the testimony show that she engaged in the business of keeping boarders with the consent of her husband; that he contributed nothing to her support, but paid his board to her like the rest; and the testimony of the merchant and butcher with whom she dealt shows the supplies necessary for the business were charged to her individually, and paid for by her. In the case of Penn v. Whitehead, 17 Grat. 503, the court of appeals of Virginia held that a married woman might engage in trade on her separate account, and enter into partnership for that purpose by the consent of her husband, and that she would be entitled to the profits of the trade against her husband, even though his agreement be merely voluntary; also, that a married woman, having a separate estate, may engage in trade with the consent of her husband, and may, to the extent of her power over it, subject her estate to the payment of the debts, and she will be entitled to the profits of the trade, as against her husband and his creditors, to the extent, at least, to which such profits may not be due to the labor, skill, capital, or credit furnished by her husband. See 2 Roper, Husb. & W. pp. 167-175, c. 18, § 4.

So far as the evidence discloses, it appears that this boarding house was conducted and the necessary supplies purchased on credit, and that credit was furnished by Martha A. Stout, unaided in any manner by her husband; and, when the day of payment came, the bills were paid by her. The money to pay these bills, no doubt, was derived from the profits arising from keeping this boarding house, and the surplus she states was hers, and from these profits she paid the $100 on the purchase money of the lot in controversy to John T. McGraw. The business she engaged in, fortunately for her, required no capital, but it did require credit, and that credit was the capital which enabled her to conduct her business, and to accumulate the profits which she applied to this purchase. That credit was not the property of her husband, but belonged to her, and enabled her to carry on business to the same extent as if she had owned a separate estate, coequal with the extent of her credit. Her credit was her separate estate, or rather what was purchased by using that credit; for this court has held in the case of Trapnell v. Conklyn, supra, that "property purchased by a married woman from a person other than her husband is her separate property, although purchased on credit, and paid for out of profits arising from its use by her, and although, when purchased by her, she had no separate estate." The case of Robinson v. Neill, 34 W. Va. 128, 11 S. E. 999, was one in which a purchase of real estate was made by a married woman on time, who executed her notes for the deferred payments, which notes were paid by profits made from gathering ice from a pond on the land; and, although her husband acted as her agent in handling the ice, property purchased with the proceeds of said ice was held to be not liable to be sold as the property of said husband for his debts. So, in the case of Knapp

v. Smith, 27 N. Y. 277, it was held that, under the statute, the married woman might acquire property, real or personal, by buying on credit, and no interest therein would pass to the husband, whether she antecedently had any separate estate or not. It would be difficult to conceive what benefit a married woman could derive from the fact that the statute authorizes her to take by inheritance, or by gift, grant, devise, or bequest, from any person other than her husband, and hold to her sole and separate use, and convey and devise, real and personal property, and any interest or estate therein, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried, and that the same should not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor be liable for his debts, if, by reason of her character for honesty and industry, she was enabled to purchase property, real or personal, on credit, and, as soon as it was thus acquired, it should be subjected to the payment of the debts of an improvident husband. This case, however, seems to be relieved from a considerable portion of the complication involved in cases of a similar character which have been passed upon by this court, by reason of the fact that the husband does not appear to have taken any part by his skill, labor, or otherwise in carrying on the business from which said $100 was realized, the whole business having been transacted and expenses thereof paid by the wife, without the intervention in any manner or form of the husband; and, under the former rulings of this court, the money arising from the business was clearly hers, and, as a consequence, the property purchased with it was hers, and could not, under the statute, be held liable to the payment of her husband's debts. The proof in this case being clear as to the manner in which the money was derived by Martha A. Stout with which to make the purchase of the property, and it thereby appearing that no part thereof was furnished by her husband, the case does not fall within the ruling of this court in the case of Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. 780; and, applying the law to the evidence taken in the cause, our conclusion is that the court committed no error in dismissing the plaintiff's bill. The decree complained of is therefore affirmed, with costs and damages.

BEALL v. PITTSBURGH, C. & ST. L. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 22, 1893.)

DEATH OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEE — RULES OF COMPANY — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — SETTING ASIDE VERDICT.

1. One of the rules of a railroad company reads as follows: "They [the brakemen] are charged with the management of the brakes, and the proper display and use of the signals. They must examine and know for themselves that the brakes, ladders, running boards, steps, etc., which they are to use, are in proper condition, and, if not, put them so, or report them to the proper parties, and have them put in order before using."

2. If a brakeman on a train, knowing such rule of the railroad company, also knowing that the nut on top of the standard of the brake, used to hold the brake wheel on, was off, but without putting it in proper condition himself, or reporting it to the proper parties, uses it unnecessarily to check the speed of the train, by which use the brake wheel comes off, throwing him onto the track, whereby he is injured, such brakeman is guilty of contributory negligence, at least; and in such case no recovery should be had against the railroad company.

3. Where the verdict of a jury is wholly without evidence on a point essential to a finding, or the evidence is plainly insufficient to warrant such finding by the jury, the same should be set aside, and a new trial awarded. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Ohio county.

Action by Grafton Beall, administrator of the estate of Lucian Beall, deceased, against the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway Company to recover for the death of decedent. There was a verdict for plaintiff; and from an order setting aside the same, and granting a new trial, he brings error. Affirmed.

John J. Jacob, for plaintiff in error. J. B. Summerville, for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. On the 4th of May, 1891, at 6:40 P. M., Lucian Beall, a brakeman on the defendant company's railroad, while using his brake in the city of Wheeling, was thrown off the moving car, and run over, and killed. The immediate cause of the accident was that, when he attempted to check speed by turning the brake wheel, it came off the brake rod, thus causing him to fall off in front of the moving train. The nut at the top of the rod, which holds down the brake in its place, was then and there discovered to be missing, and that part of the rod where the wheel rested, and where the nut was screwed on, was rusted, and indicated that it had been off for two or three days, or longer. He applied the same brake once or twice during the same trip. The defendant had persons whose duty and business it was to inspect cars coming in and going out, taking them as a whole when the train was made up. In addition to that, a written rule of the company made it the duty, and required, of its brakemen, that they should examine and know for themselves that the brakes which they were to use were in proper condition, and, if not, put them in such condition, or report them to the proper ones, and have them put in order before using. Of this rule decedent had been informed before the accident. On July 26, 1891, Grafton Beall, the administrator, brought in the circuit court of Ohio county against the railway company an action on the case, claiming $10,000 damages, the maximum fixed by the statute in such cases. The defendant appeared, and demurred to the declaration, which was overruled. The defendant then tendered a special plea in writing, to which plaintiff objected, but the objection was overruled, and the plea was filed; also, the general issue, "Not guilty;" and issues were joined. But afterwards, on motion of plaintiff, the special plea was stricken out, and defendant excepted. Then came a jury, which, after hearing the evidence, arguments of counsel, and instructions of the court, brought in a verdict for plaintiff, assessing his damages at $2,000, which the defendant moved the court to set aside, and grant a new trial; and the court, after taking time to consider, set the same aside, and awarded a new trial, for reasons stated in a written opinion, found filed as a part of defendant's counsel's brief; and to this plaintiff excepted, and obtained this writ of error, as allowed by the ninth clause of section 1, c. 135, (see Code 1891, p. 848,) without waiting for the new trial to be had. The plaintiff assigns three errors: First, in refusing to allow the witness Charles Ray to answer certain questions propounded by plaintiff; second, in granting a new trial without requiring the defendant to pay costs; third, in setting aside the verdict, and granting a new trial.

The question propounded by plaintiff, and ruled out by the court, is as follows: "'Now, with the train running at the rate of speed you describe, what opportunity would Lucian Beall have had, when going to turn on the brake, to have examined to see whether or not the nut was safely and securely fastened on the wheel?" The record discloses no ground of objection by defendant, or of rejection by the court. He had already said that the train was running faster than its usual rate of speed, and that, if Mr. Beall had taken time to look, he could have seen whether the nut was on or off. Plaintiff then changed the form of his question: "What opportunity would he (Beall) have to make an examination of the brake wheel?" which was also objected to, and ruled out. The witness then stated that it was getting rather dusk when the accident happened, but was not quite time for "our lamps," but was getting that way. "The wheel and standard are dark red, as iron is. He did not see any of the nuts that went on the brake wheel that night, but had seen them before." Counsel for plaintiff then proposed to ask the following question: "How did the color of the nut compare with the color of the rod and brake wheel?" but the defendant objected, and the objection was sustained, and plaintiff excepted. The counsel for plaintiff explained to the court the purpose and object of the questions; and, far as I can see, the evidence attempted to be adduced was competent and relevant. But the plaintiff was not injured by the exclusion, for the verdict was in his favor, and the court permitted a subsequent witness called by defendant to be examined on the subject; so that the error is not likely to be repeated. See Ruffner v. Hill, 31 W. Va. 428, 431, 7 S. E. 13.

Second Error Assigned. The law on this subject now reads as follows: "New trials may be granted upon the payment of costs or with costs to abide the event of the suit as to the court may seem right." Code, (Ed. 1891,) p. 877, c. 138, § 5. The court exercised its discretion in permitting the costs to abide the event of the suit, as authorized by the statute. See Miller v. Rose, 21 W. Va. 291; Shrewsbury v. Miller, 10 W. Va. 115; Ruffner v. Hill, 31 W. Va. 428, 7 S. E. 13. These questions, however, are treated by the counsel as of no importance; and properly so, unless the case should be again tried, when they may not arise; and the same may be said in regard to some of the instructions.

The main question, the only one of practical importance in the present attitude of the case, is the one discussed by Judge Paul, who presided at the trial, and whose written opinion is given below, as it appears in defendant's brief. I regard it as a fair and accurate statement of the substance of the material facts, to be gathered from the testimony in the record, cautiously restrained within the limits of no conflict, together with a review of some authorities bearing upon the point of law involved, under the doctrine of contributory negligence. But counsel for plaintiff contends that whatever may be the rule in Illinois, and in some other states, as to the duty of the railroad to furnish safe machinery and appliances, and as regards thereafter continually inspecting and keeping the same in repair, such restricted view of the company's duties is certainly not in accord with the rule in this state, as stated in the cases of Cooper v. Railroad Co., 24 W. Va. 37; Riley v. Railroad Co., 27 W. Va. 145; Madden v. Railroad Co., 28 W. Va. 610; Johnson v. Railroad Co., 36 W. Va. 83, 14 S. E. 432; Daniel's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 36 W. Va. 415, 416, 15 S. E. 162. That conceding that no damages can be recovered if the brakeman did know, or could have known by ordinary attention, the imperfect and dangerous condition of the brake when he used it, yet that was a question of fact, fairly placed before the jury for their decision, almost in the precise language of this court in the cases of Humphreys v. News, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 135, 10 S. E. 39, and Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 142, 6 S. E. 53; and the jury, in response thereto, having found against the defendant, that the cases in Virginia and West Virginia did not authorize the court to reverse such finding, and to set it aside. Among the rules of law prescribing the duties of railroads as common carriers, according to our cases cited above, I regard no one as more exacting, or as standing on higher ground of public policy, than the one which exacts, in a reasonable degree, continued supervision, inspection, and watchfulness to see that all machinery and appliances are kept in good and safe repair, and the track kept safe and clear. Such watchfulness is the price of safety to their own people, as well as to the public; and hence we often see them bringing to the discharge of this duty great intelligence and skill, and constant and anxious care and forethought. We find the defendant in this case, in furtherance of the discharge of such duty, making the brakeman, in explicit terms, by printed rule, a special inspector of the appliances it is his duty to use. "The brakemen must examine and know for themselves that the brakes, etc., which they are to use are in proper condition, and, if not, put them so, or report them to the proper parties, and have them put in proper order before using them." Extract from section 240 of company's rules, etc. The freight conductor "must see that the cars in their trains are in good order before starting, and inspect them when the train stops for water or for other trains." Rule 266. The car inspectors "must inspect all cars passing their stations, especially the running gear and brake fixtures, and make such repairs as may be required. They will send to the shop all cars not fit for service." Rule 360. The rule 240 was distinctly and expressly brought to the knowledge of the deceased brakeman more than once. The violation of duty on the part of other inspectors of machinery and appliances did not relieve him from the duty of inspection, which involved the safety of others, as well as of himself. "If he knew, or might have known by ordinary attention, the condition of the brake, and thus expose himself to danger; in other words, if he did not use his senses as men usually use theirs to keep from harm,—the plaintiff cannot complain of the injury which he suffered." Railroad Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 655, 6 Sup. Ct. 590. The brake with the nut off was dangerous, and the brakeman must use diligence and care in protecting himself from harm; nor can any recovery be had if the accident was the direct result of his own disobedience of orders, (Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. 990,) or of his violation of a reasonable rule made by the company for the safety of its servants, of which he had notice, (Overby v. Railway Co., 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. 813.) The testimony of plaintiff's own witnesses shows that there had not been a nut on the standard for some time. "It was rusty where the nut fits on, and the rust shows there had not been a nut on for some time." Now, it is easy to imagine circumstances in a case of emergency, for example, in which the brakeman would be called on to rush to and use a brake without looking down to see if the nut was on. But that is not this case. The evidence shows that, as the train backed down at about the rate of six or seven miles an hour, the deceased was sitting with his arms on the brake; "over it." "As the train passed the waterworks, he got up to set the brake, and, if he had looked, he could have seen whether the brake was in proper order or not. He had time enough; it was light enough; there would have been no difficulty." The irresistible conclusion is that he took the chances of using the brake wheel, with no nut on the standard to hold it down, and a sudden check of speed threw him forward and off, with the brake wheel in his hands; so that his own neglect to inspect the brake, as the rule and his duty required him to do, or his willingness to encounter a danger known to him by using a brake, knowing that the nut was off, contributed directly and immediately to the deplorable accident which caused his death. The facts of this case make it plainly distinguishable from the case of Railroad Co. v. Smith, 90 Ga. 538, 16 S. E. 950. But it is said that this is a question of fact, directly and distinctly submitted to the jury; that they, the proper judges of fact, found otherwise; and that the court should not interfere with the verdict of the jury on a question of fact, "unless there is a plain departure from right and justice;" and the rule has been long and well settled by repeated decisions that the question of negligence is in general one peculiarly for the determination of the jury, from all the facts and circumstances; and that it is only where the jury have plainly decided against the evidence, or without evidence, and not merely because the judge presiding would have found a different verdict, that it will be set aside. But it is as much the province of the court to decide the question whether or not the verdict is wholly without evidence on some essential point, or whether it is plainly insufficient to warrant the finding of the jury, as it is the province of the jury to find such verdict; and if he finds it so, as it sometimes is, without the slightest ground for impeachment of either the jury's integrity or intelligence, it is the plain duty of the court, as the proper one to expound and apply the rules of law, to set such verdict aside, and award a new trial. In this case such power was properly exercised, and the judgment complained of is affirmed.

The opinion of Judge Paul, above alluded to, is as follows: "The facts proved before the jury were, substantially, that prior to May 4, 1891,—the date of the accident,—Lucian Beall had been in the defendant's employ as brakeman for about one year; that during that time he was informed that a rule of the defendant required that its brakemen should examine and know for themselves that the brakes which they were to use were in proper condition, and, if not, put them so, or report them to the proper parties, and have them put in order before using; that about 40 minutes past 6 o'clock on the evening of May 4, 1891, Beall, a conductor, and two other brakemen were engaged in bringing a train, consisting of four gondola cars and an engine, from the Top mill, in this city, to defendant's freight depot; that the engine pulled the train to Fifth street, or near there, when it was reversed on the turntable, and from there was pushing the train towards the depot; that

Beall was stationed on the front car, and had applied the brakes on that car once or twice during the trip; that when the train reached the city waterworks, he attempted to set the brakes, for the purpose of checking its speed, but, the brake wheel becoming detached from the brake rod, he was thrown in front of the moving train, and killed; that, upon examining the brake after the accident, it was discovered that the nut which fastened the wheel to the brake rod was missing; that that part of the brake rod upon which the wheel rested, and where the nut was screwed on, was rusted, and indicated that it had been off for two or three days, or longer; that the brake rod, where it fitted into the wheel, was too small for the hole in the wheel; and that, instead of being square at that point, it was somewhat rounded by use. It will be assumed, for the purposes of this decision, that the defendant negligently and wrongfully permitted this brake to become defective and out of repair; so that the only questions to be decided are (1) whether Lucian Beall, under the facts above set forth, was guilty of contributory negligence; and, if so, (2) whether that negligence was of such a character as to deprive his personal representative of the right to recover in this action. In Railroad Co. v. Bragonier, 119 Ill. 51, 7 N. E. 688, the court, on page 60, 119 Ill., and page 691, 7 N. E., says: 'It is as much the duty of a brakeman to observe that the brakes which he is expected to handle are in working order as it is that of the engine driver to see that his engine is in order for use. All employes in these respects must be held to a high degree of care, to insure any safety at all in railroad service.' In Railroad Co. v. Jewell, 46 Ill. 99, the second headnote is as follows: 'Where a brakeman was thrown from a car, and killed, it being alleged that the accident was caused by a defect in the brake, the nut which kept the wheel in its place on the upright shaft having become loose, and, in the effort to work the brake, the wheel came off, and the deceased was thrown to the ground, held, it was the duty of the brakeman to see that the brake was in a fit condition for use, and the company was not to suffer for his neglect.' In 14 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 863, it is said: 'Where the printed rules of a railroad company required each conductor, before moving a train, to inform himself of the condition of the cars composing it, and the conductor failed to do so, and was injured by reason of defective brakes, it was held that he could not recover;' citing Alexander v. Railroad Co., 83 Ky. 590. In Railroad Co. v. Eddy, 72 Ill. 138, it was held: 'It is the duty of the servant of a railroad company to see that the machinery which he uses is in repair, and, when it is not, to report the fact to the company, and it is negligence on his part to fail to do so; and the company will not be liable for any injury sustained by him, occasioned by such machinery being out of repair.' In Railroad Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 6 Sup. Ct. 590, the court says: 'Of course, he [the brakeman] was bound to exercise care to avoid injury to himself. If he had known, or might have known by ordinary attention, the condition of the brakes and cars when he mounted the cars, and thus exposed himself to danger; in other words, if he did not use his senses as men generally use theirs to keep from harm,—he cannot complain of the injury which he has suffered.' See, also, to same effect, Smith v. Car Works, 60 Mich. 502, 27 N. W. 662. In Darracott v. Railroad Co., 83 Va. 288, 2 S. E. 511, Judge Lewis, after enumerating the duties of a railroad company to its employes, on page 294, 82 Va., and page 514, 2 S. E., says: 'There are also certain correlative duties on the part of the employe to the company. Of these, one is the duty of the employe to be reasonably observant of the machinery he operates, and to report any defects he may discover therein to the company. Another is to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuries to himself; for the company is under no greater obligation to care for his safety than he himself is. He must also obey the rules of the company prescribed for his safety, and which are brought to his knowledge; and he must inform himself, as far as he reasonably can, respecting the dangers, as well as the duties, incident to the service upon which he enters. It has accordingly been held in numerous cases, and the principle is elementary, that where the employe's willful disobedience of the company's rules is the proximate cause of the injury complained of, no recovery can be had of the company. And, in general, any negligence of the employe, amounting to the want of ordinary care, which is the proximate cause of the injury, will defeat an action against the company,—citing numerous authorities. In Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 143, 6 S. E. 53, and Humphreys v. News, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 135, 10 S. E. 39, it was held: 'A servant cannot recover for an injury suffered in the course of his employment, from a defect in the machinery or appliances used by the master, unless the master knew, or ought to have known, of the defect, and the servant was ignorant of such defect, or had not equal means of knowledge.' It will also be observed that the rule as announced in Cooper v. Railroad Co., 24 W. Va. 37, and Riley v. Railroad Co., 27 W. Va. 145, which holds a railroad company liable for injuries sustained by its employes, while in discharge of their duties, from the use of defective machinery and appliances, where such injuries resulted from a failure on the part of the company either to furnish safe machinery and appliances in the first place, or to keep them in good order and repair after having been so furnished, by having them continuously inspected by a person competent to perform that duty, is conditional, not absolute; the condition being that employes are at the time exercising ordinary care and caution to avoid the injury, and are discharging their own duties in a careful and prudent manner, (4 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 66:) in other words, that they themselves are without fault.' In Carrico v. Railway Co., (decided by the supreme court of appeals of this state, Nov. 28, 1891,) 14 S. E. 12, it was held: 'The general rule in regard to contributory negligence is that, if the negligence be mutual on the part of the plaintiff and defendant, there cannot be a recovery. But if the injury would have happened just the same, although the plaintiff had been in no wise negligent, his negligence will not prevent his recovery; or if the defendant, after he has discovered the dangerous exposure, refuses or neglects to practice any care or caution to prevent the injury, he will be held liable.' The principles announced in the foregoing decisions, it seems to me, when applied to the facts in this case, show conclusively, not only that Lucian Beall was guilty of contributory negligence, but that that negligence was of such a character as to preclude any recovery on the part of his personal representative. The verdict of the jury must therefore be set aside, and a new trial awarded the defendant."

LIPSCOMB et al. v. LOVE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 29, 1893.)

EQUITY—CANCELLATION OF DEED—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

A case reversed, and bill dismissed, because the proof wholly failed to sustain its allegations, in accordance with the decision of the court in the case of McCartney v. Bolyard, 22 W. Va. 641.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Tucker county; Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

Action by Eliza H. Lipscomb and William D. Lipscomb against A. W. Love to rescind a conveyance of land. There was decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellant. A. B. Parsons, for appellees.

DENT, J. On the 27th day of August, 1890, Eliza H. Lipscomb and William D. Lipscomb executed a general warranty deed, conveying to A. W. Love 75 acres of land, more or less, in consideration of "a lifetime support." The grantors, afterwards becoming dissatisfied, filed their bill in the circuit court of Tucker county, seeking a cancellation of this deed, and alleging, as the grounds therefor, "that, in accordance to the said stipulation, [that is, the stipulation of support,] your orators went to the house of the said Love, to be provided for as aforesaid, and said Love, according to his contract, for the period of about one month, carried out the agreement of the said contract according to the letter, and as a Christian gentleman, but from that time forward he and his said family became so intolerably abusive, and, among other things, built a small house on low and unhealthy ground, and placed the goods and chattels of your orators therein, which said premises were unhealthy, and in no way was fit to live in by healthy persons, much less for people aged as your orators; that the said Love has failed to carry out the stipulations of his agreement in the premises, and has furnished your orators with such a scanty support and clothing that they are utterly unable to withstand it or survive; and that, further, they are treated intolerably by the said Love and his family; that on one occasion they went away from the said little building for a short time, and came back, and found the door locked, and they were unable to get in; that a great portion of the time pending the contract of the said Love to support them they have been compelled to go upon the charity of their friends and relatives for support; and that they believe that the whole idea and intention of the said Love in entering into the said contract was to fraudulently get title and possession of the said tract of land without any valuable consideration therefor, and to starve your orators, or compel them to leave, and get their living as best they could, or cause them to become a county charge." The defendant filed his answer, particularly denying the truth of these allegations, and, in concluding his answer, used the following allegations, to wit: "Now, by way of conclusion, respondent repeats that he is willing and able to care for these old people and will do so if they will return to him; that he has at all times, while they were with him, given them the best he had about him, and they had an abundance of good, wholesome food, suitable to their age and condition in life, and can have the same again if they will return; that he never had any idea of defrauding them in any way, shape, or form, and did not defraud them in any way, shape, or form, and will not defraud them in any way, shape, or form if they will return to him and live with him; that respondent would be willing to let them go and make their way in the world if he could be placed in statu quo, but this cannot be done, for the reason that he went to expense of fixing them a house, bought them clothes, furnished them food, fuel, etc., made improvements of a permanent character on the land which he got of them, and until he is repaid for all this he is not willing to consent to a cancellation of the contract and deed, and, besides, the plaintiffs, by their bill, have accused him of fraud and fraudulent designs, and, in order to vindicate himself from these charges, he is compelled to resist the said bill, and object to a rescission of the said deed, and does so object, and now informs the court that he is full handed with proof to sustain each and every allegation of this answer, and he is also able to show to the court that each and every allegation of the said bill which is in conflict with the averments of this answer is false and untrue." The only admissible evidence the plaintiffs took to sustain the allegations of their bill were their own depositions, and those were positively contradicted by the defendant and his witnesses.

This case comes within almost precisely the decision of this court in the case of McCartney v. Bolyard, 22 W. Va. 641, in which Judge Woods, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The plaintiffs have neither alleged nor attempted to prove any other ground for a cancellation of the deed or rescission of the agreement than that the consideration thereof going to the plaintiffs has wholly failed, by the failure and refusal of the defendant to maintain and support them on the farm in the manner provided for in said contract. As every allegation of the bill looking in that direction is explicitly denied by the answer, the burden of proof to support these allegations of the bill rests on the plaintiffs. The depositions of the plaintiffs and of many other witnesses * * * wholly fail to prove any failure or refusal of the plaintiffs to discharge any of the duties imposed on the defendants by the terms of said deed, but they do show, beyond all question, that, if they have suffered any loss, it has been caused by their own conduct, in voluntarily abandoning their home and maintenance amply secured to them by the provisions of the deed." Every word above quoted will apply just as truly to this case as to the one then before the court. Parties who enter into solemn contracts of this character should be made to understand that courts of equity will not set them aside without good substantial grounds for so doing, fully sustained by proof. Dissatisfaction merely is not sufficient grounds for the interference of the court. While our sympathies go out to these old people, yet equity requires that they be held to their contracts in like manner as all others capable of contracting, and that they cannot be relieved from the effects of their premeditated undertaking, unless on equitable cause, supported by evidence. The decree of the circuit court, being for the plaintiffs, without sufficient evidence to sustain it, is reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs to the defendant.

STATE v. SHANLEY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 18, 1893.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — ILLEGAL SALES — JUDGMENT ON PLEA OF GUILTY — CHANGING PLEA — COURTS — SPECIAL TERMS.

1. On an indictment for a violation of the state revenue law in selling spirituous liquors without a license, the plea of guilty may be entered without formally and expressly withdrawing a plea of not guilty theretofore entered.

2. In a criminal case, the court may permit the plea of guilty to be withdrawn, and another plea to be entered in its place, in the exercise of a sound discretion, if justice and a fair trial on the merits require it; but it must be in time, and the reason for it must be made to appear clearly and distinctly.

3. A judge of the circuit court, in pursuance of section 5 of chapter 112 of Code, by a warrant directed to the clerk appoints a special term, which warrant the clerk enters in the order book of the court, but fails to post a copy of such warrant at the door of the courthouse. Held, such omission does not in any wise affect the validity of the proceedings of such special term of the court.

Error from circuit court, Taylor county; Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

J. W. Shanley was indicted for selling spirituous liquors unlawfully, and from a judgment entered on a plea of guilty he brings error. Modified and affirmed.

W. R. D. Dent, for plaintiff in error. T. S. Riley, Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOLT, J. This is a writ of error from a judgment of the circuit court of Taylor county, rendered on the 1st of June, 1892, on a plea of guilty to an indictment against J. W. Shanley for the unlawful selling of spirituous liquors. The following is the assignment of errors in the judgment complained of: "(1) The court erred in permitting the plea of guilty to be entered without having the plea of not guilty, theretofore entered by petitioner, disposed of or withdrawn. (2) The court erred in refusing to allow petitioner leave to withdraw the plea of guilty. (3) The court erred in rejecting petitioner's affidavit, marked 'Shan-ley's Rejected Affidavit,' and refusing petitioner leave to file said affidavit. (4) The court erred in overruling petitioner's motion to quash the warrant of the judge appointing said special term of said court, for the reasons assigned by petitioner. (5) The court erred in overruling petitioner's motion to continue said case until the first day of the next term of said court, for want of jurisdiction to dispose of the same at said special term. (6) The court erred in hearing and considering the evidence of the clerk of said court as to the posting of said warrant calling said special term, and notifying the sheriff and prosecuting attorney thereof, as the law directs. (7) The court erred in overruling petitioner's motion in arrest of judgment, and in entering judgment on the said plea of guilty so entered. (8) The said judgment complained of is absolutely null and void. It deprives petitioner of his liberty and property. Petitioner was induced by the agreements and representations of said prosecuting attorney, made with the knowledge and assent of said court, (as set out in said affidavit,) to enter said plea of guilty, thereby agreeing away his rights, on condition that no such judgment was to be entered; and any judgment rendered on such plea is absolutely null and void, and should be reversed and set aside." The indictment is in the usual form, and to it there is no objection. On April 17, 1891, defendant entered the plea of not guilty, put himself upon the country, and the state did the like. On April 21, 1891, "came the defendant in person, and pleads guilty to the indictment, whereupon the court takes time to consider of its judgment herein." At the April term, 1892, the court issued a capias to hear judgment, returnable forthwith, and when brought in, he entered into a recognizance with sureties for his future appearance. By warrant dated April 29, 1892, the judge of the circuit court ordered and appointed a special term, to commence May 31, 1892. See Code, § 5, c. 112. At this term, on the 1st day of June, defendant appeared in discharge of his recognizance, and moved the court for leave to withdraw his plea of guilty, and to permit him to plead not guilty to the indictment, and tendered an affidavit in support of the motion, which affidavit being inspected and read by the court, the court overruled defendant's motion for leave to withdraw his plea of guilty and enter his plea of guilty, and the defendant excepted. He also moved the court to quash the warrant appointing a special term, and moved the court to continue the cause; but the court overruled these motions, and, having fixed the defendant's fine at $100, and his imprisonment in the county jail at 60 days, rendered judgment accordingly.

Scott's Case, 10 Grat. 749-755, was a case of unlawfully selling liquors. The present ment was made at March term, 1851, and at the May term the defendant appeared and demurred, and, the demurrer being overruled, he then pleaded not guilty. At the August term, 1852, when the cause was called for trial, he moved for leave to withdraw his plea of not guilty, and plead that he was not a free negro, but an Indian; but it was held the plea was tendered too late, even if it was a good plea. See Code, § 2, c. 159, and Id. § 19. Mastronada v. State, 60 Miss. 86, was an indictment for unlawfully retailing liquor. The defendant had pleaded guilty, but, before sentence had been passed upon him, he moved the court for leave to withdraw his plea of guilty. In support of his motion he filed an affidavit, but did not aver his innocence of the charge. The action of the trial court refusing leave to withdraw the plea of guilty was held to be correct. The defendant in that case, as in this, appeared to have been an old offender, who, in other cases for a like offense, had pleaded guilty, and escaped with the mildest penalty allowed by law, but, being alarmed by a rumor that he was to be more severely dealt with, wished to withdraw his plea, and take his chances before the jury. Judge Chalmers, in closing his opinion, says: "The action of the court probably and properly taught him that the infliction of the lowest penalty for the first offense, instead of conferring a vested right to the same measure of punishment for the second, rather suggests the propriety of so increasing the penalty that it may effectually deter from the recurrence of the third." In the case of Pattee v. State, 109 Ind. 545, 10 N. E. 421, it was held "that, in the absence of a showing that there was an abuse of discretion, the refusal of the trial court to permit the withdrawal of a plea of guilty will be upheld." Elliott, C. J., says: "Affidavits cannot be made part of the record by the mere recital of the clerk. * * * The presumption is in favor of the ruling of the court, and, in the absence of a clear and strong showing that there was an abuse of discretion, the ruling must be sustained." In People v. Lee, 17 Cal. 76, it was held that the granting of leave to withdraw a plea rested in the discretion of the court, and no circumstances were shown which indicated that there was any abuse in the exercise of that discretion. In Phillips v. People, 55 Ill. 429, it was held that nothing short of a clear abuse of the sound discretion of the court in such refusal can be assigned as error. In Com. v. Mahoney, 115 Mass. 151, 152, Gray, C. J., delivering the opinion, says: "A defendant in a criminal case, who has once pleaded to the charge against him, has no right to withdraw his plea, but is confined to the issues of law or fact thereby raised or left open, unless the court in which the case is pending sees fit to exercise the discretion of allowing him to withdraw it, and plead anew." "Probably a not inaccurate expression of the American doctrine would be that the judge may permit a pleading to be withdrawn, and another put in its place, whenever this would not violate any positive rule of law or of established practice, but that such a discretion will rarely, if ever, be exercised in aid of an attempt to rely upon a mere dilatory or formal defense." 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 124. See Rocco v. State, 37 Miss. 357-366, (an indictment for retailing,) a case in which the refusal does not appear to have worked any injury. In Com. v. Goddard, 13 Mass. 455-458, the retraction of the plea of not guilty was while the proceedings were in fieri. No matter can be pleaded which is not of right. Foster v. Com., 8 Watts & S. 77-79. While the pleadings are in fieri they may be amended. Rex v. Knowles, 1 Salk. 47; Bonfield v. Milner, 2 Burrows, 1098. See O'Hara v. People, 41 Mich. 623, 3 N. W. 161; Whart. Crim. Pl. § 414, (8th Ed.)

The offense charged was a violation of the revenue laws of the state, (chapter 32, §§ 1, 3, 48, 49,) and a writ of error in such cases lies as well for the state as for the accused. Code, § 3, c. 160. The term was passed at which the plea of not guilty was, by necessary implication, withdrawn, and the plea of guilty was entered, and nothing remained to be done but for the court to fix the penalty and render judgment. Nothing else was left open at the following term, when defendant made his motion, and if the case of Com. v. Scott, 10 Grat. 749, is in point, his motion came too late. It had ceased to be a mere pleading,—an issue of fact,—but the defendant had by his own confession determined and settled the fact of his guilt of the offense as charged in the indictment. It was no longer a matter in fieri as a pleading, for that had fulfilled its object or as matter still in the breast of the court, for that term was ended and past, and the record fixed beyond ordinary amendment or control. So that it was in strictness no longer a mere question of changing pleas,—withdrawing one and putting in another,—but was more like a motion for new trial after verdict. There was no longer any fact in issue or open for ascertainment by testimony of witnesses or otherwise, but the question remained, what judgment shall the court pronounce? And that, upon the facts found by confession, was a question fixed by the statute within certain limits. Any person, for every such offense, shall "forfeit not less than ten, nor more than one hundred dollars, and may, at the discretion of the court, be imprisoned in the county jail not exceeding three months." See Code, (Ed. 1891,) p. 232, § 3, c. 32. It remained for the court to fix the punishment and pronounce the sentence of the law, but not to the defendant to change the pleading, but to allege and show some valid reason why judgment should not be rendered. Such a ground he presents to the court in his affidavit, in which he says that at the April term, 1891, the grand jury presented indictments against him for unlawful selling at retail spirituous liquors; that he appeared to defend; that then and there an agreement was made with affiant and his counsel by the prosecuting attorney, with the knowledge and assent of the court, by which judgment was to be taken against him on certain indictments for the minimum fine, ($10,) a verdict of not guilty was to be rendered in certain other of said indictments, and affiant was to plead guilty as to certain other of said indictments; and the court was simply to enter an order, in effect, that the court took time to consider of the judgment in the same, and that confessions were simply to stand in that way, and no judgment was to be entered thereon against defendant unless defendant engaged in selling liquor unlawfully, which he had not done, and that he is not guilty, etc. The court has certified, as to the only material fact,—that which relates to the agreement,—that it is not true. If proper and material, where and how is such an issue of fact to be tried? Certainly not by that court, or by a jury before that judge. If the case depended upon any such question of fact, the defendant mistook his forum. Even if the material fact in this case were true, it is very different from the case of O'Hara v. People, 41 Mich. 623, 3 N. W. 161. In that case it was conceded that on an information for adultery not founded on any true, but only a colorable, preliminary examination, before one who had no authority to make it the defendant was given by the judge to understand that he must submit to a severe sentence, or else withdraw his plea of not guilty, enter a plea of guilty, and immediately pay $400, and estop himself from bringing error. Graves, J., commenting on this point in the case, says: "When a convicted person is brought up for sentence, he has rights still, and it is specially incumbent on the judge to take care that they are fully observed and protected. No sort of pressure can be permitted to bring the party to forego any right or advantage, however slight. The law will not suffer the least weight to be put in the scale against him, and any such attempt cannot fail to be repudiated. Standing at the bar to receive judgment, the law surrounds him with its protecting principles, and intends that his sentence shall be the reflection of its justice, and, as far as possible, free from all taint of human frailty." It may be that, in this batch of indictments against defendant, the prosecuting attorney concluded to let one case stand on the confession of guilty for some indefinite period before he had judgment entered on it, holding it in terrorem over defendant as some sort of guaranty of good behavior in the future; but it is not very probable that the confession was induced by a promise on his part that there should be no judgment at all, for that would be out of his power, without leave of the court, and the court certifies positively that there was no such agreement on the part of the court. It would be taking a long step toward unsettling proceedings in such cases if the defendant is encouraged to go broadcast in search of loose verbal agreements with which to nullify and set aside confessions of guilt made in open court, and entered without qualification on the record. The case for relief in such a stage of the proceeding must be very strong and urgent, and clearly and certainly made out, before this court, on grounds of public policy, if on no other, ought to interfere; for, as a mode of ascertaining guilt as the prerequisite of pronouncing the penalty of the law, in cases of great moment, involving life and death, as in treason against the state, (see chapter 143, Code,) and in cases of felony, if the accused refused to plead, the court shall have the plea of not guilty entered, and the trial shall proceed as if he had put in that plea. but, if he confesses his guilt, no further pleading and no trial is necessary; (see section 2, c. 159, Id.) And he may plead guilty of murder in the first degree, (section 19, c. 159, Id.) and in any case he is to be sentenced for such offense or part as is substantially charged in the indictment, (section 18, Id.)

There was a motion to quash the warrant of the judge appointing the special term, because the record thereof made by the clerk in vacation does not show that the same was posted at the door of the courthouse, as required of the clerk by the statute. See Code, § 5, c. 112. It is presumed that the clerk did his duty, according to the maxim; but, being no part of the warrant, but merely a part of the clerk's ministerial duty in regard to what he should do after receiving and recording the warrant, his failure to post a copy could not have the slightest effect on the validity of the warrant, or on the power to hold court under it, and, as the court had jurisdiction to hold the term, and dispose of defendant's case, there could be no ground of continuance for want of such jurisdiction. The court heard the sworn statement, made in open court by the clerk, that the warrant calling the special term was duly posted as the law directs, and the prosecuting attorney and the sheriff duly notified thereof. The defendant makes this the ground of his sixth assignment of error. Inasmuch as such sworn statement could not affect the validity of the warrant or the jurisdiction of the court if the clerk had said it was not posted, etc., it is not easy to see how it could do any harm if he said it was posted. It was wholly immaterial, for the purpose in view, whether it was posted or not. There was no error apparent on the face of the record, and the motion in arrest of judgment was properly overruled; nor do I see anything, nor has anything been pointed out, which renders the judgment null and void.

The act of 1882, c. 41, § 10, (see Code, Ed.

1887, p. 207, c. 36, § 10.) latter clause, reads as follows: "And whether the judgment be for fine and imprisonment or for fine without imprisonment, the court may at any time during said term order that the defendant against whom such judgment was rendered be confined in jail until the fine and costs are paid in addition to the term of imprisonment, if any, fixed by the judgment. Provided; that such additional confinement shall not be for a longer period than sixty days." See Code 1868, p. 224. The court rendered judgment in this case on May 31, 1892, under the law as above stated, and after fixing the fine at $100, and his imprisonment in the county jail at 60 days, rendered judgment as follows: "It is therefore considered by the court that the state recover from the defendant the sum of one hundred dollars (the fine aforesaid) and the costs; and it is further considered by the court that the defendant be confined in the jail of this county for the term of sixty days; and it is further considered by the court that if, at the end of said sixty days' imprisonment, the said fine of one hundred dollars and costs be not paid, then the said defendant shall further be continued confined in said jail until said fine and costs be paid, said additional confinement not to exceed sixty days from the end of the first sixty days' imprisonment." But by the act of March 9, 1891, (see Acts 1891, p. 206,) which took effect 90 days after its passage, sections 10 and 11 of chapter 36 of Code were amended and re-enacted. Code, (Ed. 1891,) p. 266, c. 36, § 10. By the law as thus amended, which was the law in force when the judgment was rendered, he was entitled to be released, after the expiration of the term of imprisonment fixed as punishment, at any time, upon his giving bond with good security to the state for the payment of such fine and costs, at a time not exceeding 12 months after the date of such bond. By section 11, if imprisoned for nonpayment, and defendant fails to give such bond, the county court may order him to work it on the roads at a dollar per day, etc. So that that part of the judgment complained of, which prescribed the mode of enforcing payment of the fine imposed, was at the time without authority of law to support it, and must therefore be set aside. But that does not affect the body of the judgment, in which there is no error. The part left out is no part of the punishment. That is the same as the law was when the offense was committed. It is a mere mode of collecting, or rather of enforcing, payment of the fine, and safely and distinctly separable from the punishment prescribed by the law and imposed by the court, without in any wise affecting the real and only judgment of the court. Therefore, with such correction, the judgment complained of is affirmed.

ADKINS v. FRY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

Dec. 2, 1893.)

ACTION ON BOND OF DEPUTY SHERIFF — LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RIGHTS OF SHERIFF AND HIS SURETIES—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

1. In an action of debt by a sheriff against his deputy upon his bond, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties as deputy sheriff, and to account for and pay over, as required by law, all money which may come into his hands by virtue of said office, the right of action does not accrue to said sheriff at the time of the default of such deputy, and the statute of limitations does not begin to run against said action until said sheriff has paid the debt occasioned by said default, or some part thereof.

2. Under section 36 of chapter 41 of the Code, a sheriff or his personal representative may proceed by motion against his deputy, who has committed a default, for which his principal is liable, for which a judgment or decree shall be rendered against said principal or his personal representative, and may obtain a judgment for the full amount for which such principal or his personal representative may be so liable, or for which such judgment or decree may have been rendered.

3. In a demurrer to evidence, it is not the practice, nor is it necessary, to state on the face of the record that the evidence set forth is all the evidence that was offered, but it is necessary that the whole evidence should be set out.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Wayne county; T. H. Harvey, Judge.

Action in debt on a bond by Lamech Adkins against Johnson Fry, Jesse Perry, and others. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Campbell & Holt, for plaintiffs in error.
Simms & Enslow, for defendant in error.

ENGLISH, P. On the 24th day of October, 1890, Lamech Adkins, then late sheriff of Wayne county, brought an action of debt in the circuit court of Wayne county against Johnson Fry, Jesse Perry, Moses Napier, Attison Adkins, Younger Napier, and Lewis Ferguson upon a bond executed on the 10th day of September, 1873, by said Johnson Fry, with the others, defendants, as sureties therein, conditioned for the faithful discharge on the part of said Johnson Fry of his duties as deputy sheriff, and to account for and pay over, as required by law, all money which might come to his hands by virtue of the said office, which bond was in the penalty of $10,000. On the 2d day of February, 1891, the defendants demurred to the declaration, and each assignment of breach therein, in which demurrer the plaintiff joined, which demurrer, after consideration by the court, was overruled; and thereupon the said defendants filed a special plea in writing of the statute of limitations, and the said defendants, for further plea, pleaded conditions not broken and covenants performed, and the plaintiff traversed each of said pleas, and put himself upon the country and defendants likewise. On the 1st day of February, 1892, Moses Napier, one of the defendants, pleaded conditions performed and conditions not broken, and the plaintiff replied generally thereto. The death of Johnson Fry was suggested, and it was ordered that the suit do abate as to him. Said Moses Napier also pleaded the statute of limitations, and the plaintiff replied generally. Younger Napier tendered a plea of non est factum, which was objected to by the plaintiff, which objection was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted, and replied generally to said plea, and the case was submitted to a jury; and, after the evidence was introduced, the defendants demurred to the plaintiff's evidence, which demurrer was reduced to writing, and the plaintiff joined therein, and the jury found the following verdict: "If the court should be of the opinion that the law arising upon the demurrer to the evidence should be for the plaintiff on the issues joined, that the defendants Moses Napier, Jesse Perry, Attison Adkins, and Lewis Ferguson are indebted to the said plaintiff on the demands in the declaration mentioned in the sum of $1,424. But, if the court should be of the opinion that the law arising upon said demurrer was for the defendant, they found for them upon the issues joined, and they further found for the defendant Younger Napier upon the issue of non est factum." On the 4th day of February, 1892, the parties came by their attorneys, and the court, having maturely considered the law arising upon the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, found for the plaintiff, except as to Younger Napier, and gave judgment for the plaintiff against the defendants Jesse Perry, Moses Napier, Attison Adkins, and Lewis S. Ferguson, for the sum of $1,424, with interest thereon from the 2d day of February, 1892, till paid, and costs; and from this judgment this writ of error was obtained.

No point is made upon the demurrer to the declaration, either in the assignment of errors or in the brief filed by counsel. It is, however, assigned as error, that the breach of the deputy's bond occurred, and the cause of action accrued, in the year 1873, and that this action, at the time of its institution, in 1890, had been barred for nine years. Under this assignment of error, it is contended that the statute of limitations began to run when the deputy committed his default. Now, the sheriff had the right to elect whether he would resort to his common-law action of debt against his deputy, or proceed by motion, under sections 36 and 37 of chapter 41 of the Code. These sections provide for a proceeding by way of motion on the part of the sheriff against his deputy, but do not, so far as I can perceive, affect the question as to the time the statute of limitations commences to run against the action of the sheriff against his deputy for a default committed by the latter. Said section 36 provides that, "where any deputy of a sheriff or collector shall commit any default or misconduct in office for which his principal, or the personal representative of such principal, is liable, for which a judgment or decree shall be rendered against either, such principal, or his personal representative, may, on motion, obtain a judgment against such deputy and his sureties, and their personal representatives, for the full amount for which such principal, or his personal representative, may be so liable, or for which such judgment or decree may have been rendered. But no judgment shall be rendered by virtue of this section for money, for which any other judgment or decree has been previously rendered, against such deputy or his sureties or their personal representatives." Section 37 provides that, "when any judgment or decree shall be obtained against a sheriff or collector, or his sureties, or their personal representatives, for or on account of the default or misconduct of any such deputy, and shall be paid in whole or in part by any defendant therein, he or his personal representative may, on motion, obtain a judgment or decree against such deputy and his sureties, and their personal representatives, for the amount so paid, with interest thereon from the time of such payment, and five per cent. damages on said amount." The question now is, would the sheriff have shown any greater diligence if he had proceeded by way of motion, under sections 36 and 37 of chapter 41 of the Code, or could he have brought his motion sooner than he did his suit? It is clear that, under the provisions of section 37, the sheriff's right of action would not accrue until a judgment or decree had been obtained against him or his sureties or their personal representatives for or on account of the default or misconduct of such deputy, which shall be paid by any defendant therein; and, when we refer to section 36, the language indicates clearly that a judgment or decree must be rendered against the sheriff or his personal representative before the right accrues to proceed by motion against the deputy. The language of the section as above quoted is: "Where any deputy of a sheriff or collector shall commit any default or misconduct in office for which his principal, or the personal representative of such principal, is liable, for which a judgment or decree shall be rendered against either, such principal, or his personal representative, may, on motion, obtain a judgment against such deputy and his sureties, and their personal representatives, for the full amount for which such principal, or his personal representative, may be so liable, or for which such judgment or decree may have been rendered." It is manifest that under this section the right to proceed by motion does not accrue until judgment shall be rendered against the principal or his personal representative for some amount, and then he may move either for the full amount for which he is liable, or for the amount of the judgment or decree. So far as appears from the record in the case we are considering, no judgment was obtained against said sheriff and his sureties until the following dates, to wit: February 16, 1888, which was paid by the sheriff, and June 21, 1890; and, until said judgment was so obtained, the right to proceed by motion, under the thirty-sixth section, did not accrue. Our statute above quoted is very nearly identical with sections 46 and 47, c. 49, of the Virginia Code of 1873. It, however, differs very materially in this: Our statute provides that "where any deputy of a sheriff or collector shall commit any default or misconduct in office for which his principal, or the personal representative of such principal, is liable, for which a judgment or decree shall be rendered against either," etc.; while the Virginia statute reads as follows: "Where any deputy of a sheriff, sergeant, coroner or collector shall commit any default or misconduct in office for which his principal is liable or for which a judgment or decree shall be recovered against either, such principal or his personal representative may on motion obtain a judgment against such deputy and his sureties," etc. Yet in the case of Allebaugh v. Coakley, 75 Va. 628, the court of appeals of that state held that "the mere fact that a remedy is given the sheriff by the forty-sixth section [which corresponds with our thirty-sixth] for his protection and indemnity can impose no obligation upon him to resort to that remedy, under peril of being barred of a right existing at common law, and under another section of the statute." In that case a deputy sheriff made default in paying over certain collections which were made, or ought to have been made, by him prior to 1869. A judgment for the amount of such collections was obtained by the sheriff in 1874, and the judgment was paid by him in 1878. In May, 1879, the sheriff moved against the deputy and his sureties for a judgment for the amount so paid, with interest and damages. Held, that the claim of the plaintiff was not barred by the statute of limitations, notwithstanding the default of the deputy occurred more than 10 years before the principal moved for judgment against him. How much more is this the case under our statute, (section 36, c. 41,) where both the liability of the sheriff and a judgment or decree against him must concur before the right accrued to him to proceed by way of motion against his deputy. Under the Virginia statute, Barton, in his Law Practice, (volume 2, p. 1095,) in treating of this subject, says, under section 910: Whenever a sheriff becomes liable on account of the default of his deputy, whether a judgment has or has not been recovered against the sheriff, and although he has paid nothing to the creditor, he is yet entitled to recover against the deputy and his sureties the amount for which he may be so liable; but, under section 911, the sheriff is authorized to proceed against the deputy and his sureties only when there has been a recovery against him, and a payment of the amount, in whole or in part, to the creditor; but the provision for the proceeding against the deputy under section 910 is merely cumulative, and was not designed to affect any of the sheriff's existing rights and remedies. He may, therefore, if he pleases, waive any proceeding under that section, await the termination of the creditors' action against him, pay the amount of the recovery, and then proceed by action on the deputy's bond, or by motion, under section 911. Under both sections of our statute, however, as we have seen, a judgment against the sheriff or his personal representatives must precede his right to proceed against his deputy either by motion or action. Our conclusion, therefore, is that, under the facts and circumstances of this case, the plaintiff's action was not barred by the statute of limitations. The right of action at common law against the deputy and his sureties for the default of such deputy did not accrue until the principal had paid the debt, or some part of it, occasioned by such default; neither did the right to proceed by motion, under the thirty-fifth section of chapter 41 of the Code, accrue until a judgment or decree had been rendered against the sheriff or his personal representatives.

The judgment which appears to have been rendered against the sheriff by reason of the default of said deputy was on the 16th day of February, 1888, and the action of debt in this case was brought by the sheriff against the sureties of his deputy on the 24th day of October, 1890. Murfree on Sheriffs, at section 54, says: "The bond of a deputy sheriff to his principal is a private bond, with which the public has no concern. It is a matter exclusively between the sheriff and his deputy, and it concerns nobody else whether any bond whatever is given. Consequently, the bond of a deputy to the high sheriff is not to be interpreted by the rules which govern the construction of the official bond of the high sheriff, drawn in pursuance of the statute which specifies what bond shall be given, and the condition of the same." Our statute provides that a sheriff may, with the consent of the county court, entered of record, appoint any person his deputy, and when, in the opinion of the circuit court, the public interests require it, he may, with the consent of said circuit court, appoint any person his deputy; and it is further provided that any default or misfeasance in office of such deputy shall be deemed a breach of the conditions of the official bond of his principal. The object of this bond was to protect the sheriff against the default of his deputy, and until a liability was fixed upon him, his personal representatives, or his sureties, by judgment or decree, his right of action did not accrue against such deputy. In this case, as has been stated, there was a demurrer to the evidence, and while the action of the court upon said demurrer is not assigned as error, unless it be under the general assignment, yet it is contended that the demurrer to the evidence was informal, in this: that it did not set forth on its face that the evidence set out in the demurrer contained all of the evidence. Was this necessary, and is it the practice, to make the demurrer to the evidence show affirmatively that the evidence set out was all of the evidence offered? We think not. It is true that it has long been held that the whole evidence, both of the plaintiff and defendant, must be set out; yet it has often been said that the forms of the law are the best evidences of the law, and when we look at 1 Rob. Forms, p. 121; 4 Minor, Inst. pt. 1, p. 832; 1 Bart. Law Pr. p. 685; and Hutch. Treat. W. Va. p. 990,—we find that none of these forms contain the clause that the foregoing is all of the evidence offered. In the case of Childers v. Deane, 4 Rand. (Va.) 408, it was held that a demurrer to evidence should contain the evidence on both sides. See, also, Hoyle v. Young, 1 Wash. (Va.) 152; Green v. Judith, 5 Rand. (Va.) 1; Harrison v. Brock, 1 Munf. 35; and numerous other cases,—where it is held that the whole evidence must be set out; that is, not only that offered by the plaintiff, but that offered by the defendant. In making up the demurrer, counsel for both parties are presumed to be present, and the court should not compel a joinder in the demurrer unless the evidence is properly stated. A motion to exclude the evidence of the plaintiff from the jury differs in several respects from a demurrer to the evidence. In the first place, it must be made before the defendant has given in his testimony; and it has been held by this court, in Carrico v. Railway Co., 35 W. Va. 389, 14 S. E. 12, that, "after the defendant has given in his own evidence, a motion to strike out all the evidence, on the ground that it is insufficient to sustain the issue on the part of the plaintiff, should not be granted;" while, in a demurrer to evidence, the whole evidence offered by each party is set forth, and, if it is not so done, the question is raised upon the joinder in the demurrer, and the action of the court may be then excepted to. For these reasons, I am of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of, and the same is therefore affirmed, with costs and damages.

DEBT ON BOND—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Same as points 1 and 2 in the case of Adkins v. Fry, 18 S. E. 737, (above reported.)

Error to circuit court, Wayne county; T. H. Harvey, Judge.

Action in debt on a bond by Lamech Adkins, sheriff, against John B. Stephens and others. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Campbell & Holt, for plaintiffs in error.
Simms & Enslow, for defendant in error.

ENGLISH, P. The facts in this case are almost identical with the case of Adkins v. Fry, 18 S. E. 737, (above decided.) In fact, the cases are so similar that counsel have argued them both in the same brief. This was an action of debt by the same plaintiff, who was sheriff of Wayne county, against the sureties of A. F. Clark, who was one of his deputies, to recover from said sureties the amount of several judgments which had been recovered from said sheriff by reason of the default of his deputy aforesaid. The action of debt was brought on the 24th day of October, 1890. The judgments set forth in the declaration were recovered against said sheriff as follows: On the 4th day of September, 1886; the 14th day of February, 1889; and the 10th day of September, 1889,—and were paid by said sheriff. The default of said deputy occurred in the months of January and March, 1875, and in December, 1876. The plea of the statute of limitations was interposed by the defendants, and we hold, as we held in the above case, that the action was not barred at the time it was brought, and affirm the judgment, with costs and damages, for the reasons stated in the above case of Adkins v. Fry.

MILLER v. SHENANDOAH PULP CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 2, 1893.)

WATER RIGHTS—CONSTRUCTION OF GRANT—DAMAGES—PROVINCE OF JURY.

1. The grant of the water privileges below established mills will be so construed as to preserve the water power of such mills undisturbed, unless a contrary intent plainly appears from a reasonable construction of the instrument conveying the grant.

2. The privilege of turning the waters of a river down a canal does not carry with it the right to dam such waters back, by head gates or otherwise, so as to destroy the water power of mills already established.

3. If, to preserve himself from injury or loss, a person should deem it necessary to unlawfully damage the property of another, the law requires a just compensation to be paid for such damage.

4. The jury are the judges of the compensation to be paid in case of wrongful damage to real property, and the court will not disturb their finding unless plainly unwarranted by the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Jefferson county.

Action in trespass on the case by Edward W. Miller against the Shenandoah Pulp Company to recover for injury to plaintiff's mill property and water power. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. W. McDonald, Frank Beckwith, and J. D. Butt, for plaintiff in error. Forrest W. Brown (Geo. Baylor, of counsel,) for defendant in error.

DENT, J. Edward W. Miller instituted a suit in the circuit court of Jefferson county to recover damages for permanent injury done to his mills and water power on the Shenandoah river by the erection and maintenance of a dam and gates by the Shenandoah Pulp Company, and on the 10th day of December, 1892, recovered judgment for the sum of $3,750. The defendant obtained a writ of error to this court, and insists that the circuit court erred: (1) In not arresting the judgment and granting a new trial. (2) In not permitting the witness W. L. Black, for the purpose of showing that the use of the head gates complained of in the declaration were necessary and essential to protect the defendant's property and that of other riparian owners below the dam, to answer the following question, viz.: "What would be the effect, in times of a freshet in the Shenandoah river, upon the mill property of the defendant, and the property of other riparian proprietors below, without the use of these head gates at the dam?" (3) In refusing to give the following instructions: "Instruction No. 1. The court instructs the jury that by the terms of the grant from John Strider and wife to the U. S. of America, dated the 27th day of June, 1833, the government of the U. S. had the right to the use of all the water in the Shenandoah river, and, to effect this use, had the right to complete and perfect the dam above and nearly opposite the Guelph mill, either by extending or raising the same, or by both means, to an extent sufficient to catch all the water in said river; and if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant was the owner of the right of the U. S. at the time of the wrongs alleged in the declaration, then they must find for the defendant, even though they should believe that the said dam was either raised or extended, or raised and extended, by the defendant. Instruction No. 2. The court further instructs the jury that if they believe, from the evidence, that the defendant (the Pulp Co.) could not, without liability to injure itself and other riparian proprietors below, use the waters gathered by said dam without the building of the head gates mentioned in the declaration, and further believe that without said head gates the defendant could not reasonably enjoy his rights under the said Strider deed, then the putting in of said head gates are an incident to the right to raise and extend the said dam, and they must find for the defendant upon the question of damages occasioned by said head gates,"—and in giving the following instruction for plaintiff: "If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant has, in the manner alleged in the declaration, unlawfully injured the property of the plaintiff, and that such damage and injury is of a permanent character, and affects the value of plaintiff's property, then they will find for the plaintiff a sufficient amount as will be a full compensation for such permanent injury." (4)

In not setting aside the verdict as contrary to the law and evidence. The issue was joined on the plea of not guilty.

The fact is clearly established that the defendant's dam and head gates do back the waters of the Shenandoah to the foot of Bull's falls, and thus entirely destroy the water power at the plaintiff's mills, and for some distance above them. Both parties derive title through successive alienations from John Strider, and the defendant insists that it had the right to build its dam and construct its water gates by virtue of the deed from said Strider and wife to the government of the United States bearing date the 27th day of June, 1833. The plaintiff denies any such grant by this deed. On the construction of its provisions this case depends. The disputed questions are contained in the following recital from this deed: "That the said John Strider, and Sarah, his wife, for and in consideration of the sum of two thousand six hundred dollars, lawful money of the United States, to them in hand paid by the said United States of America (through the Hon. Lewis Cass, secretary of war) at and before the enrolling and delivery thereof, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have granted, bargained, and sold, aliened, enfeoffed, released, and confirmed, and by these presents do grant, bargain, and sell, alien, enfeoff, release, and confirm, unto the United States of America and assigns forever, all the right, title, interest, claim, and demand whatsoever of the said John Strider, and Sarah, his wife, of, in, and to the use and privilege of the waters of the Shenandoah river between the mills of the said Strider, called the 'Guelph Mills,' and the public works belonging to the United States on said river below, the fall in the river from the said mills to the termination of the land of said Strider being two feet three inches, commencing two feet five inches below the top of an iron bar now inserted in a rock situated in the tail race of the mill of said Strider, said bar being twenty-three feet six inches distant from the south corner of said mill. The said John Strider, and Sarah, his wife, for the consideration before mentioned, grant, bargain, and sell unto the United States of America the privilege of completing and perfecting the dams now extending partly across the Shenandoah river above and nearly opposite the said Guelph mills, so as to increase the supply of water to any extent passing down the canal that leads to the rifle factory; also, the privilege of increasing the depth and width of the present canal extending from the dams last mentioned past the mills of said Strider to the rifle factory; also, the privilege of increasing and extending the dam or dams at the head of the canal or race which supplies the mills of said Strider with water, and of increasing the depth and width of said canal or race, and of constructing waste weirs in the same at such places as may be considered necessary by the superintendent of the Harper's Ferry Armory, his successor, or any future agent of the United States, for obtaining water for the public works now established, or which may hereafter be established, by the United States, at or near the rifle factory on the Shenandoah river: provided, however, that such waste weirs shall not be so constructed as to prevent the free passage to the mills, etc., of said Strider, of whatever quantity of water he may require, without, however, lessening the force or quantity of water required by the United States. And the said John Strider, and Sarah, his wife, for the consideration before mentioned, grant and convey to the United States of America and their assigns forever the privilege of erecting a dam or dams partly or entirely across the Shenandoah river at any point or points below the mills of said Strider, the height of which, however, shall not be more than eight inches above the top of an iron bar now inserted in a rock, situated near the upper end of the island on which the rifle factory is located, being the second rock of a ledge of rocks extending from said island nearly across the Shenandoah river in the direction of south, 29¾ degrees west. The said iron bar is inserted in said rock so that the top thereof is even with the surface of the highest point of said rock."

The first grant is "to the use and privilege of the waters of the Shenandoah river between the mills of said Strider, called the 'Guelph Mills,' and the public works belonging to the United States on said river below, the fall in the river from the said mills to the termination of the land of said Strider being two feet three inches, commencing two feet five inches below the top of an iron bar now inserted in a rock situated in the tail race of the mill of said Strider; said bar being twenty-three feet six inches distant from the south corner of said mill." This fixes a point of beginning, above which Strider continued his ownership, below which he granted to the United States. This point being once determined, the United States nor its vendees could have any rights above it, as the law is well settled that a riparian owner may swell water, when it is in its natural state, by a dam erected below to his neighbor's line above, but no further, without being guilty of a wrong. 4 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 971; Navigation Co. v. Coon, 47 Amer. Dec. 474; Bell v. McClintock, 34 Amer. Dec. 507. This point, so carefully fixed, has not been ascertained in the evidence, and the defendant insists that it is destroyed as a boundary point by the after clauses of the deed. While we cannot agree with his ingenious argument on this question, yet, as the evidence fails to disclose the ascertainment of this iron bar, its actual location can have little to do with the determination of this case. The next grant to the United States is "the privilege of completing and perfecting the dams now extending partly across the Shenandoah river above and nearly opposite the said Guelph mills, so as to increase the supply of water to any extent passing down the canal that leads to the rifle factory." This clause must be construed so as not only to include the one dam nearly opposite the Guelph mills, but also the dams above the mills, all of which the United States was granted the privilege of completing and perfecting, so as to increase the supply of water to any extent passing down the canal that leads to the rifle factory. It was by a combination of all these dams the United States was to have the privilege of turning all the waters down the canal, and not by the dam opposite the Guelph mills alone, as is mistakenly argued by counsel. Next, it is granted "the privilege of increasing the width and depth of the canal extending from the dams last mentioned [that is, this combination of dams] past the mills of said Strider to the rifle factory;" that is, the whole length of Strider's land, so as to convey any increased volume of water needed for the works. Then follows the grant of "the privilege of increasing and extending the dam or dams [belonging to the combination before spoken of] at the head of the canal or race which supplies the mills of said Strider with water, and of increasing the depth and width of said canal or race, and of constructing waste weirs [dams, not ways, as counsel claim] in the same at such places as may be considered necessary by the superintendent of the Harper's Ferry Armory, his successor, or any future agent of the United States, for obtaining water for the public works now established, or which may hereafter be established, by the United States, at or near the rifle factory on the Shenandoah river: provided, however, that such waste weirs shall not be so constructed as to prevent the free passage to the mills, etc., of said Strider, of whatever quantity of water he may require, without, however, lessening the force or quantity of water required by the United States." Lastly, the United States is granted "the privilege of erecting a dam or dams partly or entirely across the Shenandoah river at any point or points below the mills of said Strider, the height of which, however, shall not be more than eight inches above the top of an iron bar now inserted in a rock situated near the upper end of the island on which the rifle factory is located." This last point is not shown in evidence, but it is certainly safe to presume that the object was to prevent the erection of a dam so high as to cause the water to flow back on Strider's mills. Such would be the natural inference until at least some other reasonable motive or purpose is disclosed. But this, like the other iron bar referred to, being unascertained, can have but little weight in the decision of this case.

To recapitulate. There are three grants as to dams: (1) The government is authorized to complete and perfect the dam opposite, and the dam or dams above, Strider's mills, so as to increase the supply of water to any extent passing down the canal that leads to the rifle factory; (2) also, in addition to completing and perfecting, the government is authorized to increase and extend the dam or dams above the mills; (3) to erect new dams across the river below Strider's mills, the height of which is limited. Counsel in their arguments insist that this first clause, as to the completing and perfecting, only applies to the dam opposite the mills; but a careful consideration should convince them that such cannot be the case—First, because there was only the part of one dam opposite the mills; and, second, if the government had the right to increase this one dam to such an extent as to increase the supply of water without limitation, it would not have had any use for the dam or dams above the mills, and it was because it could not get this privilege that it found it necessary to acquire the right to complete, perfect, increase, and extend the dams above the mills, so that the supply of water to pass down the canals could be increased without limit. The lower dam was only intended to turn the overflow from the upper dams into the canal, while the privilege of constructing the dams lower down was for the purpose of giving the government a larger basin of water, without interfering with the water power of Strider's mills. The water from the lower dam was to flow into the canal unobstructed by waste weirs or head gates; but whatever waste weirs the United States might need for storing water were to be constructed above, and not below, Strider's mills, and then in such manner as to allow the water to flow freely to said mills, unless the United States might temporarily stop it until the storage supply was of sufficient quantity to supply the United States works as well as Strider's mills. In this last case the United States was to keep up Strider's dams; and hence it was a great benefit to him, as it relieved him of a very heavy expense, and he could well afford to subordinate his use of the water from the upper dams to that of the United States, as the water, whenever permitted to pass the waste weirs, would be used in turning his mills before it reached the works of the United States. If the United States had, or could have obtained, the privilege, as to the lower dam, claimed by this defendant, it could have made the one dam so extensive and strong, and put in such ample waste weirs or head gates, that it would have had all the water supply and power it needed without purchasing the privilege and undertaking the expense of increasing and extending the dam or dams above the mills, and of putting in waste weirs or gates, or obtaining the privilege of building other dams below. It would have been much cheaper and better to have erected one strong and massive and permanent dam, with extensive head gates, after the manner of this defendant, than to keep up a combination of dams and waste weirs; and the only reasonable deduction for its not being done is that the water rights of the Strider mills were in its way. But these water rights did not stand in the way of this defendant; for it not only did not keep up the dams above the mills, but it constructed a commodious dam and extensive head gates in lieu of waste weirs below Miller's mills, and destroyed his water power entirely, back to Bull's falls. The United States preserved and added to the water power of the mills in controversy; this defendant confiscates and destroys it. For this privilege, assumed by it unlawfully, without purchase or condemnation, it should cheerfully pay a just compensation,—a full equivalent for the permanent character of the damage done. The two instructions asked by it were properly refused.

The defendant insists that the verdict of the jury as to the amount found is not sustained by any reasonable view of the evidence, and refers to Black v. Thomas, 21 W. Va. 709; Hatfield v. Workman, 35 W. Va. 578, 14 S. E. 153; Wandling v. Straw, 25 W. Va. 692. The plaintiff's title was sufficiently established for the purpose in issue. Not having been attacked in any manner in the lower court, proof on his part that he was the owner and in possession of the property was sufficient; and any technical questions of title will be presumed to have been waived, and will not be permitted to be raised for the first time in this court. The jury are the sole judges of the amount of the damages inflicted, and, unless their finding is plainly unsustained by the evidence, such finding will not be disturbed. The references of the defendant sustain this proposition. The evidence in this case shows that the fall in the river from Bull's falls, three-fourths of a mile above, is six feet to Miller's mills; that the present dam and head gates have entirely neutralized this fall, and the water is backed up over the mill wheel, completely destroying its use. The damage sued for here is permanent, and a recovery confers a license on the defendant to continue the cause indefinitely. It is a taking of Miller's property for the use of the defendant without condemnation or purchase; so that, in arriving at a verdict, the jury must take into consideration the value of the water power from Bull's falls to the plaintiff's mills, as well as the damage occasioned to the mills by reason of the permanent loss thereof. The plaintiff, in his evidence, states the damage at about $10,000, one-third of the value of the property, in his estimation. His son Francis states the damage to be from $10,000 to $15,000. The opinions of no other witnesses are given as to the amount of damages, except to say it is considerable. The defendant introduces no evidence to contradict these opinions, nor to establish the market value of the property, but relies entirely on its adverse title under the Strider deed to the United States. It is the settled law of this state that the opinions of witnesses are admissible as to the amount of damage done in cases of this character, to enable the jury to arrive at a just verdict; and, while the jury are not bound by these opinions, it has the right to give them such weight as, taken together with the other evidence, is justifiable. The jury might have found a much larger verdict, and still have been sustained by the evidence. The instruction given for the plaintiff states the law correctly, and was properly given. Railroad Co. v. Foreman, 24 W. Va. 662; Hargreaves v. Kimberly, 26 W. Va. 788.

There was no error committed against the defendant in refusing to allow the witness Black to answer the question propounded to him in regard to the head gates. It could make no difference to plaintiff how much the defendant damaged its own property or that of other riparian owners. His property could not be taken unlawfully, to avoid such damage, without just compensation. The establishing this fact would not have benefited the defendant's case, and it might have increased the moral obligation, at least, on the part of the defendant, to pay Miller for his property, and furnish a further reason why it should compensate him to the full extent of the unauthorized wrong done him. Our conclusion, therefore, is that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and it is affirmed, with costs and damages according to law.

WATSON et al. v. CONRAD et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 29, 1893.)

ESTOPPEL — PARTITION — SALE OF ESTATE IN REMAINDER — TITLE OF PURCHASER.

1. By the eleventh clause of the will of John Hoge, he directed "that the lands, property, money, bills, or notes devised to my executors hereinafter named shall be held by them, or the acting or surviving part of them, upon trust for the necessary support of my daughter Eliza A. Long, to be paid out by them for said purpose, and in such proportion, as they might think necessary from time to time, and, if they might think it advisable, to sell the lands which were therein devised to them, and, on receipt of the purchase money, convey the same to the purchaser or purchasers, holding the money in trust for the purposes aforesaid;" and they were thereby authorized, when they thought proper, to make sale of any property which might come into their hands by virtue of the devises aforesaid, or collect moneys due to them by virtue of the devises aforesaid, and loan out said moneys on interest when they might think it advisable to do so, so as that the moneys be kept safe and ready for the purposes aforesaid; and, if the whole of the funds then placed in the hands of his executors as aforesaid, for the purposes aforesaid, be not all paid out and disposed of for the purposes aforesaid during the natural life of his daughter Eliza A. Long, then the residue was to be paid to her children, naming them. With funds thus acquired, said executors purchased a tract of land in Lewis county on the 28th day of March, 1854, which purchase was adopted by the said Eliza A. Long, and acquiesced in until her death, which occurred in March, 1868. She left three children, who acquiesced in said purchase, and treated the property as land, by conveying their undivided interest therein to third parties. They are thereby estopped from treating said property as personality, and a party holding one-third of said land by virtue of a conveyance of one of said children is entitled to a partition thereof.

2. One of said children of Eliza A. Long having filed his petition in bankruptcy on the 10th day of October, 1867, and having become a voluntary bankrupt, and having included his interest in said land in his schedule, and his assignee having been directed to proceed to sell the interest of said bankrupt in the lands mentioned in his schedule at the time of filing his petition therein, said Eliza A. Long being then in life, a purchaser at such sale acquired no interest in said land, for the reason that said property, although held by trustees, was the absolute property of said Eliza A. Long.

Appeal from circuit court, Lewis county; M. Edmiston, Judge.

Action by John M. Long and Charles W. Watson against James F. Conrad and others for partition and other relief. There was decree for plaintiffs, and William G. Harrison, guardian for the heirs of defendant Conrad, appeals. Affirmed.

A. Edmiston and W. W. Brannon, for appellant. Geo. J. Arnold, for appellees.

ENGLISH, P. The last will and testament of John Hoge, who was a resident of the county of Pulaski, and state of Virginia, at the time of his decease, contained the following clause, to wit: "I direct that the lands, property, money, bills, or notes devised to my executors hereinafter named shall be held by them, or the acting surviving part of them, upon trust for the necessary support of my daughter Eliza A. Long, to be paid out by them for said purpose, and in such proportion, as they may think necessary from time to time, and, if they may think it advisable, sell the lands which are herein devised to them, and, on receipt of the purchase money, convey the same to the purchaser or purchasers, holding the money in trust for the purposes aforesaid; and they are hereby authorized, when they may think proper, to make sale of any property which may come into their hands by virtue of the devises aforesaid, or collect moneys due to them by virtue of the devises aforesaid, and to loan out said moneys on interest when they may think it advisable to do so, so as that the moneys be kept safe and ready for the purposes aforesaid; and if the whole of the funds now placed in the hands of my executors as aforesaid be not all paid out and disposed of, for the purposes aforesaid, during the natural life of my daughter Eliza A. Long, then the residue is to be paid unto her children, to wit, Margaret Jane Long, John Montgomery Long, James Thomas Long, and Ann Elizabeth Long, and, if my daughter Eliza A. Long should hereafter have any more child-dren, they are to come in equal with the above-named children;" and he appointed Moses H. Hoge, John M. Hoge, and Moses B. Floyd executors of said will. The two first named alone qualified as such executors. On the 28th day of March, 1854, said Moses H. Hoge and John M. Hoge purchased from Jacob Bush a tract of land situated in the county of Lewis, on Canoe run, a branch of the Monongahela river, described as containing 141½ acres and 36½ poles, more or less, the deed for which tract of land was acknowledged and admitted to record in said county on the 3d day of April, 1854. On the face of said deed it was provided that the said Moses H. and John M. Hoge should hold the above-conveyed tract of land for the uses and purposes following, and no other; that is to say, that the said tract of land, and the profits of the same, is to be for the exclusive use and benefit of said Elizabeth A. Long and her children that she then had, or might thereafter have, free from the control of the said Adam Long, and not liable to his debts then existing or thereafter to be contracted; and it was expressly declared to be the true meaning of said deed that the said trustees should not suffer the said tract of land, nor the profits thereof, to be applied to the debts of the said Adam Long, then existing or thereafter to be contracted, and that, from and after the death of the said Eliza A. Long, the children of said Eliza were to have the said land in fee simple. Said Eliza A. Long died on the 16th day of March, 1868, and her husband, Adam Long, died in the year 1856. In October, 1867, John M. Long, one of the sons of said Eliza and Adam Long, filed his petition in bankruptcy, and in his "Schedule B," filed with said petition, in describing and setting forth his property in reversion, remainder, or expectancy, including property held in trust for him, or subject to any powers or right to dispose of or to charge, set forth and described said tract of land conveyed by Jacob Bush and wife on the 28th day of March, 1854, to M. H. Hoge and J. M. Hoge, of Pulaski county, Va., in trust for his mother, Eliza A. Long, during her life, and the remainder to her children, of whom there were four, viz. John M. Long, Margaret J. Long, James T. Long, and Ann E. Evans, the latter of whom had died without issue and intestate. The interest in the land so described was on the 19th day of March, 1870, sold by D. M. Bailey, assignee in bankruptcy of the said J. M. Long, at which sale E. Ralston, assignee of E. M. Tunstall, surviving partner of Bailey & Tunstall, and A. A. Lewis, became the purchasers thereof; and on the 31st day of August, 1874, said D. M. Bailey, assignee as aforesaid, conveyed to said Ralston and Lewis the undivided interest of said J. M. Long in the reversion in 141½ acres of land, which was described therein as the same interest in said land surrendered by said J. M. Long in his schedule of property as such bankrupt, which interest was sold and conveyed by said E. Ralston and wife and A. A. Lewis to James F. Conrad. On the 20th day of January, 1874, said John M. Long and wife, by their deed, of that date, conveyed to Charles W. Watson all of his right, title, and interest in said tract of land, describing it as containing 107 acres, more or less. James K. Bywater married said Margaret Jane Long, and they, together with said James Thomas Long, conveyed their interest in said land after the death of said Ann Eliza Long, who died without issue, to said James F. Conrad. And in this way said James F. Conrad claims to be the owner of said entire tract of land, while Charles W. Watson claims to be the owner of the undivided interest of said John M. Long under said deed of conveyance from said Long and wife. This state of facts existing, said John M. Long and Charles W. Watson filed their bill, on the first Monday in January, 1877, against James F. Conrad, Moses H. Hoge, John M. Hoge, James T. Long, James K. Bywater, and Margaret Jane, his wife, setting forth the facts in substance as above detailed, and charging that notwithstanding the said executors, as such trustees, had no right under the will of John Hoge to vest the money coming to said Eliza A. Long in land, they did so, and took the legal title to themselves, but agreed, by the expressed language of said deed from Bush to them, that, after the death of the said Eliza A. Long, said land mentioned in said deed from Bush to them might pass to the children of Eliza A. Long in fee simple; and alleging that, as the other heirs had accepted said land in lieu of money, the plaintiff John M. Long was willing to do likewise, said legal title taking effect and vesting in him on the 16th day of March, 1868, the day of the decease of his mother, Eliza A. Long; that the plaintiff John M. Long, since the death of his mother and sister, for a valuable consideration sold and conveyed his interest (if to be treated as land instead of money) to said Charles W. Watson, by deed duly recorded, dated the 20th day of January, 1874; that said land was held only as a mere chattel for the use of said children of Eliza A. Long, subject to their acceptance, and not as realty, as there was nothing to bind said children to accept said land instead of money coming to them as provided by the will of John Hoge, deceased, which could not take effect, and enable them to demand same, until the death of Eliza A. Long, their mother, on the 16th day of March, 1868; and praying that if, in the opinion of the court, said interest was to be treated as land, and vested in fee on the 16th day of March, 1868, a decree for partition be rendered, giving one undivided third of said land to Charles W. Watson, according to quality and quantity, but if, in the opinion of the court, it should be treated as money, praying that the court might decree a sale of said land, and that the money might be distributed as to equity might seem right. The defendant James F. Conrad answered the plaintiffs' bill, denying that the trustees violated their trust, or exceeded their powers as trustees, in the purchase of the land in the bill mentioned; denying the right of the plaintiff J. M. Long to disclaim the provisions of the deed, and claim an interest in money under the will; and alleging that the deed gave the children of Mrs. Eliza A. Long a vested remainder in the land, while they might not have been entitled to anything in money, and the same might have been consumed by their mother; setting forth the facts as to said J. M. Long having, on his own petition, become a bankrupt, and the transfer of his interest thereby to his assignee in bankruptcy, and the conveyances made in pursuance thereof, from said assignee to Ralston and Lewis, and from Ralston and Lewis to respondent J. F. Conrad, and alleging, further, that said J. M. Long, by said proceeding in bankruptcy, surrendered his interest in said land; and further claiming that, if there could be any force in the pretense that his interest should be in money in the hands of said trustees, still his interest in that would pass from him by force of the proceedings in bankruptcy; and also that he had held possession of the entire tract of land since his purchase, and, being thus sustained by his possession and the legal title, he is advised that his title thereto is complete, and he denies the right of the plaintiffs to relief in a court of equity. A. A. Lewis and E. Ralston also answered said bill, setting forth and exhibiting said proceeding in bankruptcy, and claiming title under said assignee; claiming that under said proceedings they got not only one-fourth of said land, but after the death of said Ann E., who died intestate and without issue prior to the 11th of October, 1867, said John M. Long was entitled to one-third of her fourth of said land, which interests passed to them by the deed from said assignee in bankruptcy, and that they purchased without notice of the provisions of the will of John Hoge, deceased, and without notice that said land was charged with any secret trust. Charles W. Watson and John M. Long replied specially to the answer of A. A. Lewis and E. Ralston, putting in issue the affirmative matter therein contained.

On the 21st day of March, 1891, the cause was heard, and the court decreed that the plaintiffs were entitled to one-third of the lands in the bill and exhibits mentioned, and that they were entitled to have partition thereof, and appointed commissioners to go upon the land, and partition the same by metes and bounds, giving one-third thereof, according to quantity and quality, to the plaintiffs, and two-thirds thereof to the children and heirs at law of James F. Conrad, deceased, who had appeared in the cause by guardian ad litem. On the 8th day of July, 1891, the report of said commissioners was received, and, being unexcepted to, was confirmed; and the court decreed that the parties take and hold in severalty, by metes and bounds, as set out in said report and the plat accompanying the same, the respective tracts or parcels of land allotted to them by said commissioners, and the heirs at law of James F. Conrad, by their guardian ad litem, obtained this appeal. It is assigned as error that the court decreed the plaintiffs to be entitled to one-third of the land in the bill and exhibits mentioned; also, that it was error to decree the plaintiffs entitled to partition of the said land. Now, when we search for the intention of the testator, John Hoge, in framing the tenth and eleventh clauses of his will, it is manifest that he had two objects. One was to provide for the comfortable support and maintenance of his daughter Eliza A. Long during her life, and at the same time to protect what he thus appropriated from the improvidence and liabilities of his son-in-law Adam Long. In order to carry out this object, he devised and bequeathed to his executors certain personal and real estate in trust for the support of his said daughter, with power to sell and convey certain lands which were devised to them, holding the proceeds in trust for the purposes aforesaid, giving them power to loan money on interest when they thought it advisable, so that it might be kept safe and ready for the purposes aforesaid; and, if the whole fund placed in the hands of his executors as aforesaid was not all paid out and disposed of for the purpose aforesaid during the natural life of his said daughter, then the residue was to be paid unto her children, naming them. Now, I do not consider it very material, under the circumstances of this case, whether the property devised and bequeathed to said executors was land or money. It has been held in the case of Harcum's Adm'r v. Hudnall, 14 Grat. 369, that land devised to be sold is no longer land, but money, and in this case part of the property given to these executors was in the shape of bills and notes; and, in considering the case, let us regard it all as money, and by the terms of the will it was to be paid out and disposed of for the necessary support of his said daughter during her natural life. Now, while it is true this clause of the will does not authorize the executors to purchase real estate as a home for said Eliza A. Long, it is apparent that the money thus left to them was to be paid out and disposed of for the necessary support of said Eliza. This would necessarily involve considerable discretion on the part of said executors. The tract of land in controversy in this case was purchased by said executors as early as the 28th day of March, 1854, and the executors, in taking a deed for the same, were careful that the same should show on its face that the purchase was made for the exclusive use and benefit of the said Eliza A. Long and her children that she then had, or might thereafter have, free from the control of the said Adam Long, and not liable for his debts then existing or thereafter to be contracted. Said Adam Long died in 1856, and Eliza A. lived until March, 1863, and during these 12 years of her widowhood it does not appear that she in any manner found fault with or repudiated the act of said executors in purchasing said real estate. 2 Perry, Trusts, § 849, states the doctrine thus: "If the cestui que trust concur in the breach of the trust, he is estopped from proceeding against the trustee. * * * A married woman may concur in a breach of trust in respect to estates settled to her separate use." And in section 850 the same author says: "So, a cestui que trust may be barred from relief by long acquiescence in a breach of the trust, though he did not originally concur in it." For anything that appears in the record, this must have been regarded as a judicious investment on the part of the said executors of $750 of the money that came into their hands for the use of said Eliza. An undivided third of it appears to have been sold by the plaintiff John M. Long to his coplaintiff, Charles W. Watson, in 1874, for $500; and, if the investment was an injudicious one, who had a right to object or complain but Eliza A. Long, the cestui que trust? Yet she quietly acquiesces during the entire 14 years of her life which followed the date of the said deed. After the death of said Eliza, her three surviving children might have objected to treating this investment as land; yet when this bill was filed, in January, 1877, by said John M. Long and Charles W. Watson, nearly nine years after the death of said Eliza A., in said bill it is charged that said executors had no authority to invest the money in realty, and, having so invested it, did not bind the children of said Eliza to take the land as their distributive share of the money in the hands of said executors at and after the death of said Eliza; and although the bill charges that said land is held only as a mere chattel for the use of said children of Eliza A. Long, subject to their acceptance, and not as realty, yet the bill alleges that on the 20th day of January, 1874, the plaintiff John M. Long and wife, by their deed of that date, conveyed all of their right, title, and interest in said tract or parcel of land, describing it, for the consideration of $500, to his coplaintiff, Charles W. Watson. It further appears from the allegations of said bill that James Thomas Long, on the 15th day of December, 1869, and Margaret Jane Long, who married J. K. Bywater, on the 17th day of December, 1871, conveyed their interest in said land to James F. Conrad, all of them thus unequivocally electing to treat said investment as land, and acquiescing in and adopting the action of said executors in making said investment, which, from their uniform and long-continued silence, must have been regarded as a judicious investment, which is further manifest from the fact that, so far as appears, it is all that remains of the property that went into the hands of said executors for the use of said Eliza A. Long during her life, and after her death for her children. If said executors, then, in making the investment in this tract of land, even committed a breach of trust, said Eliza A. Long, in her lifetime, for 14 years, and her children for nearly as many years after her death, must be held to have concurred in the breach, and are estopped from proceeding against the executors. Hill on Trustees, at top page 544, (side page 382), says: "A cestui que trust, being sui juris, who consents to or acquiesces in an investment by a trustee, cannot afterwards question its propriety;" citing Brice v. Stokes, 11 Ves. 319; Langford v. Gascoyne, Id. 333; Booth v. Booth, 1 Beav. 125, etc.

Let us next inquire whether D. M. Bailey, as assignee in bankruptcy of J. M. Long, in pursuance of a petition filed by said Long in the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia on the 10th day of October, 1867, took any estate in said lands by virtue of said bankrupt proceedings. At the time said petition in bankruptcy was filed, together with the schedules, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1867, Eliza A. Long was still in life, and so continued until the 16th day of March, 1868; and it will be seen, by reference to the order directing the sale of said interest, "It was ordered that D. M. Bailey, the assignee, do proceed to sell the interest of said bankrupt in the lands mentioned in his schedule at the time of filing his petition;" and whether we regard said property as personalty or realty, as the absolute property of said Eliza A. Long, under the ruling in May v. Joynes, 20 Grat. 692, and Milhollen's Adm'r v. Rice, 13 W. Va. 510, or only an estate for life in said Eliza A., with remainder to her children, the effect is the same with reference to the transfer of title to said assignee in bankruptcy. At the time of filing said petition in bankruptcy, no title, in either instance, had passed to John M. Long, and, as a matter of course, he could transfer none to his assignee in bankruptcy, and those claiming under said bankrupt sale acquired no title thereby.

Subsequent to the death of said Eliza A. Long, and after the said children had acquired title thereto by inheritance, the said children of said Eliza A., being sui juris, so far as appears from the record, having elected to treat said property as real estate, and the plaintiff J. M. Long having conveyed his undivided interest therein to the said Charles W. Watson, in my opinion, said Watson was and is entitled to partition of said lands. The decree complained of is therefore affirmed, with costs.

CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL OF PLEA IN ABATEMENT—ARREST OF JUDGMENT — DISQUALIFICATION OF GRAND JUROR—EFFECT OF—AMENDING RETURN OF SUMMONS.

1. An issue to be determined by inspection of the record must be tried by the court, not by a jury.

2. On motion in arrest of judgment, the judgment cannot be arrested except for errors apparent in the record.

3. The incompetency or disqualification of a grand juror is no ground to abate or quash the indictment. Code, c. 157, § 12.

4. The circuit court has control over all proceedings had during the same term, or in the office during the preceding vacation. It may set aside any such proceedings, or correct any mistake therein, and make such order concerning the same as may be just. See Code, c. 125, § 60.

5. The sheriff or his deputy will be permitted to amend his return of process, mesne or final, so as to make it conform to the facts.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Taylor county; Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

G. M. Martin was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, and, a motion in arrest of judgment having been overruled, he brings error. Affirmed.

W. R. D. Dent, for plaintiff in error. T. S. Riley, Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOLT, J. At the April term, 1892, of the circuit court of Taylor county, the grand jury returned a true bill of an indictment against defendant, Martin, for selling unlawfully spirituous liquors. At the June term, 1892, defendant moved the court to quash the indictment. This motion the court properly overruled, the indictment being in proper form. At the April term, when the indictment was found, of the 16 members summoned by the sheriff only 12 were qualified to act. Thereupon, under section 4, c. 157, of the Code, the sheriff was directed to summon 4 others, and, pursuant to the order, he forthwith summoned George M. Whitescarver and three others; Mr. Whitescarver, who acted as foreman, being one of the jury commissioners who selected the list of jurors. The clerk took the list of 16 as returned by the sheriff, struck out the names of the 4 disqualified grand jurors, and substituted the names of the 4 summoned by the sheriff to take their places. As it stood, it appeared as if those on the corrected list had been summoned by the sheriff before the time. The sheriff, by leave of the court, corrected his return so as to make it correspond with the fact. In this there was no error. Stone v. Wilson, 10 Grat. 529; Wardsworth v. Miller, 4 Grat. 99. These facts defendant set forth in a plea in abatement, averring that the pretended grand jurors who found the indictment were not selected, drawn, summoned, or impaneled according to law, and therefore he prayed judgment of the indictment that it might be quashed. At the September term, 1892, defendant tendered this plea in abatement, and the attorney for the state moved to reject the same. This motion should have been sustained, and the plea rejected, for the only material part was then shown by the record to be untrue; but the court permitted it to be filed, and the state took issue on it. The defendant then moved the court to have the issue on the plea tried by a jury; but the court refused, and proceeded itself to try the issue, and found that the material facts were not true. In this there was no error, for the material facts were matters of record, and therefore triable by the court, and not by a jury. Defendant then moved to quash the panel of the petit jurors drawn and in attendance at the September term, because George M. Whitescarver, who is one of the jury commissioners of the court, is the same George M. Whitescarver who was foreman of the grand jury which found the indictment; but the court overruled the motion, and properly: (1) Because being a jury commissioner does not disqualify him for serving on the grand jury; (2) because no presentment or indictment shall be abated on account of the incompetency or disqualification of any one or more of the grand jurors who found the same, (section 12, c. 157, Code,) for, if his being a jury commissioner disqualified him for serving on the grand jury, such disqualification did not affect the indictment found. Neither did his serving on the grand jury ipso facto oust him of his office of jury commissioner, if it could be made a good ground for such ouster. Defendant then pleaded not guilty, was tried by a jury, who found him guilty, and defendant moved in arrest of judgment. This motion the court, after taking time to consider, overruled, and properly, because judgment cannot be arrested except for errors apparent on the record, and, as we have already seen, no such errors appear. All these points and rulings being saved to defendant, he brought the case here by writ of error; and the matters arising upon the record being considered, and no error appearing, the judgment rendered by the circuit court is affirmed.

HANEY v. PITTSBURGH, C., C. & ST. L.
RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1893.)

INJURIES TO EMPLOYE—FELLOW SERVANTS—VICE PRINCIPAL—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. Where a collision is caused by the negligence of the conductor in failing to notice the signals displayed at a station, or by the negligence of the operator at the station in displaying improper signals, and by reason thereof a car collides with another standing on the track, where it had a right to be, with 40 or 50 of the railroad section hands on board, and one of them jumps from the car to the ground to avoid the effects of the collision, and in so doing receives an injury which results in his death, he cannot be considered as being guilty of contributory negligence, and the company is liable for the damages thus sustained.

2. Neither the conductor of the train nor the operator at the station can be regarded as fellow servants of said section hand.

3. A conductor having the entire control and management of a railway train occupies a very different position from the brakeman, the porters, and other subordinates employed. He is in fact, and should be treated as, the vice principal of the corporation, for whose negligence it is responsible to subordinate servants.

4. If one is placed by the negligence of another in such a position that he is compelled to choose instantly, in the face of grave and apparent peril, between two hazards, and he makes such a choice as a person of ordinary prudence placed in such a position might make, the fact that, if he had chosen the other hazard, he would have escaped injury, is of no importance in determining whether he was guilty of contributory negligence or not.

Error to circuit court, Brooke county.

Action by Eleanor Haney, administratrix of the estate of Gregory Haney, deceased, against the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago, & St. Louis Railway Company, to recover for the death of decedent. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. Dunbar, for plaintiff in error. H. C. Hervey and T. P. Spencer, for defendant in error.

ENGLISH, P. Gregory Haney, who was employed as a section hand by the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Company on the 14th day of January, 1892, was with some 30 or 40 other hands, who were in the employ of the same company, on board of a construction train on the railroad of said company at or near Collier's station, in the county of Brooke and state of West Virginia, when another train of cars, which was an extra coal train, and known as "No. 6," ran into the block in which said first-named train was located at a speed of from 12 to 15 miles per hour, and collided with said first-named train, which is called "No. 3." About the time the collision occurred, several of the workmen jumped from the caboose of No. 3 to the ground, in order to avoid the effects of the collision, and among them was said Gregory Haney, who in some manner, which is not clearly apparent from the evidence, sustained an injury which resulted in a compound fracture of his leg. The presumption is that it was caused by jumping from the cars, as the evidence shows that the doors of the caboose were wide open, that said Haney was in the caboose immediately before the collision, and he was found, with his leg broken, on the ground near the side of the train immediately after the collision. This injury occurred on the 14th day of January, 1892, and, on the 24th day of February following, said Gregory Haney died from lockjaw, which the physician says was induced by several causes.

One was the injury; another was an exceedingly excitable and nervous temperament, and rheumatism. On the 30th day of August, 1892, Eleanor Haney, who had qualified as administratrix of said Gregory Haney, deceased, brought an action of trespass on the case in the circuit court of Brooke county against said railway company, laying the damage at $10,000, for damage sustained by reason of the death of the said Gregory Haney. The plea of not guilty was interposed, issue was joined thereon, the evidence adduced, certain instructions were asked by both plaintiff and defendant, and the case was submitted to a jury, which resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff of $4,500; and thereupon the defendant, by its attorneys, moved the court to set aside the verdict, and grant it a new trial, because the same was contrary to the law and the evidence, and the damages found by the jury were excessive; which motion was overruled by the court, and a judgment was rendered on the verdict; and the defendant, by its counsel, excepted, and tendered its bill of exceptions, which was made a part of the record; and from this ruling and judgment of the court this writ of error was obtained.

The first error assigned and relied on by the plaintiff in error is as to the action of the court in allowing rule 34, printed on the time card, to be read in evidence to the jury, which rule reads as follows: "Each train running after sunset, or when obscured by fog or other cause, must display the headlight in front, and two or more red lights in the rear. Yard engines must display two green lights instead of red, except when provided with a headlight on both front and rear." Now, in order that railroads may conduct the running of their trains safely and systematically, it is not only necessary that they should adopt rules for the governance of their employes, but, when so adopted and found to be salutary in their effect, they should be adhered to, and the negligence of their employes who have notice of these rules is frequently determined by their willful neglect and disobedience of the same. As to the relevancy of this particular rule, however, which was offered in evidence and objected to, the evidence shows that the accident which resulted in the injury complained of occurred very early in the morning, and also that the morning was foggy; so that the rule was relevant, as showing what was required to be done by the defendant in running its trains at such a time in the morning, and in weather of that character; and I cannot see that the defendant was prejudiced by the introduction of a rule which had been adopted by it manifestly for the protection of its property and the lives of its employes.

It is also assigned as error that the court permitted rules Nos. 3 and 4 to be read to the jury, although objected to by the defendant, which rules read as follows: "The head of each department must be conversant with the rules, supply copies of them to his subordinates, see that they are understood, enforce obedience to them, and report to the proper officer all violations and the action taken thereon. (4) Every employe whose duties are in any way prescribed by these rules must always have a copy of them at hand when on duty, and must be conversant with every rule. He must render all the assistance in his power in carrying them out, and immediately report any infringement of them to the head of the department." The action of the court in allowing rule 224 to be introduced and read to the jury, against the objection of defendant, is also assigned as error, which rule reads as follows: "Freight conductors report to, and receive their instructions from, the train master, and must obey the orders of yard masters. The conductor is responsible for the movement, safety, and proper care of his train, and for the vigilance and conduct of the men employed thereon, and must report any misconduct or neglect of duty." It seems to me that no valid objection could be sustained to the introduction of these rules. The question is directly raised in the case as to whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in the management of its trains, and, in determining that question, the first question which presents itself is as to whether the officers to whom it has intrusted the management of its trains have complied with the rules prescribed for their governance by the defendant itself. It is thus we ascertain what said officers are required to do by the directors of the railroad, and, by comparing their conduct as shown by the testimony, we can ascertain whether they have complied with their prescribed duties, or have been negligent in their conduct, and thereby have endangered or destroyed the property and lives of others; and I see no error in allowing said rules to be read to the jury. See Madden's Adm'r v. Railway Co., 28 W. Va. 610, fourth point of syllabus, where it was held by this court that "it is the duty of a railroad company to establish proper rules and regulations for its service, and, having adopted such rules, to conform to them."

The next error assigned is as to the action of the court in giving to the jury the instruction numbered 1 on behalf of the plaintiff, for the reason that there was no evidence in the case tending to justify the giving of the same. Said instruction No. 1 reads as follows: "Plaintiff's Instruction No. 1. If the jury believe from the evidence that Gregory Haney, while in the employ of the defendant company, was lawfully on a work train of the defendant, and that while on said train he was injured by a collision caused by the negligence of the conductor of the extra train attached to engine No. 6, said Gregory Haney being wholly without fault, or the means of preventing such negligence, or of avoiding its consequences, then the jury are instructed that the said conductor was not the fellow servant of said Haney, within the rule which exempts the company from liability for the negligent acts of fellow servants or persons engaged in the common service, and the company should be held responsible for an injury to said Haney caused by the negligence of said conductor." This instruction, as we understand it, propounds the law as laid down by this court in the case of Madden's Adm'r v. Railway Co., 28 W. Va. 610, point 5 of syllabus, and also in the case of Daniel v. Railway Co., 36 W. Va. 397, 15 S. E. 162, point 1 of syllabus. As to the objection that there is no evidence in the case tending to justify the giving of the same, there surely is evidence showing that the plaintiff's decedent was in the employ of the defendant company, and that he was on said train No. 3 as a laborer, being transported to the place of his work in company with the road foreman. As to the conduct of the conductor on that occasion, in his own testimony, when asked in question 14, "When you passed the distance signal at C. O. tower, what did that signal indicate to your train?" answered, "It was partly down; it indicated notice to engineer to reduce speed immediately; to approach home signal under control; that the speed was reduced;" but, when asked to state if his train approached home signal under perfect control, answered, "Well, I can't just exactly say." When asked, "What was the position of the arm on the home semaphore signal when you approached?" replied, "I don't remember exactly;" and, when asked to state if he observed it at the time, answered he did not remember the position of the block; "I can't answer;" and to the question, "Under the rules of the company, state whether or not it was your duty as a conductor to observe the signals," replied, "Yes, sir." This testimony of the conductor himself would surely have a tendency to show negligence on the part of the conductor of No. 6, and, as we think, would warrant the instruction.

Instruction No. 3 was given at the instance of the plaintiff, and the action of the court in giving said instruction is also assigned as error by the plaintiff in error for the same reason. Said instruction No. 3 reads as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that Gregory Haney, while in the employ of the defendant company, was lawfully on a work train of the defendant, and that while on said train he was injured by a collision caused by the negligence of the operators in M. N. tower or C. O. tower, or either of them, failing to give the proper signals to engine No. 6, said Gregory Haney being wholly without fault, or the means of preventing such negligence, or of avoiding its consequences, then the jury are instructed that said Haney was not the fellow servant of said operators, or of either of them, within the rule which exempts the company from liability for negligent acts of fellow servants or persons engaged in the common service, and the company should be held responsible for an injury to said Haney caused by the negligence of said operators, or either of them." Now, it is well known that the operators at the station who control the signals in this manner control the movement of the trains, and indicate the speed at which they are allowed to move on to the next block, and indicate whether the way is obstructed by another train or not; in short, these operators control the action of the conductors and engineers who manipulate the moving trains. The evidence clearly shows that by neglecting his duty, and violating the rules of the company, the operator exposed the wrong signal to No. 6 when it was approaching; and even if the conductor had been attending to his duties, and noticed the position of the signal, he would have been misled by the carelessness and negligence of the operator. And I think these instructions propound the law properly, unless, indeed, the said Gregory Haney was guilty of contributory negligence, and provided, further, that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury. The instruction, however, recites that the said Haney was wholly without fault, or the means of preventing such negligence, which would negative the evidence of contributory negligence; and the instructions also contemplate the injury as being the direct result of the negligence stated, so that I see no valid objection to them.

The action of the court in overruling the motion made by the defendant to set aside the verdict, and award it a new trial, is next assigned as error. Upon this question, in the case of Miller v. Insurance Co., 12 W. Va. 116, this court held that a new trial asked on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence ought to be granted only in a case of plain deviation from right and justice; not in a doubtful case, merely because the court, if on the jury, would have given a different verdict. Can we say that this was such a case? The accident was such as is termed among railroad men a "rear-end collision." Train No. 3, with 40 or 50 laborers in its caboose, on their way to their respective places of labor, had just pulled in to the block at Collier's station, and was standing on the track, and the conductor of No. 3 had started his flagman back to ward off danger. He had proceeded about 100 yards when he met train No. 6, coming in at a rate of speed of 12 or 15 miles an hour. The evidence shows that No. 3 passed No. 6 at the west end of Collier's yard, about two miles from where the collision occurred; so that the conductor of No. 6, if he paid any attention to what was transpiring, could not fail to know that No. 3 was going east in front of him, and, although he must have been aware that No. 3 was ahead of him, he followed so closely after it, at a high rate of speed, that No. 3 had not been stopped more than a minute when the collision occurred, and, accordingly to his own statements in his testimony, he was so careless and negligent in regard to the character of the signals displayed that, when asked upon trial what they indicated when he approached the home semaphore signal, he was compelled to admit that he did not remember exactly, and, when asked if he observed the signal at the time, answered that he did not remember the position of the block, and could not answer. Yet this was the man who, under the rules adopted by the company for the government of its employes, had the control and management of the movements of said train No. 6. It is true that, if he had noticed the signal, he would have been misled by reason of the negligence on the part of the operator in exhibiting a signal which indicated a permission to train No. 6 to come into the block at a high rate of speed, and without any notice that the track was occupied; but, on the contrary, said operator had left the signal at such an angle as to indicate a clear track, and, with the signals indicating a clear track, the operator left his office, in violation of rule No. 204 adopted by said company. It is also shown that the road between the two towers M. N. and C. O. is a block; and one of the rules of the company provides that, when a train approaches a block station, white will be displayed if there is no train upon the block ahead; and rule No. 202 says white indicates that the block is clear, and gives permission to proceed. In this instance the operator at M. N. tower gave the white signal to train No. 6 when No. 3 was still on the block. It is clear, then, that both the conductor of train No. 6 and the operator were guilty of negligence in allowing train No. 6 to run into the block and collide with No. 3.

Were they, or either of them, fellow servants with the plaintiff's decedent, Gregory Haney, of such a character as to prevent a recovery in this case? In the recent case of Daniels v. Railway Co., 15 S. E. 162, Holt, J., in discussing this question, collates the authorities bearing on the question. He says, among other things: "This brings us to the point involved, called the 'Ohio and Kentucky Doctrine,' to some extent adopted (by a divided court) by the supreme court of the United States in the Ross Case, found also in the English 'Employer's Liability Act,' and in the acts of some other states, and understood to be sanctioned and adopted in this state, especially in the Madden Case." The same English act enumerates these vice principals as follows: "Any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any signal points, locomotive engine, or train upon a railroad." In the case of Beuhring's Adm'r v. Railway Co., 16 S. E. 435, it is strongly intimated that a railroad engineer and a car numberer were fellow servants; and some authorities are brought forward in support of that position. And the court, in the opinion prepared by Brannon, J., states that the engineer and car numberer were fellow servants; but it is also stated in the opinion that no negligence was shown on the part of the engineer, and for that reason the point did not fairly arise in the case. In the Ross Case, (referred to in the Daniel's Case,) which is reported in 112 U. S. 377, 5 Sup. Ct. 184, Justice Field says: "A conductor, having the entire control and management of a railway train, occupies a very different position from the brakeman, the porters, and other subordinates employed. He is in fact, and should be treated as, the personal representative (vice principal) of the corporation, for whose negligence it is responsible to subordinate servants. * * * In no proper sense of the term is he the fellow servant with the fireman, the brakeman, the porters, and the engineers," and much more so with a section hand. One of the duties which a railroad company owes to its employees is to place careful and competent men in charge of its trains, who will conduct the same in such a manner as not to inflict injury and damage to those employed as laborers along its lines. In the case of Riley v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 146, this court held (point 2 of syllabus) that "whenever such company delegates to another the performance of a duty to its servants which it has impliedly contracted to perform itself, or which rests upon it as an absolute duty, it is liable for the manner in which that duty is performed by the middleman, whom it has selected as its agent, and to the extent of the discharge of these duties by the middleman he stands in the place of the company, but as to all other matters he is a mere co-servant." So also in the Madden Case, supra, it was held that where an engineer on one train was injured by the negligence of the conductor on the other train, running in opposite directions, the engineer was not the fellow servant of the conductor, and the company was held responsible. Let the injury complained of in this case, then, have resulted from the negligence of either the operator or the conductor, we must hold that the defendant was there acting through these agents, and either of them was the alter ego of the company, and that their negligence was the defendant's negligence.

Having arrived at this conclusion, the only remaining question we wish to consider is whether the plaintiff's decedent was guilty of contributory negligence. Looking to the evidence, we find that he was on board the caboose with 40 or 50 others, where he had a perfect right to be. How he got off when the collision came is not made clear by the evidence. He was found immediately afterwards, near the side of the car. He may have been thrown from the open door by the violence of the shock, or he may have jumped off. And, drawing the inference most favorable to the defendant, let us say he jumped off, and thereby received the injury which resulted eventually in his death. The question then is, did he, by jumping from the car under the circumstances, contribute to his own injury? In other words, was he guilty of such contributory negligence as to defeat the recovery in this case? It may be true that his action was induced by a mistaken apprehension, or that he was moved by an erring judgment; but it must not be forgotten that he was in a car with 50 others, a freight train was approaching at the rate of 12 or 15 miles an hour, and some one cried out there was a train coming, and to jump. The question is, what did self-preservation prompt? Was he to wait until the crash came, or was he to try and escape the shock, the scalding steam, and the flying splinters which are the usual accompaniment of such collisions. It is true that by remaining quiet he might have escaped injury as others did; but what was the natural impulse, and what would the great majority of men have done, however calm may have been their nervous temperament, under the same circumstances? There can be but one answer,—they would have made every effort to escape. Now, what does the law require of a man thus situated? Shearman & Redfield on the Law of Negligence, (volume 1, § 89,) under the heading, "Effect of Mistaken Judgment under Sudden Alarm," states the law as follows: "In judging of the care exercised by the plaintiff, reasonable allowance is always made for the circumstances of the case; and if the plaintiff is suddenly put into peril, without having sufficient time to consider all the circumstances, he is excusable for omitting some precautions, or making an unwise choice, under this disturbing influence, although, if his mind had been clear, he ought to have done otherwise, especially if his peril is caused by the defendant's fault. If one is placed by the negligence of another in such a position that he is compelled to choose instantly, in the face of grave and apparent peril, between two hazards, and he makes such a choice as a person of ordinary prudence, placed in such a position, might make, the fact that, if he had chosen the other hazard, he would have escaped injury, is of no importance. When the question is one of mere inconvenience, and not actual danger, some moderate risk may be taken, if there is no obvious danger. But the plaintiff will be chargeable with contributory negligence if he runs the risk of an obvious and serious danger, merely to avoid inconvenience." In this connection it may be noted that Dr. Elliott states in his testimony that the plaintiff's decedent had an exceedingly excitable and nervous temperament, which may, to some extent, account for his preferring to jump from a car standing still than to run the risk attendant upon the impending collision. Patterson, in his work on Railway Accident Law, at page 376, says: "It is not contributory negligence in a servant to jump from a moving train in order to avoid an apparent danger, such as an imminent collision;" citing Banking Co. v. Rhodes, 56 Ga. 645, in which case the court held that "where a baggage master upon a train, in imminent danger of collision, jumps therefrom, it is no defense to an action for injuries sustained that the conductor ordered him to jump. Where a collision is inevitable, such action becomes one of reasonable precaution. Such an employee assumes the risks necessarily incident to his occupation, but not such as result from the negligence of his coemployees," (unless it be the negligence of a fellow servant.) In the case of Banking Co. v. Roach, 64 Ga. 635, point 2 of syllabus, it was held that, "an engineer having jumped from his engine, and been killed, and the question being whether or not he was without fault, the necessity for jumping, his ability to jump, and the safety with which he could do so are all for the consideration of the jury." And so we think, subject, however, to the instructions of the court; the question involved being a mixed one of law and fact. Our conclusion, however, is that, under the circumstances, Gregory Haney was not chargeable with contributory negligence.

One more question: Were the damages ascertained by the jury ($4,500) excessive, or so excessive as to require the court to interfere with the verdict? Chapter 103 of our Code, § 6, which treats of actions for injuries, provides that "in every such action the jury may give such damages as they shall deem fair and just, not exceeding ten thousand dollars," etc., as a matter of course, each case must be controlled by its own circumstances. In the case of Borland v. Barrett, 76 Va. 137, Staples, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The wisdom of the law has constituted the jury, and not the court, the proper tribunal for the assessment of damages in cases like the present; and their verdict will not be disturbed unless it shows that the jury were actuated by passion, prejudice, or undue influence, or unless the amount is grossly excessive upon any just view of the evidence which might have been taken by the jury. No rule of law is perhaps more firmly established than this, both by the English and American cases,"—citing numerous authorities. It is true that in cases like the one at bar the damages are merely compensatory, while the case in which the above decision was rendered was an assault and battery case, in which vindictive damages might be given; yet, in my opinion, the above clause from the opinion of Judge Staples propounds correctly the law. So also in the case of Zinc Co. v. Black's Adm'r, 88 Va. 303, 13 S. E. 452, a case in which an employe was killed by the caving in of a bank by reason of the negligence of the defendant. Upon the question of excessive damages, the court held that, "whilst, under Code, § 3392, the question of a new trial, where the damages are too small or too large, is under the control of the court, yet the verdict will not be disturbed, unless it shows the jury were actuated by passion, prejudice, or undue influence;" and it was held error, under the circumstances, to set aside a verdict of $10,000 as excessive. In the case of Johnson v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 571, this court held that negligence was in most cases a mixed question of law and fact, and generally what particular facts constitute negligence is a question for the determination of the jury, from all the evidence before it bearing on the subject, rather than a question of law for the court. See Washington v. Railroad Co., 17 W. Va. 214. Under the circumstances of this case, looked upon in the light of the authorities above cited, the judgment complained of must be affirmed, with costs and damages.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Dec. 6, 1893.)

ATTACHMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT—SUPPLEMENTAL AFFIDAVIT—WHO MAY INTERVENE.

1. A case in which the law of attachment is discussed with reference to the affidavit, stating: (1) The nature of the plaintiff's claim. (2) The amount of the claim at the least; that is, the amount due after deducting all credits and proper counterclaims. (3) The amount the plaintiff is "justly" entitled to recover; that is, justly, not only in regard to the absent debtor, but justly in regard to other creditors and persons interested.

2. The supplemental affidavit allowed by the latter part of clause 8, § 1, c. 106. See Code, (Ed. 1891.)

3. A mere creditor at large of the absconding debtor is not a person interested in disputing plaintiff's claim, within the meaning of the term as used in section 23, c. 106, Code.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Barbour county; Joseph T. Hoke, Judge.

Action by J. N. B. Crim against C. J. Harmon, defendant, and Ruhl & Koblegard, interveners. From a decree for plaintiff, interveners appeal. Affirmed.

J. Hop. Woods, for appellants. M. Peck, for appellee.

HOLT, J. This is a suit in equity, with attachment, brought in Barbour circuit court on 26th October, 1891, by plaintiff, Crim, against defendant, Harmon, for a negotiable note for $918.07, dated July 28, 1891, payable at Tygart's Valley Bank 12 months after date. The affidavit gives the nature of the plaintiff's claim, and its amount, but it does not state "the amount at the least which the affiant believes the plaintiff is justly entitled to recover." Among the grounds for attachment enumerated by the statute, (section 1, c. 106,) the affidavit sets out Nos. 2, 3, 5, and 6, not including No. 1, which is based on nonresidence; also, certain material facts relied upon by him to show the existence of the grounds upon which the application for the attachment is based. On February 15, 1892, without objection made, but by leave of the court, (see latter part of clause 8, § 1, c. 106, p. 742, Code, Ed. 1891,) he filed a supplemental affidavit. Appellants, Ruhl & Koblegard, claimed to be attaching creditors of defendant, Harmon, by attachment sued out before a justice on 29th October, 1891, three days later. Appellants, claiming to be thus interested, filed their petition on February 23, 1892, by leave of the court, disputing the validity of the plaintiff's attachment. On May 28, 1892, plaintiff, Crim, defendant in the petition of the interveners, Ruhl & Koblegard, demurred to the petition, which the court sustained, giving petitioners leave to amend. Plaintiff, Crim, answered the original and amended petition, denying its sufficiency, and that petitioners were the owners, in any way, of the Cumberland Milling Company claim for $296.92, which was one of the two claims they set up against defendant, Harmon, the other being for $56.78 in their own name. The court had sold the attached property, and distributed all the proceeds among the attaching creditors of Harmon, except $400, which it held to await the contest between plaintiff, Crim, and petitioners. On the 23d day of December, 1892, the court heard the chancery cause of Crim v. Harmon, and the collateral petition of appellants, and pronounced a final decree, holding that there was no question of fact raised by the petition, proper for a jury; that plaintiff's attachment was valid from the filing of his amended and supplemental affidavit, on February 15, 1892; that petitioners failed to show any prior or equal claim to the fund; ordered their petition to be dismissed, and the sum of $400, in the hands of the receiver, to the credit of the cause, to be paid over to plaintiff, Crim, as a credit on his claim. From this the petitioners, Ruhl & Koblegard, have obtained this appeal.

The first question presented by the record, and argued by the counsel, is, was the attachment of J. N. B. Crim, the plaintiff, a valid one? And in this case this depends on two questions: (1) Was the original affidavit so defective as to require the attachment to be quashed, on motion of some one who had a right to make it? (2) If defective and insufficient, was it cured and made good by the supplemental affidavit, taken as such, or was the supplemental affidavit good, as an original one, from the time it was permitted to be filed?

That part of the statute in question (see section 1, c. 106, p. 741, Code, Ed. 1891) reads as follows: "When an action at law or suit in equity is about to be or is instituted, the plaintiff at the commencement of the action or suit or at any time thereafter and before judgment, may have an order of attachment against the property of the defendant by filing with the clerk of the court * * * his own affidavit or that of some credible person, stating (1) nature of the plaintiff's claim, (2) and the amount at the least, (3) which the plaintiff is justly entitled to recover. * * * See Hutch. Treat. § 1133; Ruhl v. Rogers, 29 W. Va. 779, 781, 2 S. E. 798. This is a plain, concise, and simple form of written oath, that he who runs may read. The appellee contends that his affidavit is good, although he has left out the term "justly." The argument on behalf of appellee is: "The law entitles a party to recover only that which is just. Affiant says that, by law, he is entitled to recover this claim, as stated. Therefore, he has said, by necessary implication, that he is justly entitled to recover it."

But this would soon involve the courts in the question as to what words of the statutory affidavit can be left out as unmeaning, or as already contained in other words by necessary implication, or what other words can be substituted as meaning the same thing; and to that extent their attention would be withdrawn from the merits of the case, and their time consumed in deciding such subtle questions as to words in the statute without meaning, words whose meaning, by necessary implication, is contained in other words; and synonymous words that may be safely substituted. And all this to enable persons to draft the affidavit without reading the statute. Public policy and general convenience forbid that any such perplexing burden should be cast upon the courts.

2. The history of the statute forbids any such loose construction. The formula for the affidavit is the result of 75 years of legislative consideration, passing through three revisions,—that of 1819, 1849, and 1868,—and it has been brought together, and methodized, shortened, and simplified, until that part has no superfluous or unmeaning words in it. Attention has thus been repeatedly directed to the terms "at the least," "just," "justice," "justly," for they have been substituted for each other; but instead of being left out, as idle or unmeaning, they have been introduced where they were not to be found before. See 1 Rev. Code 1819, c. 123, p. 474; Code 1849, (Ed. 1860,) p. 645, c. 151; Report of Revisors of Code of 1849, p. 753, and note; Code 1868, p. 553, c. 106; Id. c. 50, § 193; Acts 1882, c. 158, p. 514; Code, (Ed. 1887,) p. 722; Id. (Ed. 1891,) p. 741.

3. Such loose construction of this statute is also wrong, and on principle, because attachments constitute an extraordinary remedy,—harsh towards the defendant himself, and harsh in its operation towards the other creditors of the defendant, over whom the attaching creditor attains priority. It is liable to great abuse, and has often been greatly abused. The proceeding, therefore, is closely watched, and is never sustained unless all the requirements of the law have been complied with. Clafin v. Steenbock, 18 Grat. 854; 4 Minor, Inst. pt. 1, p. 266. It has its origin in one of the immemorial customs of the city of London, and has been carried in to all common-law countries, expanded and adapted to the circumstances, until it has become, not only useful, but indispensable, and should not be discouraged by tolerating its abuse, but rather encouraged and advanced, within its legitimate scope; and to this end it is not unimportant that no such relaxations be tolerated as tend to raise the class of questions here presented, of omitting from the affidavit words as unmeaning, or substituting for others their supposed equivalents; for there can be no valid writ or order of attachment without a sufficient affidavit, and no affidavit safely sufficient which, in language and scope of meaning, departs from the oath prescribed by the statute. The common sense and convenient rule, therefore, is to take it as we find it, and not consume the time of the courts in verbal subtleties as to what word is the equivalent of another, and what word includes another by necessary implication. The case of Magrath v. Hardy, 33 E. C. L. 974, was tried in the court of C. P. in 1838, in which the question arose, what was this custom of London, and how was it to be shown? Ashley, one of the attorneys of the lord mayor's court of London, of 25 years' experience as a practitioner of that court, was called as a witness by plaintiff, and he gave a full statement of the practice and proceedings by foreign attachment. It is significant, in its bearing on the term "at least," that in that case the demand was £1,000, but it was sworn to as £500 and upwards. See Locke, Attachm. 79, Law Lib. 56, where the affidavit says, "is justly and truly indebted in a certain sum [naming it as the sum due at the least] and upwards." See argument of counsel in Thompson v. Towson, (Md. 1772,) 1 Har. & McH. 504; Evans v. Tucker, (1883,) 59 Tex. 249. These qualifying terms prescribed by the statute are not idle and useless. First. An apparent indebtedness may be, in and of itself, too great, or not properly reduced by credits or proper counterclaims. It must be sworn to as the sum due "at the least." Second. Plaintiff's claim may be unjust, as against the absent debtor, or it may be fraudulent and collusive in his favor, as against other creditors. Therefore, the affiant must swear that he is "justly" entitled to recover with reference to others interested, as well as the absent debtor. See Worthington v. Cary, (1858,) 1 Metc. (Ky.) 470; Bailey v. Beadles, (1870,) 7 Bush, 383; Ludlow v. Ramsey, 11 Wall. 581; Wilkins v. Tourtellott, 28 Kan. 825.

On the question that the affidavit must state the amount of the claim over and above all set-offs or counterclaims, or, in this state, the minimum amount, by the use of the term "at the least," see Morrison v. Ream, 1 Pin. 244; Lyon v. Blakesly, 19 Hun, 299; Ruppert v. Haug, 87 N. Y. 141; Whitney v. Brunette, 15 Wis. 61; Wilson v. Arnold, 5 Mich. 98; 1 Wade, Attachm. § 66. See, also, Endel v. Leibrock, (1877,) 33 Ohio St. 254-

267; 2 Bart. Law Pr. (2d Ed.) § 221, p. 942. Hutchinson, in his West Virginia Treatise, we may infer, takes the same view from the tenor of our cases. Hutch. Treat. c. 60, § 1127, p. 778; 4 Minor, Inst. pt. 1, p. 366. Our conclusion, therefore, is, from our own, as well as other authorities on this point, that our statute authorizes an attachment as ancillary to the suit, but requires an affidavit to state (1) the nature of his claim; (2) the amount, at the least, (3) which plaintiff is justly entitled to recover, in the language of the statute, or its equivalent, not simply to show, prima facie, the existence, the nature, and the apparent amount of the claim, but that he shall also have the fear of perjury before his eyes, on the point of putting the amount of his claim at its minimum amount, and not leave out credits and proper counterclaims, and, on the point that it is just,—bona fide,—that he should recover it; that it is not only bona fide as to others, but also as to the creditor who is not present to contest the claim; that he shall not, on his corporate oath, omit or forget to make it just in these particulars, giving the nature of his claim, and not merely its apparent amount, but the least amount,—not only what, in good faith to the debtor, but to others, he is entitled to recover,—"justly entitled to recover." As a practical illustration on this point, let us suppose plaintiff makes and files an affidavit in the words of the statute, and willfully omits an important credit, or suppose it turns out that his claim is a fraud trumped up against the debtor, or a mere contrivance to shelter or protect him from his other creditors. Is it open to question that he is guilty of perjury,—of perjury as distinguished in our statute (section 1, c. 147, Code) from false swearing? How can the term "at the least," indicating a cautious minimum after making all proper deductings, be omitted as immaterial, or as already implied, or the term "justly," comprehending, as it does, honesty and good faith to others, as well as to the debtor, in the statement of what he is entitled to recover, be omitted for the like reason? Can we say that these terms may be left out, or, if needed, are to be found as necessary implications from the words, or to be gathered by inference from the affidavit as a whole, supplemented, if need be, by averments in the pleadings? An indictment for perjury would fare badly, if that, as the gravamen, had to be hunted out and pieced together from such necessary implications and outside averments,—and yet any one may see that the sworn, written statement of these two things is the gist of the whole matter.

An amended or supplemental affidavit containing the word "justly" was filed during the progress of the suit. The court below proceeded on the theory that plaintiff's affidavit filed on the 15th day of February, 1892, charging, among other things, that defendant, Harmon, was a nonresident of the state, —a ground not needing the averment of any fact to support it,—was from that date as a new affidavit in support of the pending attachment, or rather that on that ground it could be treated as an attachment from that date in the pending suit, for the statute authorizes an attachment at any time after the commencement of the action, or suit before judgment. This presents a different case from an amendment proper of the original affidavit, and may be good, as it would not be taken as a portion of the original, where it did not affect the rights or lien of any other prior attachment creditor or other person, as seems to have been the case in this instance. There are many cases, however, in which the original affidavit may be amended, such as mere clerical mistakes, and certain defects in form. The accidental omission of the officer who administered the oath to sign it at the proper time, when the affidavit is in proper form, and was actually made, will not vitiate the affidavit, (Bank v. Gettinger, 4 W. Va. 305,) or, at any time, to correct a mere clerical mistake, (Anderson v. Coal Co., 12 W. Va. 526.) For a discussion of the question, and full collation of cases, see Barber v. Swan, 61 Amer. Dec. 124, (from 4 G. Greene, 352.) In most of the states it is regulated by statute, and as yet we have none on the subject. See Drake, Attachm. (8th Ed.) § 87 et seq.; 1 Wade, Attachm. § 56; Wap. Attachm. 101-107; 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 907. In what cases, how, and to what extent, this cure by supplemental affidavit may be applied, is now prescribed by statute. See Code, (Ed. 1891,) p. 742, latter part of clause 8, § 1, c. 106, which came in by amendment made in 1887. It relates to the sufficiency of the material facts relied upon and necessary, in all cases of domestic attachment, to show the existence of the grounds upon which the application for the attachment is based, the evidential facts from which, if true, the court can say, as a matter of law, that the particular ground for attachment, prima facie, exists. It reads as follows: "But, upon objection to the sufficiency of such facts, the affiant shall have the right, within such time, not exceeding 10 days, as may be prescribed by the court, in which the action or suit is pending, to file a supplemental affidavit, stating any other facts which may have come to his knowledge since the filing of the original affidavit, and which are relied on to show the existence of such grounds, and, when filed, such supplemental affidavit shall be taken as a portion of the original." This should be so construed as to advance the remedy, and suppress the mischief intended to be remedied. By its language it is made to embrace suits in equity, as well as actions at law. Its first effect, so far as the evidential facts of the ground of attachment are concerned, would seem to be to render such affidavits not void, but only voidable by a direct proceeding to have it set aside. The material evidential facts relied upon to make, in law, a prima facie case of fraud, or other ground of attachment, cannot, in the nature of the thing required, be made the subject of uniform rule. Hence, the justice and importance of permitting that part of the affidavit to be supplemented in proper time and mode. And I should think that it is not necessary for the affiant to wait for objection to be made. He may, in a proper case, by permission of the court, anticipate, as was done in this case, such objection, for the one includes the other, to the extent that the subsequent objector cannot complain that the affiant, by anticipation, took away from him such ground of complaint. Such additional facts with which those in the original affidavit are thus supplemented must make it sufficient in law on this point; otherwise, it is still open to objection and abatement. But he must state that such additional facts have come to his knowledge since the filing of the original affidavit; otherwise, they would not be supplementary, and because the statute so prescribes, for the purpose of making the affiant state in the original all the material facts then known or remembered. The supplemental affidavit filed in this case, and objected to, contains no such statement, but attempts to amend on a wholly different and foreign subject, viz. that plaintiff is justly entitled to recover, etc., a subject not within the language or meaning of the law permitting the supplementary affidavit. The supplementary affidavit introduces for the first time the ground for attachment that defendant, Harmon, is a nonresident of this state, which does not need the statement of any other or evidential facts to show its existence, and if it had been good in other respects, following the short, plain, and simple formula prescribed by the statute, might have been made the basis of a new order of attachment, to be made effective from that time by leave of the court. This seems, as stated above, to have been the view taken by the court.

But the vital question remains, do appellants show themselves to be persons interested, within the meaning of the statute, (section 23, c. 106,) which permits any person interested to file his petition at any time before the property attached as the estate of the defendant is sold under the decree or judgment; or, if the proceeds of sale have not been paid over to the plaintiff or his assigns, to file his petition within a year after such sale, disputing the validity of the plaintiff's attachment thereon, or stating a claim thereto, or an interest in or lien on the same, under any other attachment or otherwise. In the original petition disputing the validity of plaintiff's attachment, their own claim is for $56.93, as to which, by itself, this court would have no jurisdiction, being under $100. As to the claim of $296.62 against defendant, Harmon, in the name of the Cumberland Milling Company, there is no evidence in the record, of any kind, that petitioners have any interest in or title of any kind, except that they say in their petition that they are now the owners of both of said claims; but the Cumberland Milling Company are not parties to the petition or the suit as plaintiffs or defendants, but on the contrary the affidavit on the account made October 5, 1892, by John W. Cook, treasurer and superintendent of the Cumberland Milling Company, shows or tends to show that the claim then belonged to the company. But, apart from this, petitioners, by their petition and exhibits filed therewith, show themselves to be mere creditors at large of defendant, Harmon. These exhibits profess to be summons and attachments against defendant, Harmon, and his estate, issued November 6, 1891, by a justice of Barbour county, returned as levied October 29, 1891, on the personal property, goods, and chattels of C. G. Harmon of Belington, Barbour county, W. Va. A list of the property levied upon is filed with the attachment of J. N. B. Crim against said Harmon, "now pending in the circuit court of Barbour county, which is referred to, and made part of the said ——" There was no affidavit for the attachment. Summons was awarded November 6, 1891, in each case, against defendant, Harmon, returnable same day, but never returned, whereupon the justice rendered judgments. All this, of course, amounts to nothing, leaving them still general creditors of defendant, Harmon, so that the demurrer of plaintiff, Crim, to the petition, was properly sustained. In the amended petition there is no evidence of any kind that petitioners are owners, of any kind or in any way, of the claim in the name of the Cumberland Milling Company, but the exhibit tends to show the contrary. The milling company is not before the court, and the answer of Crim to the amended petition says that neither of said petitions is sufficient in law to entitle said petitioners to any consideration at the hands of the court; that no pretense is made to ownership or interest in the personal property sold under the attachments; and that petitioners are not, and never were, the owners of the pretended debt in the name of the Cumberland Milling Company. And by the record it still appears, after the filing of the amended petition, that Ruhl, Koblegard & Co. were only creditors at large of defendant, Harmon, and that only as to the account of $56.87 in their own name, without showing a shadow of a right, legal or equitable, by pleadings or otherwise, to the larger claim made up in the name of the Cumberland Milling Company. It will be time enough to settle the rights of the milling company when they see fit to apply or intervene; and as to their own claim of $56.87, if they stand in any other attitude to the fund in controversy than as creditors at large of defendant, Harmon, the matter in controversy is of less value and amount than $100, so that this court, on that point, would have no jurisdiction. Decree complained of affirmed.

McCRUM et al. v. LEE et al.

OFFUTT v. McCrum et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1893.)

INJUNCTION—PLEADINGS—AMENDING PLEADINGS—NEW MATTER—WRONGFUL REMOVAL OF TRUST PROPERTY.

1. A trust creditor and the trustee, to whom the property had been turned over by the trust debtor to sell, file a bill of injunction to restrain a third party from wrongfully removing the trust property out of the state, but do not pray for general relief. Held, if the plaintiffs desire any relief proper to be given in the case as made, other than that specifically prayed for, the bill must contain a prayer for general relief, but such general prayer may be added by amendment or amended bill.

2. In such case plaintiffs may, by amended bill or supplemental, as may be proper, allege new facts, and make new parties defendant, showing the necessity for taking accounts and for the aid of the court in safely and properly executing his duties as trustee, adding a prayer for the taking of such accounts, and for the aid of the court in administering the trust. Held, such amendments are not improper, nor are they within the meaning of the rule which forbids the introduction of such new matter as constitutes, in substance, a new bill.

3. Against a party defendant who has wrongfully removed out of the state all or a part of the trust property, the court may make such presumptions, and draw such inferences, as the case admits of, and treat such defendant as one who shall not profit by such wrong. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Tucker county; William T. Ice, Judge.

Action by L. L. McCrum and others against J. W. Lee and others, and an action by Daniel E. Offutt against L. L. McCrum and others. The two cases were consolidated, and tried together. There was decree for McCrum, and Offutt appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Parsons, for appellant. W. B. Maxwell, for appellees.

HOLT, J. These two cases are bills of injunction brought in Tucker county,—the first by L. L. McCrum, trust creditor, and Page R. McCrum, trustee, against J. W. Lee and others, trust debtors, and D. E. Offutt, invoking the aid of the court in selling the property, and to enjoin its removal out of this state; the second was brought by Daniel E. Offutt, mortgagor of the same property by mortgage executed in Garrett county, state of Maryland, where he resided, against the McCrums, J. W. Lee, and others, settling up his mortgage, with actual notice on the part of the McCrums when the deed of trust was given, and praying an injunction to restrain them from selling under the deed of trust. The same exhibits were filed, and the same depositions were taken to be used as evidence, in both cases, and such proceedings were had that the two causes came on to be heard together on July 10, 1890, when the court pronounced a decree whereby it continued the first-named cause for future consideration, and all questions thereby presented were reserved for the future order of the court; and the court, then proceeding to ascertain the rights of the parties in the second cause, adjudged them to be for defendants, and ordered and decreed that plaintiff Offutt's injunction be dissolved, and his bill dismissed, with costs. Plaintiffs McCrums' original bill charged defendant Offutt and the Lees with wrongfully, unlawfully, and in the nighttime removing, and attempting to remove, the trust property out of their possession and control, and out of the state, and beyond the jurisdiction of the court, praying specifically for an injunction against such removal, but not for general relief. The judge in vacation granted the injunction prayed for on February 2, 1887, and on the next day it was perfected by the giving of the bond required. What is called the "Farquhar Steam Sawmill" was, as events turned out, the only one in controversy, and it was all removed beyond the state, out of reach of the trustee, except the boiler, which his injunction was in time to stop within the state, and this he advertised to sell on February 21, 1887. On the first Monday in March, Offutt filed at rules his demurrer and answer, in which he set out his own claim to the mill in question by virtue of a Maryland mortgage to him from the defendant Lee, dated December 29, 1885, older in time and prior in equity to the West Virginia deed of trust, and that the McCrums took their deed of trust with actual notice thereof. On December 22, 1888, the cause of McCrum was remanded to rules, with leave to amend, etc., and mature the same for hearing, and the plaintiffs then filed an amended and supplemental bill, bringing in Emily J. Lee as a defendant, the wife of defendant J. W. Lee, as it appeared by Offutt's answer and the evidence thus far that she claimed the mill in question as her separate property, and was a joint maker of the note of $850 secured by the deed of trust; also, charging that, since the filing of the original bill, defendant Offutt had made his whole mortgage debt on this mill by sale of other property, real and personal, in Maryland, made by virtue of other mortgages, leaving a surplus for which he should be compelled to account. In this bill they prayed for general relief, specifically for the relief prayed in the original bill, for sale of property under the deed of trust, or, if the separate property of Mrs. Lee, that in that event it might be sold as hers, to satisfy said debt of plaintiff L. L. McCrum against her. At the hearing of the two causes together, on July 10, 1890, it was manifest from the pleadings and evidence that no safe and proper decree could be made in the cause without having certain facts ascertained, and accounts taken by a commissioner; and thereupon plaintiffs, by leave of the court, filed their second amended bill, the only material addition being a specific prayer for an account of liens on the mill, with their amounts and priorities.

and at the same time, on December 1, 1890, the cause was referred to Commissioner Adams, who was directed to ascertain and report as follows: The value of the mill at the time a part of it was removed from Pendleton run into the state of Maryland; the liens thereon claimed by Offutt and by McCrum, the amounts, priorities, and to whom owing; also, any credit defendant Offutt should allow upon his mortgage on the mill in question by reason of the sales made by him of the property embraced therein, other than the mill in question, sold by him in Maryland; who was the purchaser of the property sold under such mortgages, or either of them, and the amount, if anything, yet due D. E. Offutt on such mortgages, and make and report such special statements as either party may require, or himself deem pertinent and proper; and Trustee Page R. McCrum was ordered to sell the boiler on six months' credit, and report, etc. On March 4, 1891, Page R. McCrum, trustee, reported the sale of the boiler in pursuance of the order, and the purchase thereof at the price of $100. Commissioner Adams duly opened the taking of accounts, as directed, taking some additional testimony on some material questions of fact, the ascertainment of which was material and pertinent to the matters in hand. The commissioner completed his report, adding an alternative statement, at the request of Offutt's counsel, representing his view of what the report should have been. He retained it for the inspection and examination of counsel and parties. Counsel for Offutt excepted to the report, pointing out three grounds of exceptions: (1) That Offutt should have had a first lien on the mill, etc., for $1,335.45. (2) Offutt should have been credited with $669.50, and $238.73, amount of debt and costs of the Pearre mortgage, as first lien on the real and personal property of the debtor, J. W. Lee. (3) That a court of competent jurisdiction in Garrett county, state of Maryland, had made a settlement of the transactions of said Offutt as administrator of Peter Martin, deceased, and that there was found due Offutt, as such administrator, and unpaid to him on the mortgage on the mill property in controversy, as of 19th March, 1887, the sum of $1,009.26, and such sum, with interest brought down to date, as in alternate statement, was the correct amount due Offutt, and constituted a lien on the mill in controversy. Counsel for plaintiffs excepted to the alternate statement as shown to be incorrect by the statement made and adopted as correct by the commissioner. With his report the commissioner returned the exceptions without any remarks thereon, and the cause came on to be finally heard on the 1st day of December, 1891, upon the papers formerly read, depositions, report of sale of Trustee P. R. McCrum, and the report of Commissioner Adams, and exceptions and argument of counsel. The court proceeded to pronounce the decree complained of, stating specifically the grounds thereof, adopting in express words the necessary implications from the commissioner's report: "The court is of opinion, from the pleadings and proofs, that the defendant D. E. Offutt improperly and illegally removed the mill in controversy out of this state, and beyond the jurisdiction of the courts, in fraud of the rights of the plaintiffs by virtue of their deed of trust on the mill; that Offutt should be required to account for the value of the mill in controversy as it stood in this state just before its removal by him into the state of Maryland; and after crediting his debts with the net amount of the proceeds of sale of the property sold by him in the state of Maryland, (other than the proceeds of the sale of the mill,) the said Offutt is entitled to have the residue of his debt, viz. $341.81, first paid out of the value of said mill, and plaintiff L. L. McCrum is entitled, by virtue of his deed of trust, to payment thereon of the residue of the value of the mill as it stood in this state before removal, and to recover of Offutt the residue of such value as found by the commissioner, viz. $1,270, credited by the gross proceeds of the sale of the boiler, viz. $100;" and then the court pronounced against D. E. Offutt, in favor of L. L. McCrum, a personal decree for $713.34, thus ascertained by the commissioner, and as reduced by the court, with interest from August 11, 1891, with leave to sue out execution, etc. From this decree appellant, D. E. Offutt, obtained this appeal on January 5, 1892, and an appeal from the decree of July 10, 1890, dismissing the second-named cause, on January 30, 1892.

In the first-named cause, of McCrum v. Lee et al., (Offutt, appellant,) the following grounds of error are assigned: (1) The court erred in not sustaining the demurrer to the original bill, amended bill, and second amended bill, and dismissing each of them; (2) in entering the decree in this cause referring it to a commissioner; (3) in not sustaining the defendants' exceptions to Commissioner Adams' report; (4) in entering the final decree against D. E. Offutt. In the second-named cause, of Daniel E. Offutt against L. L. McCrum and others, appellant, Offutt, assigned the following grounds of error: (1) The court erred in dissolving petitioner's injunction; (2) in dismissing plaintiff's bill at his costs; (3) under the prayer of said bill, and the evidence, the court erred in not decreeing a sale of the boiler, and perpetuating petitioner's injunction. The two cases were heard together by the court below, and have been submitted together in this court on one set of briefs. The pleadings and proofs are the same down to the hearing and dismissal of the second-named cause, of Offutt v. McCrum. It might have been better to have retained this latter cause until the final hearing of the first-named cause, but, in the view we take of the two, there was no substantial error in such dismissal, because McCrum's suit was pending against Offutt when this suit was brought; and the relief sought could have been more fittingly and properly applied for in that suit, especially as that bill, in the same court, charged him with wrongfully removing the mill in controversy out of the state and beyond the jurisdiction of the court. He should at least have answered in that case first. He did answer in March, 1887, setting out his defense and claim fully,—as fully as it is set out in his original bill of injunction; and he could have prayed, or at any time moved, that the boiler or mill should be sold under the direction of the court, and the proceeds paid in to the credit of the cause, to go ultimately to the one held to be entitled. The truth is, he had no ground for a cross bill, because the facts which he set up in his original bill, as well as in his answer, constituted matter of defense, tending to destroy and rebut, if true, plaintiff's cause of suit, and not showing any reason why the court should deprive him of a right or claim which he is conceded to have. In either view, section 35, c. 125, Code, gave him a remedy by answer, which was virtually saved to him to the end.

This bill of injunction was brought in D. E. Offutt's own name as plaintiff, and not in his name as administrator of Peter Martin, deceased. The claim on which he sued was a debt of $1,250, evidenced by four promissory notes executed to him as such administrator, and secured by mortgage on the mill in dispute, which mill Martin died possessed of, and which came to Offutt to be administered, but Offutt sold the mill, and took the notes and mortgage. It is true that in a proper case these notes and mortgage, having this earmark, might be followed as assets in equity belonging to the estate, but in law the sale of the mill was a technical conversion, and the legal title to the notes and mortgage was in Offutt personally, and not in him as administrator, that addition being an earmark appropriately added to show that it was for property which had belonged to the intestate, and that the proceeds of sale were to be accounted for to his estate. In such case the suit was properly in his own name. It is true, under our law, if these notes had been executed to Peter Martin, and had come to plaintiff to be administered, then the suit would have been in his name as administrator, and his qualification as such in this state would have been a necessary requisite to the maintenance of the suit in that character, such inconvenience not having yet been remedied in this state by statute. In this case there is no error to the injury of appellant, and the decree dismissing his bill is affirmed.

The merits of the controversy—for it is virtually one—are to be found in the record of McCrum v. Lee, in which defendant Offutt is the only appellant. First error assigned,—that the court erred in overruling defendants' demurrer to original and amended bills. Nothing is more common, and nothing is better settled, than the right, and in a proper case the duty, of a trustee to invoke the aid and direction of a court of equity in the execution of his trust. It is true, chapter 72, § 6, of the Code, prescribes the proceedings, including sale under deeds of trust; but that does not forbid, but in a proper case impliedly requires, the trustee to go into a court of equity if he needs a guaranty of safety and protection for himself, and wishes to discharge properly the duties he may owe to the debtor as well as to the creditor. As, for example, where the deed of trust is of long standing, various payments have been made, and the true balance is not known, and cannot be safely and readily ascertained; where there are successive liens or incumbrances, with balances unknown, sundry creditors, with shares or interests not defined, conflicting claims to the proceeds of sale,—in these and like cases it is often eminently proper and promotive of justice that the trust or mortgage should be executed or foreclosed in a court of equity, where the accounts of all the parties in interest can be readily adjusted, the trust fund equitably distributed, and the trustee enabled to proceed safely as well as properly in the discharge of his duties. See Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 779; Hammers v. Dole, 61 Ill. 307; Dupuy v. Gibson, 38 Ill. 197. This was but the common case of a trustee and trust creditor, who filed a bill of injunction to enjoin and restrain the defendants from wrongfully removing the trust property out of the state, as the law authorizes to be done, (see Code, c. 133, § 8,) and thus hindering or preventing the due execution of the duties of the one as trustee, and the enforcement of the rights of the other as a trust creditor.

It is true that if the plaintiffs desire any relief proper to be given in the case as made, other than the relief specifically prayed for, the bill must contain a prayer for general relief, but this can be added by amendment, as was afterwards properly done in this case. The plaintiffs may properly add new parties, as was done in this case, by making Emily J. Lee a defendant, as she was found to be a joint maker of one of the trust debts, and may, by amended bill or supplemental bill, as the case may require, allege new facts, as was done in this case, where plaintiffs in that way bring in the facts that D. E. Offutt, out of the proceeds of sale of certain real and personal estate, made by him by virtue of certain mortgages executed to him, had, since the original bill had been filed, received the full amounts of the debts due him, and had in his hands several hundred dollars surplus for which he should be compelled to account, and, if the mill should be held to be the separate estate of Emily J. Lee, that it might be sold to pay that note secured by the trust deed, which she owed as joint maker with her husband to plaintiff L. L. McCrum. This and the evidence showed the necessity of taking the accounts directed by the court, and the propriety, but perhaps not the necessity, of permitting plaintiffs to amend by praying that such accounts may be taken. All this was properly charged and done, in order that complete justice might be done to all parties, and the controversy ended. Such amendments were not improper. They did not make a new case, within the meaning of the rule which forbids the introduction of new matter constituting in substance a new bill, and the demurrers were properly overruled. With this view of the pleadings, the evidence in the cause made the taking of the accounts directed by the court eminently proper, and this disposes of appellant's second assignment of error.

The third and fourth assignments of error depend in large part upon the facts, and may be considered together. On the 29th day of September, 1885, defendant Daniel E. Offutt sold to defendant Emily J. Lee, or to her husband, defendant John W. Lee, in Garrett county, state of Maryland, a steam sawmill, fixtures, and appurtenances manufactured by Arthur B. Farquhar, belonging to the estate of his intestate, Peter Martin, and took a mortgage on the mill and certain real estate of Mrs. Lee to secure the payment of $1,250, the unpaid purchase money. It does not appear by this record that it was ever recorded in Garrett county, but it was recorded in Tucker county, W. Va., on January 26, 1887. On or about the 10th day of August, 1886, defendant John W. Lee removed this mill to Tucker county, W. Va., and set it up for sawing at Pendleton run, near the town of Davis; defendant Offutt says without his consent, but the evidence clearly shows that it was at least with his knowledge. On the 30th of November, 1886, John W. Lee, who was in possession claiming to be the owner, executed to plaintiff Page R. McCrum, trustee, a deed of trust on the mill to secure to plaintiff L. L. McCrum the payment of two notes executed to him,—one for $850 by John W. Lee, the husband, Emily J. Lee, the wife, and G. J. Lee, the son. The wife refused to join in the trust deed, but it was admitted to record December 1, 1886. When they took this deed of trust, L. L. McCrum, the creditor, had notice of Offutt's mortgage. On the land mentioned in this mortgage,—150 acres and 50 acres situate in Garrett county.—John W. Lee and Emily J., his wife, had executed to George A. Pearre a mortgage on February 7, 1883, to secure the payment of $650. This mortgage was admitted to record on the 10th of February, 1883, on this same land and certain personal property, but not including the mill. J. W. Lee and wife, on August 21, 1886, executed to Offutt another mortgage to secure the payment of $700, due in 12 months. This was admitted to record on August 31, 1886. About the — of February, 1887, defendant Offutt hired a car of the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company, sent the car into the immediate vicinity of the mill late in the evening, and during that night defendant Lee and others, at the instance and direction of appellant, took down and loaded on the car all the mill except the boiler, and shipped it out of this state, into the state of Maryland, consigned to appellant. The mill, at that time, had been turned over to Trustee McCrum, and an inventory had been made for the purpose of selling under the trust deed, the sale having been advertised. On the 19th March, 1887, in Garrett county, Md., and after he had filed his answer in plaintiffs' suit, defendant Offutt sold the mill, except the boiler, for $300. The mill where it was set on Pendleton run, before it was dismantled and removed, was worth $1,500. Plaintiff McCrum would have given the amount of his trust debt, about $1,400, for it. It was known as "J. W. Lee's Mill," and if, in fact, it belonged or had belonged to his wife, Mrs. Emily J. Lee, she permitted her husband to remove it out of the state of Maryland, and set it up and run it in this state, in his own name and as his mill; his claim of ownership being recognized, as well as permitted, by her, his authority as owner in every way being apparently full and complete. She also, according to her testimony, participated in the removal of the mill out of this state. The court, in its final decree of the 1st of December, 1891, applied to the case the principle that "no man shall take advantage of his own wrong," and the further rule of evidence contained therein, of presuming against the spoliator everything fairly deducible from his conduct in the transaction. He caused the mill, then in the control of the trustee for the purpose of enabling him to discharge his duty by selling it, to be taken down in the nighttime, and shipped out of the state, and beyond the jurisdiction of the court, in fraud of the rights of the trust creditor; and after plaintiffs' injunction forbidding the removal by him, and after his own injunction against the trustee forbidding the sale of the sawmill and fixtures, or any part thereof, he sold the mill himself in the state of Maryland for $300, at a cost and expense of sale of $102.40, leaving the net sum of $197.60, which he credited on his mortgage; thus leaving on his mortgage debt, at that time, a balance of $811.66, and thus reducing what ought to have been the proceeds of sale—$1,270 or $1,500—to $300. The commissioner, out of abundant caution, adopted $1,270, and the court confirmed it; so that from the evidence, in the opinion of the commissioner and of the court, the loss entailed upon the trust fund by his improper and illegal conduct amounted to $970. The court ascertained this amount by a very moderate and cautious application of the presumption in odium spoliatoris. But, if let alone, this entailed no loss on him, for he had in his mortgage other security, viz. the 209 acres of land in Garrett county, Md., more than sufficient to make him whole; but this would deprive the trust creditor of his right to have the securities marshaled according to the well-known rule which prevails in both states,—that a court of equity, in a proper case, will compel a creditor having a lien on two parcels of property so to enforce it as not to injure the rights of him who has a lien on but one of them. Aldrich v. Cooper, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. (4th Ed.) pt. 1, p. 255; Stephenson v. Taverners, 9 Grat. 398; Alston v. Munford, 1 Brock. 266; Wiley v. Mahood, 10 W. Va. 207; Bank v. Wilson, 25 W. Va. 242; 2 Bart. Ch. Pr. § 278; 1 Bart. Ch. Pr. § 92. The court seeing that, without prejudice to the rights of any innocent third party, it could safely undo the advantage which Offutt had tried to gain, which, if let alone, could not result in loss to him, but would result in loss to L. L. McCrum, the trust creditor, to the extent of $823.19 at least, pronounced a decree against him, in favor of L. L. McCrum, for that amount, with interest from August 11, 1891, till paid, with leave to sue out execution, etc. In this there is no error of which appellant has any right to complain. As to Mrs. Emily J. Lee, she does not appeal, and must, by this court, be held not to have been the owner of the mill. As to the method and process by which the court worked out and reached this result, that is immaterial, for the amount decreed might have been greater. It could not well have been less, and it leaves the trust debt still unsatisfied. This principle of law applied by the court—that no man shall take advantage from and by reason of his own wrong—is manifestly reasonable and necessary, and none is of more frequent application in the various branches of the law. It lies at the foundation of the law of fraud and estoppel in pais, and comprehends other maxims of practical importance; as, for example, the one that a right of action cannot arise out of fraud, and that all fair inferences may be drawn in odium spoliatoris. See Co. Litt. 148b; Broom, Leg. Max. 279, and cases cited where it has been applied. As to the other maxim, Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange, 504, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 631; Best, Ev. § 411. If appellant had left it within the power of the court, or, after his own suit was brought, had put it in the power of the court, to sell the trust property and administer the trust fund, the court would have sold the mill, and out of the proceeds paid his first mortgage, but would have required him, after paying off the senior Pearre mortgage, of $650, on the Maryland land, and paying off his second mortgage, of $700, on the land and other personal property, which property sold for $546.95, and the land for $1,200, to have paid over to the trust creditor the amount received from this source over and above what was sufficient to satisfy in full his two mortgages on the land; and this, even according to the sale actually made, would have been but a trifle less than the sum decreed against him, taking the mill as worth $1,270 before he removed it, so that the leaving out of the Pearre mortgage by the commissioner in making up his account was only a different method of arriving at substantially the same result. There is therefore no substantial error in the decrees complained of, and each is affirmed.

VOSS et al. v. KING.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 7, 1893.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—DENIAL OF LANDLORD'S TITLE—HOLDING OVER—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by a landlord against his tenant, whether the action be debt, assumpsit, covenant, or unlawful detainer, where neither fraud or mistake is shown in the procurement of the lease, no proof of title is required by the landlord, for in such case the tenant is estopped from denying the title of his landlord.

2. A tenant for years, who holds over after the expiration of his term, without paying rent or otherwise acknowledging a continuance of the tenancy, becomes either a trespasser or a tenant, at the option of the landlord.

3. Where the landlord suffers the tenant to remain in possession after the expiration of the original tenancy, the law presumes the holding to be upon the terms of the original demise.

4. The fact that during the tenancy the title of the landlord has been forfeited for the nonpayment of taxes on the land in controversy constitutes no valid defense to an action of unlawful detainer, brought to dispossess the tenant, as the plaintiff is entitled to be placed in statu quo, unless, perhaps, the tenant has made a distinct disclaimer, and has been holding adversely for more than three years, or can sustain some other valid defense.

5. This court cannot interfere with the verdict of a jury under such circumstances that we are not able to say that, by excluding all the parol evidence of the exceptor in conflict with that of the plaintiff, the verdict was not warranted by the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Randolph county.

Action by Joseph H. Voss and others against Patrick King to recover land. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

For report on former appeal, see 10 S. E. 402.

John Brannon and Samuel Woods, for plaintiff in error. C. W. Russell, for defendants in error.

ENGLISH, P. On the 14th day of December, 1886, an action of unlawful detainer was brought in the circuit court of Randolph county by Joseph H. Voss, Susan G. Elder, and Sophy S. Shennard, an infant, who sued by her next friend, Frederick Shennard, against one Patrick King, for the recovery of the possession of a certain tract of land situate in the district of Roaring Creek, in said county of Randolph, described by metes and bounds in the summons, and alleged to contain 1,000 acres, and being the same tract of land upon which said Patrick King then resided. The plea of not guilty was interposed, and on the 19th day of September, 1887, the case was submitted to a jury, and, after a portion of the evidence was heard, the plaintiffs took a nonsuit. On the 23d day of September, 1887, upon motion of the plaintiffs, the nonsuit was set aside, and on the 24th day of May, 1888, the case was submitted to another jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, finding that the defendant unlawfully withheld from the plaintiffs that part of the land in the summons mentioned, being about 207¾ acres, shown upon a plat filed in the case, made by Nicholas Marsteller, surveyor, and beginning at the gum in the summons mentioned, indicated on said plat by the letter A, running south, 19 west, 189 poles, to a chestnut, oak and gum, indicated on said plat by the letter H; thence north, 71 west, 176 poles, to a maple, indicated on said plat by the letter I; thence north, 19 east, 189 poles, to a maple, indicated on said plat by the letter J; thence south, 71 east, 176 poles, to the gum first mentioned above,—except so much of said land, being about 7½ or 8 acres, as is resided upon and occupied by one Michael King, lying northwest of said gum, and next to the line running from said gum to the maple last above mentioned; said land being at, around, and west of Michael King's, and adjoining the fence of Patrick King, the defendant, and cut off from said Patrick King's by a fence. A motion to set aside the verdict was made by the defendant, which was overruled by the court, and defendant excepted, and a writ of error was taken to this court, and on the 20th day of November, 1889, the judgment rendered upon said verdict was reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause was remanded for a new trial. On the 6th day of May, 1891, the said case was again submitted to a jury, in the circuit court of Randolph county, which, on the 9th day of May, 1891, resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs. A motion was made to set aside the verdict, and to grant the defendant a new trial, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted, and judgment was rendered upon said verdict, and the defendant obtained this writ of error.

During the trial the plaintiffs, by their counsel, moved the court to give to the jury several instructions, which are marked, respectively, Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, and 8, to the giving of which instructions the defendant objected, and his objection was overruled by the court. Said instructions read as follows: "Instruction No. 2. If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, King, having learned of the forfeiture of claimant's title several years before the expiring of his lease, after such information, acknowledged himself to be the agent of plaintiffs, as their tenant, they are not to regard the forfeiture as having any effect on plaintiffs' title, unless they believe that subsequently to all such acknowledgments he made an open, consistent, and continuous disclaimer and adverse claims. Instruction No. 3. That if the jury, from the evidence, do not believe that the defendant, King, disclaimed holding under the plaintiffs in or about 1876, and do not believe from the evidence that plaintiffs' title was subsequently to the running out of the lease destroyed, so as to put it out of the power of the plaintiffs to recover it by redemption, they are not to regard the sales of the state as excusing the defendant from restoring the possession to the plaintiffs. Instruction No. 4. If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant practiced a system of deceit towards the plaintiffs, or their agents, with regard to the lands in question, acknowledging their title, while acknowledging that of an adverse claimant, disclaiming their title to one agent, and acknowledging it to his successors and to other persons, for the purpose of maintaining his possession, and without taking the risk of an open, consistent, and continuous disclaimer and adverse claim, they are to regard his disclaimer as having no effect whatever. Instruction No. 5. If the jury do not believe that the defendant, King, disclaimed holding under the plaintiffs in 1876, or thereabouts, they are to disregard the evidence tending to show that the plaintiffs' title was forfeited." "Instruction No. 7. If the jury believe from the evidence that the orders of the board of supervisors of Randolph county do not show that the sheriff of said county returned to said board of supervisors a list of land returned delinquent by him for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon for the year 1865, then any sale made of the lands of said county for the year 1865 for the delinquent taxes thereon would be void, and no forfeiture of the land for that reason did occur for that year. Instruction No. 8. If the jury believe from the evidence that the delinquent lists of the land of Randolph county returned by the sheriff thereof for the nonpayment of the taxes thereon for the year 1866 did not have an affidavit of the sheriff thereto, then any sale made by the sheriff of said county of the land so returned delinquent for such delinquency is void, and no forfeiture of the title to the land by reason of such sale could occur for that year." The defendant, by his counsel, moved the court to give the jury the following instruction, marked No. 3: "Instruction No. 3. If the jury find from the evidence that the 207 or 208 acres mentioned in the agreement of lease made between the defendant and said David Goff, as agent for the ancestors of the plaintiffs, is a part of the 1,000 acres mentioned and described in the summons in this cause, and that the said 1,000 acres was sold by the sheriff for taxes delinquent thereon for the years 1863, 1864, 1865, and 1866, and was purchased by the sheriff for and on behalf of the state in the year 1871, and not redeemed, and that the said taxes for the nonpayment of which said land was returned delinquent were not paid for either or any of said years before such sale, then the title to said land became vested in the state,"—to the giving of which instruction the plaintiffs, by their counsel, objected, which objection was sustained, and the court refused to give said instruction. Now, as several of these instructions refer to the question as to when this disclaimer of a tenancy under the plaintiffs was made by the defendant, it may be well enough to discuss first the question of limitation.

Our statute (Code, 1891, p. 698, c. 89, § 3) provides that "if it appear that the plaintiff was forcibly or unlawfully turned out of possession, or that it was unlawfully detained from him, unless it also appear that the defendant has held or detained the possession for three years before the date of the summons, the verdict shall be for the plaintiff," etc. Barton, in his Law Practice, (volume 2, p. 1166,) says, in speaking of the action of unlawful detainer: "Under the plea of 'Not guilty' almost every defense may be made, and since, to sustain the action, the obligation is upon the plaintiff to prove that the defendant has not unlawfully held possession of the land for three years or more before the commencement of the suit, it follows that the plea of 'Not guilty' puts in issue the question of the limitation to the action." And, while it is true that upon this question the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs, yet, when we look to the testimony, we find it conflicting as to the manner in which the defendant was holding the land from the date of the expiration of his lease up to the time of the institution of this suit. These questions of fact were submitted to the jury, and, in order that they should find for the plaintiffs, they must have found that the adverse holding of the defendant had not continued for more than three years before the date of the summons.

As to instruction No. 2 asked for by the plaintiffs, I do not regard the forfeiture of the plaintiffs' title as a very material question as between the plaintiffs and the defendant, as he appears to have been claiming under them, and it surely should not have any effect upon the issue presented by the pleadings in this case, unless, after the defendant learned of said forfeiture, and ceased to hold under a lease from the plaintiffs, he made an open, consistent, and continuous disclaimer. If, as the evidence tends to show, he claimed to hold under both Voss and Smith part of the time, and at other times under neither, or rather not under the Voss title, we could not regard such disclaimer as being adverse to the Voss title, and we see no objection to the said instruction No. 2.

As to instruction No. 4, I can see no valid objection to it, as between the plaintiffs and the defendant. The fact that the lands in controversy were forfeited to the state certainly would not confer upon the defendant any right to retain the possession of them, or excuse him from returning the possession. He derived the right to the possession from the plaintiffs, and a temporary loss of title on the part of the plaintiffs would surely confer no right to the possession upon the defendant.

As to instruction No. 4, it is in substance the same as No. 2, and submits to the jury the determination of the facts in regard to the character of the disclaimer of possession under the plaintiffs, which facts are necessarily involved in coming to a proper conclusion as to whether the defendant continued to hold under the plaintiffs, or whether he in good faith claimed to hold adversely, openly, and continuously, and the instruction appears, under the circumstances of the case, to have been proper.

Instruction No. 5 was not objectionable, for the reason that the defendant was not in any manner interested in the forfeiture of the land, as it conferred on him no better right to hold the possession; and especially is that so if he made no disclaimer, but continued to hold subject to the rights of the plaintiffs.

Instructions No. 7 and 8 pertain to the regularity of the proceedings pertaining to the forfeiture of the lands in controversy, and the defendant, having no right to redeem, has no right to question the title of the party under whom he claimed, until he had shown a proper disclaimer and some title to the possession in himself. I cannot perceive that the defendant was prejudiced by said instructions Nos. 7 and 8 being given to the jury, and the same may be said of instruction No. 3.

Instruction No. 3, asked by the defendant, as we think, was properly rejected, for the reason that, under the circumstances of this case, it was immaterial, and was calculated to mislead the jury. Again, the instruction is too general, and the conclusion deduced in it from the statement of facts is not a necessary sequence. It is not every sale made by a sheriff for the taxes delinquent thereon, and purchased by the sheriff for the state, although not redeemed within the year, that confers title upon the state, since the proceeding is under the statute, and irregularities often occur that prevent the title from passing, and again savings are provided for persons laboring under disabilities, who are often allowed to redeem years after the sale has been made. When this case was before this court at a former time, (33 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. 402,) it was held that in an action by the landlord against his tenant, whether the action be debt, assumpsit, covenant, or unlawful detainer, where neither fraud or mistake is shown in the procurement of the lease, no proof of title is required by the landlord, for in such case the tenant is estopped from denying the title of his landlord. Taylor on Landlord and Tenant (volume 1, § 22) says: "A tenant for years, who holds over after the expiration of his term, without paying rent or otherwise acknowledging a continuance of the tenancy, becomes either a trespasser or a tenant, at the option of the landlord. Very slight acts on the part of the landlord, or a short lapse of time, are sufficient to conclude his election, and make the occupant his tenant. But the tenant has no such election; his mere continuance in possession fixes him as tenant for another year, if the landlord thinks proper to insist upon it." And at section 525, vol. 2, the same author says: "Where the landlord suffers the tenant to remain in possession after the expiration of the original tenancy, the law presumes the holding to be upon the terms of the original demise," etc.

As is shown by bill of exceptions No. 1, the defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury rendered in this cause, and award him a new trial, because the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, which motion was overruled, an exception was taken, and all of the evidence was set out in a bill of exceptions. It appears that the lease under which the defendant held the property in controversy from the plaintiffs expired on the 1st day of April, 1876, and it is claimed by counsel for the defendant that the defendant, some time in the month of October following, when asked by plaintiffs to renew said lease for the further period of five years, declined, and told Goff, the agent of plaintiffs: "No; I will not take any more leases under the Vosses. I was told the land was not theirs, and therefore I will not take." Now, this question of disclaimer on the part of the defendant is very material upon the question as to whether more than three years had elapsed after such disclaimer before the date of the summons, and it is insisted by counsel for the defendant that after this disclaimer nine years elapsed without the defendant in any manner recognizing the relation of landlord and tenant between him and the plaintiffs. Whether the defendant is correct or not in this assertion is a question which was submitted to the jury, and has been ascertained and settled by them against the defendant. Upon this point the testimony was conflicting, and this court has held in the case of Tompkins v. Kanawha Board, 21 W. Va. 225, that, "there being conflicting evidence on well-established principles that the judgment will not be reversed, verdict set aside, and new trial granted."

The next bill of exceptions relates to the action of the court in allowing a copy of the record of the proceedings upon a warrant of unlawful detainer brought by Benjamin F. Voss and Robert F. Voss against the defendant, Patrick King, to be read in evidence to the jury, against the objection of the defendant, in which case a judgment appears to have been rendered for the plaintiffs on the 25th day of August, 1869, and the lease from B. F. Voss to the defendant, Patrick King, bears date on the 18th day of July, 1870, less than a year after said judgment was rendered, so that this record and judgment may have been relevant, as showing that the plaintiffs were entitled to the possession of the land at the time the lease was taken from them by the defendant, Patrick King, in July, 1870; but, if the record proved nothing, I cannot see that the defendant was prejudiced by its introduction. Our statute provides (section 4, c. 89, of the Code) that "no such judgment shall bar any action of trespass or ejectment between the same parties, nor shall any such verdict be conclusive, in any such future action, of the facts therein found." Moncure, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Olinger v. Shepherd, 12 Gratt. 472, says: "That the defendant in an action of forcible entry cannot defend himself by showing that the land in controversy is a part of the public domain has been decided in Alabama (Cunningham v. Green, 3 Ala. 127) and in Tennessee, (Pettyjohn v. Akers, 6 Yerg. 448), and I am not aware that the contrary has been decided anywhere. I can see no reason for a different rule in regard to public and private lands. There is the same reason for the protection of the actual possession against unlawful invasion in both cases. The plaintiff in the action is not suing for damages, but to have possession restored to him; and when he shows that he has been turned out of possession forcibly, or by one having no right to do so, he has made out his right to restitution, which cannot be defeated by any evidence in regard to the title or right of possession. The judgment has only the effect of placing the parties in statu quo. It settles nothing, even between them, in regard to the title or right of possession."

Again, as to the receipt signed "John M. Phares, S. R. C.," dated October 22, 1864, to Benjamin F. and Robert F. Voss, for $5.24, for the redemption of 1,000 acres of land returned delinquent for the years 1863 and 1864 by the sheriff of Randolph county, while, in my view of the case, I do not regard it as material, yet I cannot see that the defendant was in any manner prejudiced by its introduction.

In view of the fact, then, that in a suit of this character the right to the possession is alone in question, and evidence in regard to the title is only material as an incident tending to show in whom the right to the possession exists, and the defendant in this case having failed to show that the lands in controversy were regularly forfeited and necessarily irredeemable, and the defendant being presumed to continue his holding under the terms of the original demise, and the evidence in regard to his disclaimer being conflicting, and the fact having been settled against him by the finding of the jury, the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed, with costs.

PAXTON v. PAXTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 7, 1893.)

COMPETENCY OF WITNESS — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENTS—EQUITY PLEADING—WAIVER OF DEFECTS—LACHES

1. A party, grantor and debtor, executing a deed of trust to secure a creditor, is incompetent to testify that it was procured from him by false representation of the trustee, both trustee and creditor being dead.

2. Under sections 35, 36, c. 125, Code, where an answer contains matter for affirmative relief, and no reply in writing is filed, but a general replication is entered, and the cause has been fully heard on such pleadings and proof, if the record shows that it is not such a case as would, before the passage of said sections, have made a cross bill necessary in order to give the defendant the relief sought by his answer, the decree will not be reversed for want of a reply in writing.

3. When, in such a case, defendant has taken depositions, and there has been a full and fair hearing on the merits, and substantial justice has been done, though there may be informality in not filing such reply, the decree will not be reversed for that cause.

4. Laches may be relied upon by a demurrer where the pleading demurred to shows the facts on which the defense of laches rests.

5. A grantor in a deed delivered to the grantee gives evidence after the death of grantee against his heirs that the deed was delivered upon a condition on the nonperformance of which by the grantee it was to be redelivered to grantor. The evidence is incompetent, both because the grantee is a party to the suit and interested.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Clay county; Virgil A. Armstrong, Judge.

Action by Hays A. Paxton against William Paxton and others for partition. From a decree agreeable to the petition, George W. Paxton and Thomas Samples appeal. Affirmed.

Cyrus Hall and Okey Johnson, for appellants. W. A. McCorkle, J. F. Brown, and T. B. Swann, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Hays A. Paxton, in his lifetime, brought a suit, which was afterwards revived in the names of his representatives, having for its objects the partition among the heirs of his father, Thomas Paxton, of a tract of land in Clay county. The said Thomas Paxton had nine children, so that the land was divisible into nine shares, though several had sold to coheirs. The only persons contesting the partition on the basis of such heirship were George W. Paxton and Thomas Samples, who claimed to be joint owners of the whole, and denied that the land was partible, as belonging to Thomas Paxton's estate, among his heirs. A decree for such partition having been rendered by the Clay county circuit court, George W. Paxton and Samples took this appeal.

The bill alleges that Thomas Paxton had a debt against George W. Paxton and Thomas Samples, made up of 10 bonds for $150 each; and that they executed a deed of trust to John Paxton, trustee, to secure it upon said land; and that, under said deed of trust, the trustee, after the death of Thomas Paxton, sold the land; and that William Paxton, who was administrator of Thomas Paxton, and also a child and heir, purchased it for the benefit of all the heirs, and conveyed it by deed to said heirs. This land was conveyed in 1855 by William Vinyard to George W. Paxton and Thomas Samples. George W. Paxton was a son, and Samples a son-in-law, of Thomas Paxton. It is clear that Thomas Paxton paid for this land by the conveyance to Vinyard of lots in Spencer, and it is claimed that George W. Paxton and Samples held it in trust for Thomas Paxton, and much matter is brought into the case relative to that feature; but I discard it as irrelevant, since later the deed of trust was given, and the parties treated it as the property of George W. Paxton and Samples for the purposes of that deed of trust; and, besides, the case made by the bill is such, and the title to the land is traced to that deed of trust, and the right to partition is based, not on a trust in the original conveyance from Vinyard, but from the deed of trust. The whole case turns on the question whether George W. Paxton and Thomas Samples gave that deed of trust. They deny it. Let us look at some of the circumstances pertinent to this decisive question. The bonds of George W. Paxton and Thomas Samples to Thomas Paxton are produced, bearing the same date with the deed of trust, 21st March, 1855. They are described in the deed of trust. That is a circumstance favoring the genuineness of the deed of trust. The obligors in said bonds admit they made them. George W. Samples says they had no relation to the purchase of the land, intending thereby to repel the idea that he and Samples had purchased of Thomas Paxton, alleged by some as the explanation of the bonds. What if they had no relation to the land, if secured by deed of trust? No matter whether it was for purchase of the land or not. William Paxton states that he saw this deed of trust, had it in his possession, and the signatures were in the handwriting of George W. Paxton and Thomas Samples, and that they both told him at different times that they had signed the deed of trust and bonds. Amanda E. Parks states that she heard a conversation between George W. Paxton and the wife of Samples, in which Paxton asked Mrs. Samples why her husband had signed the deed of trust and bonds, when she asked him why he himself had signed them, and he replied that it did not matter why he had signed them; and also heard Hays Paxton advise him to drop this litigation, as he had signed the deed of trust and bonds for the land, and George W. Paxton said it did not matter about his signing them. Against this evidence showing that George W. Paxton executed the deed of trust, there is none save that of himself, and it is overruled in weight by two witnesses, and, besides, is inadmissible,—Thomas Paxton being dead,—by Code, c. 130, § 23.

Another strong circumstance against George W. Paxton's claim is that by deed of October 14, 1874, he conveyed to Hays A. Paxton all his right in "one undivided ninth part of 1,400 acres," conveyed to him and Samples by Vinyard. Now, as heir, he would own one undivided ninth; just that. It is a circumstance that he claimed then only that. Several witnesses say that he afterwards said he owned no interest in the land, as he had sold all his interest to his brother Hays. Again, if he owned half, why did he pay just one-ninth of the taxes on the land for the year 1869 and a number of years thereafter, as he did? George W. Paxton, in his first answer, admitting the bonds mentioned in the trust, set up a debt of at least $600 against his father, but in a subsequent answer says it was inserted in the answer without his knowledge, and that his father owed him nothing. His plans had changed. In addition to the above evidence of William Paxton as to the signature of Samples to the deed of trust, and his admission of its execution, there is abundant other evidence to prove it as to Samples. He said in presence of Amanda E. Parks that he had signed and acknowledged the deed of trust. In fact he does not deny, but admits, in his answer, and in his labored evidence, that he did sign it. But he says that he was a soldier, and when at home on furlough, in 1864, John Paxton presented a paper to him to sign, which he did not himself read, Paxton representing that it would "put the land to rights" if anything happened to Samples in the army; and he signed it, as he thought, to secure his wife the land, if he should be killed in the war; that George W. Paxton would cheat him out of his share, and he signed it to save the land. This story is very unlikely. He had a deed on record from Vinyard conferring on him half of the land. How could his wife lose her interest should he be killed? How could George W. Paxton get the whole of the land? Why did he sign a paper without reading it? He then, in the same deposition, says, "I did not see, hear, or know of such a paper being in existence before March 3, 1866." But he knew its contents that day, and why did he on that day appear before the recorder of Clay county, and solemnly acknowledge it? He does not pretend that it was then misrepresented, or that he did not know its contents. He surely had opportunity to know them. Again, John Paxton is dead, and the plaintiff and other heirs claim under him as alienees, and Samples gives this evidence being a party to the suit in his own interest against such alienees. It may be inadmissible, too, because Thomas Paxton is dead, the question being whether Samples made a deed of trust to him. The deed importing that he did, allowing Samples to state that he made it to John Paxton under false representations tends to show he did not execute it to Thomas Paxton, the deed of trust creditor. If Thomas Paxton were alive, he could speak on the question, and deny that Samples made the deed to the trustee; and, as he is dead, the law may exclude Samples. The trust purports to have been made with the creditor as an express party. This evidence tends to show it was not. The test is, does the testimony tend to prove what the transaction was? Owens v. Owens, 14 W. Va. 95; Anderson v. Cranmer, opinion, 11 W. Va. 576; Robinson v. James, 29 W. Va. 224, 11 S. E. 920. But this is not important. In addition, Thomas Samples has done acts utterly inconsistent with any idea that he owned one-half the land, and consistent only with the theory—the true theory—that there was a deed of trust, under which the trustee sold on May 6, 1865, and it was purchased for the benefit of all the nine heirs by William Paxton, and Samples' wife was entitled to one-ninth as an heir.

In this suit Samples and wife filed an answer fully recognizing the common ownership by all the heirs, alleging that Thomas Paxton had in his lifetime set apart to Mrs. Samples a specific lot of 224 acres out of the land, and placed her in possession, which she had held for 27 years; and praying that they be confirmed in the separate ownership of the lot in the partition. Samples and wife both signed this answer. This answer, I see, too, definitely alleges that certain of the heirs had executed a deed conveying to Virginia Samples this lot, and exhibits it, and asks that this lot be confirmed to her. And this deed recites that the lot is part of the land to partition which this suit was brought, it being lot 5 in the "1,400-acre tract owned by the heirs of Thomas Paxton, deceased." And in 1882, Samples and his wife united with others in a deed conveying to America Simmons a specific defined lot, she being an heir, containing a recital that it was "lot No. 4 in the division of a survey of 1,400 acres, Thomas Paxton's land." From these deeds and other evidence it appears that Thomas Paxton, regarding the land as virtually his, laid it into lots, and gave several children several holdings, and they lived on them, and made improvements, for more than a quarter of a century; and some of them died on them, and perhaps were there buried. Samples recognized this partition by his solemn deed. Samples asked no more for years and years. What malign influence moved him, in 1891, to ignore all he had done years ago by filing an answer denying the deed of trust, and claiming that he and George W. Paxton owned still the whole tract, and seeking to exclude other heirs from their just share in the common patrimony? What moved him in his evidence, while admitting that he had employed the attorney signing the first answer, to repudiate his work, and say he had not read the answer, or heard it read? Strange that the attorney should have inserted the details of claim to the specific lot, and ignored his client's ownership of half this valuable land, without the assent of his client. And the various heirs paid taxes for a number of years from 1869 up, according to their interests in the land, Samples paying only on one share. And I notice that his second answer says that in 1883 he made a deed for a lot to another heir, William Paxton, as also one to Simmons and wife, but they were procured by fraud; but wherein the fraud was he does not inform us, contenting himself with mere generality.

The answers allege, generally, a want of consideration of the bonds. If so, it would affect the deed of trust; but George W. Paxton and Samples furnish the only evidence on this score,—that they were accommodation bonds intended to secure a loan, but not used. They cannot give this evidence against the dead man's estate. And, besides, other evidence of their declarations repels it. Thus, on the merits, the pretensions of George W. Paxton and Samples are without foundation and against justice. One reading the case is impressed with wonder that sensible men could present a case so filled with inconsistent acts, and so palpably untenable, and ask a court of justice to sustain it. Animadversion more severe might be made upon their conduct, but it would answer no purpose. Counsel, seeing that the substance is against his client, evidently relies with chief dependence upon the point that the answers of the defendants contain new matter calling for affirmative relief, and that, as there was no special reply, a decree giving them the whole land upon an unjust cause should have been rendered, taking away from brothers and sisters their shares confirmed by 30 years' possession, a possession so long that all have grown gray within it, and others have died, leaving children behind them. But this contention is not good. These answers are purely the common answers of defense or traverse of the matter of the bill, not cross bills. The bill alleges the execution of the bonds and deed of trust, and the sale under it, the purchase by one of the heirs for all, and thus states title of the parties entitling them to partition. The answers simply assert that the deed of trust was forged, so far as George W. Paxton is concerned, and procured by fraud, so far as Samples is concerned. This is merely matter of defense. It is not enough to call for a special reply that the answer contains new matter, but it is only when the new matter, in its nature as applied to the case, calls for affirmative relief against some of the parties, and is not simply matter of defense of the case made by the plaintiff. Smith v. Turley, 32 W. Va. 14, 9 S. E. 46, and cases cited. Now, what relief do these answers call for? Simply a denial of the partition, and dismissal of the bill and rescission. A dismissal would forever preclude the claim of plaintiff to the land under that title without cancellation. Who would say that under ordinary chancery practice, before the enactment of sections 35, 36, of chapter 125 of the Code, these defendants could not resist the plaintiffs' suit by an ordinary answer containing the matter contained in these answers? No one, I assume. Then these answers are to be regarded only answers of ordinary defense matter, and not as containing new matter calling for affirmative relief under said statute. I think Cunningham v. Hedrick, [23 W. Va. 579,] and the lucid opinion by Judge Johnson, will sustain this position. It holds that before said statute, while it was proper and in accordance with strict rules of pleading when a bill to enforce a vendor's lien was filed, if the defendant wished to rescind the contract because the defendant was of unsound mind, or that it was procured by fraud, to file a cross bill, yet where the record showed that relief could as well be given upon bill, answer, and proofs as if a cross bill had been filed, its filing would be dispensed with, as it would be mere formality to file it; and that, under the operation of said statute, where the answer contains material allegations constituting a claim for affirmative relief, and no reply in writing is filed, but only a general replication, and the cause has been heard on the pleadings thus made and the proofs, if the record shows it is not such a case as would, before the statute, demand a cross bill to give the defendant the relief sought, the decree will not be reversed because no reply in writing was filed. In that case Hedrick purchased land, gave her bond, and a deed was made to her. She answered that she was incompetent from imbecility of mind to contract, and that the contract had been procured by fraud, and resisted the enforcement of the contract for that cause, and prayed rescission, as in this case. If anything could give the cast to the answer of one calling for affirmative relief, it would be the prayer for rescission. But in the Cunningham-Hedrick Case it was held that such relief could be given on an ordinary answer, and the answer did not call for a reply in writing, and the case could not be reversed for want of it. Mettert v. Hagan, 18 Grat. 231, was a bill to recover an interest in an estate, and an answer was filed resisting relief on the ground that the party was incapable from drink of making the deed; that it was procured by fraud; and asking that it be declared null and void. That is just this case. It was held that, though strictly a cross bill would have been proper, yet the answer might, for that purpose, be treated as such, and rescission granted. So the cases settle that in such case relief may be refused, and cancellation made on answer, and a cross bill is not necessary. Now, we treat an answer as one under the statute calling for affirmative relief only where a cross bill must be filed according to the chancery practice to get the relief sought in the answer, not to cases where it can be given on the answer. Hence no reply was necessary. See, also, Bart. Ch. Pr. 304; Kendrick v. Whitney, 28 Grat. 655. There is another reason against reversal for want of such reply. After their answers were filed, the defendants went on to take depositions in support of them, and a hearing just as full and fair was had as if such reply had been filed. They treated it as if filed. Section 4, c. 134, Code, provides that "no decree shall be reversed for want of a replication to the answer, where the defendant has taken depositions as if there had been a replication; nor shall a decree be reversed at the instance of a party who has taken depositions, for an informality in the proceedings when it appears that there was a full and fair hearing upon the merits, and that substantial justice has been done." Though the first clause does not apply to a special reply in writing, yet I think with Judge Johnson that the latter clause does, as he pointedly said in Cunningham v. Hedrick, supra. In that case the court held a second point strictly applicable to this case,—that where a defendant has taken depositions, and it appears that there has been a full, fair hearing upon the merits, and that substantial justice has been done, though there was informality in not requiring a plaintiff to file "a reply in writing," the decree will not be reversed for this reason. There is still another reason why the want of a reply in writing cannot matter. The only effect of the absence of such reply would be to take the facts in the answers to be true. Though true, yet the doctrine of laches would debar the relief the answers sought. The plaintiff entered a demurrer to these answers. If treated as cross bills, a demurrer would lie to them, and raise the question of laches. Whittaker v. Improvement Co., 34 W. Va. 217, 12 S. E. 507. Are these defendants chargeable with laches? They sought to rescind and cancel a deed of trust, a fully executed deed, for fraud. Samples knew of the fraudulent deed of trust March 3, 1865. George W. Paxton knew of it, he says, in 1880. They brought no suit until they filed these answers. This bill was filed in August, 1883. George W. Paxton filed an answer simply denying the deed of trust, charging no forgery, and asking no cancellation. In his second answer (December, 1884) he still asks no rescission of the deed of trust, though he did of other instruments. In his third answer (May, 1891) he yet does not ask cancellation, though he does of other papers. If he has any answer at all calling for rescission, it is only under prayer of general relief. Samples never asked rescission of the deed of trust, or even denied it, until his second answer, as late as April, 1891, though he filed an answer before. George W. Paxton thus knew of the fraud and forgery, giving him the benefit of a prayer for annulment more than 4 years, and Samples 26 years, before they took a step to rid themselves of it. The law is that he who elects to set aside an instrument for fraud must sue without unreasonable delay after discovery of it, unless there be good reason to excuse it. Whittaker v. Improvement Co., 34 W. Va. 217, 12 S. E. 507, and cases cited. This is particularly applicable to Samples, and I hardly think Samples has any answer of the character spoken of.

Counsel for appellees contend that there are no orders filing these answers. Technically there are not. Especially should there be leave to file amended answers, and it is the amended answers which are relied upon for relief to the defendants. But the order showing plaintiffs' demurrer to them treats them as filed, and the decree refers to them as read on the hearing, and I treat them as filed. And, as pertinent to this subject of laches, for the purpose of showing not simply laches, but, as a circumstance of great force, and decisive, to repel all idea that George W. Paxton and Samples had any claim to the whole of the land, and never, until very lately, thought of setting up any, they allowed their brothers and sisters for years—many years—to occupy, improve, and cultivate separate parcels, without rent, without claim. Why? Because they knew they had no right under their deed from Vinyard, but that the land belonged to all the heirs. They knew there had been a voluntary partition into lots, and that these other heirs were holding under it,—a laying off into lots by their old father, who died as long ago as 1862, and which all recognized until these defendants sought to upset it of late years. George W. knew he had sold his interest to his brother Hays in 1874. Samples knew he had no interest save that under his wife. It was only of late years that he and Samples formed a combination to claim all. Their right is barred by reason of the separate claim for so many years, and possession and improvement by the other heirs, if George W. Paxton and Samples ever had any such right as they claim latterly.

The appellants complain that no notice of sale under the trust was given them. It required no notice to them, but notice in a newspaper, which was given.

It follows, as the deed of trust was valid, the sale and conveyance by the trustee is valid. Nothing is shown against it. The deed from the trustee to the heirs, in which William Paxton joined, recited that he, as administrator, had purchased for the benefit of the heirs. He was one. The purchase was made, likely, to save the estate to the heirs, and with the debt, William Paxton, acting as administrator, prudently presumably, and honestly conveyed to all the heirs. As they had owned the debt for weal or woe, so he secured the land for weal or woe to them. We must presume he acted prudently. Not one iota is shown to the reverse. And to end any objection on this score, all the heirs, including George W. Paxton and Samples and wife, have by deeds and words ratified the act. And would any court of equity, after a quarter of a century of possession under it, now permit one heir to come in and say the administrator had no power to purchase and convey to the others? They should have protested sooner.

The assignment of error that the court heard the case on a special reply found in the record, but not appearing in any way ever to have been filed, is not well taken, because it is not mentioned as one of the papers read; though for reasons above given this is immaterial.

I scarcely know whether I should advert to the act of the court in excluding George W. Paxton from the partition, as no error is assigned for that cause. This exclusion was proper. By deed of October 14, 1874, George W. Paxton conveyed his right in the land to his brother Hays A. Paxton. He acknowledged the deed, and, as he admits, he delivered it to the grantee. He states that he delivered it on condition that, if a horse—a part of the consideration—should not be delivered in a certain time, the deed was to be surrendered; and that the horse was not delivered, and the deed was surrendered. The deed is found in George W. Paxton's possession, which would lend some countenance to this pretension; but we must exclude this evidence, as Hays A. Paxton's lips have mouldered in death, and he cannot speak his version. The deed is found in George W. Paxton's possession. Was it ever redelivered? Amanda E. Parks says she saw the deed written in Wirt county. It was there acknowledged. She says she saw it in the hands of Hays A. Paxton, the grantee, a year or two after it was made. A witness (Whitney) says he saw a letter in the possession of Hays A. Paxton from George W. Paxton, admitting he had sold him the land, and to so tell one Elmore. Whitney next saw this letter in the papers of the case, and later he saw it in the hands of George W. Paxton. Whitney told him he would have to put it back, when George W. Paxton said, "By —, it would defeat him, if he put it back without the balance of the letter." I should have before stated that the witness Parks states that George W. Paxton came to Hays A. Paxton to borrow the said deed until "he got through with Billy," and Hays Paxton loaned him the deed. A circumstance against George W.

Paxton's claim, and corroborating Parks, is that George W. Paxton yet held Hays A. Paxton's bond, which is part of the consideration. If there had been a surrender of the deed, why would George W. Paxton still have the obligation? A witness (King) states that he heard George W. Paxton state on a trial before a justice that he had sold all his interest in the land to Hays A. Paxton. A witness (Copin) states that just before this suit was brought he asked George W. Paxton if he had not an interest in land in Clay county, and he replied that he had none, but had sold it all to Hays A. Paxton. Nothing to the reverse is shown. The circuit court decided properly that George W. Paxton had passed his share to Hays A. Paxton. And, more surely yet, we cannot undertake to say that on this question of fact the finding is wrong, plainly.

As to the deeds between other heirs which are attacked, George W. Paxton and Samples only claim that they should be annulled because they owned all the land, and other heirs who made those deeds none; but, as we find that George W. Paxton and Samples had not such right, we need say no more as to those deeds.

The point that there was no revival against the heirs of America Simmons is not ground for reversal. The bill conceded her right to a share. So did the appellants, if not entitled to the whole. Her heirship was a concession, and how does it prejudice appellants? Her heirs were accorded a share. The appellants are not entitled either to the whole or shares.

As to the point that there was no revival as to heirs of G. W. Paxton. How does it prejudice appellants? But in fact there was such revival, the order calling the heirs heirs of A. J. instead of G. J. Paxton,—a mere misnomer as to one initial.

As to the point that heirs of John Paxton, Lyle Paxton, and Caroline Burdette were not parties. They had no interest. The bill charged that they had before suit conveyed their interest by deed to Hays Paxton. George W. Paxton's answers conceded it, and Samples did not deny it. Not one of these points are assigned for error. Decree affirmed.

STATE ex rel. THOMPSON et al. v. McALLISTER, Mayor, et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1893.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—PROPERTY QUALIFICATION OF MUNICIPAL OFFICERS—REVIEWING ELECTION CONTESTS.

1. Section 13 of chapter 47 of the Code, which requires members of municipal councils to be freeholders therein, is constitutional and valid.

2. Certiorari, and not mandamus, is the proper remedy to review the proceedings of a municipal council, under section 23 of chapter 47 of the Code.

Brannon, J., dissenting.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Putnam county: F. A. Guthrie, Judge.

Action at the relation of John M. Thompson and another against W. H. McAllister, mayor, and others, for mandamus. There was judgment for relators, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Brown, Jackson & Knight, for plaintiffs in error. C. R. Lewis and Bowyer & Green, for defendants in error.

DENT, J. The following is the statement of facts taken from the brief of the counsel for the defendants in error, to wit: "On the 5th day of January, in the year 1893, at an election in the town of Hurricane, Putnam county, W. Va., a town incorporated under chapter 47 of the Code, for municipal officers of said town, John M. Thompson and C. A. Smith, residents of said town, and entitled to vote for members of its common council, together with G. W. Dudding, J. P. Mynes, and M. L. Dunfee, were elected to office of councilmen of said town for the year commencing on the 1st day of February, 1893; the number of councilmen for said town being five, the town not being laid off into wards. On the 16th day of January, 1893, at a meeting of the outgoing council, the returns of said election were canvassed, and it was declared that the above five persons received the largest number of votes at said election for the office of councilmen of said town; and said council, at this meeting, further decided, among other things, that said Thompson and Smith were not duly-elected officers of said town, because they were not freeholders therein, and further declared that W. L. Losee and W. S. Turley, two members of the old council, but not elected to the new council, should hold over as councilmen until their successors were qualified,—the said Smith, at that time, and at the time of said election, being in possession of a lot of land in said town, which he owned by a title bond, and said Thompson's wife, at said dates, owning in fee land in said town. On the 17th day of January, 1893, the said Smith and J. M. Thompson each bought land in said town, which was conveyed to them, respectively, by deeds dated, respectively, on the 17th and 18th of January, 1893. On the 20th day of January, 1893, the said Thompson and Smith each duly took the oath of office as councilmen of said town, and duly filed the same with the recorder, or acting recorder. At the first meeting of the new council, said Turley and Losee being present and acting, on the 6th day of February, 1893, the said Thompson and Smith presented themselves, and demanded that they be admitted to the office of councilmen, and permitted to perform their duties as such, but they were refused and denied admittance to their office. On the 11th day of February, 1893, the said Smith and Thompson obtained from the judge of the circuit court of Putnam county a mandamus nisi to Wm. H. McAllister, mayor; R. V. Dorsey, claiming to be and acting as recorder; G. W. Dudding, J. H. Mynes, and M. L. Dunfee, councilmen; and W. L. Losee and W. S. Turley, claiming to be and acting as councilmen of said town,—commanding the first five to admit said Thompson and Smith into the office of councilmen of said town, and commanding said Losee and Turley to surrender and turn over to said Thompson and Smith the office of councilmen of said town. The defendants Dudding and Mynes made return to said mandamus nisi that they were willing, and had always been, to admit said plaintiffs to the office of councilmen, and had made and seconded a motion to admit them, but that the majority, including said Losee and Turley, had voted against the motion. The defendants McAllister, Dorsey, Dunfee, Losee, and Turley moved to quash the writ of mandamus nisi, which motion the court overruled; and, the said defendants not desiring to make return to said writ, the court gave judgment for a peremptory writ of mandamus to issue, from which judgment the last five of defendants have obtained this writ of error and superseas.

Appellants assign these grounds of error in their petition for writ of error, viz.: First, it was error in the circuit court to hold the statute which requires councilmen to be freeholders unconstitutional; second, the circuit court should have sustained the motion to quash the alternative writ of mandamus because, among other defects upon the face thereof, the plaintiffs, claiming several rights, could not obtain a joint writ of mandamus; third, said motion to quash should also have been sustained because the alternative writ of mandamus failed to make a case for the plaintiffs, or either of them, to obtain the relief prayed for.

In my opinion, there are only two questions suggested by the facts in this case as proper, at the present time, for the consideration of this court: (1) Is the law containing the freehold requirement constitutional? (2) If so, have the relators mistaken their remedy as to all other questions raised by them?

1. In determining this constitutional question, we find the rule plainly laid down in the case of State v. Dent, 25 W. Va. 19, in these words, to wit: "Article 6, § 1, of our constitution provides: 'The legislative power shall be vested in a senate and a house of delegates.' This obviously confers on them all legislative power, except such as they are prohibited by the constitution, in other provisions, from exercising." And the person claiming that an act of the legislature is an infringement of the restrictions of the constitution must point out the provision plainly forbidding, either by express words or by inevitable implication, the passage of such act; and, if none such exists, the act, however unjust or unreasonable it may seem, is valid, and must be sustained by this court. Judge Cooley, as quoted approvingly in the above case, lays down the rule that "any legislative act which does not encroach upon the powers apportioned to other departments of the government, being prima facie valid, must be enforced, unless restrictions upon the legislative authority can be pointed out in the constitution, and the case shown to come within them." The defendants in error, recognizing the binding force of this rule, point out three sections of the constitution, all and each of which they claim are violated by the act in question:

First. Section 4, art. 4, which provides that "No person except a citizen entitled to vote shall be elected or appointed to any office, state, county or municipal." That because this section forbids any persons except qualified electors to hold office, by just implication, the converse of the proposition is also included in the meaning of the section; that is to say, that all electors are duly qualified to hold office. Such reasoning is very fallacious. This provision was simply intended to limit the number from whom the various officers of this state might be chosen to those having a voice in the selection of such officers, and not in any sense intended to determine the qualifications necessary to properly discharge the duties of any office. For the electors to say in the constitution adopted by them that "no one but ourselves shall ever be elected or appointed to any office in this state" does not, by implication, say to the legislature, further, "You shall pass no law that would prevent any of us from holding office," for such an important matter as this would not be left to implication if the electors had considered such a provision desirable. While we have no decision in this state touching this question, the highest tribunals of other states have construed similar provisions in their state constitutions as above indicated. In the case of Darrow v. People, 8 Colo. 420, 8 Pac. 661, the supreme court of that state, in passing on the same question here raised, says: "Counsel argue that section 6, art. 7, of the constitution provides that 'no person except a qualified elector shall be elected to any civil or military office in the state,' by implication, inhibits the legislature from adding the property qualification under consideration. There is nothing in the constitution which expressly designates the qualifications of councilmen in a city or town, and this section contains the only language that can possibly be construed as applicable thereto. But it will be observed that the language used is negative in form; that it simply prohibits the election or appointment to office of one not a qualified elector. There is no conflict between it and the statute. By providing that a supervisor or an alderman shall be a taxpayer, the legislature does not declare that he need not be an elector. Nor is the provision at all unreasonable. On the contrary, it is a safeguard of the highest importance to property owners within the corporation. The right to vote and the right to hold office must not be confused. Citizenship, and the requisite sex, age, and residence, constitute the individual a legal voter, but other qualifications are absolutely essential to the efficient performance of the duties connected with almost every office; and certainly no doubtful implication should be favored, for the purpose of denying the right to demand such additional qualifications as the nature of the particular office may reasonably require. We do not believe that the framers of the constitution, by this provision, intended to say that the right to vote should be the sole and exclusive test of eligibility to all civil offices, except as otherwise provided in the instrument itself; that no additional qualifications should ever be demanded, and no other disqualifications should be imposed. If, as has been well said, they 'had intended to take away from the legislature the power to name disqualifications for office, other than the one named in the constitution, it would not have been left to the very doubtful implication which is claimed from the provision under consideration.' State v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102." In the latter decision the court laid down the law in a syllabus as follows, to wit: "The provision in the constitution (section 4, art. 15) that no person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this state unless he possesses the qualifications of an elector does not by implication forbid the legislature to require other reasonable qualifications for office."

Second. The next claim of the counsel is that the latter clause of section 5, art. 4, is violated, which is in these words: "And no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification unless herein otherwise provided;" his argument being that the freehold requirement is a test, within the meaning of the constitution. The assertion is so unfounded as to hardly need refutation. This clause is simply an application of section 11, art. 3, to the case of officeholders, which is in these words: "Sec. 11. Political tests, requiring persons as a pre-requisite to the enjoyment of their civil and political rights, to purge themselves by their own oaths of past alleged offences, are repugnant to the principles of free government and are cruel and oppressive. No religious or political test oath shall be required as a pre-requisite or qualification to vote, serve as a juror, sue, plead, appeal or pursue any profession or employment. Nor shall any person be deprived by law, of any right, or privilege, because of any act done prior to the passage of such law." As will be seen at a glance, nothing is said about holding office, in this section, but it is made to apply alone to the right "to vote, serve as a juror, sue, plead, appeal or pursue any profession or employment." To remedy the omission here, the constitution makers added the clause to section 5, art. 4, which refers alone to religious and political tests as a prerequisite or qualification for office, and has nothing whatever to do with any just qualification that the legislature may deem necessary to a proper discharge of the functions of the office. In the case of Rogers v. Common Council, 123 N. Y. 173, 25 N. E. 274, the court of appeals, construing the same provisions in the New York constitution, says: "Still another ground of invalidity is alleged by the appellant. He says that the statute conflicts with article 12, which provides for the taking of an oath of office by members of the legislature and all officers, executive and judicial, before they enter on the duties of their respective offices, which oath is therein set forth; and it is there stated that 'no other oath, declaration or test shall be required as a qualification for any office of public trust.' The statute by which an applicant for appointment to a position in a public office is made to show his fitness therefor is claimed to constitute an illegal test, within the meaning of this section. * * * We do not think that the provision above cited was ever intended to have any such broad construction. Looking at it as a matter of common sense, we are quite sure that the framers of our organic law never intended to oppose a constitutional barrier to the right of the people, through their legislature, to enact laws which should have for their sole object the possession of fit and proper qualifications for the performance of the duties of a public office on the part of him who desired to be appointed to such office. So long as the means adopted to accomplish such end are appropriate therefor, they must be within the legislative power. The idea cannot be entertained for one moment that any intelligent people would ever consent to so bind themselves with constitutional restrictions on the power of their own representatives as to prevent the adoption of any means by which to secure, if possible, honest and intelligent service in public office. No law involving any test other than fitness and ability to discharge the duties of the office could be legally enacted under cover of a purpose to ascertain or prescribe such fitness. Statutes looking only to the purpose of ascertaining whether candidates for an appointive office are possessed of those qualifications which are necessary for a fit and intelligent discharge of the duties pertaining to such office are not dangerous in their nature, and in their execution they are not liable to abuse, in any manner involving the liberties of the people. * * * In this case, we simply hold that the imposing of a test, by means of which to secure the qualifications of a candidate for an appointive office, of a nature to enable him to properly and intelligently perform the duties of such office, violates no provision of the constitution." The same reasoning would hold good in an elective office, so far as the section under discussion is concerned.

Third. The last claim of the counsel is that the provision complained of is in violation of section 8, art. 4, of the constitution, in which the legislature is empowered to "prescribe by general laws the terms of office, powers, duties and compensation of all public officers and agents, and the manner in which they shall be elected, appointed and removed." This section includes all municipal officers, and was only intended to require the legislature to enact general, and not special, laws in relation to the matters included in the section. But the counsel argue that "by granting the legislature the authority to establish offices, and provide the term of office, powers, duties, compensation, and manner of election and removal, the power to add a qualification, not being given, is excluded by implication." The learned counsel appear to forget the difference so often defined between the federal and state constitutions; the former being strictly a grant of powers, while the latter is a limitation or restriction on the powers of the state legislature, which otherwise would be supreme in all legislative matters, as it is now in all cases wherein not restricted by the constitution,—that instrument itself so declaring, as heretofore mentioned. And for the very reason that the power to prescribe qualifications is not mentioned in this section, the legislature has unrestricted control of that power. And it has been held by the court of appeals of another state that the same kind of provision gave the legislature entire control over all such officers; that the power to prescribe the manner in which they shall be elected and appointed included within it, necessarily, the power to prescribe civil-service examinations, or to prescribe that they should be chosen from a class of citizens who possess some qualification that specially fits them for office, or renders them efficient officers. In the case of People v. Clute, 50 N. Y. 459, the court of appeals, construing this same provision, says: "There is no right bestowed by the constitution upon the elector to choose by vote to that office. But there is a gift from the legislature to the elector so to do, or rather a power thereby intrusted to him by the statute, which may be taken back again. Now, the authority which confers a power, and may take it away, may, in bestowing it, limit and restrict its exercise, as it sees fit, so far as it is not specially prohibited therefrom, and may, within that limit, say for how long, in what manner, and upon what objects it shall be exerted. Certainly, if the legislature may say to the voter, 'You shall not vote for any one for this office, but it shall be appointive,' it may say, 'You shall not vote for any one for this office who is not free from this disqualification which we now declare.' The legislature may not put upon any elector a personal restriction from voting for any officer who may be elective, or whom it may declare elective, save such restriction as is imposed by the constitution, for from that it is especially prohibited. But it may, in the exercise of its judgment, for the public good, limit the number from whom the elector may select, for thus to legislate is within the general and sovereign power of legislation, which it constitutionally possesses." And in the syllabus the court lays down the law as follows, to wit: "Where the power is reserved to the legislature to direct the method of filling an office, whether by election or appointment, it may, in its discretion, when conferring upon the elector the power to elect, limit the number from whom he may select." In this case the freehold requirement is not, technically speaking, a qualification, but it is a limitation by the legislature in conferring the right to vote, as to the number from whom the elector may select. It is the same as if the legislature had provided that the officers of the municipality must be chosen from among the freeholders thereof, the same as grand jurors are selected. This is not class legislation, because it is in the power of any one to become a freeholder, the same as it is in the power of any one to educate himself under civil-service rules. But it is clearly within the power of the legislature, even if, as the counsel claim, "there is no good reason for such law." Experience in municipal matters, and a wise consideration of the question, will convince any unbiased mind that such a law has under it the very best of reasons. The fact that a man owns real estate has little bearing on the question as to whether he is capable of filling an office, but the real-estate owners are the substantial people of any community,—its bone and its sinew,—and there are but few among them that do not have some property pride, and an interest in the welfare and prosperity of their permanent dwelling place. On the other hand, among those not owning real estate belong the floating population,—those who are too trifling and unthrifty to want property, and those who, having wasted their substance in riotous living, and spent their days in idleness are jealous of their neighbors' prosperity, and are ready to tear down, destroy, and scatter broadcast, the results of hard earnings, frugal management, and careful savings. To them, although electors, the prosperity and welfare of the municipality amounts to nothing, for, like the Bedouins of the plains, 'neath the shadows of night they can fold their tents, and silently steal away, while, if there are any among the unfortunate but deserving poor who would make capable officers, their more successful neighbors are ever ready and willing to lend a helping hand, and see that they own the necessary "ten feet of ground." It was no trouble for the relators to become freeholders, when they found a necessity for so doing. A municipal corporation is the legislative grant of local self-government to the inhabitants within a certain designated territory, which is known as the "city," "town," or "village," and corporate powers granted are exercised by its inhabitants in its corporate name. The freeholders of such municipality own every foot thereof, and the benefits derived therefrom are enjoyed, and the burdens borne, almost entirely by them. The loss or gain of the municipality is their loss or gain. They favor just and reasonable taxation, because it increases the general welfare, and thereby is beneficial to their private interests. They oppose excessive and injudicious expenditures of public levies, because the waste must fall heaviest on them. They therefore have an interest that makes them efficient and reliable municipal officers. While the office of councilman is the most important office, within its limited jurisdiction, of any in the state,—combining, as it does, legislative, judicial, executive, and ministerial powers,—there is usually no pay, and but little honor, attached to such office, and the burden and annoyance are exceedingly heavy. A competent man, who has no sufficient interest in the community to become a freeholder, does not care to give his time, endure the labors, and suffer the annoyance of the office, simply to improve the property of others; and sometimes it is almost impossible to induce competent freeholders to undertake it, however great their interests may be. By making it exclusive, the office is rendered more important, and it devolves upon the freeholder, as a duty, to accept. Under our system of government, all officers are but the servants of the people, and it is but just that the people should have the best service possible; and in endeavoring to secure this, for the public weal, the legislature has wisely incorporated this provision in the general law relating to the incorporation of cities, towns, and villages, and it is now in the special charter of nearly every city and town of over 2,000 inhabitants. It is further plain, under our statutory law, the candidate must be a freeholder at the time he is voted for, because the voter has a right to presume that the candidate is eligible to the office at the time he asks his suffrage; otherwise, the election is void. The election law especially requires that, in nominating candidates for office, they shall be certified to be legally qualified to hold the office for which nominated. But it is not necessary to decide this question at the present time, except as a mere dictum.

The constitutional question being out of the way, the only other question that presents itself is whether mandamus is the proper remedy to review the action of a municipal council in determining, under the law, that a candidate is not legally qualified to hold the office. This entirely depends on the fact as to whether the council, in so determining, was acting within the limits of its authority, or assuming a jurisdiction it did not possess. Mandamus is not a proper remedy to control the action of a municipal body, when acting within the scope of its legal powers, but only when it refuses to act at all, or is acting without legislative authority. Supervisors v. Minturn, 4 W. Va. 300. Section 23, c. 47, Code, provides: "All contested elections shall be heard and decided by the council." This constitutes the council a special tribunal to judge of the election and qualification of its own members. The counsel, in argument, places the question of contest on too narrow grounds. He would limit it to the case where two persons are claiming the same office by election. Where there are substantial doubts as to whether a candidate elected to office is eligible or not, any citizen interested, as taxpayer or elector, would have the right to raise the objection, and it would then become the duty of the council, as the only tribunal in which the authority is vested, to promptly hear and determine the matter. This gives a quick and speedy hearing, while the office might expire before a determination was reached, if left to the courts. In case of a miscarriage of justice before the council, chapter 110, § 2, provides for a review of the decision of the council by means of certiorari; and in case of reversal, and disobedience on the part of the council, which is not at all probable, a way would be found to compel respect to the orders of superior judicial tribunals. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, the mandamus nisi is quashed, and these proceedings are dismissed, at the costs of the relators.

HOLT, J., (concurring.) Section 13 of chapter 47 reads: "The municipal authorities of such city, town or village shall be the mayor, recorder and the councilmen, who shall be freeholders therein and who together shall form a common council." I do not think the freehold qualification unconstitutional. These offices are created, not by the constitution, but by the legislature, in the exercise of its inherent, plenary, legislative power, qualified so as to require a general law for incorporating cities, towns, or villages containing a population of less than 2,000. Section 8, art. 4, of the constitution says that in such cases, among others, the legislature shall prescribe the manner in which they shall be elected, appointed, and removed, and leaves it to the legislature to say from what body of persons they shall be elected or appointed, but with this qualification: That, being municipal officers, the negative provision of section 8 of article 4 of the constitution applies,—they must, in any event, be citizens of the state, entitled to vote; for, if the constitution is to be taken as prescribing exhaustively the qualifications of such municipal officers created by law, as well as of those officers created by the constitution itself, then section 21 of chapter 47, saying that the mayor, recorder, and councilmen must be residents of such city, etc., is also unconstitutional, and a resident of the city of Pocatalico could be legally elected mayor of the city of Charleston, and a resident of the city of Charleston could be legally elected mayor of the city of Pocatalico. So there are many other equally obvious and indispensable qualifications for various offices which the legislature has created, and may yet create, under its inherent, plenary, legislative power over the subject. See State v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 118; Darrow v. People, 8 Colo. 417, 420, 8 Pac. 661; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 96; Rogers v. Common Council, 123 N. Y. 173, 25 N. E. 274. I regard the power of the legislature inherent, as well as given by section 8 of article 4, as comprehending the power to create these municipal offices, and prescribe the qualifications of such as are appointed or elected to fill them, and that the statute, in so far as it requires them to be freeholders of the town, should not be declared void on account of an implication that might at first blush seem to arise from the negative provision contained in section 5 of the same article of the constitution. Plenary power in the legislature is the rule. There can be no restriction, except what the constitution of the United States or of the state prescribes. Therefore, it is for those who question the validity of the statute to point out where and how it is forbidden, and if this is not made clear and palpable, beyond reasonable doubt, such doubt must be solved in favor of the legislative power, and the act sustained; and this, if no other good reason were apparent, is sufficient. For 20 years, almost, (1877,) it has been practically interpreted as constitutional by the action of all departments of the government, and it would now create a great confusion and inconvenience to hold it void; and this in the case of special charters as well as in the general law. Great weight is always rightly attached to such long, contemporaneous, practical exposition. See Bridges v. Shallockross, 6 W. Va. 562, and the authorities cited by Judge Haymond.

BRANNON, J., (dissenting.) Not concurring in the judgment in this case, I file, without revision, to express my views, the following opinion prepared by me, but which did not meet with the approval of the court, as will appear in opinions prepared by Judges DENT and HOLT:

John M. Thompson and C. A. Smith were elected on January 5, 1893, at a municipal election for the town of Hurricane, Putnam county, as members of its council; but the council refused to allow them to enter into office, upon the ground that at the date of the election they were not freeholders, and allowed W. L. Losee and W. S. Turley, incumbents in said office, to continue to act therein until their successors should be elected and qualified. Upon a writ of mandamus, the circuit court gave judgment for the claimants, Thompson and Smith. The writ ran to the mayor, recorder, and councilmen, including Losee and Turley, and they, except Mynes and Dunfee, councilmen, bring the case here by writ of error. A number of important questions arise on the record, involving principles of great practical importance:

First question: If the claimants were not freeholders, would it disqualify them from being councilmen? The town was incorporated under the general law found in chapter 47 of the Code, and as section 13 requires the mayor, recorder, and councilmen to be freeholders, it is claimed that claimants are disqualified. If this be so, then a resident of this town may be a voter, and qualified to be elected governor of the state, and yet be ineligible to the town council. The claimants are qualified voters. Are they qualified to hold these offices? Is the freehold qualification demanded by the statute unconstitutional? Section 1, art. 4, of the constitution reads, "The male citizens of the state shall be entitled to vote at all elections held within the counties in which they respectively reside," with various exceptions in that section specified. Here is a broad declaration that all male citizens shall be entitled to vote, with specific exceptions. Other exceptions cannot be made by the legislature. Plainly, it was the purpose, by this section in the organic law, to point out, and make clear and certain, in what particular persons among the people of the state the sovereign power of the ballot resides. If we wish to know who is the voter, we look here, and here alone. It vests in the citizen this great right. It cannot be taken from him by legislation. If he falls within the general grant in the opening clause of the section, and not within any of its exceptions, he is a suffragan, over any power that would deny his right, or add another qualification. Cooley, Const. Lim. 753. He is a voter, though as poor as Lazarus. But has he another great privilege,—"right," I should say; for it is hard to say which is the higher right, in the freeman,—that of voting, or that of being voted for? The constitution has granted the citizen the ballot. Has it forgotten his right to hold public office? It has carefully defined the qualification of voters, in the well-drawn section quoted. Has it failed to define the qualification of officers? Having defined the qualifications of voters, it was not to be supposed that it would omit the very important matter of defining who might be officers. It has not omitted to do so. It makes the one right practically the correlative of the other. To the citizen clothed with the right of suffrage is given also the right of holding office. It should be so, and it is so. Section 4 of article 4 provides that "no person except citizens entitled to vote, shall be elected or appointed to any state, county or municipal office; but the governor and judges must have attained the age of thirty, and the attorney-general the age of twenty-five years, at the beginning of their respective terms of service; and must have been citizens of the state for five years next preceding their election or appointment, or be citizens at the time this constitution goes into operation." This does not in affirmative express terms declare that a voter shall be competent to hold office, as does the first section say that all male citizens shall be voters. It could have been better drawn, for present purposes, by declaring that any one who is a voter should be competent to be elected or appointed to office, but the section means that. We must read sections 1 and 4 together, as if in pari materia, because they deal with two kindred subjects, and they are located close together. Section 1 has just defined the qualifications of voters. Section 4 takes up the subject of qualifications of officers, and, in saying that no person but citizens entitled to vote shall be eligible to office, it, by implication,—by strong and plain implication,—means to declare that a citizen entitled to vote shall likewise, because of his quality of voter, be entitled to be elected or appointed to office. In saying that none but voters shall be officers, it means to assert the converse,—that voters shall have right to be officers. It is a negative pregnant. A reading of the two sections will more strongly impress one that such is the meaning of the fourth section than can be conveyed in words of explanation or construction. The negative mode of expression was used in the section, likely, to exclude all persons not voters from office; for, if it had said that all voters should be eligible to office, it might have been contended that persons not voters might be made eligible to office, while under the section as it is, in the negative form, that is prohibited. But surely it did not mean to leave the gate swinging, so as to let any power disable a voter from holding office. When it says that one not a voter shall not hold an office, does it not impliedly say that a voter may hold office? That it meant, not simply to exclude those not voters from office, but at the same time to confer upon voters the right to hold office, is shown by the fact that the section goes on to prescribe certain qualifications for governor, judges, attorney general, and senators. Why touch the subject of qualification for office at all, if the section had for its aim only to exclude nonvoters? The convention, knowing that, by declaring that none but voters should become officers, it had vested in voters the right to become officers, and desiring to require, as to governor, judges, and senators, certain qualifications in addition to their being voters, made the specific additional requirements as to them. Comparing this section 4, art. 3, as found in the constitution of 1863, with that in the present one, we notice the insertion in the present constitution of the word "but," not till then found in the section. In the former constitution, it read: "No persons, except citizens entitled to vote, shall be elected or appointed to any state, county or municipal office. Judges must have attained the age of thirty-five years, the governor the age of thirty years," etc. In the present constitution it reads: "No person, except citizens entitled to vote, shall be elected or appointed to any state, county or municipal office; but the governor and judges must have attained the age of thirty," etc. The insertion of the word "but" indicates that the convention knew that the first clause expressed a general rule or definition of qualification for office, admitting all voters to the right; and as governor, judges, senators, and attorney general would fall within it, unless excepted, and desiring to except them, it, for safety, inserted the word, to make it more clear than it had been. In other words, it is an exception, the same as if, after allowing all voters to be chosen to office, it had said, "except that the governor and judges must have attained the age," etc. Why the necessity of exception, if there is no general rule? Thus, to be a voter is to be also qualified to take office; to be a voter is the correlative of the right to be an officer, except as regards governor, judges, senators, and attorney general, to the extent, as to them, specified in section 4. Judge Brown so construed a similar section in the constitution of 1863, in Phares v. State, 3 W. Va. 509, saying: "The constitution prescribes who are entitled to vote, and it also provides that any person so entitled to vote shall be eligible to office."

I will propound two questions, which I will assume to think are decisive. Can the legislature enact that the governor, judges, or senators shall be freeholders? No; because the constitution only demands that they be voters, and of certain age, and no other qualifications can be exacted. The naming those shows that no others were intended. Can the legislature enact that the auditor and treasurer shall be freeholders? I answer no, as I do as to governor, because the constitution has only demanded that they be voters. The only difference is that as to governor, judges, and senators, further qualifications are exacted. Will it be contended by any one that the legislature may exclude a voter from the auditorship because he is not an owner of realty? If it cannot, it is only because of this constitutional provision. Section 8 empowers the legislature to "prescribe by general laws, the terms of office, powers, duties and compensation of all public officers and agents, and the manner in which they shall be elected, appointed and removed." It does not give the legislature power to prescribe the qualifications of officers. If the convention had left open that important matter, it would be expected that it would, in the section just quoted, grant to the legislature the necessary function or power of prescribing such qualification; but it did not so, and simply because it had itself done so in section 4. Can we suppose that the framers of the constitution intended to leave open that most important matter,—important as it concerns the rights of individual citizens, and more important as it concerns the vital interests of all the people of the state in the administration of its government,—namely, the qualification for office, leaving it subject to the fluctuation of sentiment, the caprices of constantly changing legislatures, the passions of the hour? The very idea of a written constitution of government tells us that the definition of eligibility to official station should be, and would be, one of the very first subjects dealt with in it. If section 4 does not perform this function, where do we find it? There is no statute defining qualification for office. The legislature has always understood that the constitution did this work; for the legislature of 1863, passing a general election law under the constitution of 1863, which contained a like section to section 4 now under discussion, did not define the qualifications for office. Neither did the legislature of 1872-73, passing a general election law under the present constitution. Neither did the legislatures of 1882 and 1891, in the general election laws passed in those years. Four general election laws have been passed in 28 years, none defining the qualifications for office. I have not found where the legislature has done so in any act. Thus, we have the contemporaneous construction of the legislative department of government through many years, and a great mass of legislation, to the effect that the constitution prescribed and fixed the qualifications of officers. This has great effect. Cooley, Const. Lim. 81.

Counsel for appellee argues that the fact that section 6 requires officers to take an oath, and closes with the injunction that "no other oath, or declaration or test shall be required as a qualification, unless herein otherwise provided," would forbid the freehold requirement. It would, if we could consider it a "test," within the meaning of this provision; but, from the first thought, I doubted whether it would apply to a property qualification or an educational qualification, though the words "unless herein otherwise provided" might favor, slightly, such contention. My inclination was to regard matters of opinion or bias or political action as here referred to. We know that this prohibition had its birth and suggestion in the existence of test oaths springing from the passions and excitement of the civil war, designed to exclude participants therein, on the Confederate side, from holding office. English history tells us of test acts, and they relate to matters of opinion, chiefly religious opinion, like that in 25 Car. II., requiring an oath from officers against transubstantiation, and requiring them to take the sacrament under the English church; and that earlier in the same reign, called the "Corporation Act," requiring officers to renounce the covenant; and also the uniformity act, requiring clergymen to assent to everything in the Book of Common Prayer. So far as advised, from authority here accessible, I think this provision against tests relates to opinion, and not such as a property qualification. See Story, Const. §§ 1847, 1849, and Hume's and Macaulay's Histories of England. I have met with the cases of Attorney General v. Detroit Common Council, 58 Mich. 213, 24 N. W. 887, where it is held, par. 6, that a provision in the Michigan constitution just like the one in ours does not apply to those special qualifications required for particular offices. The opinions in that case, and also the opinion on pages 91, 92, in the case of People v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich., will sustain the view I have just expressed as to the meaning of the word "test" as here used. I have also met with Rogers v. Common Council, 123 N. Y. 173, 25 N. E. 274, holding same view. Therefore, as section 4 confers upon the voter the capacity to take office, with the exceptions therein stated, the legislature does not possess the power to add to those exceptions, any more than it possesses power to disfranchise a citizen from voting by prescribing qualifications or exceptions beyond those stated in section 1.

The legislature cannot establish arbitrary exclusions from office, or any general regulations requiring qualifications not required by the constitution, except for crime. Cooley, Const. Lim. (4th Ed.) 78; Barker v. People, 3 Cow. 686; Black v. Trower, 79 Va. 123; Thomas v. Owens, 4 Md. 189; Page v. Hardin, 8 B. Mon. 648. Chancellor Sanford, in Barker v. People, supra, used this language: "Eligibility to public trusts is claimed as a constitutional right which cannot be abridged or impaired. The constitution establishes and defines the right of suffrage, and gives to the electors and to various authorities the power to confer public trusts. It declares that ministers of religion shall be ineligible to any office. It prescribes, in respect to certain officers, particular circumstances without which a person is not eligible to those stations, [as does ours,] and it provides that persons holding certain offices shall hold no other public trust. [So does ours.] Excepting particular exclusions thus established, the electors and the appointing powers are, by the constitution, wholly free to confer public station upon any person, according to their pleasure. The constitution giving the right of election and the right of appointment, these rights consisting essentially in the freedom of choice, and the constitution also declaring that certain persons are not eligible to office, it follows from those powers and provisions that all other persons are eligible. Eligibility to office is not declared as a right or principle by any express terms of the constitution, but it results as a just deduction from the express powers and provisions of the system. The basis of the principle is the absolute liberty of the electors and the appointing authorities to choose and to appoint any person who is not made ineligible by the constitution. Eligibility to office, therefore, belongs not exclusively or especially to electors enjoying the right of suffrage. It belongs to all persons whomsoever, not excluded by the constitution. I therefore conceive it to be entirely clear that the legislature cannot establish arbitrary exclusion from office, or any general regulations requiring qualifications which the constitution has not required. If, for example, it should be enacted by law that all physicians, or all persons of a particular religious sect, should be ineligible to public trusts, or that all persons not possessing a certain amount of property should be excluded, or that a member of the assembly must be a freeholder, any such regulation would be an infringement of the constitution; and it would be so because, should it prevail, it would be, in effect, an alteration of the constitution." Now, observe that Chancellor Sanford goes beyond where I need go; for he says that, without anything in the constitution expressly defining qualifications for officers, the mere fact that certain persons were by the New York constitution excluded, as is the case with us, is sufficient, alone, to vest in others, not excluded, the right to take office, or in the voters the range of choice from all not excluded. There was no such section as our section 4 for the chancellor to rely upon. If his proposition was right, how more can I assert that the position here taken is right, where we have a section 4, excluding only nonvoters, and leaving it to be understood that all that were voters should be allowed to receive office? This common principle of construction is illustrated in Donaldson v. Voltz, 19 W. Va. 156, holding that as the constitution, after granting exemption from execution, had specified certain exceptions, the legislature could not add rent. The expression of certain exceptions included others.

We have been under the impression that the property qualification for office had been, many years ago, abolished, by change in constitutional law. It surely has not been restored, and cannot be, but by a change in the constitution. It will not do to say that, while it may not be demanded as to state and county office, it may be as to municipal offices; for section 4 includes them, in terms. Were this not so, I would hold a different opinion. So I hold that the want of freehold qualification does not exclude from holding the position of councilman. It cannot be true that a man may be elected governor, and yet cannot be elected a town councilman, merely because, though a voter, he is not a freeholder. This would impress one as an absurdity and injustice. Ought the local taxing power be vested only in the property owner? Members of the legislature, vested with greater taxing powers, need not be freeholders. The only cases cited in support of the contention that the freehold qualification is not unconstitutional are State v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102, and Darrow v. People, 8 Colo. 417, 8 Pac. 661. In the former it is held that the provision in the Ohio constitution that "no person shall be elected or appointed to any office unless he possesses the qualifications of an elector" does not forbid, by implication, the legislature to require other reasonable qualifications for office. The reasoning on the point is short and unsatisfactory. The judge says the power of the legislature should not be denied by mere implication, unless clear. He thought it was not clear. I think it very clear. But I add that it does not appear that the clause in the Ohio constitution containing the negative words had, as ours has, the feature of prescribing qualifications as to governor, judges, and senators, nor the section giving the legislature power only to prescribe terms, compensation, and manner of choice of officers, but failing to give it power to fix qualifications. The Colorado constitution is the same, in effect, as that of Ohio. The remarks just made apply to the Colorado case; and I note the fact, specially, that in neither the Ohio nor the Colorado constitutions did the clause include municipal offices, as ours does. The Colorado court says that the clause in the Colorado constitution had no relation to municipal officers. The decisions are of less authority because of that fact. If one additional material qualification may be prescribed, why not another? Why not many others? The constitution is fundamental law, and strictly construed in defense of the citizen's rights. It is the Magna Charta of his freedom and rights, political and civil. Admit once that it does not fix his qualification for office. Where would his disfranchisement end? That would depend upon uncertain political, religious, or other winds. Would we limit the act within the bounds of the reasonable? That would be indefinite, unsafe, precarious,—dependent upon the times and motives and aims dominating them. Against these things, it was intended to imbed the right in the solid rock of the constitution. If we say it might have been imbedded in plainer language, yet we must look at the policy,—the evil against which it was intended to provide. I do not say that no provision or qualification whatever that is reasonable—essential to fit the party for the duty—may not be prescribed. I lay down a general rule. But I say this freehold test is not reasonable or necessary to make a man a competent or suitable officer. The Virginia court, passing on the constitutional clause giving all voters the right to hold office, held void an act requiring members of electoral boards to be freeholders. It admitted that there might be cases where, by implication, an additional qualification might be imposed, when it was essential to the discharge of the duties of the place, but the qualification of freehold could not be justified on this theory. Black v. Trower, 79 Va. 123.

Another question: Were Thompson and Smith freeholders when elected? Smith held land under a purchase evidenced by a title bond providing for a conveyance on payment of purchase money, and was in possession, but had not paid for the land. He thus had an equitable estate in fee simple. A freehold may be in an equitable estate as well as legal estate, as authorities below cited show. There is nothing, then, to prevent his being a freeholder, but nonpayment of purchase money. Shall a man owning land, in possession, who happens to owe yet a little purchase money, be deemed not a freeholder? The only reason is that he is not entitled to call for a conveyance of the legal estate. But he has a vested interest or property in the land, recognized by law. In the eye of equity, he is the owner of the land, holding in trust for his vendor only for purchase money, while the vendor holds the legal estate in trust for him, and is entitled only to the money. A court of law would recognize his right by giving him an action of trespass. If the law were that, to be a freeholder, he must have legal title, it would be different, but Virginia cases of binding authority repel that idea. It is ancient law that the cestui que use is a freeholder, so as to be a good juror. Co. Litt. 272b; 4 Bac. Abr. 556, tit. "Juries." But as to such cases I think the statute of uses would execute the use to the possession, and give good legal title. Helmondollar's Case, 4 Grat. 536, held that one having the equitable interest in land, entitled to call for the legal title, is a freeholder; and it is stated that, among many Virginia cases, no one denies that a cestui que trust of a freehold estate is a good grand juror, who is required to be a freeholder. In Cunningham's Case, 6 Grat. 695, a purchaser, by oral contract, in possession, who had paid for the land, was held to be a freeholder. In Carter's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 319, it was held that a grantor, who had passed away the legal title by deed of trust, and had merely the equity of redemption, was a freeholder. In Moore's Case, 9 Leigh, 639, the owner conveyed the land to a trustee to secure a debt, and then such owner conveyed to another person his equity of redemption, and put him in possession, and this person was held to be a freeholder. So the legal title in the person is clearly not necessary to constitute him a freeholder. And upon the strength of Burcher's Case, 2 Rob. (Va.) 826, I conclude that the fact that Smith owed yet some purchase money does not prevent his being a freeholder. It decided that a person was a freeholder who was in possession under a purchase; the deed to him not being delivered to him, but in the hands of another, as an escrow, to be delivered on payment of purchase money, which remained partially unpaid. The opinion said, as I now say: "It seems sufficient if the juror is in possession of a freehold estate, and enjoying the profits and substantial ownership thereof;" that he was in lawful possession, and a court of equity would regard the land as the purchaser's property, and, if he failed to pay, would not turn him out, but give him a day to pay, and then sell the land as his, and pay him any surplus of its proceeds after payment of the debt. If that was so at the date of that decision, when the court of law did not recognize the equitable title, or its owner as having any title, but would turn the purchaser out, by ejectment, at the suit of the vendor, how much more should we hold it to be law now, when section 20, c. 90, of the Code compels the court of law to view the purchaser's right as a substantial right, by declaring that a vendor shall not, at law, recover against the vendee land sold by the vendor to such vendee, when there is a writing stating the purchase and its terms? The heading in Reynold's Case, 4 Leigh, 663, says that it seems that one who has contracted, by article under seal, to sell his land, but has not conveyed it, and still holds the legal title, is a freeholder,—that is, the vendor; and therefore it may be said that if the vendor is a freeholder the vendee cannot be a freeholder in the self-same land. But that statement is not binding, because the court says it did not decide it, as that question was not adjourned to it; and, secondly, it is true, as said by Judge Gholson in Burcher's Case, supra, that the vendor only agreed to sell on certain conditions precedent to be complied with by the vendee, and the record did not show that they had been performed, or a dollar paid, or that any title had been made, or even that possession had passed to the vendee. I hold that the want of legal title or failure to pay purchase money does not settle that the party is not a freeholder. Is he in possession of land, claiming freehold estate, by right, legal or equitable, recognized by law, whether the purchase money had been paid or not? If yes, then he is a freeholder. Therefore, Smith was a freeholder.

Another question: Was Thompson a freeholder when elected? His wife owned an estate in fee in land. We do not know by record when she acquired it, so as to say whether it was separate estate, nor whether there was issue by the marriage. But in no conceivable view upon the record, as it is, was Thompson a freeholder when elected. If we could see that the wife acquired the land, and the marriage took place before the married woman's separate estate act, (April 1, 1869,) we could say that he was a freeholder, because, by marriage simply, he was entitled to possession and rents and profits during the joint lives of himself and wife. Pickens' Ex'rs v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 800, 15 S. E. 997. It would be a freehold, as it would continue during their joint lives, at least. 2 Kent, Comm. 130; Dejarnatte v. Allen, 5 Grat. 499, 513; Schouler, Husb. &

Wife, §§ 167, 181; Schouler, Dom. Rel. §§ 89, 201. Thompson would also be a freeholder, by reason of being invested with an estate by the curtesy initiate, though it does not appear that there was issue of the marriage, as such an estate is freehold, since it exists for the life of husband. It is true that at common law there must be issue, to create an estate by curtesy initiate. 2 BL Comm. 126; 2 Minor, Inst. 103. And under our statute, (Code, c. 65, § 15,) as it stood up to the act of March 20, 1882, notwithstanding it broadly declared that "if a married woman die seized of an estate of inheritance in lands, her husband shall be tenant by the curtesy in the same," yet Winkler v. Winkler, 18 W. Va. 455, construed it as not dispensing with any of the four common-law requisites of curtesy. But chapter 86, Acts 1882, amended said Code, § 15, by utterly dispensing with issue as an element in curtesy; and I think it would operate to vest in the husband an estate by curtesy initiate, as here is an estate of inheritance, not separate estate, vested in the wife during coverture. But we cannot say that the land vested in the wife, and the marriage took place, before April 1, 1869. If, on the other hand, we suppose that the wife acquired this land after April 1, 1869, it being thus separate estate, under section 2, c. 66, Code 1891, (chapter 65, § 3, Code 1887,) the wife yet living, the husband could not be tenant by the curtesy initiate. It has been seriously questioned whether a husband could, by force of common law, take an estate by curtesy in the separate real estate of his wife; but the better opinion is—and the law here, as settled in Winkler v. Winkler, 18 W. Va. 455, is—that he can. That question—that is, whether the common law would, alone, give him such estate—is, however, unimportant, practically, because the statute would certainly give it. Code, c. 65, § 15; opinion in case just cited, (page 468.) But there is this distinction between an estate by curtesy in lands of the wife, not separate estate, and lands that are her separate estate, namely, that in lands not her separate estate there is curtesy initiate, whereas, in lands that are separate estate, there cannot be curtesy initiate, but only curtesy consummate. In other words, until the death of the wife, no estate whatever in her lands vests in the husband. He has, while she lives, only a chance or possibility of becoming clothed with an estate upon the event of the death of the wife before his death. This is because the separate estate statute declares that the wife shall hold her separate estate, and its issues, rents, and profits, to her sole and separate use, as if she were single, free from the control or disposal of her husband. This statute is, in letter, spirit, and purpose, plainly inconsistent with the existence of any substantial estate of the husband in her land while she lives. See Breeding v. Davis, 77 Va. 639; Alexander v. Alexander, 85 Va. 354, 7 S. E. 335; Wells, Mar. Wom. 106; Hill v. Chambers, 30 Mich. 422; Porch v. Fries, 13 N. J. Eq. 204; Thurber v. Townsend, 22 N. Y. 517; Beach v. Miller, 51 Ill. 206; Cole v. Van Riper, 44 Ill. 58; Stewart v. Ross, 50 Miss. 776; 4 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 967; Billings v. Baker, 28 Barb. 843. Therefore, Thompson was not a freeholder, when elected.

Another question: But both Smith and Thompson, after election, and before their term of office began, acquired land, and became freeholders. This raises the question whether, though they were not freeholders when elected, it is enough that they were when their terms began. Much difference of opinion has existed in the courts upon this question. Where the constitution or statute declares that only certain persons shall be elected or be eligible to office, it may be plausibly contended that it refers to the date of the election, and that one not so qualified cannot be elected to, and cannot hold, the office, though he become so qualified before his term begins. But, even in such case, highly respectable authorities hold that it is sufficient if he be so qualified at the commencement of the term. Some authorities for the former view are Searcy v. Crow, 15 Cal. 117; State v. McMillen, 23 Neb. 385, 36 N. W. 587; Taylor v. Sullivan, 45 Minn. 309, 47 N. W. 802; State v. Clarke, 3 Nev. 566; State v. Williams, 99 Mo. 291, 12 S. W. 905. Some authorities for the latter view are Smith v. Moore, 90 Ind. 294; Brown v. Goben, 122 Ind. 113, 23 N. E. 519; State v. Murray, 28 Wis. 96; State v. Trumpf, 50 Wis. 103, 5 N. W. 876, and 6 N. W. 512. The latter view derives additional force by the fact that the votes cast for the ineligible candidate are not necessarily void. If they were, there would be more reason to say that he could not even be voted for; but they are so far votes, so far effectual, that if the ineligibility be not known to the voters, or be not such as they are bound to know, the minority candidate, is not elected, and cannot claim the office. Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89. But we are not called upon to say which of those views is correct, because in this case the statute cited to disable these claimants from holding their offices does not say that only freeholders shall be chosen or elected or be eligible, but says, "The municipal authorities of such city, town or village shall be a mayor, recorder and councilmen, who shall be freeholders therein." This simply says that to be such officers they must be freeholders. It only means that the powers and functions of these offices shall be wielded only by freeholders. Why defeat the popular will, this being the language, by mere construction, simply because, when elected, the persons elected were not freeholders, when at the time they actually act in office they are? The letter of the act does not require it, neither does its spirit, since its object is only to keep nonfreeholders from acting in office. It was meant, not as a prohibition against their election, but against their holding office. Authority will sustain this position: In Privett v. Bickford, 20 Kan. 52, the constitution provided that no person who had borne arms against the United States should be "qualified to vote or hold office" unless his disability should be removed, and it was held that though disqualified when elected, if the person's disabilities be removed before taking office, it was sufficient. In State v. Murray, 28 Wis. 96, it was held that an alien at date of election, but naturalized at beginning of term, could hold. In De Turk v. Com., 129 Pa. St. 159, 18 Atl. 757, the constitution provided that no one holding office under the United States should "hold or exercise any office in this state." A postmaster, when chosen county commissioner, resigned as postmaster, even after quo warranto begun to oust him as commissioner, and it was held he was competent to hold. In Com. v. Pyle, 18 Pa. St. 519, it was held that, "where one would be ineligible to office on account of disqualification, he must get rid of the disqualification before he is appointed or elected; but, where the prohibition extends only to the enjoyment or exercise of an office, it is sufficient that the person be qualified before he is sworn." The United States constitution says, "No one shall be a representative" who is not of a certain age, or has engaged in rebellion; but John Young Brown, under age at date of election, and others under disability when elected, but becoming of age, and whose disabilities had been removed, have been admitted to the house of representatives and senate. McCrary, Elect. § 258. Therefore, I conclude that it is sufficient that the plaintiffs were freeholders at the commencement of their terms.

Another question: Can both Smith and Thompson unite in one writ of mandamus? The rule is that, where the interests of several relators are separate and independent, they cannot join in one writ of mandamus, any more than in another form of action. High, Extr. Rem. § 439; 14 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 219. But this is a peculiar case, as to this point; and, if any case would justify a joinder of two interests, this would. The offices may be deemed separate, it is true; but they are claims to seats in a body composed of numerous members, elected simply to that body, not to any particular places or seats therein, not by separate wards, but for the whole town, by all its voters, at one election. Their places are held by Losee and Turley. Which one of these parties holds Thompson's place? Neither one more than the other. Suppose Thompson to sue alone, simply for the admission to the board of councilmen. If he were admitted, whom would he oust,—Losee or Turley? Would the council say which one? If it did, it would simply do so arbitrarily, or by lot, for it would have no rule to go by. Perhaps Thompson might ask Losee's place alone, and have order for his motion. But what if Smith, also, asked the place of Losee? And perhaps, if he sued for Losee's place, Losee might say that he did not withhold his place, any more than did Turley. Would not, if we assert that both should sue separately, either be entitled simply to ask admission generally, without asking the place of either Losee or Turley? If so, is it not better to tolerate a joint application for both Losee's and Turley's seats? Precedents are found fully justifying this joint writ. Two persons joined in one writ to be sworn in as church wardens. Reg. v. Guise, 2 Ld. Raym. 1008; Reg. v. Twitty, 2 Salk. 433; King v. Middlesex, 30 E. C. L. 286; Reg. v. Heathcote, 10 Mod. 48. In Manns v. Givens, 7 Leigh, 689, seven persons held as slaves, claiming manumission under one and the same deed, joined in one mandamus to compel its recordation, and no objection was thought of, for misjoinder. True, they all claimed under one deed, but each one's freedom was a separate right annexed to his person only. These parties claim under one election, which is one element for consideration. Nineteen persons appointed as a board of visitors to a college sued out, without objection, a joint writ against that number, constituting the old board, to try title. Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 415. In a case reported in 43 La. Ann. 92, 8 South. 803, (State v. Shakspeare), several councilmen of New Orleans, turned out of the board, took one mandamus to obtain restoration, and it was held that they could so sue. The opinion in Haskins v. Board, 51 Miss. 410, using language probably of Merrill (Mand. § 232,) states the principle that "relators must have a right common to all of them; must have a joint benefit in the performance of the act or duty required of respondent, and be joint sufferers because of the nondoin. Otherwise, they cannot unite in this suit." Does not the plaintiffs' case come within that statement of the principle? Though I have had some question on this point, I conclude that there is no error in the use of the writ jointly by Smith and Thompson.

Another question: It is contended that mandamus does not lie, but that certiorari is the proper remedy. The council canvassed the election returns, and declared by its order that Smith and Thompson received the highest number of votes. There was no complaint or error in its action touching the election to call for certiorari, but, after declaring them elected, the council refused to admit them. This called for mandamus, not certiorari. That mandamus has been long used in the Virginias as a proper process to try title to office, and compel admission of him who has title to it, is well settled. In the great, I may say historic, case of Bridges

v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 562, where every inch of ground of the slightest value was hotly contested, wherein Bridges sought to enforce his title and admission to the office of superintendent of the penitentiary, the efficacy of the writ was not even questioned, and Judge Haymond said that if it had been the objection could not have been maintained. I shall not discuss the matter, being satisfied that that case, and others I cite, will sustain the remedy by mandamus. Cross v. Railway Co., 34 W. Va. 742, 12 S. E. 765; Id., 35 W. Va. 174, 12 S. E. 1071; Booker v. Young, 12 Gratt. 303; Dew v. Judges, 3 Hen. & M. 1; Hutch. Treat. W. Va. § 1278; Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 415. I would affirm the judgment.

POLING v. OHIO RIVER R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1893.)

NEGLIGENCE—PLEADINGS—MAP AS EVIDENCE—APPEAL—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—LIABILITY OF RAILROAD COMPANY FOR ACTS OF UNITED STATES POSTAL CLERK—INJURY TO LICENSEE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—ALTERATION OF COUNTY ROAD—NEW TRIAL.

1. A declaration for negligence is good if it contains the substantial elements of a cause of action, the duty violated, the breach thereof, properly averred, with such matters as are necessary to render the cause of action intelligible, so that judgment according to law and the very right of the case can be given.

2. An ex parte map or diagram made by a witness, and shown by him to be correct, may be given in evidence for the consideration of the jury, not as independent evidence, but to be considered by them in connection with other evidence, so as to enable them to understand and apply it.

3. To make an objection made during the trial to the admission of evidence available in the appellate court, the point must be made and properly saved by bill of exception. It is not enough to note the objection in the certificate of evidence.

4. As a general rule, a railroad company is not responsible for the negligent acts of United States postal clerks or agents upon its trains.

5. A railroad company has a platform and mail crane near a postoffice at which the mail train does not stop, but the postal clerk from the mail car, with a "catcher," takes in from the crane the mail pouch suspended thereon, without the train slackening speed. A person who stations himself on the company's land, near the mail crane, for the purpose of witnessing the catch, or for some other purpose of like kind, as a mere voluntary licensee, is subject to the concomitant risks and danger of injury thus assumed, and the company does not owe him the duty of keeping the mail crane in suitable and safe condition. The railroad company is only liable for such wanton injury as may be done to such licensee by the gross negligence of the company, its agents and servants.

6. A defendant who, after the plaintiff has given in his evidence in chief, and rests, then moves the court to instruct the jury to render a verdict for defendant, but, the motion being overruled, goes on with his case, will be held to have waived his exception taken to such ruling of the court.

7. The road surveyor may change any county road in his precinct with the consent of the owner of the land, (Code, § 21, c. 43;) and, when any road is altered, the former road shall be discontinued to the extent of such alteration, and no further, and the new one established, (section 32, c. 43.)

8. When the verdict of a jury, viewed according to the ordinary rules of considering the evidence on motion for a new trial, is plainly against the law of the case upon the facts proved, the court, on motion of the party aggrieved, will set the same aside and award a new trial; but not more than two new trials can be granted to the same party in the same cause.

9. A case in which the foregoing rules are applied, and various instructions and rulings are considered and discussed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Jackson county.

Action by J. M. Poling, administrator of the estate of C. Swain, deceased, against the Ohio River Railroad Company, to recover for the death of decedent. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. H. Leonard and V. B. Archer, for plaintiff in error. Chas. E. Hogg, N. C. Prickett, and Jas. H. Couch, Jr., for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. This was an action of trespass on the case, brought in the circuit court of Jackson county on 22d March, 1892, by Poling, as administrator of C. Swain, against the Ohio River Railroad Company, for causing the death of his intestate, C. Swain, which resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for $3,000, from which defendant has obtained this writ of error. The assignments of error will be considered somewhat in the order made.

1. The court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the declaration. The declaration contains three counts, and the demurrer is to the declaration and to each count. In Hawker v. Railroad Co., 15 W. Va. 628, it is held that a declaration against a railroad company for negligently and wrongfully killing the plaintiff's cattle on its track need not state the acts of omission or commission which constitute the negligence and wrong. It is neither usual nor necessary in this state to specify the acts or omissions of defendant which constitute the negligence. This is matter of proof, and need not be specified in the declaration. It was not specified in the declaration in the case of Blaine v. Railroad Co., 9 W. Va. 253, nor in Baylor v. Railroad Co., Id. 270; and the declarations in these cases were held good on demurrer. It is good if it contains the substantial elements of a cause of action; and the demurrer must be overruled, unless there be omitted something so essential to the action that judgment according to law and the very right of the cause cannot be given. But the declaration must set forth the duty which has been neglected, and aver the neglect. Railroad Co. v. Stark, 88 Mich. 714. The essential ground or principal subject matter of complaint, with such matter of inducement as may be necessary to lead up to or render

It intelligible, introduced and averred with time and place in the technical modes of expression suited to the action, was all that was ever necessary under the strictest forms of common-law pleading. The first count avers that plaintiff's intestate lost his life by reason of the negligence of defendant in failing to keep its mail crane in safe condition, decedent being at the time a traveler on the highway, and without fault on his part; giving the circumstances with great particularity. Necessary implications of fact and matters of law need not be averred. It avers that it was defendant's duty to keep at all times a proper and safe mail crane at Douglas station, and that by the neglect of such duty defendant caused his intestate's death; that is, defendant's duty to decedent as a traveler on the highway. The second count avers the duty of defendant to keep its said mail crane and appliances and railroad track safe and free from danger to the traveling public, and to all persons rightfully at or near said crane and railroad; that defendant neglected such duty; that in consequence thereof decedent lost his life while on and near the public road, and without fault on his part. The third count is substantially the same. The averments that the father, Newman Swain, sustained damage by reason thereof, may be regarded as impertinent, and therefore may be disregarded as surplusage, as he is not the plaintiff. And the declaration concludes in the usual form: "And thereupon the said plaintiff says that by reason of the premises," etc., "and by force of the statute in such cases made and provided, an action hath accrued to him, as such administrator as aforesaid, to have and demand of and from the said defendant, for and by reason of the grievous wrongs and injuries in said three counts mentioned, damages to the amount of ten thousand dollars, for the uses and purposes in said several counts mentioned, and therefore he brings this suit."

By the statute of this state giving the right of action in such cases, the action is brought by and in the name of the personal representative of such deceased person, and the amount recovered in any such action shall be distributed to the parties and in the proportions provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal estate left by persons dying intestate, (Code, §§ 5, 6, c. 103;) damages given not to exceed $10,000, and barred in two years, (see Statute of Descents and Distributions, c. 78.) It will be seen by section 10 that to the state shall accrue all the personal estate of any decedent of which there may be no other distributee. It may be that the state would not take; in which event it would certainly not be improper to aver that there are distributees, but not necessary, because it must be assumed that kindred exist, and it need not be averred. Cooley, Torts, (2d Ed.) top p. 317. The demurrer was properly overruled.

In this case the court has certified all the evidence under section 9, c. 131, Code, from which the material facts appear to be as follows: In 1886 the defendant company built its road along the Ohio river, through the county of Jackson, where the death of Charles Swain, the subject matter of this suit, took place. There was an old county road of long standing leading from Douglas landing, in Grant district, on the Ohio river, back to Murrayville, on the turnpike. By order of 13th April, 1886, the county court of Jackson county "granted its consent to the said company to construct, maintain, and operate its railroad across any highway or public road in said districts of Ravenswood, Grant, or Union, in this county, when necessary to do so, but upon the following conditions: That if said railroad company shall, by the building of its said road or otherwise, obstruct any public road in this county, it shall put the road obstructed in as good condition at every crossing of said railroad as it was before the obstruction, and in all other respects according to law." In the fall of 1886 the construction company building the railroad along the Ohio river, at the point called "Lone Cedar," or "Douglas Landing," changed to the old county road, moving it down about 100 feet, made a crossing over the track 16 feet wide, and graded the road from there to Douglas landing, at the river; but the road surveyor refused to receive that part of the road from the railroad to the river. In the winter of 1886-1887 the river washed away the new road next to the river. The road surveyor then had a new road made from the crossing into the old road, on the river side of the railroad, which has been used and worked as the public road, under the direction of the road surveyor, ever since. The land between the railroad and the river at Douglas landing is lying open, unfenced; and the road made by the construction company is also used as a foot path, and for horsemen, but is not worked or recognized as the highway, and, if it had ever been a part of the county road, it had in the spring of 1887 been abandoned, and thenceforward was a mere private path, used by tacit permission of Hall, the landowner. The road made by the construction company, turning to the left, and the new road, turning to the right, separate at the railroad crossing, and come together at the landing on the beach; the distance being only 75 yards. The crossing over the track is 15 feet wide. On the river side of the track, and 8 feet below the 16-foot crossing, the railway company erected a platform and mail "crane," but no other building, called "Douglas Station," where, by means of a "mail catcher" on the car, mail pouches could be taken on without stopping or slackening the speed of the train. The mail pouches and the mail catchers attached to the postal cars for taking up mails without stopping the trains are furnished by the United States government mail-equipment division of the post-office department; but the mail cranes are constructed, erected, and are to be kept in good order by the railroad companies, at their expense. The store where the Lone Cedar post office was kept was on the hill side from the railroad, about 180 or 190 feet distant. The deceased, Charles Swain, was an intelligent, sober, industrious, strong, healthy young man; 20 years old, lacking three months; living with his father, Newman Swain, about one and a half miles back in the country from the station in question. Father and son were at the station together on the morning of the accident. The mail train came in about noon, and, not wishing to return until they should get their mail, young Swain, with the consent of his father, went hunting with a young man named George Pickering, who sometimes acted as deputy postmaster at that place. They were hunting near by, on the land of Mr. Hall. Near noon they quit hunting; came down to the railroad, about 75 or 100 feet down the river, below the station; walked up the track to the platform; stayed there five or ten minutes; heard the coming south-bound mail train whistle when a half or three-fourths of a mile away; saw the train come in sight about 600 yards off; young Swain saying, "That is engine No. 16." The two young men then walked across the platform back of the crane, next the river, and stepped on a rise or bank 15 feet from the upright of the mail crane. The mail sack was hanging on the crane when they came up, and they knew that the mail clerk on the approaching train would attempt to catch the sack. The lower arm had been struck by the catcher, and knocked off, about two weeks before. When the mail car came up, the postal clerk caught the mail pouch hanging on the crane, the train running 20 or 25 miles per hour, but, on making the catch, struck the lower arm of the mail crane with the hook of the catcher, knocking off the upper part of the lower arm, and hurling it forward, and around against the left breast of young Swain with such force that he took a few steps, fell, and died in a few seconds. The piece of the lower arm broken off, and thrown around and back against young Swain, was large at one end, tapering to a feather edge at the other, which was the explanation given by a witness of the direction in which the blow by the catcher threw it. The decedent had no business with the train; was there simply as a looker-on at the passing mail train. He was not traveling on, or in any way using, the county road. But one of the questions of fact, about which a considerable part of the testimony was given, was whether the point, 15 feet behind the upright part of the crane, to which he walked as the train approached, and where he was standing by the side of Mr. Pickering when he (Swain) was struck and killed, was in the county road or not. It was within the railroad company's right of way. There is a diagram in evidence which shows with great precision where the decedent stood when killed, with reference to these two roads. He was not within the 30 feet of the road running from where the road crosses the rails to the right to the landing at the river, but was within the 30 feet of the road turning to the left, and running to the river at the same point, being 11 feet from the center of the 30-foot right of way, but was not within the 30-foot right of way of the road turning to the right. There is also a diagram showing the location of the mail crane, and also a great deal of evidence as to whether it was a safe and proper appliance. In the present attitude of the case, taking it most strongly for plaintiff, and confining it to plaintiff's evidence, after the verdict of the jury, we must regard it as not an appliance in complete and proper order, to the full measure of what was required on behalf of any one to whom the company owed the duty to see that such appliances under their own control were in full and complete and proper order; otherwise, it would not have been possible to strike the lower arm of the crane with the hook of the catcher. The thing itself speaks, and shows that if the distance between the arms had been greater, or the catcher had been shorter, it would have been impossible for the catcher, no matter at what angle raised, to have struck the lower arm; but it cannot in any proper sense be called a nuisance. It is also shown that if the catcher on the mail car is raised to a horizontal position, or anything near that, it passes through without danger. This is also shown by the very many times it was successfully used without accident, although the lower arm had been struck about two weeks before. The mail agent who made the catch was a young man without experience, who commenced on October 8, 1888, 18 days before the accident happened; and in the second week of his running on the train the accident occurred. The evidence also shows that the mail crane was on the concave side of a curve, and that there was a loose joint, and there had been a slight washout under the track at that point; both having a tendency to swing the train towards the crane.

But one instruction was asked by and given for plaintiff, and to this defendant excepted. For defendant the court gave instructions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, and 8, but refused to give defendant's instructions Nos. 4 and 5, and defendant excepted. Plaintiff's instruction is in the words and figures following: "The jury are hereby instructed that if they believe, from the evidence in this case, that the decedent, C. Swain, at the time that he was struck by the piece of the arm of defendant's mail crane, was on the highway leading from a point called 'Douglas Landing' to another point on the Murrayville road, then at the time said Swain was so struck he cannot be considered or neld to have been a trespasser on defendant's premises." Defendant's instructions given: "No. 1. The jury are instructed that it is the duty of the plaintiff to make out his case by a preponderance of the evidence. No. 2. The jury are further instructed that negligence is the doing of something which, under the circumstances, a reasonable person would not do, or the omission to do something in discharge of a legal duty which, under the circumstances, a reasonable person would do, and which act of commission or omission, as a natural consequence directly following, produces damages to another. No. 3. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, C. Swain, was using the railroad track or its right of way as a foot path for his own convenience, and that he was not so using said track or right of way at a lawful crossing, and that the said C. Swain received his injury, while he was so using said track or right of way at a place other than a lawful crossing, by the breaking of a mail crane belonging to the Ohio River Railroad, that the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, unless they believe, from the evidence, that the defendant was guilty of wanton or gross negligence." "No. 6. The jury are further instructed that the defendant is not responsible for the negligence of the postal clerks on its postal cars on its road. No. 7. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the breaking of the lower arm of the defendant's crane was caused by the failure of the postal clerk to properly adjust the mail catcher on the postal cars for the purpose of catching the mail sack, then the defendant is not liable, and they should find for the defendant. No. 8. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, C. Swain, was a person in the full possession of his senses of seeing and hearing, and also in the full possession of his mental faculties; and if they further believe, from the evidence, that at the time of the accident the said Swain knew that there was danger in standing about the mail crane; and if they further believe, from the evidence, that said mail crane, with the mail sack adjusted thereon, was in plain view, and seen by said Swain; and if they further believe, from the evidence, that the defendant knew that a train of cars was approaching, or would soon approach, the place where said crane was standing; and if they believe, from the evidence, said Swain knew the mail sack would be caught, or an attempt would be made to catch it, by the mail clerk on the train; and if they further believe, from the evidence, that said C. Swain visited the vicinity of said mail crane from curiosity, or for personal convenience, without any reasonable duty calling him there,—that in such case, even although they may believe, from the evidence, that at the time of the accident the deceased was standing in a public road, yet he was guilty of contributory negligence by so standing near a known place of danger, and the jury should find for the defendant." Defendant's instructions refused: "No. 4. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the death of C. Swain was caused by the breaking of the lower arm of the mail crane of the defendant; and that if they further believe, from the evidence, that the breaking of the crane was the result of the lower arm being too near to the upper arm,—that in such case the failure to construct such crane with the lower arm further from the upper arm, if it was a duty devolving upon the defendant to so construct, such failure to construct it is only an omission of duty, and, if it is such omission of duty, the plaintiff cannot recover, under the evidence in this case. No. 5. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, C. Swain, was at the time of his death on and about the defendant's platform and mail crane, not as a passenger, or upon any business connected with the railroad company, but merely there for his own convenience or curiosity, or for personal enjoyment, the defendant owed to him no active duty to look out for his protection; and hence, if he was killed by the breaking of a mail crane caused by a passing train, the plaintiff cannot recover on the theory that the defendant has been guilty of negligence by a failure to discharge towards him a legal duty."

The order of the county court of Jackson, as we have seen, permitted the railway company to construct, maintain, and operate the railroad across this public road on condition that, if they obstructed it, it should put the public road in as good condition at the crossing as it was before. But the road made by the company from the crossing down to the landing at the river was not accepted; but Mr. Peters, the road surveyor of the district, notified the parties making it that he objected to it at that place, and would not receive it; nor was it ever received or assented to by him or the county authorities; and after it washed away next to the river, in a few months thereafter, the road from the crossing turning to the right, and going down to the landing, was made by Mr. Hall, the landowner, with the sanction of the road surveyor, and has been worked and used and kept in order by the county as the public road ever since, which includes the time of the accident. By section 21, c. 43, Code, the surveyor may change any county road in his precinct with the consent of the owner of the land, and, "when any road is altered, the former road shall be discontinued to the extent of such alteration and no further, and the new one established." Code, § 32, c. 43. So that, if the road turning to the left from the crossing, and running to the river, had ever been a part of the Murrayville and Douglas Landing road, it had been changed by the road surveyor, and thereby discontinued, by the alteration; and the road turning to the right had been thereby established, and was the public road at the time of the accident. Yet the left-hand road was still used by horsemen and footmen, and where the young man stood when struck was on it, giving it a width of 30 feet, and was only 11 feet from the edge of the true public road,—the one turning to the right. Under this state of the evidence, the court cannot say that plaintiff's instruction should have been refused as being abstract, and wholly without evidence on the point; for the two roads coincide at the crossing, and coincide in part opposite where the decedent was standing.

Second error assigned by plaintiff: In admitting the parol evidence of Dr. Davis and others to prove that deceased was in the public road at the time of the accident. It is true that mere user of a road will not make it a public road, under Code, § 31, c. 43. The user must be accompanied either by an order of the county court recognizing it in some way as a road, or the road must be worked by the road surveyor as such. Still, there was an attempt in this case to show a recognition in both these ways; and I do not think it was error to permit witnesses to testify that it was made by the construction company as a substituted part of a public road, and was used by the public as such for some time.

Third error assigned by plaintiff: In permitting the witnesses D. R. King and others to testify from the plat, Exhibit A, with the record. This was a map or diagram of the place of the accident, showing the relative positions of the railway mail crane, roads, and crossing, and the place where the accident happened, where the young man stood. Though ex parte, it was shown to be correct by a witness who made it, and must have been useful for the understanding of the testimony, and almost indispensable to many of the witnesses in making their testimony readily intelligible to the court and jury. It was used by the witness who made it, in order to explain and apply his own testimony, and make it capable of being understood. It was not offered or used as independent evidence, but for this purpose, and no other. Such use is common in practice, and clearly legitimate. Curtiss v. Ayrault, 3 Hun, 487; Brown v. Tile Co., 132 Ill. 649, 24 N. E. 522. "It was received for the consideration of the jury, so far as it was shown to be correct, in connection with other evidence, and to enable them to understand and apply it, and not as independent evidence." See, also, Hoge v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 562-564, 14 S. E. 152. It is one of the appropriate methods of bringing before the eye of the jury a representation of the things and scenes in which the fact took place, and as an aid in understanding and applying the evidence. See 1 Greenl. Ev. (15th Ed.) § 82, note.

Fourth error assigned by plaintiff: In admitting illegal evidence, and excluding competent evidence, against the objections of defendant, "as noted in the transcript of the evidence." Under section 9, c. 131, all the evidence, and not the facts, is certified. The transcript of the evidence is voluminous, and it shows many exceptions "noted" to evidence during the progress of the trial; but no bill of exceptions was taken to such rulings, and the exceptions are therefore taken as waived. It would involve great labor, indeed, to go over a verbatim report of all the evidence as given in, and pick out and consider all exceptions "noted" to questions asked and answers given, permitted, or overruled. The law does not contemplate so easy and compendious a mode of bringing up for review all such rulings of the lower court, nor one so general and indefinite in specification, and involving so much labor on the part of the appellate court. See Gregory's Adm'r v. Railway Co., (W. Va.) 16 S. E. 819. It must in some way be so set out as to be capable of being easily found and identified.

I have already given the main facts of the case with some fullness of detail, and, because the plaintiff comes to us with a verdict in his favor, from his evidence alone, except where the defendant's evidence is not contradicted. On one point,—a vital one, as the counsel regard it,—where did decedent stand with reference to a public road when killed? there is perhaps some evidence tending in a very slight degree to prove the plaintiff's claim in that respect. So, at least, I have regarded it. The principles and rules of law to be applied are involved in the question, did the railway company owe to decedent any duty of which the violation by the company was the direct and immediate cause of his death, and what points of law, with reference to the rulings complained of, spring up out of the application to the facts of such principles and rules? The principles may be said to be few and simple, (the common principles of right and wrong, public policy, and general convenience of that day;) but the rules based upon them, and formed by generalizing, more or less, the points decided in the very many cases, are quite numerous and complex. These rulings relate to the instructions asked by defendant, and refused; its motion for a verdict on plaintiff's evidence, and for a new trial, both overruled. These, as far as may be, will be considered together.

The postal clerk who made the catch from the running train was in the service of the United States government; was not in the employ of defendant. He was not the servant or agent of the company; not hired or paid by them, nor subject to their control. A postal clerk is not an employe of the railroad company, (Mellor v. Railroad Co., [Mo. Sup.] 14 S. W. 759;) and a railroad company is not responsible for the negligent acts of postal clerks or agents upon its trains, (Muster v. Railway Co., 61 Wis. 325, 21 N. W. 223,) except under circumstances which need not now be discussed, (see Snow v. Railroad Co., 136 Mass. 552;) and the reason is, the postal clerk is neither the servant nor the agent of the railway company; had nothing to do with his selection or employment, have over him no supervision or control, and have no power to discharge him; so in no sense could his act be said to be the act of the company. The decedent was a voluntary licensee, one without invitation, standing on the side of the defendant's right of way as a trespasser or licensee, for some purpose of his own,—most likely to see the catch made by the passing mail train, or to wait for his companion to get the sack thrown off; evidently not as a servant of the company, for he was in no wise in their service; not as an expectant passenger, for the train did not stop; not to get the sack, for he had nothing to do with the post-office or mail business; not as using the county road for any purpose, for he was not in it, and had not been using it there that day, and the place to get his mail for which he was waiting, and his direction of travel, was on the other side,—the post-office, 180 feet away; not as a mere trespasser, unless in a technical sense, for it is fair to infer that he was there with the tacit consent of the company, though it does not appear that it was with their knowledge. In Woolwine's Adm'r v. Railway Co., 36 W. Va. 329, 15 S. E. 81, it was held that such a licensee subjects himself to the risks and perils incident to the place he is in as such licensee, and that no duty is imposed upon the owner or occupant to keep the premises in safe and suitable condition for such person; and the owner is only liable for such willful or wanton injury as may be done to the licensee by the gross negligence of the railroad company, its agents or employees. Was there gross negligence on the part of the company in this case? For such contention there is no foundation that I can see, unless the mail crane was of such a character as to be a common nuisance to those using, or waiting to use, the highway at the crossing. We have already seen that such was not his business there. He was not in the road at the time, had not used it, and the only evidence—that of his companion—shows that they stepped back there 15 feet from the mail crane, to what was evidently supposed to be a safe place, to see the mail train go by, and, we may reasonably infer, to see the catch made of the mail pouch. But, from this evidence, can we fairly say that the mail crane, which it was the duty of the company to put up properly and keep in repair, was a common nuisance? Gross negligence having been branded as an unmeaning, vituperative epithet, the modern tendency is to discard its use, and treat everything under the head of ordinary care, and its correlative, simple negligence. But it would be remarkable to find a few simple and useful gradations in almost all things, and yet none in negligence. It may not be generally useful in practice in the present day; but that is because of the multiplicity of the degrees of negligence, and the unevenness of the grades and subdivisions, and not because there is no such thing as gross negligence. Railway Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489; Railway Co. v. McDaniels, 107 U. S. 454, 2 Sup. Ct. 932. To say that it is but the violation of the duty of ordinary care required in the case is but putting two things of different degrees in one class, by using "ordinary care" as a generic term; and the term "ordinary care" has still to be graded and divided by the jury by the conduct of the prudent man under the circumstances, putting themselves in his place, and measuring what is required of him by such circumstances, before it can be applied. Thus supplemented by a sliding scale, and thus made adaptable to measuring in such practical, but indefinite, way, the care required, it is found, no doubt, to be more useful and convenient in the vast majority of modern cases. Nevertheless, this broad and simple classification is, with us, still regarded as useful and convenient in two or more classes of cases. The terms "utmost care" and "slightest negligence," "slight care" and "gross negligence," are still applied, especially in two classes of cases: The former, to common carriers of passengers, as in Farish v. Reigle, 11 Grat. 697, (decided in 1854, 40 years ago;) Railroad Co. v. Sanger, 15 Grat. 230,—both still leading authorities with us. In this class of cases the common carrier owes to the passenger the duty of exercising more than ordinary—the utmost—care. The latter, to voluntary licensees and trespassers. Woolwine's Adm'r v. Railway Co., 36 W. Va. 329, 15 S. E. 81; Spicer v. Railway Co., 34 W. Va. 514, 12 S. E. 553. In this class of cases the owner and occupant does not owe the duty of exercising ordinary care; but slight care, so as not to cause wanton injury, and thereby be guilty of gross negligence, discharges the only duty he owes. Where one is liable for the slightest negligence,—for example, to a passenger,—he must take the greatest care. He will be liable for such injury from negligence as the most thorough and conscientious diligence could not have foreseen and prevented. Carrico v. Railway Co., 35 W. Va. 389–390, 14 S. E. 12. When one inflicts upon a voluntary licensee a wanton, reckless, heedless injury, he is guilty of gross negligence, and is liable. See Woolwine's Adm'r v. Railway Co., above. A mere sightseer, on no other business, goes into any one of the large modern factories in operation throughout the civilized world. It requires great care and watchfulness on his part, unfamiliar as he is with such places and things, to avoid danger and escape injury, although the place is reasonably safe and fit, and everything is carried on with due ordinary care; but unless there is wanton injury, the result of gross negligence, the owner is not liable. Why? The owner has set no trap for him; he did not induce, but only permitted, him to come; he is not there on business; the place and appliances belong to the manufacturing company; it was fixed for them and their employees; it suits them; by their knowledge and skill they avoid danger, though to those unskilled and unfamiliar it may be dangerous,—dangerous to any one in fact; but it was not made for, and is not carried on for, any purpose with which the licensee has anything to do; if the injury is not wanton, the negligence is not gross, and the company is not liable, for it owed him no other duty, and that one has not been violated. As appears by the event, a step or two further to the right would have put this unfortunate young man in the highway, and, as it happened, out of harm's way. But I do not see how he can be charged with contributory negligence, except in a very technical or artificial sense. No one would have been likely to anticipate or foresee the danger. He merely assumed the risk, whatever it might be. The risk, perhaps, was not less of his being struck by lightning at that place during a thunder storm; so that I do not see how it can be said that he was guilty of contributory negligence in any proper, or at least natural, sense. If he had been a traveler at that place, just a step or two on the company's right of way, and off the public road, and perhaps a technical trespasser, but a traveler, waiting to cross the track at the crossing, I am not prepared to say that the company would not have been liable, because they would then have owed him the duty of ordinary care. See Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 254; Sanders v. Reister, 1 Dak. 151, 46 N. W. 680; Murray v. McShane, 52 Md. 217. Or if he had been in the highway, where he had a right to be, without business, at a safe distance from the passing train, and the mail crane was so imperfect and dangerous as to be a common nuisance, being so close to the public road, then they would be guilty of gross negligence, and liable; but in our view this case is neither of these. Besides, it may be said that there was in this case an intermediate efficient cause of the injury between it and the having there the imperfect, and in some degree dangerous, mail crane.

Did this mail crane unlawfully obstruct or render dangerous this highway and crossing to the extent of making it a nuisance? The only description made of it, and criticism made upon it, on the part of plaintiff's witnesses, is made by Mr. Vosburg, evidently a correct and very intelligent man, a civil engineer by profession, who was on the ground, and examined and made his measurements 13 months after the accident happened, who says, in constructing cranes: "I have no experience at all." "What do you know about them?" "Not anything at all." He had observed others, but this was the only one he ever measured or directed his attention to particularly. That you could not change the distance between the arms, and keep them parallel, without changing the length of the mail pouch. The post-office department made the specifications for both sacks and arms, and furnished the pouches and the catcher. That if the sack is changed, and made longer, the outer end of the lower arm must be lowered, and the fastened end ought to be. In answer to the question, "Is it possible for the mail clerk to make these catches in the condition in which you found it?" answered, "Possibly; yes, sir; because the evidence is that he made them for a long time while in that condition." And the evidence on the side of defendant on this point is that, with ordinary skill,—and it took but little,—the catcher can be raised parallel with the floor of the car, with the rod that runs between the doors from side to side; that, when brought to about that position, there is no danger of striking either the lower or upper arm of the mail crane, but, if the mail clerk should delay elevating this catcher into proper position until he was too near the crane, then he would be liable to strike the lower arm in putting it into position. For diagram of mail crane, see Postal Laws and Regulations 1887. By change in length of mail pouches, we may infer the lower arm was dropped at the outer end about 13 inches out of a line parallel with the upper arm; and this made the striking of the lower arm with the catcher possible. I do not think this crane could be pronounced a nuisance; but, if it were such, the decedent was not in the highway, but on the defendant's right of way,—a place he selected with his eyes open, with all his faculties unimpaired and in full play, for the purpose of seeing the catch made, or for some purpose of like kind.

Defendant's Assignments of Error Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9. Exception No. 7, to the giving of plaintiff's one instruction, has already been considered. It cannot be said that there was absolutely no evidence tending in any appreciable degree to show that the decedent was not a trespasser or voluntary licensee on defendant's premises; for he was standing in a place that had once been dug and used as a road, though afterwards altered by the road surveyor, and thus discontinued. For a still stronger reason, defendant's motion to direct the jury to return a verdict for defendant was properly overruled. Where the party is guaranteed the right of trial by jury, especially in cases of negligence, which are, for the most part, peculiarly cases of fact, and therefore such cases are peculiarly within the province of the jury, such direction is only proper in a few cases so plain that there is no room for two opinions. It stands on ground wholly distinct from a motion for a new trial; though the latter, in one of its reasons, often comprehends the former,—as where the case is wholly without evidence as to some essential fact. It saves time, trouble, and expense, is sometimes all that can be said in its favor. But here the defendant waived this exception by going on with his case. If he intends to save it, he must submit his case to court or jury without further evidence. He (the defendant) has appealed to the court to end the case, as matter of law, then and there, for defect of proof. He can go to the jury at that stage, his motion being overruled, or he can waive his exception, and go on with the case, take his chance before the jury, and, if losing, move for a new trial, which is more comprehensive; but is not permitted to take all these chances, and, in addition, skip his own evidence, which may have supplied the defect in plaintiff's case, put himself back where plaintiff rested, and he made his motion as if he had taken the hazard of submitting his case at that point. The six instructions given for defendant he cannot complain of, and they need not be considered, except as to any bearing they may have upon the question of the refusal of instructions Nos. 4 and 5. As a general rule, it may be affirmed that omissions, unless when involving the nonperformance or malperformance of a positive duty, are not the subject of suit. Whart. Neg. § 82. But otherwise, when the omission is the defect in the discharge of a legal duty; for it is of the essence of negligence to omit to do something that ought to be done. Id. § 83. Instruction No. 4 was properly refused. If the negligence of the defendant in failing to construct a proper crane was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, and it owed the decedent the duty to see that it was a safe appliance, it is of no consequence whether it be omission or commission. See Harriman v. Railway Co., 45 Ohio St. 11, 12 N. E. 451, and other cases cited; Beach Contrib. Neg. § 25, note 2. It depends on the question whether defendant owed decedent any duty or not, under the circumstances; and although the thing complained of may help to determine that question by reason of its nature, as that it was an omission, yet that does not furnish the true criterion of liability, and the plaintiff might still be entitled "to recover under the evidence in this case." No hypothetical state of facts being stated, this instruction treats the question of negligence as a question of law, to be determined by the court "under the evidence in the case," or as a question of law and fact, to be thus determined by the court, and for that reason also is bad. Plaintiff's instruction No. 5 was also properly refused. While apparently putting the fact of decedent being on or about defendant's platform and mail crane as the hypothetical fact, inter alia, out of which the court is to tell the jury the given legal point arises, such fact is really assumed; and the fact that he was not there as a passenger, etc., but for his own curiosity, etc., is the real hypothetical fact of the instruction. "About defendant's platform and mail crane?" Where is that? The counsel on both sides have made a difference of 10 or 12 feet in the location of the county road, near and about the platform and mail crane, the crucial point in the case; and both locations are equally comprehended in the fact assumed by the court, and may be said to be the one controverted fact. In such a case, "around and about" is also too indefinite. If the instruction was intended to raise the point that it made no difference whether the place where the young man stood was on the company's right of way, and not in the county road, or in the county road, and not on the right of way, then it is obscure and confusing, and should have been framed differently. Mayor, etc., v. Poultney, 25 Md. 34; Railway Co. v. Snyder, 24 Ohio St. 678. See, also, Morse v. Gilman, 18 Wis. 385; Hughes v. Monty, 24 Iowa, 501,—all cited to sections 466, 467, Wells, Law & F. And an indirect assumption of this fact, as in this case, is condemned on the same principle; for it also throws the weight of the case upon a part of the evidence or facts, instead of putting it upon all. See Wells, Law & F. § 477; Roots v. Tyner, 10 Ind. 87, cited. These things being believed from the evidence, the jury is told the defendant owed decedent no active duty to look out for his protection. Then it adds, "And hence, if he was killed by the breaking of a mail crane caused by a passing train, the plaintiff cannot recover on the theory that the defendant has been guilty of negligence by a failure to discharge towards him a legal duty." I think the instruction, as a whole, calculated to confuse and mislead the jury, and, if not argumentative, it suggests the implication that plaintiff may be entitled to recover on some other ground than that of being guilty of negligence. It also involves the question of active duty, which has already been considered. The defendant might be liable for an injury to one traveling in a highway, directly caused by a nuisance close by, without reference to the character of the duty, whether active or passive. He may put up some structure so near as to render the lawful use of the public road dangerous. He, it may be said in the first place, owed the passive duty not to put it up, and when he put it up he violated that duty by an act of commission. Second. Being up, he owed the active duty to look out for and guard against the party's injury from such nuisance. Besides, instructions No. 3 and No. 8 covered the same state of facts in all material points, and were given, being based on the law as laid down in Spicer v. Railway Co., 34 W. Va. 514, 12 S. E. 553. I regard this case as ruled by the law as laid down in the case of Woolwine's Adm'r v. Railway Co., 36 W. Va. 329, 15 S. E. 81, and the case, just cited, of Spicer v. Railway Co., and do not think it can be distinguished as to the controlling elements of law and fact, or withdrawn from their decisive influence.

I need scarcely add, from what has already been said, that the facts, taken at their strongest, according to the rules in such cases, do not justify the verdict. The evidence of plaintiff, taking it all as true, with all fair and reasonable inferences, together with the uncontradicted evidence of defendant, proves nothing from which the jury could reasonably infer that defendant had violated any duty which it owed to plaintiff's intestate, or was guilty of any negligence for which plaintiff is entitled to recover, but is plainly insufficient to warrant such finding. The verdict is against the law of the case upon the facts proved, and must therefore be set aside. Judgment and verdict set aside, and new trial awarded. Reversed and remanded.

On Rehearing.

This unfortunate young man, when so unexpectedly struck by the sliver from the lower arm of the mail crane, was standing 15 feet from, and back of, the upright supporting the arms, and not in any road, but on the land or right of way of defendant. The left-hand road running from the railroad crossing to the landing on the Ohio river was made by the construction company, was not only not received or adopted as a part of the county road by the road surveyor, but, on the contrary, was expressly refused and repudiated, and soon after was washed away at the river. The landowner, by the sanction and direction of the road surveyor, made what is called the "right-hand" road, which was adopted and worked as the only road leading from the crossing to the river in existence at the time of the accident; and in this he was not standing, but on the land of the defendant. He was not there on the invitation of defendant, or on business of any kind with it; not to become a passenger, for the train did not stop; and he was not in defendant's employ. He was there simply as a looker-on, to see the mail train go by, and the mail agent make the flying catch of the mail pouch. Therefore he was a mere trespasser, or, at best, a voluntary licensee. The company made no change to endanger him after he came. It owed him no duty that was violated. For although, in the present attitude of the case, I take for granted that the mail crane was not of the best construction, but must have been in some respect defective, yet it was not a public nuisance; for it had been frequently used with safety, and successfully, both before and immediately after this accident, without harm or danger to any one, unless it was dangerous to the one using it. It was a case in which the unexpected happened, and its liability to happen could not be foreseen, and is only proved by the actual happening (see Richards v. Rough, 53 Mich. 212, 18 N. W. 785; Sjogren v. Hall, 53 Mich. 274, 18 N. W. 812; Cooley, Torts, 92, note 1.), and therefore a case of damage without injury; at least, so far as defendant is concerned. Moreover, the one who made the catch, knocking the sliver off the lower arm of the mail crane, was the mail agent of the United States government, not in the employ or subject to the orders or under the control of defendant, and, if there was any negligence at all, it was his intervening and breaking the usual connection; for, in law, it is not the remote, but the proximate, cause which is looked to and regarded as the real cause. See Washington v. Railroad Co., 17 W. Va. 190. That these are the facts as they indisputably appear in this record, there is, in my opinion, no sort of doubt, and, from the application of the appropriate principles and well-settled rules of law, it is equally clear that the defendant did not appear to be liable, and a new trial should have been granted; for it has long been as much the duty of the court, in certain cases, to set verdicts aside, as it is the duty, in general, of juries to find them. Verdicts like this include legal propositions, as well as propositions of fact, and the power must reside somewhere to grant new trials; for it is absolutely essential to justice that there should, on many occasions, be opportunities of reconsidering the cause by a new trial. See Bright v. Eynon, (1757) 1 Burrows, 391, 394. Here the verdict is against the law of the case upon the facts proved, and is therefore set aside, and a new trial awarded.

PELZER MANUF'G CO. v. CELY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 22, 1894.)

APPELLATE COURT—WHEN JURISDICTION ATTACHES—FILING RETURN—RIGHT TO LEVY EXECUTION—EFFECT OF APPEAL.

1. The jurisdiction of the supreme court on appeal from the circuit court does not attach till the return is filed, as required by rules 1 and 2; and a judgment, an execution, and a levy in the circuit court after appeal, but before the return is filed, are not void for want of jurisdiction, since the circuit court does not lose its jurisdiction till that of the supreme court attaches.

2. A judgment obtained on a money demand is one "directing the payment of money," within Code, § 346, providing that "a notice of appeal from a judgment directing the payment of money shall not stay the execution of the judgment, unless" a stay of execution is granted.

Action by the Pelzer Manufacturing Company against Cely & Bro. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants move to set aside the judgment, an execution issued thereon, and a levy made thereunder. Denied.

Perry & Hayward, for plaintiff. H. J. Haynsworth and A. M. Lee, for defendants.

McIVER, C. J. This is a motion addressed to this court under a notice duly served, of which the following is a copy: "Take notice that upon the affidavit hereto attached, and all the pleadings and proceedings in the above-entitled cause, we shall move the above-mentioned court at Columbia, S. C., on Wednesday, the 17th day of January instant, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, for an order vacating and setting aside the judgment entered in the above-entitled cause, the execution issued thereon, and the levy made thereunder, upon the ground that said judgment, execution, and levy are void, the circuit court having been deprived, by this appeal, of all jurisdiction in the cause." It appears from the showing made at the hearing of this motion that the judgment appealed from was duly entered in the proper office on the 15th day of December, 1893, and on the same day execution was issued to enforce said judgment, which was lodged in the office of the sheriff on the said 15th of December, 1893. On the same day, notice of intention to appeal was served on Mr. Haynsworth (one of the attorneys of plaintiff,) but, as appears from the uncontradicted affidavit of Mr. Haynsworth, two or three hours after he had filed the judgment in the clerk's office, and after he had left the execution in the office, with instructions to sign, seal, and deliver the same to the sheriff. It furthermore appears that on or about the 30th day of December, 1893, the plaintiff executed the bond to the defendants, with two good sureties, provided for by section 346 of the Code, to enable the plaintiff to enforce a sale of property, which being satisfactory to the sheriff, that officer thereafter, to wit, on the 3d day of January, 1894, levied upon the stock of goods of the defendants, and took the same into his custody and possession. It also appears that in due time, to wit, on the 13th day of January, 1894, the appellants served their proposed "case" and exceptions, and on the 16th of January, 1894, duly filed the return required by rules 1 and 2 of this court. It will be observed that this is not a motion for a stay of proceedings in the court below, pending an appeal under the provisions of section 349 of the Code; nor does it appear that any such application has been made to either of the justices of this court, under rule 21 of the supreme court; nor does it appear that any application has been made to the presiding judge before whom the judgment was obtained for a stay of execution; but, on the contrary, as it is explicitly stated in the notice of the motion, (for which reason we have deemed it proper to set out such notice in haec verba.) it is an application for an order "vacating and setting aside the judgment entered in the above-entitled cause, the execution issued thereon, and the levy made thereunder, upon the ground that said judgment, execution, and levy are void, the circuit court having been deprived, by this appeal, of all jurisdiction in the cause." So that the only question presented by this motion is whether the circuit court had lost its jurisdiction of the cause at the time when the judgment was entered, the execution issued, or the levy made. As we understand it, the circuit court, having once acquired jurisdiction of a cause and the parties thereto, retains such jurisdiction until it is lost; and it is not lost until the jurisdiction of this court attaches. Now, as it has always been held that the jurisdiction of this court does not attach until the return required by rules 1 and 2 has been filed in this court, for the obvious reason that, until the return is filed, this court has no record upon which it could take jurisdiction of any cause, except such as are specially provided for either by the constitution, the statutes, or rules of court, and as it is very clear that the present case does not fall within any of those classes, it follows necessarily that this court never acquired jurisdiction of this cause until after the return was filed; and, this being after the judgment was entered, and after the execution was issued and the levy made, the motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, execution, and levy, as void for lack of jurisdiction in the circuit court, cannot be granted.

While this view is decisive of the question presented for our determination, yet it may not be amiss to decide also the other question which seems to have been mainly argued at the bar, as to the proper construction of section 346 of the Code. That section, or so much thereof as we deem it necessary to quote, provides: "A notice of appeal from a judgment directing the payment of money shall not stay the execution of the judgment, unless the presiding judge before whom the judgment was obtained shall grant a stay of execution;" and, after going on to provide that after notice of appeal the plaintiff shall not enforce a sale of property without giving the prescribed bond, the section proceeds in the following language: "Nor shall the plaintiff in such case be allowed to proceed with a sale of defendant's property, if the defendant do enter into an undertaking," etc., as prescribed. On the part of the appellants it is contended that this section does not apply to judgments obtained on money demands, but applies only to a judgment directing the payment of money; and great, and, as we think, undue, stress is laid upon the word "directing." We do not think that such a view can be sustained. If a judgment for the recovery of so much money on an ordinary money demand cannot be regarded as a judgment directing the payment of money, then it is somewhat difficult to understand what it does amount to. It unquestionably does require the payment of the amount of money adjudged to be due by the one party to the other, and the word "directing" amounts to neither more nor less than the word "requiring." When a tribunal invested with the power to enforce its mandates directs, by its judgment, the payment of money, it is equivalent to saying that it requires the payment of such money, and in this connection the two words may be used interchangeably. It is also to be observed that the language used is, not an appeal from an "order," a word which would be much more appropriate if appellants' view be correct, but an appeal from a "judgment" directing the payment of money. The word "judgment" has a well-defined meaning: "A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in the action," (Code, § 286;) and, when a judgment on an ordinary money demand is rendered, it determines that the payment of so much money shall be made by the defendant to the plaintiff,—it amounts to a direction to that effect. But, in addition to this, the subsequent language used in the same section serves to show that the construction which we have adopted is correct. It uses the words "stay of execution," "shall not enforce a sale of property;" the provision contemplating the giving of the bonds provided for both fixes the amount of such bonds at double the amount of the judgment, and the provision that the bond to be given shall be conditioned to pay the judgment. All this shows that the legislature intended to embrace, in the provisions of that section, judgments recovered upon ordinary money demands. Again, if the view contended for by appellants should be adopted, the extraordinary anomaly would be presented that the legislature, while providing that a mere notice of appeal shall not operate as a stay of execution unless the required bond shall be given, in the several cases mentioned in sections 350, 351, and 352, leaves, without any such protection, the large, if not the largest, class of judgments, in which, in most cases, such protection is most needed. Now, while this result would not be sufficient to support the construction which we have adopted, if the language used plainly required a different construction, yet, where the language admits of two constructions, that which is most consistent with justice, and with what may be assumed to be the true intention of the legislature, should be adopted. But again, even if we could adopt the view contended for by appellant, that would not avail the appellants in this case, for that section only forbids a sale of defendant's property where he has not obtained a stay of execution from the presiding judge by whom the judgment was rendered; and in this case it does not appear that any attempt has yet been made to enforce a sale of defendants' property. While it may be possible (though we do not think so) that the legislature intended to forbid a sale of property after a notice of appeal has been given, it is quite clear that there is no provision in section 346 forbidding the plaintiff acquiring a lien by a levy. And there would be good reason for such a distinction; for while the legislature might possibly have thought it best to allow a sale of the defendant's property after a notice of appeal had been given, unless the plaintiff would, by giving the bond required, protect the defendant from the hazards of loss by a sale, yet there would be no reason for depriving the plaintiff of the benefit of the prior lien which he was entitled to by reason of his superior diligence; and such lien he could only acquire, on personal property, by a levy. In any view which we have been able to take of this case, we do not think that the appellants are entitled to the order asked for. It is therefore adjudged that the motion be refused.

McGOWAN and POPE, JJ., concur.

WILSON v. CITY COUNCIL OF FLORENCE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 18, 1893.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ISSUE OF BONDS—VOTE BY PROPERTY—INJUNCTION.

A city will not be restrained from issuing bonds; where there has been a majority vote therefor, one vote being allowed for every $100 of taxed property, including that of corporations and estates; its charter (Act Dec. 24, 1890) declaring the right to issue bonds to be in a majority vote of the city, a person to have one vote for every $100 worth of property on which he pays taxes.

Petition by John Wilson against the city council of Florence to restrain an issue of bonds. Injunction denied.

The petition and return were as follows:

Petition: "The petition of John Wilson respectfully shows to this honorable court (1) that the city council of the city of Florence are about to issue twenty-five thousand dollars of the bonds of the corporation, and will do so unless restrained therefrom; (2) that heretofore the said city council undertook to issue said bonds, claiming the right to do so by virtue of an election held for that purpose, and were restrained therefrom by this court, which restraining order is still of force; (3) that on the 2d day of August, 1893, after said restraining order was issued, the said city council held another election to determine the issue of said bonds, and are about to issue said bonds by virtue of the result of said election; (4) that said city council allowed the board of managers of the said election to receive the votes of corporations by their president or agents authorized for that purpose, and the votes of estates held in trust by the trustees of such estates, and thereby obtained a majority vote of the taxable property of said city. Wherefore your petitioner prays that an injunction be issued by this court, restraining the city council of Florence from issuing the bonds of the corporation in the said sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, and such other and further relief be granted as to this court should seem just and proper, and your petitioner will ever pray, etc.”

Return: “The relator herein, the city council of Florence, through its attorney, W. W. Harlee, making return to a rule issued by this court, dated November 29th, 1893, requiring said city council to show cause before this court at 11 o'clock on Monday, the 4th day of December, A. D. 1893, why an injunction should not issue restraining said council from issuing the bonds of the corporation in the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, shows for cause: (1) That by resolution of said city council adopted at a meeting held on the 20th day of July, A. D. 1893, the mayor of said city was authorized to order an election to determine the issue of said bonds, a copy thereof being hereto attached as part of this return, marked ‘Exhibit A,’ and, pursuant to such resolution, an election was ordered to be held on the second day of August, A. D. 1893, for such purpose, due notice of which was given by publication in the Florence Times and the Messenger, such notice stating the object of the election, the time of opening and closing, the place, and such persons as were allowed to vote, complying strictly with the act incorporating said city. (2) That said election was held on said day in the city of Florence, by J. B. Douglas, J. E. Schouboe, and Robert Bowler, three managers, duly appointed and sworn in by the city clerk before entering upon the performance of their duty, as appears by the city clerk’s certificate, a copy of which is hereto attached as part of this return, and marked ‘Exhibit B.’ (3) That before said board of managers entered upon said election they were furnished by the city clerk with a list of the property holders of said city whose names were upon said books, who have returned and paid taxes on one hundred dollars or upward for the year 1892, together with the amount owned by each; also, the total taxable property of the said city, as appears by the certificate of said clerk, a copy of which is hereto attached, and marked ‘Exhibit C,’ as part of this return. (4) That an election was duly held in pursuance to the published notice for that purpose on the said day, commencing and closing at the times specified, and held at the place designated, and a vote of 5,804 was polled in favor of issuing said bonds, no vote being polled against it, representing $580,400.00 worth of property, one vote representing, in each case, one hundred dollars, as appeared from the city tax books at that time, the total taxable property of said city aggregating the sum of $1,098,072,—less than double the amount voted in favor of issuing said bonds,—as appears by the return of said board of managers duly certified, a copy of which is hereto attached as part of this return, and marked ‘Exhibit D.’ (5) That upon the result the city council are about to issue the said bonds, and will do so unless restrained by this court, or some other of competent jurisdiction. (6) That the relator admits the allegations contained in paragraph one, (1,) (3,) three, and (4,) four, and all of (2) two except so much as alleges that the former order of this court is binding on the city council as to the action taken subsequent to date of said order of the petition; but avers, in reply thereto, that no agent or president of any corporation in said city voted except as duly authorized by the board of directors of said corporations, and requested to vote thereon, with full instructions how to vote, as the relator is informed and believes, and alleges such information to be true. (7) That it is respectfully submitted that said corporations and trustees are taxpayers, and are therefore, under said act approved 24 December, A. D. 1890, incorporating the city of Florence, on page 860, Statutes at Large, entitled to express either assent or dissent as to a burden being placed on their property. Wherefore your relators pray that said application be refused, and petition dismissed, with such other relief as to the court shall seem meet and proper. W. W. Harlee, Relator’s Attorney.”

Exhibit A: “City of Florence, Council Chamber, 20th July, 1893. At a special meeting of the city council held this day, the following resolution was adopted: * * * ‘Resolved, that the mayor be authorized to order a new election for the issue of city bonds under the provisions of the ruling of the supreme court,’—which was accepted. * * * E. W. Lloyd, City Clerk. [City Seal.]”

Exhibit B: “Florence, S. C., Clerk’s Office, 1st August, 1893. I appoint J. B. Douglas, J. E. Schouboe, and Robert Bowler managers of an election to be held on August the 2d, 1893, to determine the issuing by city council $25,000 of the bonds of the corporation. [Signed] W. W. Hursey, Mayor. “I hereby certify that the above is a true copy of an order now on file in my office. 30th Nov., 1893. E. W. Lloyd, City Clerk. [City Seal.]”

Exhibit C: “Florence, S. C., November 29, 1893. Council Chamber. I, E. W. Lloyd, clerk of the city council of Florence, do hereby certify that on the morning of August the 2d, A. D. 1893, I furnished to J. B. Douglas, J. E. Schouboe, and Robert Bowler, managers of an election to be held on that day in said city to determine the issue of the bonds of the corporation in the sum of $25,000.00, a list taken from the tax books of said city of the entire property on the tax books, and the amount of each taxpayer; and that, as appeared by the tax books for that time, the taxable property of said city amounted to $1,098,072. E. W. Lloyd, City Clerk. [City Seal.]”

Exhibit D: “State of South Carolina, County of Florence. We, J. B. Douglas, J. E. Schouboe, and Robert Bowler, do hereby certify that on Tuesday, the first day of August, A. D. 1893, after being duly appointed as managers of an election to be held on Wednesday, the second day of August, we were duly sworn in by Capt. E. W. Lloyd, clerk of city council, for such office, and on said second day of August, 1893, we opened the polls for said election (which election was held for the purpose of determining the issue of $25,000 of the city's bonds by city council) at 6 o'clock A. M., and continued the same until 8 o'clock P. M., allowing each voter to cast one vote for each and every one hundred dollars' worth of property returned and paid taxes on for the year A. D. 1892, the ballots being printed to read as follows: 'Issue Bonds, Yes.' 'Issue Bonds, No.' That 5,804 votes were polled in favor of issuing said bonds, representing $580,400.00 property, and no votes polled against the issue of said bonds. That we were furnished by city clerk with the tax books for the year 1892, and find the taxable property of the city of Florence to be $1,098,072, including every kind of property of the said city. Necessary to make a majority vote, $549,037, (5,491;) and we therefore return to city council that a majority vote was cast in favor of issuing said bonds. August, A. D. 1893. [Signed] J. B. Douglas, J. E. Schouboe, Robt. Bowler, Managers."

J. P. McNeill, for petitioner. W. W. Harlee, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This is an application, made by the petitioner, who is a citizen and taxpayer of the city of Florence, addressed to this court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, praying that the city council of Florence may be enjoined and restrained from issuing bonds to the amount of $25,000 for the purpose of raising money for internal improvements in said city. The respondent made a return to the rule to show cause, setting forth fully the facts, which, as the return is not traversed, must be taken as true. These facts may be thus briefly summarized, (though both the petition and return should be incorporated in the report of this case), to wit: That, in pursuance of the powers conferred upon said city council by the charter of the city, an election was duly ordered and regularly held on the 2d day of August, 1893, to determine whether the bonds here in question should be issued; that at such election only those who were entitled by the charter to vote were permitted to do so; and that the result of the election, at which a majority of the qualified voters cast their votes, was in favor of the issue of said bonds, no votes having been cast against such issue. It is quite clear, therefore, that there is no ground for the injunction prayed for. It seems to have been supposed that because this court, in a previous action between these same parties for the same purpose, granted the injunction then asked for, (Wilson v. City Council, 17 S. E. 835,) the same result should follow in this case; but, by reference to the opinion of Mr. Justice McGOWAN, who, as the organ of the court, rendered the judgment in the former case, it will be seen that the judgment then rendered was based upon totally different facts from those presented in the present case, and which have arisen since the former decision. There the injunction was granted because the election then held was not conducted in the manner prescribed by the charter of the city, and hence the city council was not legally invested with the power to issue the bonds. But, since that decision was rendered, another election has been duly ordered, and conducted in conformity to the provisions of the charter, as construed by this court in the former decision, which resulted, as has been stated, in favor of the issue of said bonds, and hence the said city council is now fully invested with the power to issue said bonds. The judgment of this court is that the application for the injunction be dismissed.

TINSLEY et al. v. UNION COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 18, 1893.)

COUNTY BOARDS—DISALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—APPEAL.

1. On appeal from the board of county commissioners' disallowance of a claim, the circuit court may review the facts returned, (Code, § 368,) but its finding thereon is not reviewable.

2. Gen. St. § 623, providing that nothing in said section shall prevent a board from disallowing, as incorrect, any account, in whole or part, nor from requiring further evidence of its truth, does not require the board to hear other testimony, nor to apprise a claimant that other testimony on his claim is needed.

3. A board of commissioners is not required to hear claims as a court, fixing a day for hearing, with witnesses.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Union county; L. B. Fraser, Judge.

Appeal by Ira E. Tinsley and Robert S. Foster from a decision of the board of commissioners of Union county disallowing a claim against said county. Appeal dismissed, and claimants appeal. Affirmed.

D. A. Townsend, (Thos. S. Moorman, of counsel,) for appellants. William Munro, for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. There is some confusion in this case, and it will be necessary to make a short statement of facts: The action or proceeding is upon a claim for $100 against the county of Union for work and labor alleged to have been done by the plaintiffs on a certain highway of the county under a contract with the county commissioners. It appears, among other things, that on September 14, 1889, the plaintiffs presented to the board of county commissioners the claim of $100 "for work and labor on a highway near Supple Jack," which was considered by the board on the same day, and disallowed because, as stated, the contract made by them had not been complied with. On September 20th the plaintiffs sued upon the account in the court of common pleas, but the action was soon discontinued, and need not be again referred to. On October 7, 1889, the plaintiffs presented to the board of county commissioners, again, a claim, substantially for the same account, of $100, which had attached to it the following affidavit: "Ira E. Tinsley and Robert S. Foster, being duly sworn, say, each for himself, that they were employed by the county commissioners of Union county, to wit, James F. Norman, William Gallman, and Jasper Acock, in the year 1889, to perform certain work on the public highway leading from Union O. H. to Columbia; that the price agreed to be paid was one hundred dollars; that the work was performed according to contract, and was received after the inspection and examination by the said commissioners. [Signed only by one of the parties] R. S. Foster. Sworn to October 7, 1889. D. A. Townsend, N. P. We hereby apply for payment of the above account, on the affidavit hereto attached, and upon such other testimony as the board may desire to hear. We ask that the said claim be paid without delay, and, in case it be refused, that the cause of such refusal be stated in writing. [Signed] D. A. Townsend, Atty."

To this claim the county commissioners made the following objection: "State of South Carolina, Union county. Jasper M. Acock, James F. Norman, and William M. Gallman, being duly sworn, say, each for himself, that they have read the foregoing affidavit signed by R. S. Foster, dated October 7, 1889, and deny the statements therein contained to be correct, and deny that the county is indebted to said Tinsley and Foster, as alleged, in any amount. [Signed] W. M. Gallman. J. F. Norman. J. M. Acock. Sworn to Nov. 5, 1889." The following notice was served on Mr. Townsend, the attorney of the parties, on November 9, 1889: "Please take notice that the claim of Ira E. Tinsley and R. S. Foster for one hundred dollars has been disapproved." Whereupon, the plaintiffs appealed from the judgment to the circuit court: "(1) Because said board erred in deciding that the said county commissioners did not employ the plaintiffs to perform the work set forth in their claim herein; the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs in support thereof being amply sufficient, and no notice whatever having been served upon the plaintiffs of the introduction or consideration of any rebutting testimony or evidence of any kind, and there being no such rebutting testimony or evidence properly before said board for their consideration. (2) Because the said board erred in deciding that the said county commissioners did not promise to pay the plaintiffs one hundred dollars for said work; the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs being amply sufficient to sustain said promise, and no notice whatever having been served upon the plaintiffs of the introduction or consideration of any rebutting testimony or evidence of any kind, and there being no such rebutting testimony or evidence properly before said board for their consideration. (3) Because said board erred in deciding that the said county commissioners did not receive said work, after its completion, unconditionally; the evidence thereof introduced by the plaintiffs being amply sufficient to prove it, and no notice whatever having been served upon the plaintiffs of the introduction or consideration of any rebutting testimony or evidence of any kind whatever, and there being no such rebutting testimony or evidence properly before the board for consideration. (4) Because the plaintiffs having informed said board, in the application, that other and further testimony would be introduced if the said board should not deem the testimony or evidence introduced with the application sufficient, the said board erred in not apprising the plaintiffs of the necessity for the introduction by the plaintiffs of other testimony, in order to convince the said board that said claim should be allowed. (5) Because the said board erred in not hearing said case according to the usual custom of all other courts, and not fixing a day certain for the hearing of said case, on which the plaintiffs might appear before said board with their witnesses, and exercise their right of replying to any rebutting testimony or evidence introduced against said plaintiffs, or considered by said board against the plaintiffs. (6) Because said board erred in not deciding that the claim of the plaintiffs was a just and proper claim against said county, and that it should be paid," etc.

After this, some efforts seem to have been made by the county commissioners to have the case reheard, with all the parties present. But, as the matter was then on appeal to the circuit court, the plaintiffs objected; and we need not incur the case by setting out those ex parte proceedings, but consider only the proceedings by the commissioners on November 5th, and the appeal which was taken therefrom, as hereinbefore stated. The exceptions to the decision of the commissioners came up first before his honor, Judge Norton, who required the commissioners to make a return, which they did; including, however, a statement of the proceedings which took place after the appeal, but which, as before stated, do not touch the questions involved in the simple appeal. Under the order of Judge Norton the commissioners made a return of their proceedings and judgment rendered November 5, 1889, disallowing the claim for $100 filed by appellants, and stating all that occurred on that occasion, viz. November 5th. The case came up, on the exceptions herein stated, before Judge Fraser, who affirmed the judgment of the county commissioners and dismissed the appeal; and, as we understand it, the only questions before the circuit court (Judge Fraser) were the errors of law and of fact alleged in the grounds of appeal from the decision of the county commissioners. "On appeal from a decision of the county commissioners to the circuit court, the only questions before that court are the errors of law and of fact alleged in the grounds of appeal." Green v. Commissioners, 27 S. C. 9, 2 S. E. 618. It is therefore needless for this court to consider any of the various matters which occurred before or after November 5, 1889; the sole question before this court being whether the circuit judge committed any error of law in overruling any one of the exceptions taken by the plaintiffs to the judgment rendered by the county commissioners on November 5, 1889. This was what is known as a "county claim," of which the board of county commissioners has exclusive jurisdiction, subject to appeal to the circuit court. See Jennings v. Abbeville Co., 24 S. C. 543. Now, were there any errors of law or of fact committed by the circuit judge, as disclosed by the exceptions to the judgment of the commissioners?

Exceptions 1, 2, and 3, in different forms, complain that the proof was amply sufficient to establish the claim of the plaintiffs, and that it was error in Judge Fraser not to so hold. There are other matters stated in the exceptions, but, as far as the sufficiency of the testimony was concerned, it was a question of fact, and upon appeal was reviewable by the circuit judge. It will be observed that on the occasion in question (November 5th) the plaintiffs presented an account of $100 for work alleged to have been done by them on a certain highway under a contract with the county commissioners. The character of the work done was not stated, except simply the charge: "To work and labor on public highway near Supple Jack, $100." The only evidence offered by the plaintiffs was the affidavit of R. S. Foster, one of the plaintiffs. Mr. Townsend, attorney for plaintiffs, stated as follows: "We hereby apply for payment of the account on the affidavit annexed, and such other testimony as the board may desire to hear," etc. To this claim the commissioners made the following answer: All three of the commissioners—Gallman, Norman, and Acock—made an affidavit, each swearing for himself, that the affidavit of Mr. R. S. Foster, dated October 7, 1889, was not correct, and denying that the county was indebted to said Tinsley and Foster as alleged, or in any amount. And thereupon notice was served upon Mr. Townsend, the attorney of the plaintiffs, on November 9, 1889, "that the claim of Tinsley and Foster for $100 has been disallowed." In hearing the appeal, Judge Fraser, under section 368 of the Code, had the right to consider the facts as returned, which he did, but this court has no right to review and reverse his decision upon the facts.

Exception 4 alleges that Judge Fraser committed error of law, in this: "That the plaintiffs having informed the board, in their application, that other and further testimony would be introduced if the board should not deem the testimony or evidence introduced with the application sufficient, the said board erred in not apprising the plaintiffs of the necessity for the plaintiffs to introduce other testimony in order to convince the board that said claim should be allowed," etc. The ground of appeal states the matter of notice thus: "That other and further testimony would be introduced if the board should not deem the testimony sufficient. The said board erred in not apprising the plaintiffs of the necessity for the introduction by the plaintiffs of other testimony," etc. But the notice actually given was somewhat different, in these words, viz.: "On the affidavit annexed, and upon such other testimony as the board may desire to hear," etc. It seems that the members of the board made the contract, whatever it was, with the plaintiffs, and, having full knowledge as to what it was, they did "not desire" to hear other testimony. Was that error of law? We do not think so, but it was a matter of discretion with the commissioners. This identical question was decided in the case of Green v. Commissioners, supra, in which Chief Justice McIVER, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "But, assuming that it did appear that the board did not require such further evidence, we are unable to see that they committed error of law in not doing so. The statute does not require that the board should demand such further evidence. It is only permissive. The language of the proviso to section 623 of the General Statutes, relied on by the plaintiffs, is as follows: 'Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent any board from disallowing any account in whole or in part, where so rendered and verified, if it appears that the charges are incorrect, or that the services or disbursements have not in fact been made or rendered, nor from requiring any other or further evidence of the truth or propriety thereof. No allowance or payment beyond legal claim shall ever be allowed. And the board of county commissioners in any county may refuse to audit or allow any claim or demand whatsoever, unless made out and verified in the manner herein specified.' So that it is plain that the provision for requiring further evidence is permissive, and not mandatory; and, if the board neglect to require such further evidence, no error of law can be imputed to them on that account," etc. We see no error here.

Exception 5 complains that the said board "erred in not hearing said case according to the usual custom of all other courts, and not fixing a day certain for the hearing of said case, on which the plaintiffs might appear before said board with their witnesses, and exercising their rights of replying to rebutting testimony," etc. The board of county commissioners is comparatively a new tribunal, under our law, and the forms of procedure in it have never been clearly settled. "Some of the forms incident to a court have undoubtedly been conferred upon the county commissioners; but it would seem that they are regarded more as a 'board of audit.' They are not styled a 'court,' but a 'board.' Its members are called 'commissioners,' not 'judges.' It does not proceed according to the forms generally considered essential to a court, with parties before it as plaintiff and defendant, but in a summary way, without formal pleadings, evidence, or record. We do not think that the board of county commissioners is a court, in such sense that its record may be pleaded in bar as evidence of a former recovery in respect to a claim against a county allowed by the commissioners," etc. See County of Richland v. Miller, 16 S. C. 247. We see no error here.

The sixth exception is too general to be entitled to consideration.

We agree with his honor, Judge Fraser,—but for reasons other than those stated,—that there was no error of law, reviewable by this court, charged in the exceptions to the judgment of the county commissioners rendered on November 5, 1889. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

STATE v. LUCKER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—PRESENCE OF ACCUSED—TRIAL—CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. A person charged with a misdemeanor may be tried therefor in his absence.

2. The granting of a continuance is a matter within the discretion of the trial court.

3. A request, by counsel retained to prosecute an appeal, for time to except to the charge of the trial court, should be denied, where it appears that he has had five months in which to prepare his exceptions, and no reason is shown why he has failed to do so.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Berkeley county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

C. W. Lucker was convicted of a misdemeanor, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. S. Bissell, for appellant. W. St. Julien Jervy, for the State.

POPE, J. The defendant, (appellant,) C. W. Lucker, was tried for a misdemeanor at the June term, 1893, of the court of general sessions for Berkeley county, before Judge Izlar and a jury, and was found guilty, and sentenced to $2\frac{1}{2}$ years' imprisonment in the state penitentiary, or to pay a fine of \$500. He gave notice of appeal, upon the following grounds:

Because the defendant was tried in his absence, and could have presented a meritorious defense, had he been present, and that it was not through any fault of the defendant that he was not present, as will appear from the following affidavit: "The state of South Carolina, county of Berkeley. Personally appeared before me E. J. Dennis, who, being duly sworn, says that on Monday morning, June 5, 1893, while he was going to Mt. Pleasant Courthouse, from the ferry wharf, on the arrival of the 10 A. M. boat from Charleston, C. W. Lucker called him into his house, and told him that he desired the case of the State v. C. W. Lucker continued until the next term of court, because he, the said C. W. Lucker, was suffering from rheumatism in the foot, and his wife with neuralgia in the head; and the deponent further says that he promised to endeavor to put off the said case, and believed at the time that he could do so, and the said C. W. Lucker, at the said interview, assured the deponent that he had a witness or witnesses to prove where he got the plants planted in his field. Sworn to before me this — day of June, 1893. E. J. Dennis. Thos. S. Gaillard, [L. S.] Notary Public."

The offense for which the appellant was convicted was made a misdemeanor by an act of the general assembly passed in 1885. See 19 Stat. 140. Being a misdemeanor, it was legal to try the offender in his absence. The appellant, by his one ground of appeal, in effect, complains that the circuit judge erred in not granting a continuance of his case. This is a matter within the sound discretion of the circuit judge, and we have repeatedly declined to interfere with the exercise by him of this discretion. State v. Howard, 35 S. C. 197–200, 14 S. E. 481; Cantey v. Whitaker, 17 S. C. 527; State v. Dodson, 16 S. C. 459; McDaniel v. Stokes, 19 S. C. 61; Westfield v. Westfield, Id. 88; Symmes v. Symmes, Id. Besides, in the case, we do not find the fact that this affidavit was ever brought to the attention of the circuit judge at the trial.

We are also requested by the attorney for appellant to grant him time to except to the charge of the circuit judge. It seems he was retained by the appellant to conduct his appeal at some time in June, 1893. He has therefore enjoyed five months within which to make out his exceptions, and no reason is given why he has not been able to avail himself of all this time. We can see no merit in the application. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

HUNT et al. v. NOLEN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 27, 1893.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—PARTIES.

C. was a necessary party defendant to an action to foreclose a mortgage for the price of 200 acres of land, where he had actual possession of 30 acres under a title paramount to that of the mortgagor, but from the same common source, and his possession amounted to an eviction sufficient to entitle the mortgagor to claim damages for breach of warranty, and the mortgagor had tendered payment to the value of the rest of the land, and it was a question whether C. owned the 30 acres in fee, or owned a life estate in them, with ultimate reversion to the mortgagor.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action by Amanda C. Hunt and Marie Hunt against W. R. Nolen to foreclose a mortgage. From a decree for plaintiffs, cross appeals are taken. Modified and remanded.

Izlar, P. J., heard the cause on the master's third report and the exceptions thereto, and thereafter signed the following decree:

"This case was heard by me at the October term, 1892, court of common pleas for Spartanburg county, on the supplemental report of the master of said county, and the exceptions of the defendant thereto. To obtain a clear understanding of the questions presented by the exceptions, it is necessary to state, succinctly as possible, the facts leading up to the issues growing out of the supplemental report of the master. It appears that in July, 1889, the plaintiffs executed and delivered to the defendant their deed, whereby they undertook to convey to the defendant, in fee simple, a tract or parcel of land situated in said county, on the waters of Fair Forest creek, containing 200 acres, in consideration of four thousand five hundred dollars. The defendant paid two thousand five hundred dollars of the purchase price, cash, and executed his bond and mortgage to the plaintiffs, bearing date the 15th of July, 1889, to secure the credit portion of the purchase price. The credit part of the purchase, two thousand dollars, was to be paid to the said plaintiffs on or by the 1st day of January, 1890, with interest from the date of said bond at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. Under his purchase the defendant was not put in possession of the two hundred acres conveyed to him by the plaintiff. The location of the land under the deed of conveyance made by the plaintiffs to the defendant developed the fact that a portion of the land which the defendant supposed he had purchased at the time was in possession of one J. F. Cleveland. That the portion in possession of J. F. Cleveland contained about thirty acres; so that, instead of two hundred acres, the defendant was only put into possession of about one hundred and seventy acres. The portion in possession of the said J. F. Cleveland is a valuable piece or parcel of land, and, if lost to the defendant, will impair the value of the portion in his possession. That the 13th day of January, 1890, the defendant paid to the plaintiffs, on his bond and mortgage, the sum of fourteen hundred dollars, but refused to pay the balance thereof until he was put into possession of the remaining portion of the tract purchased by him. On the 21st day of January, 1891, the plaintiffs commenced their action of foreclosure against the defendant for the balance of the purchase money due and remaining unpaid on the bond and mortgage of the defendant. The defendant appeared, and answered the complaint. For a defense and counterclaim, he alleged the foregoing facts, and claimed that by reason thereof there had been a breach of the covenant of warranty and other covenants on the part of the plaintiffs in said deed, and that he had been injured and damaged thereby in the sum of one thousand dollars. All the issues were referred to the master. A number of witnesses were examined relative to the issues raised by the pleadings. On the 30th day of November, 1891, the master filed his report, finding, among other things, that there was a deficiency in the quantity of acres intended to be conveyed by the plaintiffs to the defendant, of thirty and one-quarter acres, worth twenty-one dollars and ninety-five cents per acre; that the thirty and one-quarter acres, at twenty-one dollars and ninety-five cents per acre, would amount to six hundred and sixty-three dollars and ninety-eight cents; and that giving the defendant credit for this sum on his bond and mortgage in January, 1890, would leave a balance due by the defendant to the plaintiffs of thirty-nine dollars and fifty-eight cents. And the master recommended that the plaintiffs have judgment of foreclosure for this amount, and costs of the action. To this report both the plaintiffs and defendant excepted. These exceptions were heard by his honor, Judge Fraser, who filed an order in the cause, holding that the parties under whom Cleveland claimed only had a life interest in the portion of the land involved in this controversy. He then goes on to say: 'There is no evidence before me to show the value of these estates for life, and to what extent the defendant has been damaged, in this view of the rights of the parties, all the estimates having been made on the theory that the outstanding paramount title was an estate in fee simple, and not an estate merely for the life or lives of certain individuals. There is evidence that some of them were at one time alive, and it must be assumed that they are still alive, as they were when the sale was made by order of court, unless there is evidence to the contrary.' He therefore re-committed the case to the master 'to inquire and report as to which of the said life tenants are still living, as to the ages of such as are living, and any other facts that may be necessary to enable the court to come to a proper conclusion, and that he report his conclusions thereon.' On the 10th day of July, 1892, a motion was made in the cause before his honor, Judge Wallace, to require the plaintiffs to make J. F. Cleveland a party defendant in this action. This motion was refused. The master, in obedience to the order of Judge Fraser, filed his report, bearing date the 10th day of November, 1892, in which he finds the ages of the life tenants who are still living, and then concluded: 'Calculating the value of the life estate of these parties by means of reliable life insurance tables, I find that it amounts to sixty-seven 8-100 dollars, which is as near accuracy as can be reached by calculation in a matter of this kind.' On the 12th day of November, 1892, after hearing this report, I made an order recommitting the cause again to the master, requiring him to report more fully upon the matter referred to him by his honor, Judge Fraser. On the same day, the same master, in obedience to this order, filed his report. In this report the master says: 'Defendant's counsel take the position before me that no money should be paid by defendant to plaintiffs until defendant is put in possession of the whole land deeded to him, and that he ought not to pay interest. Plaintiffs insist that there is nothing in the position, and, if there was, it could not be raised now. My conclusion is that the position of defendant is not tenable, and that, even if it was, it could not be raised at this stage of the case. With this view of the case, I have made the calculation, and find that the sum of seven hundred and fifty-seven dollars is due at this date, and should be paid by defendant to plaintiffs.' To this report the defendant duly excepted.

"The case is, without doubt, novel, in at least some of its features. This being the case, I have endeavored to give to the questions presented all the consideration possible, under the circumstances. I am prepared, however, to say that the conclusion to which I have arrived, if not correct, is at least satisfactory to myself. I think it meets fully the equities of the case. But three questions are presented by the exceptions: (1) Should the defendant be required to pay to the plaintiffs the balance due on his bond and mortgage until he is put in possession of the whole of the lands purchased by him? (2) Should he be required to pay interest on said balance during the time he is kept out of possession? And (3) can these questions be raised at this stage of the proceedings?

"It may be as well to dispose of the third question first. In passing upon this question, the fact must not be overlooked that no decree has been ever made in the cause. Only a few preliminary questions have been determined. These I shall not interfere with, even had I the inclination and the power. I shall, in all that I may say, consider the questions heretofore passed upon in this cause as settled. There is nothing heretofore decided in this cause, so far as I am able to discover, which prevents the court from now considering the questions raised by the exceptions of the defendant. Therefore, without discussing the question further, I shall content myself with simply saying that in my opinion the master erred in holding that the questions involved in the exception of the defendant could not be raised at this stage of the case.

"Now, as to the first question. The rule, it seems to me, is well settled that where there is a deficiency in the quantity of land sold, in a case like the present, the purchaser is entitled to a deduction from the purchase price,—the average or relative value of the deficiency. But the difficulty arises in this case from the fact that it is claimed that the party in possession of the deficiency only has a life estate therein, and that upon the falling in of the life estate the defendant will be entitled to the possession of the land claimed to be deficient, and that under these circumstances he is not entitled to a deduction of the average or relative value of the lands deficient, but only to a deduction of the value of the life estate of the tenant or tenants for life. To enforce a rule of this kind, it seems to me, would be contrary to equity and good conscience; especially so under the circumstances of the present case. J. F. Cleveland, who is in possession of the deficiency, is not a party to these proceedings. No one is advised of the title under which he claims. It is only assumed that he has a life estate in these lands from the fact that the trust deed from H. H. Thomson to William C. Bennett only conveyed a life estate to the persons under and through whom J. F. Cleveland is supposed to have derived his title to these lands. It may be that J. F. Cleveland now has a perfect, paramount title to these lands. Who can tell? But, be this as it may, there is one fact about which there can be no dispute: He is, and has been ever since the purchase of the defendant, in the possession and use of a certain portion of the land which the plaintiffs undertook to convey to the defendant. Where is the guaranty that he will deliver up the possession to the defendant upon the falling in of the life estate? The defendant may never get the possession of these lands, and, if he does, it may be years after the life estate is terminated, and after a long and expensive litigation. Under these circumstances, is the defendant to be told that justice and equity demand that he pay now for these lands, in the possession of another, and trust to 'fickle fortune' to save him harmless in the end, or that equity regards the value of an ancient life or lives deducted from a balance due upon the purchase price of these lands full and complete compensation for the loss of the possession and use of these lands for an indefinite period, and perhaps forever? I cannot think so; it seems to me that it would be inequitable to compel the defendant, upon a bare contingency, to pay for this portion of the land conveyed to him, until the plaintiffs have put him in the quiet and peaceable possession thereof.

"The next to be considered is that of interest. I do not think the defendant should be required to pay interest on so much of the purchase price of said land as is represented by the deficiency, for the time he has been or may be kept out of the possession of said lands. This conclusion seems to me to be so fair and just, under the circumstances of the case, I shall not protract this opinion by discussing it.

"Deducting the value of the number of acres found deficient, as fixed by the master,—that is to say, six hundred and sixty-three 98-100 dollars for the amount of bond,—and the balance remaining would be $1,336.12. This sum, with interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum to the 13th of January, 1890, would amount to $1,408.15; so that the payment of $1,400 practically paid for all the land in the possession of the defendant. If the deficiency is put at the average price per acre of the 200 acres conveyed, the payment of $1,400 would have exceeded the value of the portion now possessed by the defendant. In the view I take of this case, the plaintiffs are entitled to their judgment of foreclosure for the sum of six hundred and sixty-seven dollars and fifteen cents; said sum to commence to bear interest from the day the defendant shall be put into the possession of said thirty and one-quarter acres deficiency. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs have judgment against the defendant for foreclosure and sale of the mortgage premises, and that the said judgment be duly entered in the office of the clerk of the court. It is further ordered and adjudged that the judgment of foreclosure and sale entered in conformity with this decree shall not be enforced until the defendant shall have been put into the quiet possession of the thirty and one-quarter acres deficiency by the plaintiffs, or their heirs or assignees, and that, until the possession of said land is so given, the plaintiffs, their heirs and assignees, legal representatives and attorneys, are restrained and enjoined from enforcing said judgment of foreclosure and sale. It is further ordered and adjudged that if the plaintiffs, their heirs or assignees, shall fail, neglect, or refuse to put the defendant (or, in case he be dead, his heirs at law) in possession of said land within twelve months after the falling in of the life estate of the tenants for life in said lands, (unless, by an order of this court, said time is extended,) the said judgment of foreclosure and sale shall be marked 'Satisfied' by the clerk of this court, for the time being, upon the payment of the usual fee for such service by the defendant, or others interested in having such satisfaction entered. It is further ordered and adjudged that in case the defendant, his heirs at law, legal representatives, or assignees, shall fail to pay the sum heretofore found to be the value of thirty and one-quarter acres, with interest from the date he shall be put in possession of the same, within sixty days after he shall have been put into quiet possession of said lands, the said mortgaged premises shall be sold by the master of said county, (and, in case there shall be no master of said county, by the clerk of this court,) on some regular sales day, after due advertisement, for cash; that the officer making the sale shall, out of the proceeds arising from said sale, pay first the cost and expenses of said sale, and any lien or liens for taxes and assessments upon the said mortgaged premises, then the amounts due the plaintiffs, with interest as aforesaid, and, if there be a surplus after paying the said sums, that he hold said surplus subject to the further order of the court; that the officer making the sale shall execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers a deed or deeds to the premises sold; and that the purchaser or purchasers be let into possession upon the production of said deed. It is further adjudged that in case of sale the defendant, and all persons claiming by, through, and under him, be forever barred and foreclosed of all right, title, interest, and equity of redemption in and to said mortgage premises, or any part thereof. It is finally ordered that the costs of this action be paid by the parties,—that is to say, each party to pay his or their own costs,—and that the parties have leave to apply for further orders at the foot of this decree."

Bomar & Simpson, for plaintiffs. Ralph K. Carson and Duncan & Sanders, for defendant.

McGOWAN, J. We certainly agree with the circuit judge that in some respects this is a novel case, and to prevent confusion, and to make the points clear, we will condense a portion of the very full statement of the circuit decree. It appears that in July, 1889, the plaintiffs executed a deed to the defendant, whereby they undertook to convey to him a tract of land on waters of Fair Forest creek, Spartanburg county, 200 acres, in consideration of $4,500. The defendant paid in cash $2,500, and executed his bond for the credit portion, $2,000, which was to be paid on or before January, 1890, with interest from date at 10 per cent., and to secure this balance the defendant executed a mortgage of the said premises. The location of the land under the deed developed the fact that a part of the land the defendant supposed he had purchased was in the possession of one J. F. Cleveland; that this portion contained about 30 acres; so that, instead of 200 acres, the defendant was only put into the possession of about 170 acres. On January 13, 1890, the defendant paid to the plaintiffs $1,400, but refused to pay the balance thereof until he was put into the possession of the remaining portion,—the aforesaid 30 acres. This is the subject of this contention. On January 2, 1891, the plaintiffs commenced this action of foreclosure for the remainder of the purchase money due. The defendant, for a defense and counterclaim, alleged the foregoing facts, and claimed that by reason thereof there had been a breach of the covenant of warranty, and that he had been damaged to the extent of $1,000. All the issues were referred to the master, who took the testimony, (which is all in the brief,) and, among other things, found that there was a deficiency in the quantity of land of 30¼ acres, worth $21.95 per acre, making $663.98, and that giving the defendant credit for that sum in January, 1890, would leave a balance due by the defendant to the plaintiffs of $39.58, and he recommended that the plaintiffs have judgment for that sum and costs, etc. To this report both parties excepted. These exceptions were heard by his honor, Judge Fraser, who, among other things held that there was a deficiency of land; that Dr. Cleveland holds under a title from the same common source, which is paramount to that held by the defendant under his deed in this case. He is in actual possession of a part of the disputed land under that paramount title. For the purposes of this case, Dr. Cleveland's title to the possession is perfect, and his possession of a part by actual occupation under his title is a sufficient eviction to entitle the defendant to claim damages for the breach of warranty. See 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 40; Garvin v. Cohen, 13 Rich. Law, 153; Van Lew v. Parr, 2 Rich. Eq. 321. His honor, Judge Fraser, also held that the deed under which Dr. Cleveland claims gives a title only for the life of the persons named in the deed of H. H. Thomson to Dr. William C. Bennett, (naming them,) after which life estate the land reverts to defendant; and, as the master's report had been made on the assumption that Dr. Cleveland had a fee-simple title to the land in question, his honor, Judge Fraser, therefore recommitted the case to the master, to inquire and report as to which of the said life tenants are still living, and as to the ages of such as are living, and any other facts that may be necessary to enable the court to come to a proper conclusion, and that he report his conclusions thereon. The master reported the names of the aforesaid life tenants: Hettie Miller, 70 years of age; Susan Turner, 78 years; Sallie Burnett, 74 years; Julia Du Priest, 71 years; and John Du Priest, 67 years of age. Calculating the value of the life estate of these parties by means of reliable life insurance tables, I find that it amounts to $67.08, which is as near accuracy as can be reached by calculation in a matter of this kind. In July, 1892, the defendant moved before Judge Wallace, at chambers, to require the plaintiffs to make J. F. Cleveland a party defendant in the case. This motion was refused. The master, in his third report, making his statements more full, says: "Defendant's counsel take the position before me that no money should be paid by defendant to plaintiffs until defendant is put in possession of the whole land deeded, and that until then he ought not to pay interest. Plaintiffs insist that there is nothing in the position, and, if there was, it could not be raised now. My conclusion is that the position is not tenable, and, if it was, it could not be raised at this stage of the case. With this view of the case, I have made the calculation, and find that the sum of seven hundred and fifty-seven dollars ($757) is due at this date, and should be paid by defendant to plaintiffs." To this report the defendant excepted, and the cause came on for a hearing before his honor, Judge Izlar, who, passing by the preliminary questions which had been decided with the remark that he "would not interfere with them, but consider all the questions heretofore passed upon in the case as settled," stated that only three questions were presented by the exceptions: (1) Should the defendant be required to pay to the plaintiffs the balance due on his bond and mortgage until he is put into possession of the whole of the lands purchased by him? (2) Should he be required to pay interest on said balance during the time he is kept out of possession? (3) Can these questions be raised at this stage of the proceedings? And upon these points he held that the master was in error in deciding that the questions involved in the exceptions of defendant could not be raised at this stage of the case. He held that the defendant should not be required to pay the balance due on his bond, nor the interest thereon, until put into possession of the whole tract of land (200 acres) purchased by him; and he decreed that the plaintiffs are entitled to their judgment of foreclosure for the sum of $687.15, said sum to bear interest from the day the defendant shall be put into the possession of said 30¼ acres deficiency, but said judgment not to be enforced until quiet possession of the said deficiency of 30¼ acres is given to the defendant or his representative by the plaintiffs or their representatives. (A full copy of the decree should appear in the report.) From this decree, as well as that of Judge Fraser, both the plaintiffs and defendant appeal, upon various exceptions, which are all printed in the record; and the defendant also appealed from the order of Judge Wallace refusing the motion for leave to make J. F. Cleveland, who is in possession of the land deficiency, a party defendant.

From the view which the court takes, it will not be necessary, now, to consider any of the grounds of appeal, except the latter,—that from the order of Judge Wallace refusing the motion to make Cleveland a party defendant as to his title to the land de-iciency in his possession. It is true the general rule seems to be "that adverse claimants are not to be made parties to a foreclosure suit, for the purpose of litigating their title, as between defendants. The only proper parties are the mortgagee and mortgagor, and those who have acquired any interest from them subsequently to the mortgage. An adverse claimant is a stranger to the mortgage and the estate," etc. See 2 Jones, Mortg. 1440, and Quattlebaum v. Black, 24 S. C. 55, cited for the plaintiffs. But this is most certainly, in several particulars, a novel case, to which, as it seems to us, the aforesaid rule is not properly applicable. The case had been commenced, and was progressing, upon the assumption that the title of Cleveland in the deficiency was a fee simple, when his honor, Judge Fraser, held that his title was limited to the heirs of certain persons named, and upon their death would revert to the defendant, and thereupon he re-committed the case to the master for a new report under that view of the case. When that ruling was first made by Judge Fraser, the case was thereby so essentially changed as to make it, in fact, a new case, to which new principles were applicable. J. F. Cleveland, who was and is in possession of the deficiency parcel, was not a party to the proceeding. No one is certainly advised of the title under which Cleveland claims. It is only assumed that he has no more than a life estate in these lands from the fact that the trust deed from H. H. Thomson to William C. Bennett only conveyed a life estate to the persons under whom J. F. Cleveland is supposed to have derived his title to the land. As stated by the circuit judge, it may be that Cleveland now has a perfect paramount title to the lands. Who can tell? Be this as it may, there is one fact about which there can be no dispute: He is now, and has been ever since the purchase of the defendant, in the possession and use of a certain portion of the land, which the plaintiffs have undertaken to convey to the defendant. Where is the guaranty that he will deliver up the possession to the defendant upon the falling in of the life estate? And, even if it should be decided that he has no greater interest than a life estate, the defendant, possibly, may not get possession of the lands, or, if so, it may be years after the life estate has terminated, and after a long and expensive litigation. The circuit judge, among other things, found, as a matter of fact, that the defendant had substantially paid for all the land in his possession, and that the contest was now, in effect, reduced to the 30 acres of deficiency in the possession of Cleveland, who is not a party to the proceeding. We do not think that the equities of the parties can be reached without having Cleveland before the court as a party. Under these peculiar circumstances, it seems to us that Dr. Cleveland should have the opportunity to be heard upon the subject of his title, and, as a consequence thereof, to be bound by the decree which may be rendered upon the subject. It seems to us that all the parties have an interest that Cleveland should be made a party, under the fundamental doctrine of equity, as to parties, "That all persons in whose favor, or against whom, there might be a recovery, however partial, and also all persons who are so interested, although indirectly, in the subject-matter and the relief granted, that their rights or duties might be affected by the decree, although no substantial recovery can be obtained, either for or against them, shall be made parties to the suit," etc. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 114. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified as herein indicated, and the cause be remanded to the circuit court, in order that J. F. Cleveland shall be made a party defendant in regard to the alleged deficiency of 30 acres, and his title thereto, and for a reconsideration of the questions involved.

EBAUGH v. MULLINAX.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 11, 1893.)

TAX SALES—REDEMPTION—FORFEITED LANDS.

1. Advertisement of sale of delinquent lands for taxes, made in a daily paper on January 28th and February 4th, is made "weekly for two weeks," under Act 1874, § 100, and authorizes a sale February 6th. Alexander v. Messervey, 14 S. E. 854, 35 S. C. 409, followed.

2. While Act 1874 limited the right of redemption to 91 days after sale, Act Dec. 23, 1879, providing that all lands then or thereafter on the forfeited land record, which had been offered for sale under Act 1874, and not sold for want of bidders, should be sold by the sinking fund commission by public auction, and its amendment, (Act Dec. 21, 1880,) providing that at any time before actual sale the owners might redeem lands forfeited, applied to lands delinquent for 1880 taxes, and forfeited to the state in 1882.

3. The court charged that plaintiff contended that he redeemed the land before the sinking fund commissioners sold it; that the right to redeem extended 91 days after delinquent sale; that there was no effort to redeem for probably two years. But it was contended that the offer was made before sale; that the jury should determine that fact; that they had heard the secretary's letter to plaintiff, returning his money, and stating that it came too late; that the sale had been made; that the law gave 91 days after delinquent sale, and thereafter the commission had a right to sell; that if, before the commission sold, plaintiff offered to redeem, there was no statute authorizing redemption, but that the jury must take the testimony even on that point; that the time for redemption had passed, plaintiff's entire right to reclaim the land was gone, and the commission could sell the land. Held, that such charge denied plaintiff's right to redeem up to the time of the commissioners' sale, and so nullified its submission whether his offer preceded the sale. Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Berkeley county; J. H. Hudson, Judge.

Trespass by D. C. Ebaugh against A. J. Mullinax. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

For report on former appeal, see 13 S. E. 613.

R. J. Kirk, for appellant. Mordecai & Gadsden, for respondent.

MCGOWAN, J. This was an action for a tract of land (308 acres) in Berkeley county. The land was the property of the plaintiff, but the defendant claimed that the title had been transferred to him, by virtue of a sale and deed for $10.84 taxes and penalty to him by the commissioners of the sinking fund, acting for the state. The case was once before in this court. Upon the first trial the tax title of the defendant was sustained on circuit, but upon appeal to this court the judgment was reversed, and a new trial ordered, on the ground that, "before the land of a defaulting taxpayer can be validly sold for the nonpayment of the taxes assessed thereon, there must be an unsuccessful effort made to enforce payment by distress and sale of the personal property of the defaulting taxpayer, the best evidence of which is an execution issued, and a return of nulla bona thereon." See 34 S. C. 364, 13 S. E. 613. Accordingly the case went back to the circuit for a new trial, which was had before Judge Hudson and a jury. For the purpose of the trial the defendant admitted that if the plaintiff's witnesses were present and sworn they would prove that up to the time of the delinquent sale of the property in question, to wit, February 6, 1882, the plaintiff had a fee-simple title thereto, dating back to a grant, etc., and thereupon the plaintiff rested his case. For the purpose of this trial the plaintiff admits the passage of the resolution by the board of sinking fund commissioners, under which the title about to be put in evidence was made and delivered. The title deed from the sinking fund commission to A. J. Mullinax, dated May 6, 1884, was put in evidence. The defendant also proved that the various steps required to be taken by the acts of the general assembly of the state for the carrying out of delinquent land sales had in this instance been practically complied with, the only exceptions thereto claimed by the plaintiff and denied by the defendant being (1) that the notice of the delinquent lands had not been advertised for the length of time required by the statute governing said sales; and (2) that before the sale by the sinking fund commission to the defendant the plaintiff had made a legal "redemption" of the land by paying the amount of the tax, with costs and penalties, into the hands of the agent of the sinking fund commission, and taking his receipt therefor. As to the first question,—the sufficiency of the advertisement,—Mr. Eason, county auditor, testified that he received from the treasurer a list of delinquent lands for the year 1880, and the tract in question was among them. The advertisement was published in the News & Courier, a daily paper in Charleston, January 28 and February 4, 1882. Attended the sale on February 6, 1882. The tract was knocked down to the state for want of bidders. As to the second question,—the "redemption" claimed,—Mr. Ebaugh, the plaintiff, testified that he was absent from the state until the spring of 1882, and when he returned he found that his land had been forfeited, and he made an application to redeem it, and paid what money was demanded to Mr. U. R. Brooks, claiming to be the agent of the sinking fund commission. Mr. Brooks received the money, and gave witness a receipt for it, subject, as he thinks, to the approval of the sinking fund commission; but some two or three weeks after paying the money he received a letter from Mr. J. N. Lipscomb, secretary of state, inclosing check for the money which had been paid, and saying it was returned, "because the lands were already sold by the sinking fund to Mr. A. J. Mullinax," etc. This letter bore the same date as the deed of the land to Mullinax, viz. May 6, 1884.

Both the plaintiff and defendant made a number of requests to charge, but it is not considered necessary to state them here, as the charges and the refusals to charge will be considered in connection with the exceptions. Under the charge of the judge the jury found a verdict for the "defendant," and the plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "(1) Because his honor refused to charge, as requested by the plaintiff: 'The one hundredth section of the act of 1874, which required the sale of delinquent lands for taxes to be published "weekly for two weeks," requires the auditor to advertise for full fourteen days. An advertisement for any shorter length of time is not a compliance with the statute, and a sale under such circumstances passes no title to the purchaser.' (2) Because his honor refused to charge, as requested by plaintiff: 'If the jury find that the tax, costs, and penalties had been paid by the plaintiff to the agent of the sinking fund commission at any time before the sale to Mullinax, then the acceptance by said agent was a legal redemption by the owner, and the subsequent sale to Mullinax was without authority and void.' (3) Because his honor erred in charging the jury: 'If before the sinking fund commission conveyed the land to Mullinax, Ebaugh made the offer to redeem, there would be nothing in the statute law authorizing the redemption.' (4) Because his honor erred in charging the jury: 'But the time for redemption had passed. His entire right under the law to redeem the land was gone, and the sinking fund commission had the right to make a sale of the land. Not only had the 91 days gone, but about two years had elapsed. Remember these points.' (5) Because his honor erred in charging the jury: 'Under the decision of our own supreme court in the case of Alexander v. Messervey, I will instruct you that the tax collector is required to advertise for two weeks. Therefore if there was an insertion in a weekly paper once (a) week, and the weekly issue of the same paper for the next week, or any day in the following week, he can sell, whether the full period of fourteen days has expired or not, because he has advertised weekly for two weeks,' etc.

First. Exceptions 1 and 5 make the point as to the alleged insufficiency of the advertisement of the sale,—that the publication for two days only, once on January 28 and once February 4, 1882, was not "weekly for two weeks." It is true that this was not a judicial sale, ordered by the court, but a sale by a collector; and, as Judge Cooley said: "A sale by a collector cannot be assimilated to a sale by a sheriff under judicial process, issued by a competent court. His power is a naked power, not coupled with an interest, and in all such cases the law requires that every prerequisite to the exercise of the power must precede its exercise." But the question here resolves itself into one of construction of the language used, and, looked at in that way, we concur with the circuit judge in being unable to distinguish this case from that of Alexander v. Messervey, 35 S. C. 409, 14 S. E. 854.

Exceptions 2, 3, and 4 raise the only other question seriously made in the case, complaining of error on the part of the circuit judge in charging: "If before the sinking fund commission made the conveyance to Mullinax the offer to 'redeem' was made by Ebaugh, there would be nothing in the statute law authorizing the redemption, but the time for redemption had passed. His entire right, under the law, to redeem the land was gone; and the sinking fund commission had the right to make a sale of the land. Not only had the 91 days gone, but about two years had elapsed." Was this error? It is undoubtedly true that statutes "allowing 'redemption' from tax sales are to be liberally construed in favor of the owner. Whatever tends to modify the right of the government to sell lands for taxes is favorable to the citizens, and ought to be liberally construed, on the principle that remedial statutes are to be beneficially expounded." Desty, Tax'n, p. 532. As we understand it, the only object of the state in making such stringent requirements in regard to the forfeiture and sale of delinquent lands is to secure at all events the taxes and costs; and therefore it is the wise policy of the state to favor "redemptions," as in that way the payment of tax dues is secured without the expense of sales or the sacrifice of the property of the citizen incidental thereto. It is certainly now the law of the state that the owner of lands forfeited for taxes has the right to redeem the land at any time before the sale shall be actually made. See section 291 of the act of February 9, 1882, "to provide for the assessment and taxation of property," (17 St. 1039); and also section 307 of the General Statutes. But in answer to this view it is urged that the act of 1882 is not retrospective, and its last section (305) declares that the provisions of the act should not affect the assessment made in the year 1881, nor the collection of taxes under any act passed at that session (1882) of the legislature, but such collection should proceed in the manner prescribed by the acts authorizing the same, and the laws in relation thereto, that were of force from (we suppose it should be "before") November 1, 1881. Assuming, then, that we must apply the law here as it stood before the passage of the act of 1882, how will the matter stand? The default of the taxpayer was for the year 1880, the land offered for sale and forfeited for want of bidders February 6, 1882, and conveyed to Mullinax May 6, 1884. It is contended that, the act of 1882 being the first and only one which provides that the property owner shall have the right to redeem it at any time before the actual sale, and the provisions of that act not applying here, the landowner is relegated to the act of 1874, which limits the right of "redemption" to 91 days after the sale, and that under it the property owner, after the expiration of 91 days, had absolutely lost his right to redeem at all, his right having vested in the state by forfeiture. We cannot accept this view. It certainly overlooks the fact that the act of 1882 was not the first to change the law by allowing "redemption" at any time before the actual sale. On December 23, 1879, an act was passed "to extend the time for the redemption of forfeited lands," (17 St. 40); the second section of which provided as follows: "That all lands now or hereafter upon the forfeited land record which have been offered for sale under section 117 of the act of 1874, * * * and which have not been sold for want of bidders, nor redeemed under the provisions of this act, shall be treated as assets of the state in charge of the sinking fund commission, and by them sold at public sale. * * * Provided, that this section shall take effect on and after the 31st day of October, 1880." And at the very next session of the legislature, on December 21, 1880, the above act was altered in some particulars, and amended by adding the following: "That section 2 of 'An act to extend the time for the 'redemption' of forfeited lands,' be and the same is hereby amended, by adding the following: Provided that any time before any such sale shall be actually made, the owners of any such piece or parcel of such lands, or those claiming under or through such owners, or others, shall have the right to redeem any piece or parcel of the lands so forfeited, by paying in gold, silver, United States treasury notes, national bank notes, the full amount of all accumulated taxes costs and penalties due and unpaid thereon up to the date of such payments." See 17 St. 327. We do not see why this amended act should not control the case. The original act took effect October 31, 1880, and the amendment from its passage, December 21, 1880. At that time the land still remained private property,—had not been forfeited to the state, which did not occur until February 3, 1882. The terms of the provision, however, are large enough to include the case when it did arise,—“all lands now or hereafter upon the forfeited land record.” As to the cases described, it provides that the landowner, “at any time before any such sale shall be actually made,” might redeem his land by paying all taxes and penalties; and, as we think, thereby repealing so much of the act of 1874 as limited the right of redemption to 91 days after forfeiture.

There was conflicting testimony as to whether the payment to the agent, Brooks, was before the actual sale and conveyance to Mullinax; and it was claimed that the circuit judge, as he ought to have done, left that question of fact to the jury. That is so, but what could that avail the plaintiff, when the jury were at the same time instructed that the plaintiff's right of “redemption” was absolutely gone, and that, without regard to that question, or how they might decide it, the sinking fund commission had the right to disregard the effort to redeem the land and to sell it? In the view taken by the circuit judge, it seems to us that the charge on the facts was unnecessary, if not misleading. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

POPE, J., concurs.

On Rehearing.

McIVER, C. J., (dissenting.) In this case two questions are presented: (1) As to the sufficiency of the notice of the delinquent land sale; (2) as to the charge of the circuit judge upon the question of redemption. As to the first of these questions I agree with Mr. Justice McGOVAN in the view which he has taken, and do not deem it necessary to add anything to what he has said. But as to the second question I am unable to agree with him; not because I have any fault to find with his view of the law applicable to this case, but because, as it seems to me, he has placed an erroneous construction upon the charge of the circuit judge. Assuming the law to be that the plaintiff, as a defaulting taxpayer, was entitled to redeem his land at any time before it was sold by the sinking fund commissioners, and that such right of redemption was not finally lost by the expiration of 91 days after the delinquent land sale, when the property was declared forfeited to the state for want of bidders, the practical inquiry is whether the charge of the circuit judge, properly construed, was in conflict with this view of the law. The error in the opinion, as I submit with deference, arises from the fact that detached sentences of the charge are set out in the exceptions and incorporated in the opinion, from which the conclusion is drawn that the charge was in conflict with the law as stated. But nothing is better settled than that the whole charge must be taken together, and construed as a whole, and not by detached sentences that may be found in it; otherwise it would be very difficult, if not impossible, for any charge to stand the test. Owing to the imperfections of human nature it would be unreasonable to expect that even the best and most careful judge could escape criticism if his charge is to be judged of by taking up detached sentences, without regard to the context in which they appear. The material inquiry is whether the jury have received erroneous instruction as to the law applicable to a given case, and to determine this inquiry it is necessary that the whole charge should be considered together, for that is the way it was received by the jury, and that, therefore, is the way in which the jury must be regarded as having considered it. Looking at the charge in this light, I do not see how the jury could have been misled as to the law applicable to this case. The following is the whole of the charge relating to the question of redemption as it is set out in the “case,” to which alone we must look, and not to the exceptions, where it is not fully set out: “The next point principally contended for is that Mr. Ebaugh practically and in the eye of the law redeemed this land before it was sold to Mullinax. The right to redeem extended to the full period of ninety-one days after the delinquent land sale. In this case there was no attempt made to redeem until probably two years had elapsed, but it was contended that the offer to redeem took place before the sale to Mullinax. You are to determine that fact,—whether it did or not. You have heard the letter of the secretary of state, who was chairman of the sinking fund commission, in response to Mr. Ebaugh, sending back the money he had given to Mr. Brooks, and declaring that it came too late, and that the sale had been made to Mr. Mullinax. Mr. Ebaugh unfortunately was absent from the state. I do not know that there is any provision in the statute to save one from the penalties of the law because he is absent from the state. The law gives ninety-one days after the sale, and after that time the sinking fund commission would have the right to sell this property. If, before the sinking fund commission made the contract of sale, he made the offer to redeem, there would be nothing in the statute law authorizing the redemption. But in this case you must take the testimony even on this point. There is the letter of the secretary of state, the testimony of Mr. Ebaugh as to his payment to Mr. Brooks, and all that. You will consider it all. But the time for redemption had passed. His entire right under the law to reclaim the land was gone, and the sinking fund commission had the right to make a sale of the land. Not only had the ninety-one days gone, but about two years had elapsed. Remember these points." It seems to me that the obvious meaning of that portion of the charge relating to the question of redemption, all of which is copied above, when considered as a whole, as it must be, is that until after the lapse of 91 days from the delinquent land sale the defaulting taxpayer has the absolute right to redeem, and before that time does elapse the sinking fund commission have no authority to offer the land for sale, but, after that time has elapsed, without an offer to redeem having been made, the land may then be offered for sale by the commission; and, if actually sold before any offer to redeem is made, then the purchaser will acquire a good title. Unless such be the proper construction of the charge, it is impossible to conceive why the question of fact whether the offer to redeem was made before the sale to Mullinax should have been submitted to the jury. If the jury were to understand from the charge that the undisputed fact that Ebaugh had made no offer to redeem within the 91 days effectually barred his right of redemption, there was literally no question of fact in the case; and it would have been the idlest folly, amounting to a mere mockery, to submit the question of fact as to whether the offer to redeem was made before the sale to Mullinax to the decision of the jury. I am unwilling to adopt a construction of the charge which necessarily involves such an idea, especially when, in my judgment, the charge, considered as a whole, forbids such a construction. The detached sentences in the charge, which seem to be relied upon by appellant, are: First. "If, before the sinking fund commission made the contract of sale, he made the offer to redeem, there would be nothing in the statute law authorizing the redemption;" but it seems to me clear that from the language immediately preceding and that immediately following that sentence the circuit judge was speaking of the right to redeem within the 91 days, and not of the right to redeem after the lapse of 91 days; for the language preceding is: "The law gave ninety-one days after the sale, [meaning, of course, the delinquent land sale,] and after that time the sinking fund commission would have the right to sell this property;" and, as if to make the meaning more plain, the sentence relied upon by appellant is immediately followed by these words: "But in this case [italics mine] you must take the testimony even on this point,"—that is, the point whether Ebaugh made the offer to redeem before the sale to Mullinax,— clearly meaning that, though Ebaugh had lost the right to redeem by the lapse of the 91 days, before any sale could be made by the commission, yet if he did offer to redeem before the sale was actually made, that would be sufficient. Second. The other sentences relied upon are as follows: "But the time for redemption had passed. His entire right under the law to reclaim the land was gone, and the sinking fund commission had the right to make a sale of the land. Not only had the ninety-one days gone, but about two years had elapsed. Remember these points." The latter part of this quotation shows clearly that the judge was speaking of the 91 days which must elapse before "the sinking fund commission had the right to make a sale of the land;" and his concluding injunction. "Remember these points"—not "this point"—shows that he meant that the jury should consider not only the point that the 91-days right to redeem was gone, but also the further point, which he had previously directed them to consider "in this case,"—whether the offer to redeem by Ebaugh was made before the sale to Mullinax. I have no doubt that the judge intended the jury to understand, and have as little doubt that the jury did understand, that the whole case turned upon the question whether Ebaugh made the offer to redeem before the sale to Mullinax; and their verdict must be regarded as a response in the negative to that question.

There is one circumstance in this case not without significance, and that is the failure to produce the receipt which the plaintiff says he took from Brooks, which he thinks was given subject to the approval of the sinking fund commission. That receipt would have tended to show not only the precise date of the payment of the money, but also the terms upon which the money was received; whether conditioned upon the approval of the sinking fund commission, or, what was more probable, upon the condition that the land had not already been sold, as was stated to be the fact in the letter of the secretary of state returning the money. It must be remembered that the act of 1879, (17 St. 40,) requiring sales of forfeited land by the sinking fund commission to be made "at public sale," after advertisement, was amended by the act of 1880 (17 St. 327) by striking out the words "at public sale" and the words "after such advertisement;" so that, as the law then stood, there was nothing to prevent a private sale of such lands without advertisement. It may be, therefore, that Brooks received the money upon the condition that the land had not already been sold at private sale, of which he was not informed. While I do not mean to insinuate even that this receipt was intentionally suppressed by the plaintiff, yet it seems to me it would have been an important piece of evidence, and if the plaintiff from any cause, even the most innocent, failed to produce it, he must take the consequences. It was the duty of the plaintiff to prove his case, and in order to do so it was necessary for him to show that he had actually paid the money before the sale of Mullinax, which I think we are bound to assume the jury found was not the case; and that is the end of the matter. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

WIANT et al. v. HAYS, Commissioner, et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 9, 1893.)

STATE SCHOOL LANDS—FORFEITURE—SALE—PROPERTY IN EXCESS—EXECUTION LIEN.

1. The title to land forfeited for nonentry on the assessor's land books, by section 7, p. 90, Acts 1869, (Code 1868, c. 31, § 34,) vested in the state upon the forfeiture, by the mere force of the statute, and without judicial or other proceeding declaring the forfeiture, and therefore a judgment against the former owner, rendered after such forfeiture, is no lien on such land.

2. The right of the former owner to the excess of the proceeds of the sale of such forfeited land, after payment of taxes, interest, and costs, accorded to him by section 5, art. 13, of the constitution, is property in the former owner,—personal property,—which he may sell, and which is liable to the lien of a fieri facias against him; and such property as that, if a transfer be made of it in fraud of creditors, they may maintain a suit in equity to avoid the transfer.

3. Personal property, to be the subject of sale, must have an existence, but a potential existence is sufficient.

4. Under section 2, c. 141, Code, a writ of fieri facias is a lien upon personal property, not of such nature as to be leviable, owned by the debtor before its return day, if docketed as required in said section, against a purchaser for value, without notice other than the constructive notice arising from such docketing; but, if not so docketed, the lien will not affect such purchaser, if he be a bona fide purchaser for value, and without notice of the writ. It makes no difference, so far as the protection of the purchaser is concerned, whether he purchased before or after the return day of the writ.

5. A proceeding, under chapter 105 of the Code of 1887, by a commissioner of school lands, for the sale of forfeited lands, is a judicial proceeding,—a suit, not simply an administrative proceeding. The court may in it allow one claiming right to the surplus proceeds of its sale to file his petition asking such surplus to be paid to him.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Gilmer county;
V. S. Armstrong, Judge.

Action by William T. Wiant and others against S. A. Hays, commissioner of school lands for Gilmer county, and others. There was decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Linn & Withers and N. M. Bennett, for appellants. R. F. Fleming, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. A tract of land, the property of Peregrine Hays, was forfeited for nonentry on the assessor's land books of Gilmer county for more than five years, from and including the year 1870; and under a decree in a proceeding instituted by the commissioner of school lands made February 5, 1891, the land was sold as forfeited, and purchased by Kidd, and its proceeds, after paying taxes and costs, left a surplus. The sale was on October 1, 1891, and it was confirmed by decree of October 8, 1891. By a writing dated June 1, 1891, Peregrine Hays assigned to Kidd any excess that might remain from its sale. Peregrine Hays and Kidd, before confirmation of sale, united in filing a petition in the circuit court of Gilmer, wherein said proceeding was going on, setting up said assignment, and asking that said surplus be paid to Kidd, pursuant to the assignment. William T. Wiant and R. G. Linn, administrator of Robert Linn, and others, filed in said proceeding a petition against Hays and others, setting up that Linn, administrator, had obtained a decree for money against Hays in February, 1886, and that Wiant had recovered a judgment for money against Hays, July 2, 1887, which were docketed in the judgment lien docket, and that various writs of fieri facias had been issued on said decree and judgment, which were returned unsatisfied; and that certain ones of them had been entered in the execution lien docket,—Linn's first, docketed on February 13, 1891, and Wiant's earliest, docketed June 4, 1891; and they claimed in their petition that, under said judgments and executions, they were entitled to said surplus. The petition of said Wiant and Linn and others was, on demurrer, dismissed, and the said surplus fund was decreed to Kidd, and said Wiant, Linn, administrator, and other petitioners appeal.

To whom should such surplus fund go,—to Kidd, under his assignment from Hays, or to Wiant and Linn, administrator, under their said claims as creditors of Hays? By the omission of the land from the tax books, its forfeiture became complete some time in 1875. By such forfeiture the whole title went from Hays, and vested in the state, by force of the statute, (Acts 1869, p. 90, § 7; Code 1868, c. 31, § 34,) without any legal proceeding or sale. The act operates as a legislative grant, and vests title in the state. Levasser v. Washburn, 11 Grat. 572. As was said in McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561, and McClure v. Mauperture, 29 W. Va. 633, 2 S. E. 761, after the forfeiture became complete, the former owner had no more right or title in the land than if he had never owned it. Therefore, as before Wiant's and Linn's judgments Hays had ceased to own the land, their judgments did not become liens on this land, as they were not rendered until in the years 1886 and 1887. What interest, then, had Hays as to the land after such forfeiture? This is a material question, because, under the arguments in the case, we must answer whether Hays had such interest as could be assigned to Kidd, or such as could be subject to the writs of fieri facias upon Wiant's and Linn's judgment and decree.

The constitution, (article 13, § 5,) as also the statute, provides that the former owner of forfeited lands shall be entitled to receive the excess of the sum for which the land may be sold over taxes and costs, if his claim be filed within two years after the sale. This surely does not vest any estate that is real estate in the former owner, for the statute vests the whole estate in the state; and in McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561, it is held that this provision does not confer upon the former owner any interest in the land. But he has something that is property, dependent upon a sale and the existence of an excess for its fruition. In McClure v. Maitland it is held that the grant to him of the excess is a gratuity,—an act of grace in the state. This language was used to support the position taken in that case that, under the then existing act relative to proceedings for the sale of forfeited lands, the owner had no right to demand to be a party, and was not a proper party, but it was surely not intended to mean that the right, under the constitution and act, to the excess, should it ever come to exist, was not a property right. It is a vested right, contingent, so far as its vesting in possession and enjoyment is concerned, upon the happening of the event of a sale and excess,—a right inchoate until sale, and then consummated, if it leave a surplus. It has potentiality, as contrasted with a mere naked possibility. There is the land out of which money may issue, and that land is required by law to be sold, and will be sold, and to that money the law gives the former owner a right. It is not a mere expectancy, like that of a child as to the estate of the living father, or the sale of the catch of fish on a future voyage. The fact that perchance the land may never be sold, and may never produce a surplus, does not render the former owner's right a mere possibility, legally speaking, but it is a probability. The facts that the land exists, and will be sold under fixed law commanding it, and that the right of the owner to the surplus is connected with it, and that the surplus issues out of it, give that right a potential present existence. That which is in every sense nonexistent—a non-entity—cannot be sold, is not property; but it need not have, in every sense, a perfect, tangible existence, to be regarded in law as capable of ownership. So it have a potential existence, it is enough. A man may not sell the fruit from trees, or wool or lambs from sheep, which he has not; but he may do so if he then owns the trees or sheep. Their ownership gives potential existence to the fruit and wool and lambs, though as yet the trees have not blossomed, or the wool grown, or the ewes become pregnant. "A mere contingent possibility, not coupled with an interest, is not the subject of sale, as all the wool one shall ever have, or the sheep which a lessee has covenanted to leave at the end of an existing term. If rights are vested, or possibilities are distinctly connected with interest or property, they may be sold." 1 Pars. Cont. 523. What is a devise of land to an executor to be sold,—part of proceeds to one, part to another? The law ought to go as far as possible to deem that property necessary to pay creditors. We find it in old and late books, as laid down in Benj. Sales, p. 80, § 78, that "things not yet existing, which may be sold, are said to have a potential existence; that is, things which are the natural product or expected increase of something already belonging to the vendor." Here the land did not belong to Hays, but that land existed, and he had a conceded right to certain money to issue from it. It would be unreasonable to say that a man whose land, worth many thousands of dollars, forfeited for a few dollars of taxes, has no such interest in the excess as that, when it comes into real existence as money, it cannot be subjected to pay his debts. It might be said with some force that while the land is, as regards the legal title, vested in the state, yet the state holds in trust for the former owner as to the residue, and that his interest is land; but perhaps that view is untenable. I shall without further elaboration refer to the following authorities for the discussion of this somewhat abstruse subject: Huling v. Cabell, 9 W. Va. 522, and many citations there; Bank v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 555; Benj. Sales, p. 80, § 78; 1 Pars. Cont. 523; Tied. Sales, § 52; 2 Kent, Comm. 468, (641,) note a; 2 Bl. Comm. 297; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 74 Amer. Dec. 421; Fonville v. Casey, 4 Amer. Dec. 559, and note.

It is argued that it is no property,—merely a gratuity from the state. So it is as regards Hays and the state; but when once the gift has vested, like any other property given, it is the property of Hays, the donee. It is argued that it is, like pension to a soldier, exempt from creditors. There is no analogy. The pension is exempt by provision of the act granting it, but there is no exemption here made by the constitution. So we hold that this right of Hays touching the land is property; not real, but personal,—a chose in action. Therefore it could pass under the assignment of Hays to Kidd. But what of Wiant's and Linn's executions, docketed as execution liens? Code, c. 141, § 2, says that every writ of fieri facias shall, in addition to the effect which it has under chapter 140 of this Code, be a lien from the time it is delivered to an officer to be executed upon all the personal estate of which the judgment debtor is possessed, or to which he is entitled, and upon all which he may acquire on or before the return day thereof, although not levied on, nor capable of being levied on, under that chapter. And then follows a provision that a purchaser shall not be affected by such lien unless the execution be docketed, as in said section provided; and the statute then provides that, if so docketed, it shall be an abiding and continuing lien against a purchaser, and have preference over him. The executions constituted liens on the said property right of Hays, the execution debtor, arising from said land, as it was in existence when the executions were delivered to officers for execution. Huling v. Cabell, 9 W. Va. 522.

Linn's fi. fa., which issued October 11, 1890, and was docketed February 13, 1891, has preference over Kidd's rights under his assignment. I find no execution of Wiant's docketed before June 4, 1891, and, that being after Kidd's assignment, Kidd has preference over Wiant, provided he be a purchaser for valuable consideration, bona fide, and without notice of Wiant's execution. Though the assignment was, after Wiant's execution, in the officer's hands, and before its return day, yet, the property being a chose not leviable, Kidd has preference over Wiant, if Kidd be such a bona fide purchaser without notice. The lien of a fi. fa. upon a chose is not under chapter 140, but under chapter 141, § 2; and, as this section excepts such purchaser, it is no difference that, when he purchased, the execution was in the officer's hands, and the return day had not passed. Opinion in Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Grat. 162. Some change was made in 1882 in chapter 141. As our Code now is, chapter 140 gives the writ of fieri facias a lien on leviable property, but not at all on property not leviable. Chapter 141 does this. Under chapter 140 the lien on leviable property begins when the fieri facias goes into the officer's hands, and ends with its return day, unless levied, in which case it continues to bind the property levied upon after its return day. If not levied, it would not bind the property in the hands of one purchasing it after the return day, under chapter 140, whether he had notice of the execution or not. I say under chapter 140. But chapter 141 makes the fieri facias a lien on property not leviable, and continues, if it does not create, the lien, under chapter 140, on leviable property after its return day, if the fieri facias be docketed, as required by section 2. The lien given by section 2, c. 141, as to property not leviable, like a chose in action, begins when it goes into the hands of the officer, but does not end with the return day. As to leviable property, one could not purchase it during the life of the execution, even without notice of it, but he could purchase unleviable property without notice, either before or after its return day, unless it be docketed, as section 2, c. 141, saves him from the lien it creates on unleviable property; but chapter 140 does not save him from the lien by it created as to leviable property. In other words, if the subject be unleviable property, like a chose, whether purchased within or after the lifetime of the fieri facias, and it be docketed, as required in section 2, c. 141, the lien is good against a purchaser, though he be a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice of the fieri facias otherwise than by the docketing; but, if not docketed, it is not good against such bona fide purchaser for value without notice. As to leviable property, if purchased before the return day of the writ, its lien, though not docketed, is good, even against a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of it, because of chapter 140; but, if purchased after the return day of the writ of fieri facias, the lien is not good against a bona fide purchaser for value, unless so docketed, or unless he have notice of the writ; but, if either so docketed, or the purchaser have such notice, it is good against him.

The petition charged that Kidd's assignment was made with intent to defraud petitioners. This, I assume, was regarded by the court as immaterial, and as no ground to save the petition from demurrer, on the theory that the right assigned was not property in Hays, to which a creditor could set up a claim, and could not be the subject of a fraudulent alienation. Were this so, the position would be correct, as a creditor cannot say he has been defrauded by an assignment of anything that is not property of his debtor to which he can resort for satisfaction; but, as the thing assigned is to be regarded property liable to creditors, it follows that its fraudulent transfer could be assailed. Equity, under the statute avoiding fraudulent transfers, will reclaim and subject any species of the debtor's property, prospective or contingent,—all kinds of property, real, personal, legal, or equitable, vested, reversionary, or contingent estate,—subject to debts. It will subject property sometimes where the legal process cannot reach it. Equity is here not technical, but asks whether it is a thing of substantial value of the debtor, which in the facility and flexibility of its remedial procedure it can reach. Wait, Fraud. Conv. §§ 24, 25; Bump, Fraud. Conv. § 238. Certainly, equity would not allow the fraudulent transfer, if such it was, of hundreds of dollars, actual money in the hands of the court, coming from a sale of the land, having no longer a merely potential, but now an actual, existence, on any such theory that it was not property liable to creditors. If capable of assignment, it would, so far as its existence as property is concerned, be liable to creditors.

But it is contended that the proceeding in the name of the commissioner of school lands in the circuit court is not a suit with parties, but only an administrative proceeding by the state ex parte, to sell its own land,—only a method of converting its land into money,—and this contention is rested on McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561, and, not being a suit, Wiant could not file his petition in the proceeding. The question in that case was whether the former owner was a proper party to the proceeding to sell, and whether he could complain of error in the proceeding, and maintain an appeal. It was held that the proceeding was not judicial, in the sense that it involved litigation between parties. But this proposition, as applied to this case, can have no force, for two reasons: First. The act under which McClure v. Maitland was had made no provision for parties. The legislature, desiring to make the proceeding as effectual as possible, and pass good title, and protect the purchaser's title, as under ordinary decrees, by chapter 95, Acts 1882, (Code 1887, c. 105,) greatly changed the law touching the sale of forfeited lands for the benefit of the school fund, directing that the commissioners file a petition which must contain certain matters of allegation, naming the owners of the land by it sought to be sold, directing process to issue against the owners and all unknown persons having or claiming the land, and that it be served on them, or, in default of service, that a publication be made, and that the case be referred to a commissioner to report certain important matters, and that all the parties claimant appear before him, and that exceptions might be filed to it, and that a hearing take place on the report and exceptions, and a decree of sale be entered, if the land be found liable, and the sale reported to court for its action. There is an express provision that, if there be exceptions to the report, "the same proceedings shall be had in the case as if it were a suit in chancery." Now, why, with parties plaintiff and defendant, process, pleading, hearing between the parties, decree, etc., it is not, if not technically a chancery suit, yet a suit, I cannot see; a suit under a special statute, it is true, but none the less a suit. So, substantially, it was regarded in Hays v. Camden's Heirs, 18 S. E. 461, (decided this term.) Proceedings at rules take place as in ordinary and common-law suits. In some places it is called a "suit." But I know that it is said by those holding the other view that the question is not to be tested by the circumstances, such as I have alluded to, the presence of pleading, process, hearing, etc., but it must be tested by the nature of the proceeding; that is, that it is only an administrative process by the state, through an officer and court, to realize money on its own property. But to this I reply that though the state might make the proceeding such, and did in its acts up to 1882, yet, by its act in 1882, it changed the proceeding from one ex parte to one inter partes, and clothed the proceeding with all the habiliments of a suit; and still it did not proceed against the land, taking the fact of forfeiture as a concession, and simply at once sell the land, but it subjected its right and title under the supposed forfeiture to question and investigation, under the law, through a suit, called in all interested adversely to its claim, and gave them leave to contest its right, and made its claim the subject of litigation. Second. Suppose it is not a suit, as between the commissioner and the defendants. Still, claimants to the residue might file their petition in the proceeding to obtain that residue, because, the money being in the court, they could in no other way get it, save by asking the court for it by petition; and I understand that always where money is in the hands of a court in any proceeding, which is claimed by parties, and on grounds outside that proceeding by attachment, execution, assignment, or otherwise, a petition may and must be filed. How, otherwise, can the right to it be asserted? And, as incidental, there can be parties defendant to the petition. It would be a petition as to the proceeding, seeking the fund, but not litigating anything involved between the parties to the proceeding; while, as to the parties interested in the fund, it would be a bill,—a suit. It must be filed in the cause, because it seeks a fund in custody of the law, and asks an order in that cause for leave to withdraw the fund; but in no other respect does it concern or become part of it. This petition can be called a "bill," as between its plaintiffs and defendants. It is a bill in equity to render effective the lien of a fi. fa. on a fund not leviable, which is a common function of equity, and also to annul a transfer of it, and settle right to it; and it is only filed in the proceeding because there the fund is. It is no litigation within the other proceeding. Said decree, so far as it sustains the demurrer of Kidd to Wiant's and Linn's petition, and dismisses it, and gives the surplus to Kidd, is reversed, and said demurrer is overruled, and the cause remanded for further proper proceedings.

HARTMAN et al. v. EVANS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 2, 1893.)

EQUITY PRACTICE—EXCEPTIONS TO ANSWER—DEED OF TRUST FOR SECURITY—USURY—RIGHTS OF GRANTOR TO DISCOVERY—EQUITABLE JURISDICTION.

1. When a plaintiff in equity files exceptions to an answer, the exceptions should be noted as filed, and at once be set down for argument.

2. If the exceptions to the answer are not well founded, it is not ground to reverse a decree that they were not set down to be argued, but the cause was heard and decided without passing upon them.

3. When a replication to the answer is entered or filed, the exceptions to the answer are treated as abandoned, and the answer deemed sufficient as to any discovery prayed for.

4. Evidence of lending, at a usurious rate of interest, to other persons, is not competent to prove a usurious rate in the case on trial.

5. Every presumption is made in favor of the correctness of the decision of the commissioner in chancery. If the testimony is conflicting, the court rarely interferes with his finding on the facts, provided he makes no error of law affecting the result.

6. Any borrower of money may exhibit his bill in equity against the lender, and compel a discovery on oath of the money really lent, and the interest or consideration of the same; and, if a deed of trust has been made to secure the payment of the debt, an injunction may be awarded to prevent a sale thereunder during the pendency of the suit.

7. It is the duty of the trustee to look to the rights and interests of the trust debtor, as well as to those of the trust creditor, being the agent of both parties, and bound to act impartially between them.

8. Where there is, from any cause, an impediment to his making a fair and proper sale, (1) as where, from the fact of the deed of trust being one of long standing, or from any cause, the amount due and to be raised by a sale is uncertain; (2) where there are various deeds of trust or other incumbrances; (3) where the legal title is outstanding; (4) where there is a cloud upon the title,—the trustee may, of his own motion, apply to a court of equity to remove such impediment to a proper execution of the trust; and, if he should fail to do this, the party injured by his default has a right to make such application.

9. When the court has for any purpose properly taken jurisdiction of such case, it should proceed to have the trusts executed under its direction, and with its sanction, when the interests and rights of any party manifestly require it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Monongalia county; John M. Hagans, Judge.

Action by Joseph J. Hartman and Elliott Hartman against Thomas R. Evans and O. H. Dille, executors of James Evans, deceased, and others, for an injunction and other relief. There was decree for defendants, dismissing the bill, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Keck, Son & Fast, for appellants. A. B. Fleming and O. B. Dille, for appellees.

HOLT, J. This is an injunction brought by the Hartmans in the circuit court of Monongalia against Evans and others, executors of James Evans, deceased, to enjoin a sale under a deed of trust on lands to secure a debt to the testator. The executors of James Evans answered the bill, and plaintiffs excepted to the answer. Various depositions were taken on behalf of plaintiffs, and defendants excepted to them as incompetent. On the 24th day of February, 1891, the cause came on to be heard. The court, not passing upon the exceptions to defendants' answer, sustained defendants' exceptions to certain depositions of plaintiffs, and referred the cause to Commissioner Lazzell, to ascertain and report (1) the usury, if any, and amount in the trust debts; (2) how much, if anything, remained due on the trust debts. Additional testimony was taken by both plaintiffs and defendants, and, the cause coming on to be finally heard on April 12, 1892, upon the papers formerly read, orders, decrees made, report of Commissioner Lazzell, and exceptions thereto, the court decreed that the injunction awarded on May 18, 1890, be dissolved, and that plaintiffs' bill be dismissed, not passing directly on exceptions to answer or report, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Plaintiffs assign numerous errors, which may be conveniently examined under these four heads: First, in allowing the answer to be filed, and not sustaining the exceptions thereto; second, in sustaining defendants' exceptions to certain depositions of plaintiffs; third, in not passing directly on the exceptions to the report of Commissioner Lazzell; fourth, for various errors in dismissing, finally, plaintiffs' bill, (and under this head the briefs are in the main taken up with the discussion of facts as to the question of usury and questions of chancery practice.) Our practice, starting with that of the high court of chancery of England, has been modified by various statutes, beginning with the act of 1748, until it reached its present state in the Code of 1868, giving us an inexpensive, expeditious, and simple mode of procedure, which needs but two slight changes to put it almost even with the most advanced Codes of Procedure, viz. shorten and abolish the rule days, and extend the power of the chancellor to take oral testimony at the hearing. An examination of our statutes on the subject extends through a period of 150 years. See Act Oct., 1748, 6 Hen. St. at Large, p. 207; Act Nov., 1753, Id. (Ed. 1794,) p. 345, § 38; Revisal of 1819, (1st Ed.) pp. 196-215. (Act Dec. 21, 1818;) Revisor's Rep. of Code 1849, p. 843; Code 1849, (Ed. 1860,) c. 171, p. 709, (Acts W. Va. 1863, c. 73;) Code W. Va. 1868, (Ed. 1891,) c. 125, p. 800. Our present law on exceptions to answers reads as follows: "When a plaintiff in equity files exceptions to an answer the exceptions shall at once be set down for argument." "When exceptions to an answer have been sustained if the defendant put in a second answer which is adjudged insufficient he shall be examined on interrogation and committed until he answers them." Code 1891, §§ 54, 55, c. 125. See Act Nov., 1753, (1 Code 1819, p. 214.) If the plaintiffs intended to insist on their exceptions, they should, by an order for that purpose, have had them set down for argument, or have brought them to the attention of the court, and had them disposed of as preliminary to any hearing of the cause. Where this is not done, or a general replication to the answer is entered, the exceptions to the answers are treated as abandoned, and the answer deemed sufficient as to any discovery prayed for. Story, Eq. Pl. § 877; citing Coop. Eq. Pl. 328. See Hughes v. Blake, 6 Wheat. 453; Clarke v. Tinsley, 4 Rand. (Va.) 250; Richardson v. Donehoo, 16 W. Va. 685; Rogers v. Verlander, 30 W. Va. 619-637, 5 S. E. 847; Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108; Coleman v. Lyne, 4 Rand. (Va.) 454-457. The exception to the answer should be noted as filed. 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 763-775. The effect of entering a replication is to admit the sufficiency of the defendant's answer, and to exclude all exceptions thereto. 1 Bart. Ch. Pr. 417. Although there appears no order in the record noting the filing of the general replication, yet it is recited in the order of reference as one of the pleadings on which the cause is heard.

and that is sufficient; and, if the exceptions to the answer are not well founded, it is not ground to reverse a decree that they were not set down to be argued, but the case was heard and decided without passing upon them. Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Grat. 102.

2. Sustaining defendants' exceptions to sundry depositions taken on behalf of plaintiffs. Under section 23, c. 130, Code, the court correctly sustained the exception taken to the depositions of plaintiffs, so far as they were examined as witnesses on their own behalf in regard to personal transactions and communications between them and James Evans, deceased, against the defendants as his executors. The other exception related to the deposition of four witnesses who testified that they had borrowed money of James Evans, deceased, at the rate of 8 per cent. On the part of plaintiffs it is contended that such evidence tended to show that it was the general habit of the testator to lend money at that rate of interest, and that proof of such habit would be competent as tending to show a lending at such rate in this instance. I think the court was right in excluding this testimony as immaterial. It does not belong to that class of facts which are proved by the concurrence of desire and opportunity to commit them. It is not such evidence as the law requires in cases of usury. It does not even establish habit. The general rule is that, when the issue is whether the party did a particular thing, it is not admissible to put in evidence that he did a similar thing at some other time; and nothing appears to withdraw this case from the operation of the rule. On the contrary, it is within the reason of the rule; it would be trying an irrelevant side issue, with the trial prolonged, and the real issue overridden and obscured.

3. That the court, by its final decree of April 12, 1892, simply dissolved the injunction, and dismissed plaintiffs' bill without passing upon plaintiffs' exceptions thereto, or defendants' exceptions, or upon the report itself, making no allusion to it whatever, except that it was a paper read at the hearing, although made and returned in obedience to the order of reference of the court of February 24, 1891. Ten witnesses gave their depositions, all called for plaintiffs except one. No evidence was taken before the commissioner. Defendants claimed that there was due their testator from the plaintiffs the sum of $3,500, with interest from the 1st day of January, 1885, subject to a credit of $200 as of January 13, 1890, and that it did not include any usurious interest. Plaintiffs claimed that it was usurious, and that there were credits not given, and that the correct balance, after purging it of usurious interest and giving them credits, left the correct balance of $3,396.59, as of 1st January, 1890. The commissioner, among other things, says in his report as follows: "Owing to the nature and amount of evidence before your commissioner, he has had considerable difficulty in ascertaining the facts sought by this decree of reference; but he has carefully and thoroughly examined all the evidence before him, and, from all the evidence in the case, it is the opinion of your commissioner that the plaintiffs paid to James Evans usurious interest at the rate of 8 per cent., in advance, for the years up to November 10, 1880." "It seems to me that after taking into consideration the allegations of the bill, the answer, the nature of the indorsements, and especially the order of Joseph Hartman to James Snyder, which was paid by George Johnson to James Evans, no other conclusion can be arrived at than the one I have arrived at, namely, that usury was charged by said Evans, and paid by plaintiffs, Joseph and Elliott Hartman;" and he gives as the true amount due from plaintiffs on the deed of trust to defendants, the executors of James Evans, $4,322.35, as of May 13, 1891. He, however, makes other statements to meet "all the other views of the case." One is, $4,837, credit January 13, 1890, by $200, admitted in the answer to have been paid, leaves, on May 13, 1891, $4,637; another, $4,766.70; another is, $4,479.77.

A short history of these transactions is as follows: On the 1st day of November, 1876, plaintiffs borrowed of Col. James Evans $1,000, gave him their single bill of that date, due, with interest payable annually, in five years; and to secure the payment thereof they executed a deed of trust to defendant Marshall M. Dent, trustee, on two tracts of land,—one containing 69½ acres; the other 83½ acres,—duly acknowledged and admitted to record on January 1, 1881. They gave decedent a negotiable note for $61.65, due in six months, with interest, for a balance of interest on the deed of trust. On November 5, 1877, they borrowed of Col. Evans the further sum of $1,000, gave their note of that date, with interest payable annually, and due in five years, and, to secure this, executed a deed of trust of same date, whereby they granted to defendant Oliver H. Dille, trustee, the same two tracts of land, and two additional tracts,—one of 33 acres and 2 poles; the other of 13 acres. This also was duly acknowledged and admitted to record. On 1st November, 1881, they obtained a further loan,—this time of $1,100,—and they executed to Col. Evans their single bill for the amount, dated November, 1881, bearing interest from November 1, 1881, payable November 1, 1882, with interest, and, to secure it, executed to Joseph Moreland, Esq., trustee, a deed of trust on the same four tracts of land. This was duly admitted to record. On the 1st day of January, 1885, the balance on these three deeds of trust was calculated, and found to be $3,500, for which they executed to Col. Evans their bond of that date, payable on or before 1st January, 1886, and, to secure the payment, conveyed the same four tracts of land to defendant Clarence B. Dille, trustee, which was also duly recorded. James Evans, the trust creditor, died on — day of —, 1889, leaving a will whereby he appointed his son Thomas R. Evans, and his two sons-in-law, Oliver H. Dille and John N. Dawson, his executors, who proved the will and qualified as executors, and thereupon requested and required the trustee, Clarence B. Dille, to advertise and sell the three tracts mentioned in the deed, the tract of 13½ acres having been released. The trustee accordingly advertised that he would, on the 26th of May, 1890, in front of the courthouse in Morgantown, W. Va., sell said three tracts for one-third cash in hand, one-third in a year, with interest, and the residue payable in two years, with interest, taking from the purchaser notes with good security, and retaining the legal title till the notes were paid. Thereupon plaintiffs brought this suit in equity, making the following defendants: Thomas R. Evans, Oliver H. Dille, and John N. Dawson, executors of the last will of James Evans, deceased, Clarence B. Dille, trustee, Marshall M. Dent, trustee, and Joseph Moreland, trustee,—setting out, inter alia, the above facts, and making exhibits of these trust deeds, etc. They charge the debt secured to be usurious; that the lands are very valuable, worth three times the debt claimed as due; that neither of said deeds of trust has been released; that the legal title is outstanding; that the amount due is not ascertained, nor the amount of usury. They therefore pray that said executors and trustees be made parties defendant; that they answer fully as to the 8 per cent. and certain other special interrogatories; that a preliminary injunction may be granted, restraining the sale under the trust deed until the legal title can be got in; that the real and true amount of money due under the trust deeds or deed be first ascertained by the court, according to the rules and practice of courts of chancery, the usury, if any, purged away, and, finally, that the court may take charge of and execute said trust, causing complete justice to be done, as to the court shall seem right. The temporary injunction was granted May 10, 1890. The defendants the executors answered, denying the usury and other charges as to the amount due, but say that they are informed and believe that the land is worth $14,000, etc.

Our law on the subject of commissioners in chancery and their reports is found in chapter 129, p. 818, Code, (Ed. 1891.) Every commissioner shall examine and report upon such accounts and matters as may be referred to him by any court. After its completion he shall retain it 10 days for the examination of parties unless otherwise ordered by the court or agreed by the parties. Any party may inspect the report without taking a copy, and file exceptions thereto, and the commissioner shall, with his report, return the exceptions, with such remarks thereon as he may deem pertinent, and the evidence relating thereto; but any party may except to such report at the first term after it is returned, or by leave of the court after such term. The 11 exceptions of defendants to this report bear no date, as they should have done, and there is nothing to show when they were filed, except that they were read at the final hearing, April 12, 1892, 11 months after it was filed. If the exceptions had been filed with the commissioner, he would have examined them, and made some additions, and perhaps corrections, to his report; such, for example, as a statement showing the amount due the executors on the theory that no usurious interest had been charged or paid. At any rate, the general convenience of such a practice is obvious, often obviating the delay of recommittal, and evidently contemplated by the statute as the general rule; and, for the same reason, the rule in many courts is that no exceptions to the commissioner's report can be made which were not taken before him. See Story v. Livingston, 13 Pet. 359; McMicken v. Perrin, 18 How. 510; Sand, Eq. 633; 1 Fost. Fed. Pr. § 315. A good commissioner is the right arm of the court, and his services are indispensable to the due administration of justice in cases like this. The investigations and conclusions of a man of sense and experience as a commissioner have been found to be entitled to great weight. Hence the reason of the rule that every presumption is in favor of the correctness of the decision of a master, and it is not usual to reject his findings, unless, upon examination, such findings are found to be unsupported or defective in some essential particular. See Kimberly v. Arms, 129 U. S. 512-524, 9 Sup. Ct. 353; citing Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U. S. 617-666, 9 Sup. Ct. 177; Tilghman v. Proctor, 125 U. S. 136, 8 Sup. Ct. 894; Medsker v. Bonebrake, 108 U. S. 66, 2 Sup. Ct. 351. See Keck v. Alender, 37 W. Va. 201, 16 S. E. 520; Fry v. Feamster, 38 W. Va. 454, 15 S. E. 253; Roger v. O'Neal, 33 W. Va. 159, 10 S. E. 375; Fisher v. McNulty, 30 W. Va. 195, 3 S. E. 593; Smith v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 642; Handy v. Scott, 26 W. Va. 710; Graham v. Graham, 21 W. Va. 698; Prichard v. Evans, 31 W. Va. 137, 5 S. E. 461; Boyd v. Gunnison, 14 W. Va. 1; Ward v. Ward, 21 W. Va. 262; Thompson v. Catlett, 24 W. Va. 525; Lynch v. Henry, 25 W. Va. 416.

Our statute makes 6 per cent. the legal rate of interest for the loan or forbearance of money, or other thing of value, and forbids any person from taking, on any contract, money or other thing above the value of such rate, and makes all such contracts and assurances, made directly or indirectly, for a loan or forbearance of money at a greater rate, usurious as to such excess of interest agreed to be paid, and no further; and it provides for the trial of the questions: (1)

Was the contract assurance or other writing usurious? (2) If usurious, to what extent? (3) Whether or not interest has been paid on the contract or writing above 6 per cent., and, if so, to what extent? It also gives the borrower the right to exhibit his bill in equity against the lender, and compel him to discover upon oath the money or thing really lent, etc.; and if property has been conveyed to secure the payment of the debt, and a sale thereof is about to be made or is apprehended, an injunction may be awarded to prevent such sale pending the suit. See Code, (Ed. 1891,) c. 96, p. 713. This was one of the purposes, and only one among others, for which this suit in equity was brought, and the injunction prayed for. The court, on hearing the cause on the pleadings and proofs then in, referred these questions as to usury, mentioned in the statute, to Commissioner Lazzell, and I cannot see any good reason in this record why such reference was not eminently proper; and, if we are to apply to the findings and conclusions of the commissioner the rule already announced, it is difficult to see why they should not be held to be, in the main, correct. Without going into details, it is only necessary to say that I do not think there is any clear and decided preponderance of testimony against his finding on the question of usury; at any rate, the court ought to pass directly upon the report.

But there are reasons why this cause should have been retained, and the trust executed under the direction of the court, no matter what conclusion the court may have reached in regard to the alleged usury. Trusts are especially the subject of equitable supervision, and courts of equity are always open, at the instance of the cestui que trust, to compel trustees to perform their duties. They will also interfere by injunction to restrain the improper exercise of the powers of the trustee, (1 Bart. Eq. Pr. 444,) whose duty it is to look to the interests of the trust debtor as well as those of the creditor. In deeds of trust, especially those of long standing, where the amount due and to be raised by a sale is uncertain, (Hogan v. Duke, 20 Grat. 244, 253,) where there are various deeds of trust or other incumbrances, (Horton v. Bond, 28 Grat. 815; Cole v. McRae, 6 Rand. [Va.] 644,) where the legal title is outstanding, (Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Grat. 492, 498,) where there is a cloud upon the title, (Lane v. Liddall, Gilmer, 130,) or, in conclusion, any impediment to a fair execution of the trust, the trustee, who is the agent of both parties, and bound to act impartially between them, may and ought of his own motion to apply to a court of equity for his own safety, as well as for the interest of those concerned, to remove the impediment and direct his conduct; and, if he should fail to do this, the party injured by his default has an unquestionable right to do so. Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Grat. 492, 498, opinion of Judge Moncure, who refers to 1 Lomax, Dig. 322-326; 1 Tuck.

Comm. bk. 2, pp. 101, 106; Quarles v. Lacy, 4 Munf. 251; Gay v. Hancock, 1 Rand. (Va.) 72; Chowning v. Cox, Id. 306; Gibson v. Jones, 5 Leigh, 370; Miller v. Argyle, Id. 460; Wilkins v. Gordon, 11 Leigh, 547. See opinion of same judge in Hogan v. Duke, 20 Grat. 224, 253. See opinion of Burks, J., in Horton v. Bond, 28 Grat. 815, 822, where the same principle is applied to decrees of sale. See, also, Shultz v. Hansbrough, 33 Grat. 567, 576, (opinion of Burks, J.) The loans in this case run through a period of ten years, were secured by four different deeds of trust, and as many different trustees all made defendants. It is true that the last deed of trust, dated January 1, 1885, to Clarence B. Dille, trustee, who was about to sell, recites the $3,500 thereby secured as the balance due at that date, after deducting all credits, upon three deeds of trust theretofore executed by plaintiff, reciting them; but the creditor did not execute the deed of trust containing such recital, and, although he accepted it, no technical release was ever executed by him according to section 1, c. 76, of the Code, so that it might be a question whether the naked legal title to the two important tracts did not still stand vested in Marshall M. Dent, trustee in the deed dated November 10, 1876, and of the two smaller tracts in O. H. Dille, trustee. Again, Clarence B. Dille, trustee, advertised that he would sell the whole under the deed of trust, in his notice representing it as the only body of coal on the east side of the river for sale, underlaid with over 150 acres of coking coal. Now, it may be that this mineral might, of itself, bring enough to pay the trust debt, but the trustee, without some competent authority, to whose directions he could look for his guidance and protection, could not sell the mere "mineral right;" or it may be that one of the tracts would bring enough, and in either mode the trust debt might be fully satisfied, and the plaintiffs left still owners of their farm and home. The land is estimated to be worth $14,000, and I infer from the record that the vein of coking coal constitutes a good part of such value. See Mickie v. Jeffries, 21 Grat. 334; Stove Works v. Gray, 9 W. Va. 469. See Bart. Ch. Pr. 446. The bill itself is framed, not only with reference to purging the trust debt of usurious interest, but alleges all these additional grounds for having the trust executed under the sanction and direction of the court; and for this plaintiffs expressly pray. Nor do defendants, in their answer, attempt to deny, explain, or remove any of these impediments to a sale in the county by the trustee; only they insist that the debt is all due, that there is no usury, and, if any such usurious interest had been taken by the testator, it was more than five years before the bringing of the suit, and they set up and rely on the bar. My construction of the third clause of section 6, c. 96, of the Code, is that the excess of interest paid is to be credited, as long as any part of the usurious contract remains unpaid. This is a point, however, to which the commissioner's attention was not directed, and upon which he has not reported. We are of opinion, therefore, that the decree of April 12, 1892, is erroneous, and must be reversed, and that the cause must be remanded for further proceedings; the cause to be retained, and the trust executed, under the direction and sanction of the court.

POWERS v. COPE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 8, 1894.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT — CONTRACT — QUESTION FOR JURY — LIABILITY OF LANDLORD FOR REPAIRS.

1. Where premises are leased for one year by rent contract, with the privilege, at the tenant's option, to retain them the following year at such price as any one else would give, and this option was exercised, the tenant giving his notes for the second year's rent, and the contract for this year being otherwise in parol, it is a question for the jury, there being evidence on that subject, whether the parol contract embraced an agreement to apply certain terms of the previous rent contract to the second year's occupation or not.

2. A written contract, in which the tenant stipulates to make all needful repairs at his own expense, "except the putting on of a new roof, new doors, and new floor," exempts the landlord from making any repairs other than those expressly excepted, and even from making those, unless they are needed and called for by the tenant. If no new roof be needed or called for, the fact that new valleys or gutters, or some other repairs on the roof, became necessary, would not charge the landlord. The phrase "new roof" is not ambiguous.

3. If repairs to the sidewalk were embraced in the tenant's undertaking, they would not be chargeable to the landlord, though made at the latter's request; and if they were not so embraced, as the landlord did not stipulate in the rent contract concerning them, they were not matter for set-off, in resistance to a distress warrant for the rent, though the tenant might be entitled to maintain an action therefor.

4. There was evidence to warrant the verdict, and the court did not err in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Bibb county; C. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by V. S. Cope against J. C. Powers to recover rent by distress warrant. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and a new trial denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Mrs. Cope obtained a distress warrant against Powers upon her affidavit alleging that he owed her $750 for rent of the described premises in Macon; that $150 of the same was due and unpaid; that the balance was not due, but would become due in certain installments; and that Powers was seeking to remove his goods from the premises. Powers defended, alleging he does not owe plaintiff any sum for rent. He rented the premises as a bar, and to do business therein. The house is wholly unfit for a business place, because it leaks so badly it affords very little protection from water during rain. Further, because of this leakage, his goods, carpets, etc., have been damaged $50, which is far more than the house is worth per month for rent, and he asks to recover this amount from plaintiff. Further, plaintiff has become liable to him, on account of the leaky condition of the house, $650, for he leased the house for three years, with a view of using it for that time, has spent $650 in repairing the inside of the house, plastering, etc., in order to make it decent and suitable for a place of business. but, on account of plaintiff's failure to keep the roof in proper condition, it leaks so badly that all of said work has been destroyed, the plastering has fallen off, and the wall paper fallen loose, thus rendering the house unsightly and unfit for business. Further, that he expended on the sidewalk, by direction of the chief of police, and the consent and request of plaintiff, $22, which he asks to recover of her. He gave plaintiff notice of the defective condition of the roof, but, disregarding her obligation, she neglected and refused to repair it. He amended, amplifying his defense, and making more specific statements, and further alleging that he notified plaintiff that the floor and timbers under the floor were badly decayed and unfit for use, yet she refused to repair the same, and he was compelled to put a new floor and new sleepers under the floor, in order to make the house tenable, which cost him $21, and which he seeks to recover. Also, that he was constructively evicted by plaintiff, because of her allowing the roof to become so leaky as to render the house untenable, and thus compelling him to leave the premises. There was a verdict for plaintiff for $750, and, defendant's motion for a new trial being overruled, he excepts.

The motion contained the grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc., and that it was contrary to a specified portion of the charge, and the evidence applicable thereto. Also, because the court erred in charging: "If you believe from the evidence that it was understood and agreed between them that the terms of the written contract for the year 1892, ending August 1, 1892, should also apply to the renting of the year from August, 1892, to August, 1893, then the court charges you that Mr. Powers agreed in that contract to do all the work at his own expense, without deduction from the rental, which was necessary to keep the property in repair, including all miscellaneous work on doors, windows, locks, gas, water, fixtures, etc., and to do all and every sort and kind of work, to any extent whatever, necessary and proper to keep up the inside of said building in good repair, except the putting on of a new roof, new doors, and new floor." Alleged to be error, simply because a recital of the work was incorporated in the contract, and calculated to mislead the jury; a great many kinds of repairs being mentioned, about which there was no contract. Also, because the court did not explain to the jury how that contract affected the issues on trial. Error in construing the contract, in the charge, as follows: "A new roof would not mean the keeping of a portion of the roof in repair. A new roof would [not] mean the stopping of the leaks in a gutter." Alleged to be error, without going further, and telling the jury what was meant by the words "a new roof," as used in the contract, and as misleading. Also, in not charging, in this connection, that the words "a new roof," as used in the contract, meant if new material was used, as if it became necessary to cut out and put in a new valley, that that would be a new roof, in the sense used in the contract. Because the court erred in failing to charge that if the valley had become decayed, and it was necessary to cut the old one out and put in a new one, that would be a new roof, in the sense as used in the contract, and it would be plaintiff's duty to have that done; defendant contending that the valleys had so badly decayed that it was impossible to repair them, and that, in order to stop the leaks, it was necessary to put in a new valley. Error in charging: "The court charges you that, if you believe Powers fixed a sidewalk for Mrs. Cope from a notice from the chief of the police that she must fix it, that he cannot offset that against the claim for rent. He would have to resort to some other means. You will not consider any evidence, then, as to the amount paid out for the sidewalk." Alleged to be error because the item of fixing the sidewalk was fully pleaded and proven without objection from the court or plaintiff. Because the court erred in construing the contract between the parties to mean that a "new roof" meant an entire new roof, and also in submitting to the jury to say whether the words "a new roof" meant an entire new roof, or the use of new material, as new tin, in repairing the roof; the words "new roof," as used in the contract, being ambiguous. The contract in question was one of lease of the property for a year from September 1, 1891, to September 1, 1892, signed by plaintiff and defendant, and contained stipulations that Powers would keep the storehouse and kitchen in good repair during the continuance of the lease, ordinary wear and tear excepted; it being declared and agreed by him that the property, at the time of the execution of the lease, and at the time of the first occupation thereunder, was in good repair and condition; that he agreed to do all the work at his own expense, and without deduction from the rental price, necessary to keep in repair the building, "including all the miscellaneous work on the doors, windows, locks, gas, water, fixtures, roof, etc., and to do all and every sort and kind of work, to any extent whatever, necessary and proper to keep the inside of said building in good repair, except the putting on of a new roof, new doors, and new floor."

L. D. Moore, for plaintiff in error. A. Proudfit, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

METROPOLITAN ST. R. CO. v. JOHNSON. JOHNSON v. METROPOLITAN ST. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 3, 1893.)

WITNESS — EXAMINATION — ACTION BY HUSBAND FOR INJURIES TO WIFE — EVIDENCE — DAMAGES.

1. Where a question to a witness is objected to as leading, and the court, without directly sustaining the objection, suggests a better form, which is adopted by the examining counsel, there is in this no cause for a new trial.

2. On the trial of an action against a street-railroad company for damages to the plaintiff occasioned by negligent injury to his wife, sustained in consequence of running a dummy against her while she was endeavoring to cross a street in front of a train, it is not competent to prove what was the usual custom of pedestrians when they undertook to cross a street along which cars drawn by dummies were passing.

3. In an action by a husband for loss of his wife's services, occasioned by a tortious personal injury to her, he can recover the reasonable value of such services as have been lost to him from the time of the injury to the date of trial; and in calculating the amount the jury may take into consideration the nature of the services, and all the circumstances of the case. There need be no direct or express evidence of value, either by the day, week, month, or any other period of time, or of any aggregate sum. The peculiar relation which the wife sustains to her husband and his household takes her services out of the rules of law which apply to computing the value of services rendered by hirelings or ordinary servants.

Error from city court, Atlanta county; Howard Van Epps, Judge.

Action by J. F. Johnson against the Metropolitan Street-Railroad Company to recover for damages resulting from personal injuries sustained by plaintiff's wife. There was judgment for plaintiff, and a new trial denied. Defendant brings error, and plaintiff assigns error by cross bill of exceptions. Affirmed.

N. J. & T. A. Hammond, for plaintiff in error. Burton Smith and W. H. Pope, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The court made no direct ruling as to whether the question objected to as leading was or was not so, but suggested what the presiding judge deemed a better form of question. This suggestion was adopted by counsel, and the question, in its original form, was not pressed. Surely no cause for a new trial can be found in this.

2. In trying the question of negligence by the company or by its engineer relatively to Mrs. Johnson on the particular occasion in controversy, and incidentally the question of her contributory negligence, it was not competent evidence to show that the usual custom of pedestrians, as observed by the engineer, had been on former occasions to do thus and so. Their conduct would be no measure of diligence for Mrs. Johnson, because that measure is to be found, not in the conduct of such persons merely as the engineer had observed, but in the conduct of every prudent person who might be placed in like circumstances with those which environed Mrs. Johnson at the time of this occurrence. This standard was not one for proof by witnesses, but was already in the minds of the jurors. They were to compare her conduct with that standard, and not with a standard raised in the mind of the engineer, or which might be raised in their own minds by what he had noticed relatively to the usual conduct of certain unknown and unnamed persons, who may have been more or less diligent than prudent persons generally. Nor was the rejected evidence relevant touching the company's or the engineer's negligence, for the engineer was bound to anticipate that Mrs. Johnson would act as a prudent person, according to a legal or jury standard, and not merely according to the usual custom of those pedestrians whom he himself had personally observed.

3. The action being for a tortious personal injury to the plaintiff's wife, the court certainly did not err in charging the jury that, if the injury was committed, he could recover the reasonable value of her services which were lost to him during the period between the time of the injury and the date of trial. Without adjudicating the question, we will observe that our present opinion is that the court could have gone further in respect to time, so as to embrace any loss of service which would be reasonably certain to occur on account of the injury after the trial and during the probable existence of the coverture, the probable duration being measured by the continuance, according to the mortuary tables, of the joint lives of the matrimonial pair. Nor did the court err in charging that in calculating the amount of the damages the jury could take into consideration the nature of the wife's services, and all the circumstances of the case. When the loss of a wife's services, resulting from a personal injury to her, is to be compensated for, she is not to be treated as an ordinary servant or as a mere hireling. *Cooley, Torts, 226; Railroad Co. v. Goodman, 62 Pa. St. 329. She sustains to her husband and his household a relation special and peculiar. Her place cannot be supplied. No other is capable of filling it. Some wives perform manual labor, others do not; yet the husbands of the latter, no less than those of the former, would certainly be entitled to compensation from wrongdoers for causing inability to perform service. The actual facts and circumstances of each case should guide the jury in esti-inating for themselves, in the light of their own observation and experience, and to the satisfaction of their own consciences, the amount which would fairly and justly compensate the plaintiff for his loss. Certainly some elements of loss, such as manual labor, would be subject to estimation by witnesses; and, if evidence of this kind were produced, of course the jury should consider it together with the other facts. But what we hold distinctly is that there need be no direct or express evidence of the value of the wife's services, either by the day, week, month, or any other period of time, or of any aggregate sum. The court committed no error in denying a new trial.

While the argument here was in progress, counsel for defendant in error expressed a willingness for the judgment to be reversed, and entered his consent to that effect in writing on the transcript of the record. This was done in the hope of a reversal on the cross bill of exceptions, and for the sake of the opportunity which that reversal would afford to recover in another trial more damages than the jury awarded by the verdict already rendered. But we are satisfied with that verdict, as was the court below, and consequently we leave it to stand. Judgment affirmed. Cross bill of exceptions dismissed.

COLLEY v. GATE CITY COFFIN CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 6, 1893.)

INJURIES TO EMPLOYE — DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES — AMENDING DECLARATION — LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

The action being by an employee against his employer for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defective machinery and appliances which the employee was using in the line of his duty, the declaration is amendable, at the trial, by varying and amplifying the particulars in respect to which the machinery was defective, and in respect to the manner in which the injuries were inflicted, the amendment evidently relating to the same occasion, the same occurrence, the same injuries, and the same machinery referred to in the declaration. No new cause of action is introduced, either with reference to the statute of limitations or any other rule of law. The amendment offered being good in substance, and relevant, the court erred in rejecting it, and this error vitiated the trial, and rendered nonsuit, in which it resulted, erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta: Howard Van Epps, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by John W. Colley against the Gate City Coffin Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

On May 14, 1892, Colley filed his declaration, alleging: On May 7, 1890, he was in the employment of defendant, engaged in curving sides of boxes or for boxes, and discovered that the belt that ran the curve saw was off the pulley. The sand drum was run by the same shafting that ran the curving saw, and petitioner had to adjust the belt from the tight pulley to the loose pulley in order to stop the shafting so that he could place the saw belt on the pulley; and, while attempting to adjust the belt, the hanger was torn loose from the floor, striking him with great force, breaking his collar bone in two places, and splitting the skin, besides breaking two ribs. He then set out his pain and suffering; that the injuries were permanent; his capacity to earn money reduced one-half; that he was able-bodied before the injury, and earned a certain sum per day, etc.; and further alleged he was in no wise to blame, but it was the result of gross negligence on the part of defendant. All the machinery was run by steam power, and the method adopted by him in attempting to adjust the belt was the usual and only way he knew how to adjust it, and was in keeping with directions that had been previously given him, or rather he did it as he had noticed others do it; and, but for the fact that the shafting was improperly and unsafely put up, the injury would not have happened. The countershafting was out of balance from being bent or improperly hung, and added to the cause of the injury. This defect was also unknown to him. He had only a very short experience in working with and managing machinery. He also alleged that this cause of action was sued to the December term, 1890, of the court, dismissed by order of the court on March 25, 1892, and renewed in the time required by law. Upon the trial plaintiff's counsel asked him as a witness to state how the hanger that held the countershafting to the floor was fastened to the floor. An objection to this was sustained, on the ground that there was no allegation in the declaration complaining of the fastening of the hangers. Plaintiff's counsel also asked him the question, "What made it break loose at that end?" and he answered: "I saw nothing to make it break loose. If it had been properly put to the floor, it would not have broken loose, I don't believe." On objection the court ruled this answer out, upon the ground that there was no allegation that it was not properly put to the floor. Plaintiff's counsel also asked one Ashley, who was an expert witness, to state how machinery on the order of this (indicating) should be attached to the floor. On objection the court held that under the declaration plaintiff could not attack the fastening of the hanger to the floor. Thereupon plaintiff offered to amend by adding to the declaration that the shafting or hangers were improperly or unsafely fastened down; that the same should have been bolted to the floor, or longer leg screws should have been used in fastening it down; that those used were entirely too short, and in this way the shafting or hangers were improperly and unsafely put up. The court refused to allow this amendment, making the following ruling: "The court recognizes the doctrine fully that a plaintiff ordinarily, who has filed an action in time, may vary his averments by amendment with additional grounds of negligence. He may add additional grounds of negligence not suggested in the original declaration; and, if the original declaration was filed in time, the fact that such an amendment was offered after the lapse of the statutory time will not defeat its allowance. Under those circumstances, the amendment would relate back to the original action, and will be treated as if originally ingrafted upon it. I say I fully assent to that doctrine of law. But the case is different where the cause of action was barred at the time that the suit was brought. In this case this action was barred when this suit was brought, except in so far as it specifically revived or renewed the action of the original declaration. In the original declaration the ground of recovery was sought both upon the suggestion that the shafting was bent and out of balance, and also upon the ground that the hanger was insecurely fastened to the floor. The new declaration specifically assigns the ground of negligence to be that the shaft—I suppose it means the countershaft, though it does not say so—that the shaft was out of balance; and that the reason it was out of balance was because it was bent, or improperly hung. I hold that there is no allegation at all in this declaration which can be construed, upon the principles which govern the construction of pleadings, to be an allegation, even in general terms, that the hanger was not properly secured to the floor. That being true, the amendment offered now to an action barred when the suit was begun cannot be entertained." On this ruling the plaintiff assigned error, because the first declaration charged specifically that the hanger was insecurely fastened to the floor, and, there being enough in the second declaration to amend by, the hanger and shafting and countershafting being inseparable, the amendment should have been allowed, and the statute of limitations did not apply. He further assigned error upon the rejection of testimony as already stated, and upon the grant of a nonsuit on the close of his evidence.

R. R. Arnold, J. A. Van Winkle, and R. J. Jordan, for plaintiff in error. Hall & Hammond, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The main errors complained of in the bill of exceptions were the rejection of an amendment offered to the plaintiff's declaration and the granting of a nonsuit. It is unnecessary to discuss the assignments of error with reference to the rejection of certain testimony which the plaintiff sought to introduce, because, if the amendment to the declaration had been allowed, the court would doubtless have admitted this evidence. The substance of the declaration and of the amendment offered is set forth in the reporter's statement. The amendment should have been allowed, and the case should have been submitted to the jury. We have not, in deciding this case, paid any attention to the contents of a previous declaration filed by the plaintiff against the same defendant, because that declaration is not properly before this court. It was not introduced in evidence, nor was a copy of it attached as an exhibit to the present declaration, or its substance set out therein. Therefore the specification of the former declaration in the bill of exceptions as a part of the record of the present case was improper, and the judge had no authority to recognize or order it to be sent up as a part of such record. Taking the second declaration,—the one now before us,—and the amendment offered to it, the first question is, did the amendment set up a new and distinct cause of action, or was it merely an amplification of that contained in the declaration? There can be no doubt that this declaration is very loosely and imperfectly drawn. It would seem that with very slight effort or care the counsel who prepared it might have made it much more clear and satisfactory, and thus have relieved the trial court and this court of the labor and investigation unnecessarily imposed upon them in passing upon its sufficiency. It does, however, state that the plaintiff was an employe of the defendant; that he received serious personal injuries, which resulted from defective machinery and appliances which the employe was using in the line of his duty; that the plaintiff was in no wise to blame, and that the injuries were the result of the gross negligence of the defendant in improperly and unsafely putting up the shafting, which was a part of the machinery in question. The purpose of the amendment was undoubtedly to amplify, and to some extent vary, the particulars in respect to which the machinery was defective, and also in respect to the manner in which the injuries were inflicted. It is also quite clear that this amendment related to the same occasion, the same occurrence, and the same injuries referred to in the declaration, and consequently it does not introduce a new and distinct cause of action.

We will now inquire briefly as to the bearing of the statute of limitations upon this case as affects the question of amendment. The declaration having been filed more than two years after the injuries therein complained of, the plaintiff's right of action is barred, unless the present suit is in fact a renewal of a former one for the same cause of action, and was instituted within six months from the dismissal of the original suit. It will be observed the declaration alleges that the former action was brought to the December term, 1890, of the city court of Atlanta, and was dismissed on the 25th day of March, 1892, and that the present suit, filed May 14, 1892, was a renewal of the original action. Under section 2932 of the Code, the present action was brought in time if, taking together the declaration and the amendment offered to it, they relate to the same cause of action as that for which the first suit was brought. Whether they do or not is a question of fact which could be easily settled by a comparison of the two declarations, but it was no obstacle to the allowance of the amendment that the action would have been barred if the present suit had been delayed until the time the amendment was offered, provided this suit itself was brought in time. Verdery v. Barrett, 89 Ga. 349, 15 S. E. 476. See, also, Railway Co. v. Thomas, 89 Ala. 294, 7 South. 762, in which it was held that amendments adding new averments of facts more clearly showing the negligence complained of, or otherwise altering the grounds of recovery, or varying the alleged mode in which the defendant had violated its duties, should be allowed; and that such amendments were not subject to the bar of the statute of limitations if the action was commenced within the time designated by the statute.

As to the effect of the plaintiff's failure to introduce the record of the former suit, and consequently to prove its existence or character, we will remark that it was incumbent on him to show that in point of fact the present suit was a renewal of the former one. This he could not do without putting the record in evidence, and, consequently, but for the error of the court in rejecting the amendment to the declaration, the granting of the nonsuit would have been undoubtedly right, on the ground that the plaintiff failed to take his case out of the statute of limitations. This error, however, vitiated the entire trial and its result. By the rejection of this amendment the plaintiff was cut off from making out his case. We have already suggested that this ruling deprived him of the benefit of some testimony which he actually sought to introduce, and it may be that it prevented his offering other testimony which might have sustained his action. At any rate, he was entitled to a trial upon his declaration as it would have been with the amendment allowed. He would then have had a full and fair opportunity to get his entire case fairly and squarely before the jury. The judgment granting the nonsuit was necessarily infected with the erroneous refusal to allow the amendment, and therefore it cannot stand. Judgment reversed.

COLEMAN v. EASTERLING.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 20, 1893.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—PLEADINGS—TENDER.

The allegations of the petition seem sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds upon the ground of part performance; but there being no distinct and definite averment as to the balance due by the plaintiff to the defendant, or of a tender thereof, this court cannot say the trial court erred in holding the petition did not set forth a state of facts which would entitle the plaintiff to the relief prayed for, or in dismissing the action. Under the petition as it stands, it does not appear that the plaintiff's cause of action had fully ripened. Had he made a proper tender before filing his petition, and alleged this fact, the question presented would have been different.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Tatnall county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Action by D. W. Coleman against Jesse J. Easterling for specific performance of a contract, and other relief. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Coleman filed his petition for accounting, injunction, and specific performance against Easterling. When the cause came on for trial, counsel for Easterling, stating that the answer to the petition could not be found, but that it had been filed, and that he desired to file a motion to dismiss the cause, did file an amendment to his answer, in which he alleged that the petitioner had not presented such a case as entitled him to the relief sought; that petitioner had not set out such a contract as the court would enforce, the contract being in respect to the sale of land, and existing in parol, and there being no part performance thereof, nor any act done in pursuance of the contract; and that, so far as petitioner undertook to set out a contract in writing, it appeared from the petition that said alleged contract was unsigned, and in violation of the statute of frauds. Petitioner was allowed to amend his petition, as will hereafter appear. The court sustained the motion to dismiss, and, to this ruling, petitioner excepts.

The petition alleged: Two tracts of land in Tatnall county, describing them, were sold at sheriff's sale, one of them on July 4, 1882, under an execution from the superior court against petitioner in favor of Hardwick, Sheppard and McDonald being the purchasers at the sale, in consideration of $97.25. The other tract was sold by the sheriff on the first Tuesday in September, 1882, to McGee, for $50, this sale being under a mortgage fi. fa. in favor of Perry against petitioner. Deeds were made by the sheriff to the purchasers. McGee made his purchase for Sheppard and McDonald, to whom he afterwards conveyed. Copies of the sheriff's deeds are attached. Before said sheriff's sales, petitioner had been for several years the owner and possessor of the lands, and the same were bought at the sheriff's sales by Sheppard and McDonald at his special request, he not then being able to meet the obligations; it being then and there agreed between him and them that they would hold the title as security for the money advanced by them in buying the same, and also as security for other indebtedness due them by him; and in consideration thereof they permitted him to have possession of said lands after the sheriff's sales, and manage and treat the same as his own in all respects, he paying taxes thereon up to the present time. Sheppard and McDonald, during all the time they held the title as security, openly announced they would not sell the lands to any one except with petitioner's consent, and with the understanding that he might have the right to redeem them by paying the amount of the debt due. He has paid them the amount due on the purchase of the lands, holding their receipts therefor, but owed them other money, for which they still hold the title by his consent; and in the fall of 1887 they demanded of him a settlement and payment of the amount due them, offering to reconvey the title to him, or convey it to any one whom he might name, to be held as security for the money borrowed to pay them. He induced Easterling to advance him the money by paying it direct to them, and taking title from them as security therefor, and for any other sums which, in the business between him and Easterling, might become due to Easterling by him; and thereupon Easterling, at his special request, and under said agreement, which was in parol, took title to the land from them on February 9, 1888, paying them the $332. Copy of this deed is annexed. The agreement between Easterling and petitioner was substantially as is set out in the paper annexed, marked "Exhibit D," and, after the deed was made to Easterling, he stated to petitioner he would put the contract between them in writing, giving him the two years agreed on to redeem the land in, which was assented to by petitioner; but said contract was never made by Easterling, though petitioner is informed and believes that the paper annexed, the original of which is in the hands of McGee, attorney at law, was drawn, by direction of Easterling, by McGee as Easterling's attorney; and Easterling has admitted to petitioner, at divers times since February 10, 1888, and to others, that petitioner had two years in which to redeem the lands in accordance with the understanding between him and petitioner; nor did Easterling ever deny that such was the contract until several months ago, and after the Savannah & Western Railway Company had surveyed its line through the land, greatly enhancing its value. In addition to the $332 paid by Easterling, with interest thereon at 8 per cent., petitioner also owed him about $280, with interest, the whole of which, it was understood and agreed between them, was to be secured to Easterling by the title to the lands which he obtained as above mentioned. In pursuance of the agreement between him and Easterling, petitioner proceeded in conformity therewith, in cutting, hauling, and drifting timber to the mills named therein, delivering the same to Easterling, who kept accounts of the same, and showed to petitioner, in the spring of 1888, that, while the business up to that time had been unprofitable to petitioner, there was yet a balance in his favor, on the timber so delivered, of $48.40, which Easterling said he would pass to petitioner's credit; and it was then understood between them that petitioner was not to be compelled to cut and deliver to him any more timber under the contract at the then prices, it being an unprofitable business. Besides the $48.40, there are various other amounts due him by Easterling to be put against his indebtedness to Easterling, in the way of overcharges, some of which have been admitted by Easterling, and for other items, the whole amounting to about $125. He has never been able to get a full accounting with Easterling, but offered, about October 18, 1889, to pay him, upon an accounting between them, all the money due him by petitioner, which Easterling then declined, the offer being coupled with the demand on petitioner's part to have the title to the lands conveyed to him by Easterling; Easterling stating that he was willing to receive payment of the amount due him outside of the $332, besides interest, named in the deed, but would not receive the $332 and interest, and make title, as demanded. Petitioner is in possession of the land, and has been for several years before 1882 and since; has annually paid the taxes on the same; has made leases upon the same during 1889, for turpentine purposes; and has had a tenant on the land cultivating a portion of it,—the land lying on either side of petitioner's residence,—which is owned by him, and he exercising acts of ownership continuously over all of it. The land is worth about $1,600, Easterling having offered to buy it from him, shortly before the time he took title from Sheppard and McDonald, and to pay him $1,000 for it, and since then it has increased in value because of the location of the railroad mentioned. He has done all he could in order to comply with his contract with Easterling in good faith, and has been and is ready to come to an accounting with him, and pay him all he owes him; but Easterling refuses to receive it, sometimes declaring he is under no obligation to make title, and sometimes that he is waiting for the two years to expire, when he will dispose of the land as he sees fit. Petitioner prayed that Easterling might bring his deed into court; that he be enjoined from parting with the title to any one other than petitioner; that he be decreed to specifically perform his contract, and make deed to petitioner, upon payment by petitioner to him of the money found to be due by petitioner; and for general relief and process, and temporary restraining order.

Exhibit D, referred to, was in form a contract between Easterling and petitioner, dated February 10, 1888, but unsigned. It stated: In consideration of a promissory note that day made and delivered to Easterling by petitioner, for amounts stated, with interest, and due two years after date, Easterling had bargained with petitioner the tracts of land, describing them; that Easterling agreed to allow petitioner to cut the timber growing thereon, and, if necessary, to make advancements to enable petitioner to cut, haul, and run the timber to two certain mills, at either of which the timber was to be delivered to Easterling, who was to take charge of it, have it sawed, carried to Darien, and sold, and, after deducting the expenses thereof, to credit upon the notes of petitioner the net proceeds of the sales, after deducting amounts advanced to petitioner to enable him to cut, haul, and run the timber to said mills; that petitioner agreed to cut all the marketable timber growing on the lands, and deliver it to Easterling at the places mentioned, as fast as he could, and in no event was the timber so cut to be petitioner's property until each note mentioned in the contract had been settled in full; that petitioner agreed for Easterling to take charge of all such timber, and after deducting the expenses mentioned, or the advances made, to then credit the net proceeds upon petitioner's notes; that petitioner agreed, in the event he cut any of the timber and failed to deliver it to Easterling at the places specified, to forfeit whatever amount he might have paid on the notes, and relinquish all claim he might have to the land unto Easterling, and, in the event he failed to pay the notes, with interest, by the time they were due, to forfeit whatever amount he might have paid by the cutting, hauling, or drifting timber, or otherwise, and also relinquish all claim he might have to the land by reason of any payments he might make to Easterling; and that Easterling agreed, if petitioner paid the notes when due, with money or anything he would accept in lieu thereof, he would make to petitioner title in fee simple to the land; otherwise, it was mutually agreed the contract should no longer be binding on Easterling.

The amendment to the petition alleged: Said written contract was not signed by the parties, because of the trust and confidence reposed by petitioner in Easterling. Petitioner relied upon the declaration made by Easterling to him that it made no difference whether it was signed or not, and Easterling finally, finding that further deception would not avail, declared that the paper had been destroyed. Said contract was prepared by McGee under Easterling's direction, and expressed the agreement made between the parties. In pursuance and in part performance of it, petitioner made his arrangements to cut, and did cut, timber until about July 1, 1888, cutting, hauling, drifting, and delivering to Easterling 300 pieces, worth $900 or other large sum, which Easterling sold, and the exact net receipts from which are unknown to petitioner. After Easterling found that petitioner had obtained from McGee a duplicate of said contract, Easterling admitted that he had said written contract; and petitioner charges that the contract so made was to have been presented by Easterling to him for signature, but, relying upon the assurance of Easterling that he would present it for signing, and have petitioner sign and deliver the notes petitioner was to give, petitioner went to work, cutting, hauling, and delivering the timber, and Easterling went on making advances for provisions and expenses in drifting and hauling the timber. In this way the mutual dealings continued during the timber season, which ended in July, 1888, when it was mutually agreed that, owing to the low prices of timber, the cutting would be discontinued. Thereupon it was agreed between them that the timber should be leased for turpentine purposes, and the rent therefor, or so much thereof as necessary, be applied to petitioner's indebtedness to Easterling; and in pursuance of this agreement the land was so leased, and the very money tendered to Easterling was in pursuance of the agreement to lease, and derived from the lease. This money so tendered was to pay principal and interest of the indebtedness due by petitioner to Easterling, and the tender is continued.

Garrard, Meldrim & Newman and H. J. McGee, for plaintiff in error. Hines, Shubrick & Felder, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The reporter's statement sets forth, in substance, the allegations of the plaintiff's petition, to the dismissal of which he excepted. His contract with the defendant not being in writing, it was insisted that it was within the statute of frauds, and therefore not binding. The allegations of the petition, considered in connection with Exhibit D thereto, are perhaps sufficient to show there had been such a part performance by Coleman as would take the case out of the statute. The title to the lands was in Sheppard and McDonald, by virtue of deeds from the sheriff, who had sold the lands as the property of Coleman. They had agreed to hold the title as security for the purchase money, as well as for other indebtedness of Coleman to them, and to allow Coleman, who continued in possession, an opportunity to redeem the property. He induced Easterling to settle his indebtedness to Sheppard and McDonald, and to take from them a title to the lands as security, both for the money paid to them, and for any other sums which, in the business between Coleman and Easterling, might become due the latter; and, upon payment of the amount due to him, Easterling was to convey the property to Coleman, who, in the mean time, was to remain in possession, and who, in fact, did remain in possession. It was further agreed that Coleman was to have two years in which to redeem the lands, and that he was to cut, haul, and deliver timber growing thereon at certain sawmills owned by Easterling, who was to convert the same into lumber, sell it, and, after deducting expenses, credit upon the indebtedness of Coleman to him the net proceeds of the sales. Coleman, in pursuance of this agreement, did cut and deliver large quantities of timber; and, though the business was not profitable, there was a small balance due to Coleman arising therefrom. The prosecution of this business was either abandoned or suspended, and Coleman thereupon agreed with Easterling to rent out the lands for turpentine purposes, and to apply the rents to the payment of his indebtedness to Easterling. Taking all these averments as true, it may be that, if the petition had been in other respects sufficient, it would have been proper to grant the relief prayed for. We think, however, that the petition is fatally defective because it fails either to distinctly and definitely allege what the balance due by Coleman to Easterling was, or to state any good reason why the plaintiff could not have ascertained and averred what this balance was. The petition is also defective because it does not aver that Coleman had tendered to Easterling any specified sum as the amount or balance due him, which would certainly be necessary in order to authorize a decree for specific performance. The following extracts from the plaintiff's pleadings contain about all that is material or pertinent concerning the balance due Easterling, or the alleged tender. Even a cursory reading will suffice to show they are altogether too vague and indefinite as to these essential matters. The petition alleges that the petitioner "has never been able to get a full accounting with the said Easterling, but has offered, through D. V. Coleman, on or about the 16th of October, 1889, to pay him, (the said Easterling,) upon an accounting between them, all the money, principal and interest, due him by this petitioner, which he then and there declined to do, and would not receive the money from this petitioner in full payment of all the debts due him, the said offer being coupled with the demand on the part of this petitioner to have the title to the foregoing lands conveyed to him by the said Easterling;" and also that petitioner "has done all he could in order to comply with his contract with the said Easterling in good faith; that he has been and is ready and willing to come to an accounting with him, and to pay to him all of the money due to him, as aforesaid, but the said Easterling refuses to receive it." The amendment alleges that the lands were leased for turpentine purposes, as agreed, and that "the very money tendered to Easterling was in pursuance of this agreement to lease, and was money derived from the lease. This money so tendered was to pay principal and interest of the indebtedness due by your petitioner to defendant, and the tender is continued." Among other things, the petition prays that Easterling may be decreed "to come to an accounting with your petitioner, so that it can be ascertained exactly the sum of money that is due by your petitioner to him, (the said Easterling;)" and that petitioner "may receive a good and sufficient deed from the said defendant of the said lands hereinbefore set out, upon payment by this petitioner to said defendant of the sum of money so found to be due by him." We are therefore fully satisfied that the trial court committed no error in holding the petition insufficient in law. Indeed, under the petition as it stands, it does not appear that the plaintiff's action had fully ripened. If he could not ascertain the exact amount he owed Easterling, and which it would be incumbent upon him to pay, or offer to pay, before he would be entitled to demand a conveyance of the lands, he certainly could have ascertained approximately what that amount was, and ought to have tendered a sum at least sufficient to satisfy the indebtedness. This was necessary to complete his right to a conveyance, and consequently ought to have been done before the action was brought. If a proper tender had been made, and the petition had alleged this fact, the question presented would have been an entirely different one, and it is quite probable the trial judge would then have given the case other and appropriate direction. Judgment affirmed.

HOMICIDE—FORM OF VERDICT.

The identical question made in this case as to the form of the verdict in a case of capital homicide was ruled in West v. State, 4 S. E. 325, 79 Ga. 773.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Chatham county; R. Falligant, Judge.

Ambrose Harris was tried for murder. The verdict was "Guilty," with a recommendation to the mercy of the court, instead of recommending confinement in the penitentiary for life. He filed an application for a writ of habeas corpus. Denied, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Morrison, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Fraser, Sol. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

COOK v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 18, 1893.)

MANSLAUGHTER—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was no error in any of the charges complained of. The verdict was fully warranted by the evidence, and the refusal of a new trial was undoubtedly right.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Houston county; C. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Robert Cook was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and, a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Robert Cook was indicted for the murder of Lee Turner, and was found guilty of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendant excepted. The evidence shows that the defendant, the deceased, and others were boys playing together, and were friendly. The defendant had a pistol, belonging to his father, (not a self-cocking pistol, but one that required the hammer to be pulled back,) and was handling it very recklessly, snapping it towards some of the others. He was remonstrated with by them, but presented the pistol at the deceased, fired, and killed him. According to the testimony of the brother of the deceased, the latter had just said, "I wouldn't do that way if my pa had a pistol," to which defendant replied, pointing the weapon at him, "Shut your damned mouth, or I'll shoot your damned brains out." Mose Cook testified that defendant said, "Hush, I'll shoot you," and fired the pistol. There was conflict in the evidence as to the age of defendant, his father testifying that he was not quite 12 years old at the time of the killing, and other evidence indicating that he was between 13 and 14 years old. The defendant claimed that he did not intend to shoot, and did not know the pistol was loaded. The motion for new trial alleges that the verdict is contrary to law and the evidence, and that the court erred in its charge to the jury; the parts of which excepted to being as follows: "If you believe he was under 14 and between 10 and 14, and that he did have sufficient mental capacity, intelligence, and will to know and distinguish between right and wrong with relation to the particular act, did know that it was wrong to shoot a man with a pistol, if that was the act in question, or to kill a man, why, then you would be authorized to conclude that he had sufficient mental capacity to distinguish between good and evil, and was responsible for his act, as though he was 14 years old." Error, because the law does not hold a person between 10 and 14 years to the same responsibility for crime as those who have reached the age of 14; and therefore the defendant would not be as responsible, even if he knew right from wrong, as he would if he had reached the latter age. "If a man kill another by shooting him with no regard for consequences, recklessly and carelessly,—as, if a man shoots into a crowd, not caring whether he killed anybody or not, or not intending to kill any particular person, but, recklessly of human life, shoots into a crowd, and kill any one, his dearest friend or utter stranger,—the law will declare that killing to be murder, and would supply the malice from the reckless disregard of human life, and would call such a killing as that murder; and in a case like that it should not require there should exist any ill will or express malice. The law implies malice from the act, and declares that killing to be murder." "If a workman upon a house in a crowded street were to throw a heavy timber down upon the sidewalk when people were passing, and the tendency of such act was to destroy human life, and a person were to be killed in that way, even though a stranger to the workman, that would not be involuntary manslaughter, but would be murder." These two extracts are alleged to be erroneous, because unauthorized by the evidence and inapplicable to the case, no such issues being involved, and such instructions tending to mislead the jury. "Therefore, if you believe in this case that the defendant intentionally pointed a loaded pistol at the deceased, or pointed a pistol at him not knowing whether it was loaded, or believed it to be unloaded, not intending to kill him, and cocked it, and pulled the trigger, and fired, and killed him in that way, that would be involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act." Error, because argumentative, and an intimation that the defendant was guilty of involuntary manslaughter. The court did not give the jury the right to decide for themselves that the defendant was guilty of that offense, but instructed them, if such facts were true, and were proved by the evidence, they could find him guilty thereof. "It could not be said to be an accident that a man should point a pistol at another, not intending to kill him, and should cock it, and pull the trigger, and fire. Such a killing would not be an accidental killing." Defendant contends that this was erroneous, because it did not submit his defense fairly to the jury; and that the court did not enlighten them on section 4302 of the Code, on which defendant relied; and that the court intimated that the killing could not have been accidental.

SAVANNAH & O. CANAL CO. v. SUBURBAN & W. E. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 18, 1893.)

RESTRAINING CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGE OVER CANAL—DISCRETION OF COURT.

On the facts in the record, there was no abuse of discretion in denying the injunction prayed for.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Chatham county; R. Falligant, Judge.

Action by the Savannah & Ogeechee Canal Company against the Suburban & West End Railway Company for an injunction. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

The Savannah & Ogeechee Canal Company prayed that the Suburban & West End Railway Company be enjoined from attempting to build and construct a bridge over petitioner's canal, and from obstructing or in any manner interfering with the rights of the petitioner in the premises; and that, as the injury apprehended would be done if immediate remedy was not afforded, a temporary restraining order might issue. Also, that the defendant might be enjoined from attempting to build the approaches to the bridge over petitioner's right of way, and from operating its railroad over said bridge or its approaches. Upon the hearing injunction was denied, to which ruling petitioner excepted. The original petition was filed May 13, 1893. It alleged: Petitioner is a corporation, owning in fee simple a canal connecting the Savannah and Ogeechee rivers. Defendant is a corporation, created for the purpose of operating a street railroad in Savannah and to such suburban points as it may select. Defendant is about to construct a bridge over petitioner's canal, at a point immediately south of the intersection of the canal with the Louisville public road in Savannah, without any authority of law, or without even offering to compensate petitioner. If defendant is permitted to bridge the canal, petitioner will suffer irreparable damage. By amendment petitioner alleged: Defendant is about to build the approaches to its bridge over the right of way of petitioner, and is about to operate its railroad over the bridge, and over the approaches thereto. The amendment was filed May 20, 1893. Defendant answered: Under its charter it has the right to use any street in Savannah, and any public road in Chatham county, under the permission granted it by the mayor and aldermen of Savannah, or the county commissioners. It has obtained the permission from the mayor and aldermen for the use of Railroad street, a part of which is also known as the "Louisville Road," and by virtue of this permission has constructed a bridge across complainant's canal where the canal crosses Railroad street or Louisville road, the bridge being constructed within the width and limits of such street or road. Under its charter, defendant has the rights to construct and maintain bridges, and the bridge so constructed does not obstruct or impede free navigation of the canal. There has been no damage, irreparable or otherwise, to petitioner by the construction of the bridge. Defendant is absolutely solvent, and fully able to respond to any damages. Defendant denies that the approaches to the bridge interfere with or are over any right of way of petitioner. On the contrary, the bridge is erected over the canal where the canal intersects Railroad street and the Louisville road, which two highways unite at the point where the canal intersects them, as shown by the plan of the locality attached. The street and road mentioned are public highways intersected by the canal, and petitioner has never had or acquired any right of way over or across said highways. The approaches to the bridge would not interfere with or obstruct the use of said street or road, or the crossing of them by any vehicle or person. The approaches have been laid out and will be so completed as not to interfere with or obstruct the use of the street or road in any manner. Said approaches will be within the highway, even with and alongside of the approaches to the city bridge across the canal, and contiguous to the city bridge, and will correspond in grade with the approaches to the city bridge, and cannot interfere with, hinder, or obstruct plaintiff any more than the approaches of the city bridge would. If the alleged right of way is claimed as a towpath, said approaches will not in any manner prevent the crossing of the same by any team or towline, but a continuous towpath is obstructed, within about 5 feet of defendant's bridge, by the bridges or arches of the Central Railroad & Banking Company, which span the canal about 15 feet north of the city bridge. Defendant says, on information and belief, that the Central Railroad & Banking Company is the principal, if not the sole, owner of the stock of petitioner, and is opposed to the building of defendant's road across the track of the Central Railroad on the Augusta road, although defendant has the charter right to lay its track in said public road, and to cross the track of the Central Railroad on grade level; and the opposition to crossing the canal is only a means adopted by the Central Railroad to frustrate the building of defendant's road. The stockholders of petitioner have ceased to keep the canal open for navigation, and have practically abandoned the canal as a means of navigation, except so much of the basin of the canal near the Ocean Steamship Company's wharves, which is used by the Central Railroad to facilitate the handling of freight and transfer of the same in connection with its management of the steamship company.

The case was heard below upon the petition and amendment and defendant's answers, and affidavits hereafter mentioned. On behalf of defendant was submitted an affidavit of Thomas that he is a civil engineer; that the map accompanying his affidavit is a correct delineation of the plan of the bridges of the Central Railroad and of the city of Savannah and of defendant across the canal, and their location in reference to the highways,—Railroad street on the east, and Louisville road on the west; that he is the engineer of the defendant, and superintended the building of the bridge; that by actual measurement made by him the bridge is as long as, and three inches higher than, the bridge next thereto, erected by the city of Savannah or Chatham county, and used by the public to cross the canal where the canal intersects Railroad street and the Louisville road; that defendant's bridge is not an obstruction or an impediment to the free navigation of the canal; and that the bridge was built for at least a week prior to May 11, 1893. Also the affidavit of another civil engineer that the map or plan accompanying his affidavit was a correct delineation of the plan of the bridge of the railroad, of the city of Savannah, and of defendant, and their location in reference to the highway intersected by the canal. On behalf of the plaintiff there was introduced an affidavit that the map attached to the affidavit was a true representation of defendant's bridge over the canal at a point immediately south of the intersection of the canal with the Louisville road as it was on May 16, 1893; and that since that day to May 20, 1893, that status at that point had not been altered. Also, affidavit that the paper attached to the affidavit came from the custody of petitioner, and covered that part of the right of way lying between its basins and the Savannah river. This paper was the award of three appraisers,—one appointed by the Savannah, Altamaha & Ogeechee Canal Company, one appointed by Stiles, and one by the superior court,—as stated in the award, for the purpose of appraising the value of certain land belonging to Stiles, through which the canal passed, and awarding to him the price of the same. The award contained an appraisal of certain land described at valuations fixed in the award, and was signed by the appraisers March 14, 1837. It was accompanied by a certificate of a magistrate that the appraisers appeared before him and made oath to the award, and by an acknowledgment of legal service of the award and notice according to the statute by the secretary and treasurer of the canal company; also by certificate of the clerk of the superior court of Chatham county that the paper was a true copy of the award rendered, and that the original was of file and record in his office.

Lawton & Cunningham, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Saussy, S. L. Lazaron, and H. McAlpin, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

GEORGIA S. & F. R. CO. v. WILLIAMS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 8, 1894.)

NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

1. Where a mule attached to a wagon being driven along a public road in the direction of a railroad crossing ran away, reached the crossing, and, finding the same obstructed by a passing train, swerved aside, and ran parallel with the railroad for 150 yards, and, getting ahead of the train, attempted to cross in front of it at a private crossing, and the driver was killed by the train colliding with the wagon, there was no cause of action for the homicide, notwithstanding the servants of the company violated the statute in running too fast upon, and in approaching, the public crossing, and in not blowing the whistle, as required by the statute, this violation not being the proximate cause of the injury, it appearing by the evidence that those in charge of the train did all they could to stop after they discovered the mule was in the act of running away.

2. The court erred in not granting a new trial on the merits, irrespective of the alleged errors complained of in the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Bibb county; C. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by Annie Williams against the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad Company to recover for the death of plaintiff's husband. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and, from a judgment denying a new trial, defendant brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

Annie Williams sued the railroad company for damages from the homicide of her husband, Frederick. Her declaration alleged, in brief: Frederick was driving a one-horse wagon along the public road at what is known as "Flynn's Crossing," and, as he was crossing the railroad at said public crossing, the mule he was driving became frightened at a south-bound freight train, which was close to the crossing, he having no notice of the approaching train, no whistle having been blown, and the speed of the train not having been checked, as required by law; and the mule, being thus frightened, ran away along the side of the road for 300 yards, to where another road crosses the railroad, and, turning into this, the mule ran across the railroad, and the locomotive struck the wagon, demolishing it, and so wounding her husband that he died. He could not, by the use of ordinary care, have avoided the injury. Defendant did not use all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, but failed to blow for the crossings, or either of them; the speed of the train was not so checked as to be stopped at the first crossing, nor was such care used as to the second crossing; and the runaway team was in view of defendant's servants, so as to give them full notice of Frederick's danger. Had the train been checked at the first crossing, as required by law, the accident would not have happened, for the engine would have been under such control as that defendant's servants could have avoided the accident at the second crossing. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and the defendant excepted to the refusal of a new trial.

Gustin, Guerry & Hall, for plaintiff in error. Preston & Giles and J. L. Hardeman, for defendant in error.

SAVANNAH, F. & W. RY. CO. v. DU BOSE.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 8, 1894.)

INJURIES TO EMPLOYE—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The evidence was conflicting, and there was no abuse of discretion in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Savannah; A. H. MacDonell, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by W. Du Bose against the Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Company. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and, a new trial having been denied, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Du Bose sued the railway company for damages from personal injuries, alleging: While in the employment of the defendant, he was ordered by it to clean out the boiler of an engine, and while doing so, without fault on his part, was severely scalded. It was defendant's duty to furnish him with safe and suitable machinery and instrumentalities of labor, but it did not do so, for a certain cock on the engine was so defective and unsafe that the plug thereto blew out, causing him to be scalded. This defective condition of the machinery was unknown to him, and known to defendant, and could have been discovered and remedied by it. After the introduction of the evidence for plaintiff, defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the grounds: The evidence showed plaintiff was not entitled to recover, in that he failed to show himself without fault, being an employe, and because he failed to show that the master did not exercise all ordinary and reasonable care in furnishing him with safe and suitable appliances for his work. This motion was overruled, and to this ruling defendant excepted pendente lite, and upon it assigned error in its final bill of exceptions. There was a verdict for the plaintiff for $1,000, and, defendant's motion for a new trial being overruled, it excepts to such ruling. The grounds of the motion were that the verdict was contrary to law, to the evidence, and decidedly and strongly against the weight of the evidence and the principles of justice and equity. The plaintiff testified: "When hurt, I was working for the defendant, my duty being to wash out boilers. I had orders that the engine I was working on was to go out at eight o'clock, and it was my duty to get her ready in a very short time. When they fetched her in, she had about 110 pounds of steam on. She had a good deal of water. Both the injectors were on, cooling her down. I went underneath, and slackened up the blow-off cock. I thought it was in good order. I would not go under there if I thought it was not safe. Went to work there in 1873. When I took my wrench, and went underneath to slacken up the plug, I made half a turn, and as soon as I did this the plug flew out. I always slacken the plug up so it would turn. The nut came off because it was stripped. Had no instructions not to go underneath the engine when it had 110 pounds of steam on. The plug in question was under the back driver,—the rear portion of the boiler. The plug works into the cock, which is three or four inches from the bottom of the boiler. I had to go underneath the engine to put the wrench on the nut. When I made half a turn, the nut slipped off and the plug flew out. That was the right way, and the only way it could be done. You cannot get the water out unless you slacken the plug. There are other plugs which you can open to let the water out, but it is dangerous to do that. That was the proper plug to turn, to get the water out of the boiler. I did not see anything on top of this plug. Don't know what became of the nut. Dropped the wrench, and everything else, in order to save myself, the best I could. If the nut had been in proper order, it would not have fallen off. When the plug came out, the water burst right out. I was underneath there, and tried to get out as soon as possible; but the hot water came upon me, and scalded me." The witness then stated the character of the injuries he sustained, time of his confinement to bed, loss of time from his work, and further testified: "I was 46 years old in June, 1892. [The injury occurred in December, 1889.] When I was injured, was in good health. Fired on the road before they took me to do that work. They put me in the roundhouse because they knew well enough I was careful. When injured, I was earning $46 per month. Can't now do heavy work, and am getting $6 per week. Told Foye I could not tell how I got hurt, except that the plug was damaged. Told him I did not know who was to blame. If the plug were examined in the usual way, I would not have been scalded. The threads that hold the nut were so worn and defective that when I made half a turn the whole thing dropped. It must have been weakness of the threads on the end of the plug. I did not tap the plug with a hammer, and did not tell Foye that I tapped and knocked the plug. The nut is to keep the plug down. If you knock it up, it will move. Turning the plug is for the purpose of letting the steam through. By turning the nut, the plug is in place. It will not move, but, if the nut comes off, the pressure of the steam will start the plug up. When this nut fell off, the steam threw the plug up. If the handle was on top of the plug, it would keep the plug down, even if you take the nut off. There was no handle on this plug. I knew that, but there was no danger, because the nut was on there, and I thought it was safe. The plug is as safe as can be, if the nut is sound on there. There was no danger of steam escaping, unless the plug moved. You have to move the plug to let the steam escape, and have no right to tap the plug. I had no orders not to go underneath the engine when there was a quantity of steam on. The steam comes through the plug from the boiler. If the nut had been examined, I would not have gotten hurt. As long as the plug is in that position, that shuts the steam off from the boiler. If the plug turns the least bit, it would hurt me, but the pressure of steam will move it. The nut looked all right when I put the wrench on. Seemed to be in place, and in good order. I couldn't see if the threads were worn. Was boiler washer there about eight years. Crowley appointed me boiler washer, and Navy was the foreman when I got injured. I worked under him two or three years. He never gave me instructions about the quantity of steam, and he himself has gone under the engine to slacken the plug and let the water out. I had washed out this particular engine before, and at that time she was cold. If the nut is safe, there is no danger in turning it when there is a high pressure of steam in the boiler. That plug would hold 200-pounds pressure of steam. Couldn't loosen that plug without going underneath the engine. If the inspector had examined it when I washed it out before, I would not have gotten scalded. The engine came in about 4:30, and I undertook to wash it out because I had orders from the hostler, who said it was to go out about 8 o'clock, and told me to wash it out right away. The engine went out that night. I heard it. Don't know who told me. Many told me when I went to the roundhouse. I cannot give the name of a single person who told me she went out that night. It takes about two hours to wash out a boiler, when it is hot. On the last trial of this case, I testified I told Foye that I could not see that it was any fault of mine, or of the master mechanic. It was just a blind thing. Of course, they couldn't see it, a bit more than myself, unless they slackened it up." A witness for plaintiff also testified as to plaintiff's suffering from the injuries.

For the defendant, Navy testified that he appointed plaintiff boiler washer; that his instructions to boiler washers were to muffle the whistle, and get the pressure of steam down to about 10 or 15 pounds, so that the boiler would receive the water from the city hydrant, prior to opening the blow-off cock, and let the water out of the boiler. These instructions were given, for one reason, as a precaution for the boiler. He gave these instructions to plaintiff verbally, and, if they had been followed, plaintiff would not have been in danger. He (witness) heard of the injury about five or ten minutes after it occurred, as soon as he got to the roundhouse, where the engine was, and the engine at that time had steam on, though he could not say what the pressure was, because he could not get to the cab to see the gauge. If Du

Bose went underneath the engine with a wrench, and tried to loosen the nut, when there was high pressure of steam on, he did so in violation of witness' instructions. If he had followed the instructions, the steam pressure would have been low, and the accident would not have occurred. The plug moves up and down. Always found plaintiff a careful and reliable man. The instructions about cleaning out boilers were given,—when, witness did not remember, but before the accident occurred. He did not remember the circumstances connected with giving the plaintiff instructions. If the nut was in perfect condition, and screwed on, the pressure would be on the whole of it. In order for this plug to come out by reason of steam pressure, it would have to pass through the open space. The purpose of the nut is not to hold the plug down, but to keep the steam shut off. There is a handle which runs from the top of the plug up to the footboard, with a lever on it, and the engineer can turn the plug from the cab by means of this handle. As long as this plug is in position, no steam can escape from the boiler, because the pressure would be shut off, and it is necessary to turn the plug in order to let the steam escape. Turning the nut will not turn the plug, unless it is corroded, but, if the plug is tapped, it will fly out. The least tap to the plug would blow it out. One who is now night hostler for defendant, and was when plaintiff was injured, and who also washes out boilers, testified that he washed them out by blowing off steam first; that those were the instructions which Navy gave him, and Navy gave him the instructions before the plaintiff was injured; that the instructions were not to attempt to let the water off before all the steam was gone; that, to let the water out of the boiler, you have to open the blow-off cock; that you must let the steam off before you can let the cold water come into the boiler; that "we blow it off after we get the steam low enough to take the water from the city hydrant," and that he didn't know whether the same instructions were given to Du Bose; that the way you open the blow-off cock is to take a wrench, and slacken it up so as to turn the plug, and that will let the steam out; that the usual way to get at the blow-off cock is to stoop under the engine, and by doing this he would be discharging his full duty to the road; that you take your wrench, and turn the nut; that witness received his instructions several years before the accident to plaintiff; that slackening the nut won't turn the plug, but you slacken the nut for the purpose of opening the plug; that if you slacken the nut the plug would not blow up, unless you tapped it after the nut had been taken off altogether; that, even if you let the steam down, there would still be hot water in the boiler, sufficient to scald any man, if it went over him. Witness was scalded once when there was but 20 pounds of pressure on. He went underneath the engine to tie up one of the mud plugs, and after he had fired the engine up, and it had commenced to make steam, the plug fell out, and he was scalded. There was testimony for defendant that instructions given men who washed out boilers prior to the time plaintiff was hurt were to reduce the steam pressure by muffling the whistle, and letting the steam escape in that way, before putting cold water into the boiler. It takes about an hour to cool off an engine in order to let cold water into it. There is hot water in the boiler after the steam has escaped through the whistle. If the steam had been blown off, and the plug were moved in any way, there would not be any pressure in the boiler to force the plug out. One who was in the roundhouse, at a little distance from plaintiff, at the time of the accident, heard the report of the steam, and went to the engine, but did not know what pressure of steam was on the engine. When he got there, the steam and water flew in every direction, and one could not get up to the cab. At that time the whistle was not muffled. He did not particularly examine it. This person was he who plaintiff had testified told plaintiff to wash out the boiler, at the time in question, right away. He testified that he turned the engine over to plaintiff, but did not give him any instructions about her. He didn't tell plaintiff she had got to go out that night. She did not go out that night, but went out the next morning. The accident did not prevent her going out that night. The railroad had had this engine over five years. A man can take a wrench, and stand aside, and let the water and steam out of the blow-off cock. It is necessary for a man to go under there to slacken the nut, and the proper way is to slacken it with a monkey wrench. It appeared from the evidence of another witness that if the plug were corroded, and it were necessary to move it, one would have to tap it underneath with a hammer, and then you could turn it with a wrench. That it takes a severe tap with a hammer to get it out; that witness had known a plug to stay in place when there was no nut on it, and the engine was running, but that was not a usual thing. Foye testified that plaintiff told him he (plaintiff) had gone under the engine to blow her out, and in loosening the plug found it a little hard, and tapped it with a hammer; it flew out and he was scalded; that he (witness) did not recall whether the plaintiff told him he had tapped it with a wrench or hammer; that witness' idea was that plaintiff had tapped it with something. Only knows, in a general way, the words plaintiff used on that occasion, and plaintiff did not say he was in any wise at fault.

In rebuttal, plaintiff testified that he muffled the whistle with waste, but the water blew the waste out; that they did not have a clamp then, but have made clamps since; that he did not have a hammer at the time, but had a monkey wrench, and did not use one end of the wrench as a hammer; and that you could not hit anything with it; it would break.

INJURIES TO EMPLOYEE—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Although the evidence would well have warranted a finding for the defendant, it also warranted the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the weighing and balancing of the whole being a matter for the jury. There was no error in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Savannah; A. H. MacDonell, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by M. J. Falvey against the Savannah, Florida & Western Railroad Company. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and, a new trial having been denied, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Falvey sued the railway company for damages from personal injuries, which he alleged he received while a locomotive fireman in its employment, from being compelled to jump from an engine upon which he was, in order to prevent a greater injury, which he feared he would receive from a collision which was imminent between said engine and a train ahead of it upon the same track. He alleged in his declaration that he acted under the advice and orders of the engineer of the train upon which he was fireman in so jumping, and that in jumping he was thrown against a switch stand, injuring his hip, back, and chest, causing him to expectorate blood, throwing him into convulsions, causing suppression of his urine, producing internal injuries, and making him a physical wreck. He obtained a verdict for $2,370, and, defendant's motion for a new trial being overruled, it excepted. The grounds for the motion were: The verdict was contrary to law, to the evidence, strongly and decidedly against the weight of the evidence, without evidence to support it, and contrary to the principles of equity and justice. The evidence upon both sides was quite voluminous. That for the plaintiff was to the effect: The injury in question was done him on September 16, 1890. He was at that time, and had been for two years, a fireman for defendant. For two years before he began service as fireman in its employment, he was employed by it as a watchman, doing light work. In 1883 he had been hurt, while a fireman on the Central Railroad, in a collision, sued that road, and his case against it was settled, and a considerable sum paid him. In that suit he claimed to be seriously injured; thought, then, that he was. It was some three or four years from the time of the injury on the Central road before he went to work on the Savannah, Florida & Western. His work as fireman for the latter road was heavy, engaging him late and early, and he was at work continuously as such fireman, doing double duty, and able to perform it. Before the injury for which he now sues he had recovered his health, had no peculiar movement of the heart, his breathing was perfect, his extremities were not cold, and he had no weakness of the bladder, nor trouble with his urine. About two hours previous to the collision now in question, he had received a slight injury from a stick of wood having been thrown on his arm, and told his engineer, after his arm was hurt, he could not fire. The engineer stopped the train, and told the conductor he must have another man, and told Falvey to go back to the cab, have a good rest, and attend to his arm; but Falvey did not go back, saying that he would be all right after a while. He bathed his arm in cold water. At the time the collision was about to take place, Falvey was piling wood in the tender of the engine, which was a part of his usual duty. The engineer had got a colored man to do the firing when Falvey was hurt. The train upon which Falvey was working collided with a train ahead of it, which had been neglected, left unflagged, and as to the presence of which warning had not been given, as should have been done, to the approaching train. When the engineer saw this train, he knew a collision was imminent, and called to Falvey, "Get off! Jump!" This was very early in the morning. It was foggy, and the engineer did not see the train ahead until he got up close to it. It was then too late to prevent a collision. When he spoke to Falvey, as last above stated, the train upon which Falvey was was running about 15 miles an hour, and there were about 25 cars in the train. Falvey got on the steps of the engine, and jumped off, or alighted. After Falvey got off, the engineer got on the same steps, and followed him. The engineer was carried forward, and both his arms slid on the ground, making a slight bruise on his arms, but not amounting to anything. According to Falvey's testimony, he, (Falvey,) in jumping, struck a switch stand, and sustained serious injuries of the kind mentioned in his declaration. The engineer testified that there was a switch stand in the neighborhood of where Falvey jumped, but whether Falvey struck it he only knew from what Falvey said. In a few seconds after Falvey and the engineer jumped, the collision took place, and broke up three cars in the train ahead of them. Upon the subject of the injuries received by Falvey there was much testimony in his behalf, some of it by physicians, tending in the main to show that he was seriously hurt, though there was some evidence that he was disposed to magnify his injuries. Plaintiff was 33 years old when injured in the last collision mentioned, and was receiving, as wages, $1.60 per day. Much evidence was introduced by the defendant, among the witnesses being a number of physicians, and the evidence for defendant tended very strongly to show that plaintiff sustained no serious injury whatever, but was attempting to feign having received serious hurts, or, in other words, that his case was a decided one of "malingering."

Erwin, Du Bignon & Chisholm, for plaintiff in error. Garrard, Meldrim & Newman, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. WALKER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 8, 1894.)

CHattel Mortgage — Foreclosure — Affidavit of Illegality.

1. Where an execution issued upon the foreclosure of a mortgage on personal property has been levied, an affidavit of illegality to such execution, alleging that the deponent is not legally indebted to the plaintiff in any amount, and that the mortgage foreclosed is utterly without consideration, and void, is, under section 3975 of the Code, good in substance, and it was error to dismiss the same on a general demurrer for want of sufficiency.

2. The jurat being no part of the affidavit, a general demurrer to the sufficiency of the affidavit will not reach a defect in the jurat, such as failure to add to the name of the person who administered the oath his official designation. The jurat is amendable. Perkerson v. Veal, 47 Ga. 92; Thurmond v. Dickson, 57 Ga. 153.

Error from superior court, Crawford county; O. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by Walker & Gibson against R. D. Smith to foreclose a mortgage on personal property. There was judgment of foreclosure, and to the execution issued thereon defendant interposed an affidavit of illegality. The affidavit was filed under the Code, (section 3975,) providing that "when an execution shall issue upon the foreclosure of a mortgage on personal property * * *, the mortgagor, or his special agent, may file his affidavit of illegality to such execution, in which affidavit he may set up and avail himself of any defense which he might have set up, according to law, in an ordinary suit upon the demand secured by the mortgage, and which goes to show that the amount claimed it not due." From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the affidavit, defendant brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

A mortgage fi. fa. in favor of Walker & Gibson against Smith was levied upon property described in the mortgage, and Smith interposed an affidavit of illegality. Plaintiff demurred to this affidavit for want of sufficiency, and the demurrer was sustained, to which ruling Smith excepted. The illegality was upon the grounds: Because affiant is not legally indebted to plaintiffs in any amount; because the mortgage foreclosed is utterly without consideration and void; because plaintiffs are proceeding for $25.41 attorney's fees, which is illegal, the contract being made since the act of July 22, 1891, prohibiting the collection of attorney's fees; and because a portion of the mortgage is interest, and plaintiffs have foreclosed, and are proceeding for interest on interest..

W. S. Wallace, R. D. Smith, and J. H. Hall, for plaintiff in error. L. D. Moore, for defendants in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment reversed.

KING et al. v. SEARS.

SEARS v. KING et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 17, 1893.)

Ejectment—Evidence—Tax Deed—Sufficiency of Authentication—Description—Who May Question Execution—Motion for New Trial—Time of Making—Appeal.

1. Where, for the purpose of authenticating a tax sale in a way to render the prescribed affidavit a substitute for other evidence, the statute required the mayor to make oath that all the notices and advertisements required by the act have been duly and regularly given, an affidavit, silent as to advertisements, but deposing that all the notices required by the act have been so given, is insufficient.

2. The description in a conveyance being in these terms: "A certain lot or parcel of land, lying and being within the incorporate limits of said city of Brunswick, and situate in that part known as 'Old Town.' For a more particular description of said lot or parcel of land, reference is hereby made to the plan of said city, executed by George R. Baldwin, civil engineer, by him signed, and dated May 25th, 1837,"—the plan referred to not being produced, nor its contents proved,—the description is too vague and uncertain to be applied definitely to any premises whatever, and no recovery could be had upon the deed, were it otherwise sufficient to pass title. Nor would the production of the plan aid the defective description in the deed, unless the plan shows only one lot or parcel in Old Town. If it shows more than one, the uncertainty as to which particular one was sold would remain, and be fatal.

3. A deed more than 30 years old, and coming from the proper custody, purporting to have been executed in another state, attested by one witness, certified by him as a commissioner of deeds for this state in that state, under his seal of office, as duly acknowledged before him by the maker, and recorded in this state more than 30 years ago, the land conveyed by it being situated in this state, and possession of the land by the grantees in the deed for several years being shown, is admissible in evidence without further proof of its execution. The want of two witnesses does not render the deed invalid or inoperative as a conveyance of the premises described in it.

4. A description in a deed in these terms: "All those six certain lots, pieces, or parcels of land situate, lying, and being in the town of Brunswick, county of Glynn, and state of Georgia, heretofore, and up to the making of this indenture, owned by the parties of the first part, and known and distinguished on a certain map of the said town of Brunswick, made according to the survey of the said town, and recorded with the proper officer in the said county of Glynn, being the map mentioned and referred to in the several conveyances heretofore made, and duly recorded, of the property hereby conveyed, as water lot number twenty-seven and town lots numbers twenty-four, twenty-five, one hundred and fifty-four, three hundred and twenty-nine, three hundred and thirty," is sufficiently certain to show that the parcel designated as town lot No. 24 was meant to be conveyed; and the aid of extrinsic evidence may be invoked to identify that lot, and establish its precise location.

5. A stranger to a deed cannot urge, as an objection to its validity, that it was executed for the sole purpose of enabling the grantee to maintain an action of ejectment in the federal court to recover the premises from an adverse holder, the deed being made since the adoption of the Code, which abrogates the old law, prohibiting the conveyance of land pending an adverse possession. When a deed is offered in evidence, if the objection to its admission concedes that it was in fact executed and delivered, the objection should be overruled, unless the matter of the objection would, if established, render the deed inoperative for the purpose sought to be subserved by its introduction.

6. Under the evidence the jury could have found a title by prescription, but the charge of the court did not constrain them to pass on that question.

7. The plaintiff claiming under a conveyance from a prior occupant, who went in under color of title, and remained for less than seven years, whether a recovery could be had upon such prior possession alone and the deed to the plaintiff, against one who entered under claim of right, but who shows neither title nor lawful right, depends upon whether the plaintiff's grantor, on going out of actual possession, or afterwards, intended to abandon the premises, or whether he left with the intention to return, and remained in that mind until he conveyed to the plaintiff.

8. So long as the superior court is not finally adjourned for the term, the term continues, though other courts of the circuit be held in the mean time. A motion for a new trial may be filed in the recess as well as in open court. When so filed, it may be acted upon by the judge at any time during the term.

9. Where the judge certifies that the brief of evidence has been filed within the time prescribed by law, this will be taken as true, although there may be no signed entry of filing on the brief itself. The act of November 12, 1889, does not, in cases where the term continues longer than 30 days, require that the brief shall be approved within 30 days after the trial, but only that it shall be filed within that time, subject to approval.

Error from superior court, Glynn county; J. L. Sweat, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Oceanna Sears against James F. King and others. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and a new trial denied. Defendants bring error, and plaintiff filed a cross bill of exceptions. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

The actual plaintiff below was Oceanna Sears. She obtained a verdict against King for the premises in dispute (the action being one of ejectment) on May 10, 1892, at the May term of the superior court of Glynn county.

On June 9, 1892, King filed his motion for new trial, together with a brief of the testimony. On June 10, 1892, and while the judge below was in Ware county, a rule nisi was granted, and an order taken that the grounds of the motion be examined, considered, revised, and approved on the hearing to be had on July 5, 1892, at Brunswick. On the same day an order was granted that defendant have until July 5th to prepare and file, under the approval of the court, a brief of the evidence in the case. On July 6, 1892, an order was passed, reciting that Glynn superior court, at the term at which the case was tried, to wit, "this present term," was in session for more than 30 days, and ordering that the plaintiff show cause instant, or as soon as counsel could be heard, why the judgment and verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial granted, etc. This order was passed in open court. When the motion for new trial was called up for hearing, respondent in the motion moved to dismiss it, which motion was overruled. The motion for new trial was also overruled; the order overruling it being headed, "In Glynn superior court, May term, 1892, held July 7, 1892," and to this ruling King excepted. To the ruling refusing to dismiss the motion for new trial, plaintiff excepted. The action was for the recovery of a tract in Brunswick, known "on the map or plan of that city made by George R. Baldwin in 1837 as Old Town lot number 24, and which is in the shape of a rectangle, measuring ninety by one hundred and eighty feet, bounded on the west by Bay street, east by Oglethorpe street, south by lot number 25, and north by lot number 23." The motion for new trial contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc.; also, because the court erred in overruling the objection of defendant to the deed of December 31, 1841, from U. Dart, mayor of Brunswick, to A. H. Merriam, the objection being upon the grounds: There is no execution or other authority for sale accompanying the deed. There is shown no authority for the making of such a sale as mentioned in the deed, or the execution of such a deed. There is shown and appears, neither upon the face of the deed or elsewhere, any compliance with any authority whatever. The deed does not appear to have been recorded as required by law, there being or appearing no proper certificate to that fact. The affidavit attached to, and in support of, the deed, on its face does not show compliance with the act recited in the face of the deed as authority for the sale, in that the affidavit states that the notices were given as required by the act, but does not state what notices were given, and does not state that the advertisements were published as required by the act. The deed in question was part of plaintiff's chain of title. It recited that by an act of the general assembly of December 26, 1837, amending an act to incorporate the town of Brunswick, it was enacted that the mayor and council should make, or cause to be made, under oath, in March of each year, an equitable valuation of all property within the city, upon which they should assess and levy an equitable tax for city purposes, etc.; and whereas, by the act it was made the further duty of the mayor, after giving certain notices in the act specified of the assessment of the tax, and the same remaining unpaid at the expiration of said notices, then to cause the property to be advertised for sale, and sold to the highest and best bidder, on a certain day to be specified in the advertisement, provided the tax and other contingent expenses due on the property were not paid on or before the day of sale, and that the mayor should make title to the purchaser for the same, with the provision that the owner should have the right to redeem, all of which, by reference to the act, would more fully appear; and whereas, the mayor and council, in pursuance of the duties imposed upon them by said act, did in March, 1841, assess and levy an equitable tax for said year—$1.87½—on a certain lot of land within the incorporate limits of the city of Brunswick, and in that part known as "Old Town," for a more particular description of which lot reference was made to the plan of the city executed by George R. Baldwin, civil engineer, May 25, 1837; and after giving due notice of the assessment and levy of the tax "in manner pointed out in said act," and no person coming forward to pay the same, said lot was then advertised to be sold in Brunswick on December 31, 1841, on which day it was set up and exposed to public sale, when it was knocked [down] to A. H. Merriam for four dollars, being the highest and best bidder that could be obtained: Therefore, in pursuance of the duties imposed upon him by the act, and in consideration of the four dollars, the mayor conveyed the lot to Merriam, reserving the right of the former owner to redeem. Accompanying this deed was the affidavit referred to, made by the mayor, to the effect that all the notices required by the act of December 26, 1837, so far as respected the property described, had been duly and regularly given. The deed was recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court on August 31, 1843.

Another ground of the motion was: Error in overruling the objection of defendant to deed of October 27, 1852, from Henry and Harriet Merrill to Sylvester Mumford, which objection was upon the grounds: There is no description of the premises in dispute set out in the deed. There is but one witness to the deed. While there purports to be a certificate from one signing himself a commissioner of deeds for the state of Georgia, it is not in compliance with the law of this state, in that the deed must be attested by a commissioner of deeds for the state of Georgia, and this deed does not appear to have been signed before such commissioner, or by him attested. The deed in question was also part of plaintiff's chain of title. It described the premises as all those six certain lots of land situated in Brunswick, Glynn county, Ga., theretofore owned by the parties of the first part, and known and distinguished on a certain map of the town of Brunswick, made according to the survey of the town, and recorded with the proper officer in the county of Glynn,—being the map mentioned and referred to in the several conveyances theretofore made, and duly recorded, of the property conveyed,—as water lot No. 27, and town lots Nos. 24, 25, etc. This deed concluded: "In witness whereof the said parties of the first part have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written." Then followed the signatures and seals of the makers of the deed, accompanied by the statement: "Sealed and delivered in the presence of C. I. Bushnell, as both parties." Following this was a certificate made in the state, city, and county of New York, to the effect that on October 27, 1852, before the subscriber, a commissioner in said state, appointed by the governor of Georgia to administer oaths, etc., and take acknowledgments of proof of deeds, etc., to be used or recorded in Georgia, and duly commissioned and sworn and dwelling in the city of New York, personally appeared the within-named Henry Merrill, "who has signed the within deed, who acknowledged that he signed, sealed, and delivered the same as his voluntary act and deed, for the uses and purposes therein mentioned; and at the same time and place also personally appeared Harriet S., wife of the said Henry Merrill, likewise a party to said deed, and, being duly examined by me separately and apart from her said husband, did declare that she did freely and voluntarily, and without any compulsion from her said husband, sign, seal, and deliver the within deed for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, with intention thereby to renounce, give up, and quitclaim her third and right of dower of, in, and to said lots of land within conveyed." This was signed by C. I. Bushnell, "Commissioner in the State of New York for the State of Georgia," and to it was attached his seal. As to the ground of objection that there was but one witness to this deed, the court below states that, from an inspection of the deed in passing upon its admissibility, the court found that the names were identical, and the handwriting the same, of C. I. Bushnell, the attesting witness, and who certified to his official capacity as commissioner of deeds for the state of Georgia; that on the day it purported to have been executed it was signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of said C. I. Bushnell, who followed his attestation with his certificate and seal that he was a commissioner of deeds as aforesaid, duly appointed and qualified, on that day; and that, in addition, all parties who signed it acknowledged before him that it was their deed, and that they signed, sealed, and delivered it for the purposes mentioned in the deed,—it was therefore admitted in evidence.

Another ground of the motion was because the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to the deed dated September 14, 1888, from Sylvester Mumford to Oceanna Sears, the objection being that the same was not duly and regularly attested, in that the defendant stated, and stood ready to prove, that the deed was witnessed by F. H. Harris, Esq., counsel for the plaintiff, and by John L. Harris, his son; that, at the time of the attestation, F. H. Harris was attorney for the plaintiff, and his son, John L., was under 21 years of age, and in the office of said F. H. in a ministerial capacity; and that the deed was made for the purpose of vesting the claim of title to the premises by Mumford to plaintiff, who at the time lived out of the state of Georgia, and in Michigan, for the sole purpose of maintaining an action of ejectment, for the premises in the federal court, where an action had been brought for the premises and dismissed by plaintiff; further, because F. H. Harris was not, when he attested the deed as a notary public of Glynn county, a notary public of said county, his commission having expired; and defendant offered to introduce evidence in support of said objection, and the statements made on which it was founded. The court overruled the objection, and the motion to show the facts recited, assigning as a reason therefor that said attack must be made, not before the court upon the admission and introduction of the deed, but before the jury after the deed should have been introduced, and admitted the deed in evidence without allowing, and refusing to allow, the defendant to prove certain matters before the court.

Error in reading to the jury from an act approved December 26, 1837, amending the act of December 29, 1836, incorporating the town of Brunswick, etc., the provisions of the act of 1837 as to the assessment of property for taxation, notice to be published in case of nonpayment of the tax assessed, and advertisement and sale of the property if the tax were not paid agreeably to the request in the notice, etc., and then charging: "The court charges you if you shall find in this case that a deed has been made to the premises in dispute, which is the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, under a tax sale made under the authority of this law, which the court has just read you, and that upon such deed you shall find the evidences required by this law, to wit, the oath or affidavit of the mayor executing the conveyance that the notices required by law had been duly and regularly given, then the court charges you that that would be conclusive evidence of the proper compliance with this law in the sale of the premises in dispute for taxes. The court charges you that you would be authorized, in examining that affidavit of the mayor, if you shall find such affidavit upon this deed, to construe the term 'notices,' as used in that affidavit, as including the notices required by the act to be given of the advertisement of the sale of the property in question. The court charges you that a sale regularly and duly made under this law, and title executed under such sale, with an oath thereon showing such statements as go to show that the terms of the act have been complied with, would operate to divest the title to this property from the then owner of it, whoever that might have been, and to vest it in the purchaser of this property at such sale, and to whom the conveyance in question was made by the mayor of the city of Brunswick."

The motion to dismiss the motion for new trial was upon the following grounds: (1) Because it appeared from the record that the verdict was rendered on May 11, 1892, and it appeared from the minutes that on May 28, 1892, the court took a recess until July 5, 1892, and no order of the court was taken, granting time in which to prepare and file a motion for new trial; and, during the interim from May 28th to July 5th, there had been two superior courts in session in the Brunswick judicial circuit, presided over by the judge thereof, to wit, an adjourned term of Appling superior court and an adjourned term of Ware superior court; and the minutes of Glynn superior court showed that a special term of that court was held on June 13, 1892, as called by the judge for the purpose of granting charters; and therefore the motion to dismiss was made upon the ground that the movant failed to file the motion for new trial during the term at which the verdict was rendered, and within 30 days after the rendition of the verdict, and during term time, to wit, while the court was regularly in session. (2) Because there was no rule nisi authorized by law granted in the case, in that, while there was what purported to be a rule nisi attached to the motion for new trial, the same was signed by the judge in Ware county, and during the recess of Glynn superior court, the judge having no jurisdiction of the case, at said time and place, to grant the rule nisi. (3) Because there was no legal authority vested in the judge to grant a rule nisi, or do any other act connected with the motion, save at term time. (4) Because, under the law, a brief of the evidence must be filed as a part of the record for revision and approval by the court,—that is, it must be approved before it can become a brief of the evidence and part of the record,—and no brief of the evidence was filed under the approval of the court; what purported to be such brief having been filed on June 9, 1892, and the judge's order in reference thereto, giving time, having been granted in Ware county during the recess of Glynn superior court, and no legal brief of evidence being ever in fact filed before July 5, 1892. (5) Because movant had failed to comply with the law of motions for new trials, as set forth in the Code and amendatory acts. In connection with this motion the judge below certified: "In Glynn superior court, May term, 1892. I do hereby certify that on the 28th day of May, 1892, all the jurors were discharged from further attendance upon court, and, on said day, court took a recess until the 5th day of July, 1892. I further certify that during the interim from the 28th day of May, 1892, I held two adjourned terms of superior court in the Brunswick judicial circuit, [that is] to say, Appling superior court, convening on June 20, 1892, and adjourning on June 24, 1892, and Ware superior court, convening on June 27, 1892, and adjourning on June 30, 1892, said terms being regularly adjourned terms of said court; and that I also granted two charters on June 13, 1892, it being recited in orders passed thereon that the same were granted at a special term of Glynn superior court for the granting of charters, notwithstanding the fact that the regular May term, 1892, of Glynn superior court had not been adjourned, but recessed as aforesaid. I further testify that the rule nisi, bearing date June 10, and the order granting time, bearing date June 10, 1892, were signed by me while at Waycross, Ware county, Georgia, and during the recess of the court as aforesaid."

Ira E. Smith, Courtland Symmes, and J. H. Lumpkin, for plaintiffs in error. Frank H. Harris, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The premises sued for are described in the declaration thus: "A certain tract or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the city of Brunswick, said county and state, and known or designated on the map or plan of said city made by George R. Baldwin in the year 1837 as 'Old Town Lot Number Twenty Four, (24,)' and which is in the shape of a rectangle, measuring ninety by one hundred and eighty feet, and bounded on the west by Bay street, east by Oglethorpe street, south by lot number twenty-five, and north by lot number twenty-three." A demise was laid from Sylvester Mumford, and another from Oceanna Sears. Three deeds were introduced by the plaintiff,—the first from Dart, as mayor of the city of Brunswick, to Abiel H. Merriam, dated at the top December 31, 1841, and at the bottom January 31, 1842, and purporting to be based on a sale for city taxes for the year 1841, the sale being made on the 31st of December in that year. The second was a deed from Henry Merrill and Harriet Merrill to Sylvester Mumford, dated October 27, 1852. The third was a deed from Sylvester Mumford to Oceanna Sears, dated September 14, 1888. There was evidence that Merriam died intestate, leaving Harriet, his widow, his sole heir, and that she afterwards intermarried with Henry Merrill. There was also evidence tending to show title in Mumford under the statute of limitations,—such title as would be called "prescription" had it arisen since the adoption of the Code; and the evidence showed with absolute certainty that Mumford had actual possession, if not for a term long enough to ripen a title under the statute of limitations, long enough to enable him or his vendee to recover against a wrongdoer on his prior possession alone, if that possession had not been abandoned. Looking to the merits of the whole case, we are of opinion that there could be no recovery on the paper title as such, and that, in consequence of errors in the charge of the court, the jury were not constrained to pass upon and decide the questions of fact on which title under the statute of limitations, or a right to recover on prior possession alone, would depend. The result is that there must be a new trial.

1. The first link in the paper title is the tax deed. No execution for taxes was introduced. The deed stood alone, save as it was supported by an affidavit of the mayor entered thereon; this affidavit being relied upon under the act of December 26, 1837, applicable to assessments and sales made for taxes in the city of Brunswick. That act required that "the mayor shall publish a notice containing a description of the property taxed, the amount of the tax assessed upon it, and the name of the supposed owner, if known to the mayor, requesting him to pay said taxes within eight weeks from the date of said notice, which notice shall be published six weeks in the city of Brunswick, and in one newspaper printed in Milledgeville six weeks; and if said tax shall not be paid agreeably to the request in said notice the mayor shall advertise the property upon which the tax has been assessed for sale, giving three months' notice of the time and place of sale, the amount of tax for which the same is to be sold, and the name of the supposed owner, if known to the mayor, together with a description of the property to be sold, which notice shall be published three months in the city of Brunswick, and the same length of time in one newspaper in the city of Savannah, and in one newspaper in the city of Milledgeville. * * * And the said mayor, at the time of executing the conveyance of sale or title to any property sold for taxes, shall make and subscribe thereon his oath or affirmation that all the notices and advertisements required by the act, respecting the property thus conveyed, have been duly and regularly given, which oath or affirmation shall ever after be deemed and taken as conclusive evidence of these facts in all the courts in this state." The affidavit which the mayor made and subscribed on the deed now in question declared that "all the notices required by the act of the general assembly of the state of Georgia, assented to on the 26th of December, A. D. 1837, entitled 'An act to incorporate the town of Brunawick, and to extend its jurisdictional limits,' &c., &c., so far as respects the property within described, have been duly and regularly given." This affidavit was not a compliance with the requirement of the act. The mayor did not make and subscribe the oath which the act dictated, but one less comprehensive, both in letter and in substance. The notices had not only to be due and regular, but they had to be duly and regularly advertised. To give them proper contents, and to advertise them once, might be treated as giving them duly and regularly; but the mayor had to see and know that the advertising of them was continued, the first notice for six weeks in the city of Brunswick, and six weeks in one newspaper printed in Milledgeville, and the second notice for three months in the city of Brunswick, and three months in one newspaper in each of the cities of Savannah and Milledgeville. Suppose the mayor had been indicted for falsely swearing that all the advertisements required by the act had been duly and regularly given. It seems plain to us that he could successfully have defended himself against the charge by answering simply that he had not so sworn. He could have said the act itself makes a distinction between the notices and the advertisements, because it requires the oath to include both, and to declare that both were duly and regularly given. The affidavit omits advertisements. Why was that omission made if the mayor intended to do something different from what the act does,—that is, make the word "notices" include advertisements as well as notices? It is possible that advertisements might be construed both as including the notices to be advertised, and the prescribed publication of them by advertising, for to affirm that advertisements have been duly and regularly given could, without strain upon the language, be held to mean that they had the prescribed contents, and had been published through the prescribed medium, and for the length of time required. Be this as it may, it is enough that, in prescribing the terms of the oath or affirmation, notices were evidently treated by the legislature as the things to be advertised, and advertisements as the advertising or publication of them. In view of the legal strictness which is observed in manifesting the validity of all sales for municipal taxes where it is sought to divest the owner of his title by means of such sales, we are clear that the defective affidavit before us is no substitute, as matter of evidence, for due proof of a tax fi. fa., the levy of the same, and of a due observance of all the preliminaries prescribed by the statute under which the sale was made, or purports to have been made. This deed, whether with or without the aid of the affidavit, affords no evidence of authority to sell for taxes.

2. Another infirmity of the deed, treating it as a basis of recovery in the present case, is that it contains nothing showing its application to the premises now in dispute. Nothing but the general and vague description set out in the second headnote appears in the deed to identify its application to any particular premises whatever. The deed does not represent that the property was seized as that of any named owner, or that it was in the possession or occupation of any person. In truth, there is not the slightest hint or intimation in the whole instrument from which the least aid could be derived in applying the description to its subject-matter. Nor was the map or plan referred to in the description introduced in evidence. If it had been, the description would apply as well to one lot or parcel on it as to another; so that if, according to it, that part of Brunswick known as "Old Town" contains more than one lot or parcel,—and, as appears by the deed from Mumford to Mrs. Sears, it evidently does,—the uncertainty as to which particular one was sold would remain, and be fatal.

3. The ruling made in the third headnote applies to the deed from Henry and Harriet Merrill to Sylvester Mumford. That deed was admissible as an ancient document without proof of its execution. Its application to the premises in dispute is doubtful on the face of the deed itself, but it purports to convey a town lot in Brunswick of the same number as that sued for. With the requisite allunde evidence, the two lots might be shown to be identical, one with the other.

4. The exact terms of the description used in the last-mentioned deed are recited in the fourth headnote, and there is no impediment to invoking extrinsic evidence for the purpose of identifying the lot referred to as No. 24, and establishing its precise location in the town, or more properly the city, of Brunswick.

5. King, the defendant below in the action, was a stranger to the deed from Mumford to Mrs. Sears; and, though it was made pending his adverse possession, that would not render it invalid, because it was executed after the adoption of the Code, which abrogates the old law prohibiting the conveyance of land while held adversely to the maker of the deed. King, being a stranger to this deed, and, so far as appears, not holding under either of the parties to it, had no concern with their purpose in making it, though that purpose may have been to enable Mrs. Sears to bring and maintain an action of ejectment against him in the federal court to recover the premises. An inquiry into that matter might be relevant were the question raised in that court for the purpose of defeating a collusive action brought there as the result of contrivance by a mere colorable conveyance to give that court jurisdiction. But the jurisdiction of the superior court is not dependent upon the citizenship of the plaintiff, but upon the location of the land within the county, and upon that alone. The objection to the deed, as to its attestation by one witness whose commission as notary public had expired, and who was, at the time, counsel for the grantee in the deed, and by another witness who was the minor son, and engaged in the law office, of the first witness, furnished no reason for excluding the deed as evidence. The objection, as stated, involved in itself a concession that the deed was in fact executed and delivered; and certainly the matter of the objection would not, if established, render the deed inoperative, or interfere with its legal effect as a muniment of title, for it would pass title as well without any attesting witness as with two or more, whether either of them was competent to attest it or not. Proper attestation is a requisite to prepare a deed for record, and either probate or official attestation is requisite for the same purpose. But, as we understand the objection, the point made was not that the deed was not in a condition to be recorded, but that it was not valid as a conveyance. Deed good with one attesting witness only. Downs v. Younge, 17 Ga. 295; Lowe v. Allen, 68 Ga. 225. Same as to mortgage. Gardner v. Moore, 51 Ga. 268. Deed good without any attesting witness. Johnson v. Jones, 87 Ga. 85, 13 S. E. 261. Same as to mortgage. Marable v. Mayer, 78 Ga. 60.

6. We have discovered no conclusive reason why the deed from the Merrills to Mumford would not serve as color of title to the premises in dispute, if, as matter of fact, the lot described as No. 24 be the same lot as that to which the declaration refers in each of the two demises which it contains. There is evidence that Mumford, by his tenant, had possession up to March, 1862. The tenant himself dates the beginning of this possession in the latter part of 1854, or early in 1855. Another witness dates the beginning one year earlier. Were the jury to accept the recollection of this witness as more reliable than that of the tenant himself, they could easily have found that the possession had continued for seven years before the first suspension of the statute of limitations by legislative act took place, which was December 14, 1861. If the tenant's statement is to be preferred as the more reliable, then the statutory title most probably did not ripen; for, while a suspension of the statute of limitations would not count against a possession of land held after the Code took effect, it would hold against a possession which terminated before January 1, 1863,—the time when the Code went into operation. It was the Code which brought in the element of prescription as distinguished from limitation; and, under the Code, prescription, as it has been held, runs, though the statute of limitations be suspended. Pollard v. Tait, 38 Ga. 439. While, of course, prescription could be suspended by name, yet, being something merely analogous to, but not identical with, the statute of limitations, it is not suspended when the latter alone is mentioned in the suspending act. It was contended in the argument that, as the jury could have found from the evidence a title by "prescription," using the term for convenience, as we now use it under the Code, it mattered not whether a recovery could have been had upon the paper title, irrespective of the statute of limitations, or not. But it does matter, for under the charge of the court the jury were enabled to shun the question of prescription altogether. They were left free to find for the plaintiff on the paper title, when, as matter of law, that title was insufficient as a basis of recovery.

7. The same observation applies to another possible ground of recovery. Treating Mrs. Sears as claiming under her deed from Mumford, who went into possession under color of title, if he remained for less than seven years before the statute of limitations was suspended, a recovery might or might not be had upon such prior possession alone. (coupled with the deed from Mumford to Mrs. Sears,) as against King, the defendant, who seems to have entered under a claim of right, but shows neither title nor any lawful right. There being a demise both from Mumford and Mrs. Sears, or rather from each of them, his prior possession alone would be a basis of recovery if he never intended to abandon the premises; but, on finding that his tenant had gone out in time of the war, he intended to resume possession, and remained in that mind until he conveyed to Mrs. Sears. The animus revertendi would be matter for inquiry and determination by the jury on all the facts and circumstances of the case, and, if they found it existed, they might restore the possession to Mumford or his vendee, as against a mere wrongdoer, although Mumford had not shown either paper title or prescriptive title. But the charge of the court did not force the jury to pass on this question any more than it did on the question of prescriptive title. Under that charge the verdict may have been reached irrespective of whether the animus revertendi on the part of Mumford existed or not.

8, 9. The questions of practice involved in the cross bill of exceptions, and ruled upon, will be understood from headnotes 8 and 9, read in connection with the official report of the facts. The court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial. Judgment reversed. On cross bill, affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1894.)

INJURY TO BRAKEMAN—LIABILITY OF RAILROAD COMPANY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff, a brakeman, mounted a flat car to assist in side-tracking it, and, the train having backed into the siding, he cut the car loose, and signaled the train to leave it. Finding that the car did not clear the other track, he signaled the train to return and push the car in further. Plaintiff saw that the train was returning at fast speed, and put one foot between iron rails on the car and the end of the car, and kept the other foot on the outside so as to set the brake, and when the train struck the car the rails slipped forward and crushed his foot. Plaintiff signaled the engineer to lessen the speed of the train, but the latter could not see plaintiff on account of the position of the cars. If this signal had been made to a brakeman, who was in full view of plaintiff, it could have been communicated to the engineer. Held, that the plaintiff was negligent (1) in cutting off the car outside the clearance post, (2) in placing his foot in such position, and (3) in giving the signal to an engineer who he knew could not see him. Lewis, P., and Hinton, J., dissenting.

Error to circuit court, Culpeper county.

The plaintiff, Dulany F. De Butts, a brakeman in the employ of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, was injured while shifting a car, and, having sued the company, recovered a verdict against them of $7,500, from a judgment for which amount the defendant obtained a writ of error. Reversed.

Wm. H. Payne, for plaintiff in error. F. L. Smith and Edmund Burke, for defendant in error.

LACY, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Culpeper county rendered on the 16th day of November, 1890. The action was for an injury received by the plaintiff, Dulany F. De Butts, the defendant in error here, against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, while in the employment of the company as brakeman at Culpeper Courthouse on the 25th day of December, 1889. Arriving at Culpeper Courthouse with a freight train on which he was employed, De Butts was directed to assist in side-tracking and dropping one of the cars of the train, which had been disabled for further travel on account of a hot box and a broken journal. De Butts mounted this car, and the train pulled up and backed into the siding. De Butts cut the car loose and signaled the train to pull up and leave it. Another brakeman of the same train was put in charge of the switch, which he locked with a key which he took from his pocket. De Butts finding as the train pulled out that the car was not within the distance, just signaled for the train to come back, his object being to have the car that he had cut loose, and on which he was standing, pushed further into the side track within the distance post. The brakeman gave the signal to the engineer to come back, and he reversed and came back. The car on which De Butts was standing was a gondola, loaded with iron rails, which were somewhat shorter than the car, and there was a space between the end of the iron rails and the framing of the car. De Butts, seeing this, and thinking the train was coming rather fast, put one foot inside of the frame of the car and the end of these iron rails, and kept the other foot on the outside, so as to set the brake on the gondola car. When the train struck the stationary car loaded with iron rails the iron rails slipped forward on the floor of the car and caught De Butts' foot and hurt it, and hurt the other leg also. He was extricated from his position by the conductor, who was at the time in the office at the depot, sending a dispatch to the proper authorities to give information of the fact that the disabled car had been side-tracked there, and would be left behind when the train moved on to its destination. Being thus hurt, De Butts left the employment of the company, and brought this suit for damages for the stated injury. At the trial there was evidence adduced on both sides, and instructions asked by the defendant and refused by the court, and exceptions taken, and a motion to set aside the verdict by the defendant made and overruled and excepted to, and the evidence certified. There was a verdict for the plaintiff for $7,500, upon which judgment was rendered, and the case brought here by writ of error by the defendant.

The evidence shows that the plaintiff in the action, the defendant in error, was injured seriously in the foot. And we must next consider whether the injury was caused by the negligence of the railroad company, and, if so caused, whether the plaintiff was innocent or himself guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident as a proximate cause, without which it would not have happened. The conductor of the train had gone into the office of the company, and left the engineer and crew to shift this car to the side track, while he sent a dispatch. If this can be considered negligence under the circumstances of this case, it is the sole indication thereof. But, if so, then the plaintiff, De Butts, was guilty of negligence—First, in cutting off this disabled car outside the distance post; secondly, in putting his foot inside a box car loaded with railroad iron,—iron rails,—against which a train was presently to bump by his own signals. Without these acts, or either of them, the accident in question would not have happened. It was the plain and well-understood duty of De Butts as brakeman to cut this train loose, and signal the train away after it had gotten inside the distance post. So well did he understand this duty that he needed no instructions to bring the train back when he discovered his own neglect of duty in leaving the car outside of the distance post. If he had observed this at the proper time, all would have been safe. He says he put his foot inside in front of this pile of heavy iron to keep from receiving an injury. Why would this foot be less likely to be hurt on the platform outside the car than the one foot he did leave outside, and which was not hurt? He says he signaled the engineer to stop, and was not obeyed; that the engineer could not be seen by him nor he by the engineer. Why did he signal the engineer, whom he could not see, and who therefore could not see him, in preference to the fellow brakeman, who he says stood at the switch, and was necessarily in full view of him, on an unobstructed track, only a few yards off? It was a lack of diligence, and in itself negligence, to give signals to a person out of sight, and then act as if they would be obeyed. We are of opinion that the negligence of the company is not established, and it is clear, we think, that the defendant in error was guilty of contributory negligence in putting his foot inside the box car in front of iron rails when he knew that the car was about to be struck by the train to move it, and especially so, as he himself says, when he saw that the train was coming back fast enough to strike hard. Railroad Co. v. Risdon's Adm'r, 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. 786; Railroad Co. v. Moore, 78 Va. 96; Clark v. Railroad Co., Id. 717; O'Connell's Case, 20 Md. 212; Scally's Case, 27 Md. 589; Wonder's Case, 32 Md. 419; Railroad Co. v. Cottrell, 83 Va. 519, 3 S. E. 123; *Railroad Co. v. We are of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this case. The judgment of the circuit court appealed from here must therefore be reversed and annulled, and the case remanded for a new trial.

LEWIS, P., and HINTON, J., dissenting.

SHIFFLETT et al. v. COMMONWEALTH.¹
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 11, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—PROSECUTION FOR MISDEMEANOR —ABSENCE OF DEFENDANTS—JUDGMENT OF IMPRISONMENT.

1. Plaintiffs were jointly indicted for disturbing religious worship, were duly summoned, but no appearance made. The court entered an order amending the indictment against S. C., and making it read "S. S., alias S. C." Held, that the court could do this in such defendant's absence, under Code, § 3999, which provides that no indictment shall abate for any misnomer and gives the court power to amend the same, but does not require the defendant to be present in order that this may be done.

2. Code, § 4012, declares that "in prosecution for misdemeanors not embraced by section 4010, after a summons has been executed ten days before the first day of the term, * * * the court may either award a capias, or proceed to trial, in the same manner as if the accused had appeared." Held, that it was proper to try defendants for a misdemeanor in their absence, without first awarding a capias for their arrest, when they had been duly summoned.

3. It is not error to enter a judgment calling for imprisonment in jail, in the absence of defendants charged with a misdemeanor, the rule of the common law requiring their presence having been changed by Code, § 4076.

4. When the accused is not in custody, it is not error to direct his arrest and confinement in jail for the nonpayment of a fine before a fieri facias has been issued; Code, § 726, giving the court this power.

5. Where a person has been duly summoned to answer a prosecution for a misdemeanor, and fails to be present, to proceed in his absence with the trial, and sentence him to imprisonment, is no violation of the constitutional provision which guaranties to the accused the right to be confronted with witnesses against him, he being deemed, in such case, to have waived said provision.

Error to circuit court, Greene county.

Scott Shifflett and another, having been convicted of disturbing religious worship, were sentenced to confinement in jail, and they bring error. Affirmed.

Field & Thomas and R. H. Pollard, for plaintiffs in error. R. Taylor Scott, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

LEWIS, P. The plaintiffs in error were jointly indicted, under section 3805 of the Code, for a disturbance of religious worship. A summons to answer the indictment duly issued, and was served upon them, but there was no appearance on the part of either of them. At the May term, 1892, the following order was entered in the case, viz.: "It appearing to the court that the indictment contains a misnomer, in this: that Scott Shifflett is called Scott Crawford, by which last name he is commonly known, but his true name is Scott Shifflett,—it is therefore ordered that the indictment be amended by striking out the name of 'Scott Crawford,' and in its place and stead inserting the name of 'Scott Shifflett, alias Scott Crawford,' which is accordingly done." At the same term it was ordered as follows: "It appearing to the court that a summons has been executed on each of the said defendants ten days before the present term of this court, and the commonwealth being ready for trial the court doth order that the trial proceed, though none of the defendants are present, in the same manner as though said defendants had appeared and pleaded not guilty." The trial thereupon proceeded, and the jury found the defendants guilty, fixing their punishment at four months' imprisonment in jail, and the payment of a fine of $50 each, and there was judgment accordingly; and, on motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, a capias was awarded, commanding the arrest of the defendants, "and their delivery to the jailer of Greene county, to be by him safely kept in jail for the period of four months, and thereafter until the payment of the fine and costs adjudged, such additional confinement, however, not to exceed six months." The judgment of the county court having been affirmed by the circuit court of Greene county as to the plaintiffs in error here, a writ of error was awarded by one of the judges of this court.

1. The first objection is as to the action of the trial court in allowing the indictment to be amended in the absence of the defendants. This objection, however, is without merit, in view of the statute which provides that no indictment shall be abated for any misnomer of the accused, "but the court may, in case of a misnomer appearing before or in the course of a trial, forthwith cause the indictment or accusation to be amended according to the fact." Code, § 3990. The statute does not say the amendment shall be made only in the presence of the accused, and in the present case the amendment was not made until after the defendants had been summoned to answer the indictment, though we do not mean to decide that the amendment might not have been rightly made before the service of process. Upon that point it is unnecessary to express any opinion.

2. Nor was there error in proceeding to trial in the absence of the defendants. The argument is that, inasmuch as corporal punishment is attached to the offense charged in the indictment, a capias ought to have been awarded for the arrest of the defendants, and that it was illegal to order a trial in their absence. But here, too, all doubt is removed by the statute, which reads as follows: "In prosecutions for misdemeanors, in cases not embraced by section 4010, after a summons has been executed ten days before the first day of the term of the court, or if the accused was admitted to bail and make default, the court may either award a capias, or proceed to trial, in the same manner as if the accused had appeared and pleaded not guilty." Code, § 4012.

3. The next objection, viz. that the trial court erred in entering up judgment in the absence of the defendants, is also settled by statute, which displaces the rule of the common law that judgment for corporal punishment can be pronounced against a man only when he is personally present. Section 4076 of the Code provides that "no capias to hear judgment shall be necessary in any prosecution for a misdemeanor, but" that "the court may proceed to judgment in the absence of the accused; and" that, "if such judgment requires confinement in jail, the court may make such order as may be necessary for the arrest of the person against whom such judgment is, and for the execution thereof."

4. Another point is that "when the accused is not in custody it is error to direct his arrest and confinement in jail for the nonpayment of a fine, until a fi. fa. has been issued." But section 726 of the Code empowers the court in which any judgment for a fine is rendered, going in whole or in part to the commonwealth, either of its own motion or at the instance of the attorney for the commonwealth, to commit the defendant to jail until the fine and costs are paid, or until the costs are paid where there is no fine, and provides, further, that the court, or the judge thereof in vacation, may direct the clerk to issue a capias pro fine, either before or after a return of a writ of fi. fa. Section 4071, however, provides that when a person is sentenced to confinement in jail a certain term, and afterwards, until he pay a fine, etc., such additional confinement shall in no case exceed six months from the end of said term; and this provision was observed in the present case.

5. Lastly, the objection that the defendants have not been constitutionally tried is as destitute of merit as the assignment of error already considered. The constitutional guaranty that "the accused in all criminal prosecutions hath a right to be confronted with the witnesses against him," etc., is in no manner violated by any of the statutory provisions above mentioned. The appellants in the present case were given the opportunity, as the statute requires, to appear and defend, and their choice not to appear, but to make default, was a waiver of the constitutional provision now relied on. We are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court is right, and must be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 11, 1894.)

CAMP OF CONFEDERATE VETERANS—POWER TO HOLD AND SELL LANDS—DEED.

Under section 1008, Code, every corporation, when not otherwise provided, has the right "to purchase, hold, and grant estate, real and personal." The defendant corporation, by special act, has power to hold land to provide a home for invalid Confederate veterans, provided that it shall not hold, at any one time, more than 500 acres. The government was vested in a board of visitors, who purchased land. At a regular meeting of the camp, the board of visitors was authorized to sell a portion of the tract purchased, if advisable. Subsequently the board of visitors sold the tract in question, which sale was ratified by both the board and the camp. Held, that the board of visitors had full power to make the sale, and the purchaser obtained a good title.

Appeal from chancery court of Richmond.

The defendant, Davis, purchased of the Lee Camp No. 1, C. V., a tract of land, and refused to accept a deed on the ground that the board of visitors who made the sale had no power to do so. In a suit brought by the camp for specific performance of the contract, a decree was made, holding said sale to have been regular, and requiring the defendant to complete his purchase, from which decree the defendant appealed. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion delivered by W. S. BARTON, Chancellor:

I have carefully considered the record and the arguments of counsel in this case. The arguments are able and elaborate, and have been of much assistance to me. By the general statute of this state, every corporation, in respect to which it is not otherwise provided, has the right to "purchase, hold, and grant estate, real and personal." This corporation, therefore, unless "it is otherwise provided," had the power to purchase, hold, and grant the land, the subject of this controversy, under the general law. There is no provision otherwise. The special act of incorporation, on the contrary, expressly provides that "said association may acquire title to and hold land for the purpose of providing a home," etc., "provided that it shall not hold at any time more than five hundred acres." The only restriction is as to the amount of land it may hold at one time. Section 1070, Code 1887, provides "that no incorporated company shall hold any more real estate than is proper for the purposes for which it is incorporated." The only reason, therefore, for the third section of the charter, seems to have been to prevent any trouble or doubt as to the amount of land to be held at any time, by the statutory provision that 500 acres might be proper for the purpose of the incorporation. We can well understand that there may have been in the minds of the projectors the idea of a farm, to be cultivated by the inmates of the home for their profit and occupation. In all this there is no other restriction upon the right and power of the corporation to "purchase, hold, and grant" realty, which are given by the general statute, and so affirmed by the charter itself. The purpose referred to in the third section of the charter is simply the general purpose for which the charter was granted. This general purpose or object is fully set forth in article 2 of the by-laws of the association before its incorporation, and is recited in the preamble of the act of incorporation, passed on March 13, 1884. By article 11 of regulations governing the board of visitors, who seem to be equivalent to a board of directors, the board is authorized to select a site at or near Richmond, to erect the necessary buildings, etc., the title to the property purchased to be in the camp, or lease, etc., till permanent quarters be provided. The corporation having realized a large amount of money through a bazaar held for it by ladies of Richmond, by donations from many persons in different states made to it for its general purposes and objects, determined to purchase a site for the home. Accordingly, in November, 1884, it purchased the land now known as the "Soldiers' Home," in which was included the part, the subject of controversy, which was conveyed to it in fee simple absolute, without any trust, limitation, or restriction of any kind whatsoever. It not being "otherwise provided" by the general statute, the charter of the corporation, or the deed of conveyance, I think the corporation has the full power of alienation, which, by the common law, is incident to the ownership, and is expressly given by the general statute, and by a necessary implication in its charter. Nor does the necessarily limited duration of time in which the object and purposes of the corporation can operate in any wise affect the title in a grantee of the corporation. There is such a thing as a fee simple for alienation and a determinable fee for enjoyment. The limited life of a corporation, whether by express provision in its charter, or by its repeal or forfeiture, does not affect the estate and title of a grantee.

At a regular meeting of the camp in August, 1887, a resolution was adopted, which had been offered at the June meeting and twice laid over, giving authority to the board of visitors to sell nine acres of the tract across the boulevard from the Soldiers' Home,—the land now the subject of controversy being a part of the nine acres,—should in the judgment of the board such sale be to the interest of the home. This was like such a resolution at a meeting of stockholders in an ordinary corporation, authorizing the board of directors to sell certain land. In March, 1889, the board of visitors, at a meeting thereof, appointed a committee of its own body to make the necessary arrangements and conduct the sale, which was done by the committee, its action approved and ratified by the board, and subsequently by the camp. Under similar circumstances a board of directors would have made the deed of conveyance. It may be questionable whether the board of visitors here could convey a satisfactory title; but I think there can be no doubt but that the corporation was bound by the action of the board of visitors, whom it had appointed its agent for the very purpose of sale, and, if it had refused to carry out the contract, a specific performance would have been ordered by the court. I do not think the subsequent ratifications made at the suggestion of counsel for the defendants, and in the form prepared by them, were necessary, except so far as to provide for the execution of the proper deeds by the proper officers. Upon the whole case, therefore, I am of the opinion that the plaintiff had the right to sell the land bought by the defendant, that the deed secures a proper title to the purchasers, and that they ought to be required to fulfill their contract. A decree may be prepared accordingly. My conclusion has been reached through much study and thought, but I have not considered it necessary to write out an elaborate opinion,—only to state the general line of reasoning which has led me to the opinion above expressed.

John Howard, for appellant. Christian & Christian and Pegram & Stringfellow, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. For reasons stated in writing by the chancellor who decided this cause in the said chancery court, which opinion is copied in the record of this cause, there is no error in said decree.

HECKERT et al. v. HILE'S ADM'R et al.¹
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 11, 1894.)

INVALID MARRIAGE—LEGITIMACY OF CHILDREN.

Under Code 1887, § 2554, declaring that "the issue of marriages deemed null in law, or dissolved by a court, shall nevertheless be legitimate," children by the second marriage of a man whose first wife had left him and gone to another state are legitimate, though born before the first marriage was dissolved. Fauntleroy, J., dissenting.

John E. Roller, for appellants. Sipe & Harris, for appellees.

LACY, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Rockingham county, rendered on the 26th day of October, 1889. The controversy in this case is between the children of Peter Hile by a lawful wife, who left her husband and went to the state of Michigan, and the children of the said Peter Hile by another woman, married by him during the lifetime of his first wife, who were born before the dissolution of the marriage of the first wife. The circuit court decreed that the first marriage was lawful, and the children legitimate; that the second marriage was null, but that the children of this null marriage were legitimate,—made so by our statute, (section 2554 of the Code of Virginia,) which declares that "the issue of marriages deemed null in law, or dissolved by a court, shall nevertheless be legitimate;" and that the second set of children, being legitimate, inherited from the father as the first set, the issue of the legal marriage. There can be no doubt of the correctness of this decision. The case comes within the plain provision of the statute cited above, which is of ancient date in this commonwealth, (Acts 1785, c. 60; Acts 1794, c. 93, § 19,) and was carefully considered and construed in 1804 in this court, in the case of Stones v. Keeling, 5 Call, 143,—a decision under which we have since rested. In that case the law was considered in every aspect under which it should be regarded, and was sustained and made effective.

But it is contended by the counsel for the appellants that a recent case in this court was substantially overruled Stones v. Keeling, and they cite Greenhow v. James, 80 Va. 636; but we do not so regard it. That was the case of the illegitimate children of a white person by a negro, who left the state, and were married abroad. The distinction is sufficiently drawn in the opinion in that case; and in the case of Stones v. Keeling, supra, Judge Roane, who delivered one of the opinions in that case, does the same on page 148, saying: "The law concerning marriages is to be construed and understood in relation to those persons only to whom that law relates, and not to a class of persons clearly not within the idea of the legislature when contemplating the subject of marriage and legitimacy." The case of Greenhow v. James does not affect this case, nor the case of Stones v. Keeling, and the last-named case is a distinct authority on this case, and we think upon the plain terms of the law, and the reason of the legislature in enacting the same, is correct. We therefore affirm the decree of the circuit court of Rockingham county.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE—ILLNESS OF WITNESS.

Upon a second trial, after a previous conviction was set aside on appeal, defendant moved for a continuance from the May to the July term of court, on account of the absence of a witness who had been duly summoned, whose evidence was material, and who was detained on account of illness, but who, in defendant's opinion, was convalescent, and would be able to attend at the July term. The physician of the witness stated that there was little chance of his recovery, but that he might live. Held, that it was error not to grant the continuance, and that defendant was entitled to a new trial, it appearing that the witness had recovered.

Error to corporation court of Alexandria city.

One Phillips was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

Edmund Burke and E. S. Brent, for plaintiff in error. R. Taylor Scott, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

LACY, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the corporation court of Alexandria city, rendered on the 22d day of May, 1893. This is a prosecution against the plaintiff in error for murder, and the conviction herein is the second conviction of the said plaintiff in error. The first conviction, which was on the 27th day of January, 1892, was of murder in the first degree, and the accused was sentenced to be hanged; but on writ of error to this court on that conviction and sentence, on the 16th day of February, 1893, the said judgment was reversed and annulled, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded the plaintiff in error. Upon a second trial in the said corporation court of the city of Alexandria, the judgment was rendered which is now here the subject of review, whereby the accused was convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of eight years.

The first assignment of error is the refusal of the trial court to continue the case on the ground of the absence of the witness Green, who was a member of the bar of that court, who had been duly summoned, and the summons returned executed, whose materiality was duly attested, and which was known to the court, he having testified at the first trial. It was proved by his attending physician that the said Green (the witness) was sick, with the chances against him as to his recovery, but there was a possibility of his recovery. The accused, in his affidavit, sets forth that the said Green was convalescent, and that he would, as he believed, be able to attend the July term, the trial taking place in May, and that he could not safely go to trial; that he has discovered additional evidence that the said Green could offer to the court, and that the motion was not made for delay, or to evade trial, but was bona fide, that he might meet and make defense to the charge brought against him; and it is stated upon the trial by the counsel that the said Green is now well, and able to attend court to testify. Under these circumstances, it is insisted by the plaintiff in error that the trial court ought to have granted the short continuance asked for, and that its refusal has resulted in a denial of justice.

The rule upon which the court proceeds in considering a motion for a continuance is well settled, and has often been the subject of decision in this court. In Hewitt's Case, 17 Grat. 629, Judge Moncure said, on this subject: "A motion for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case; and, though an appellate court will supervise the action of an inferior court on such a motion, it will not reverse a judgment on that ground, unless such action was plainly erroneous. As a general rule, when a witness or a party fails to appear at the time appointed for a trial, if such a party show that a subpoena for a witness has been returned executed, or, if not so returned, was delivered to the proper officer of the county or corporation in which the witness resides a reasonable time before the time for the trial, and shall swear that the witness is material, and that he cannot safely go to trial without his testimony, a continuance ought to be granted. The party thus shows, prima facie, that he is not ready for trial, though he has used due diligence to be so; and, in the absence of anything to show the contrary, the court ought to give him credit for honesty of intention, and continue the case if there be reasonable ground to believe, that the attendance of the witness at the next term of the court can be secured, especially if the case has not been before continued for the same cause. But circumstances may satisfy the court that the real purpose of the party in moving for a continuance is to delay or evade the trial, and not to prepare for it, and in such case, of course, the motion ought to be overruled." See 3 Rob. Pr. (O. S.) pp. 140, 141. Savage, O. J., in People v. Vermilyea, 7 Cow. 383; State v. Lewis, 1 Bay. 1; Com. v. Knapp, 9 Pick. 515; Roussell's Case, 28 Grat. 936, opinion of Burk, J., citing and approving Judge Moncure's opinion in Hewitt's Case, supra; Gwatkin v. Com., 10 Leigh. 687; Walton's Case, 32 Grat. 863, opinion of Judge Moncure, a case very similar to this; Hook v. Nanny, 4 Hen. & M. 157, note; Higginbotham v. Chamberlayne, 4 Munf. 547; De Ford v. Hayes, 6 Munf. 390; Harris v. Harris, 2 Leigh. 584; Harman v. Howe, 27 Grat. 676; Bland & Giles County Judge Case, 33 Grat. 447. The authorities on this subject are collated in an admirable article in 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 804, 821.

We are not unmindful that there have been two convictions by two juries herein. The first conviction has been annulled by this court as unlawful, and the same set aside. The case was sent back for a new trial to be had therein, and this new trial was to be without any prejudice from the first conviction, which is null. Upon the second trial, as upon the first, the accused was entitled to be fully heard. His witness was not dead, but sick; he might recover, (as he has done.) The accused swore to his materiality, and there is no ground, and none is alleged, to believe that he was not a material witness. We think the accused was entitled to be fully heard before he was condemned. An accused cannot be fairly tried until he has been fully heard under the established rules of law as set forth above, (Welsh v. Com., 18 S. E. 273;) and the corporation court erred in overruling the motion of the accused for a continuance on the ground stated, and for that cause it must be reversed and annulled. It is not necessary to consider the exception based upon the action of the court in overruling the motion of the accused for a change of venue because of local prejudice, as an impartial jury, free from exception, was obtained from another county. Case reversed.

MORRISS v. VIRGINIA STATE INS. CO.¹
 (Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Dec. 7, 1893.)

TRUST DEEDS—NOTICE OF SALE—PLACE OF SALE—EXERCISE OF POWER BY AGENT—EQUITY.

1. While it is a compliance with a deed of trust requiring a notice of "ten days at the least" to insert the advertisement on Sunday, the 4th, for a sale on the 15th, when the circumstances warrant equity in taking charge of the sale, the court should prescribe a notice of at least 30 days, not only in the newspaper, as directed by the deed, but by handbills.

2. Where a deed of trust contains no provision as to the place of the sale, this matter is in the discretion of the trustee, and, if either party is not satisfied with his decision, he may apply to equity for instructions prior to sale.

3. Where a deed of trust covering property on the outskirts of Richmond contained no provision as to the place of sale, and the trustee selected the city hall in Richmond, on the debtor's objection that, if the sale were made on the property, it would command a higher price, the debtor's wishes should be respected.

4. A deed of trust directing a sale, but not requiring, in terms, a subdivision, should be construed in reference to Code 1873, c. 113, § 6, requiring the trustee, in case of default, "to sell the property conveyed by the deed, or so much thereof as may be necessary;" and if the land will bring a better price by a sale in lots, and the owner so requests it, and the trustee refuses, the owner may control the trustee, in the exercise of his discretion, in equity.

5. Trustees in deeds of trust must act in person, and not by agent.

Lewis, P., dissenting.

Appeal from chancery court of Richmond.

The Virginia State Insurance Company, being the beneficiary under a deed of trust executed by one Morriss, requested the trustee to proceed with the sale, which the trustee did, but in such a manner as to be objectionable to the debtor in the matter of notice of sale and method of conducting the same. The debtor secured an injunction, which was dissolved, and an appeal is taken from said order of dissolution. Reversed.

Stiles & Holladay and Edmund Waddill, for appellant. Christian & Christian, for appellee.

LACY, J. This is an appeal from certain decrees herein, the last of which was rendered on the 31st day of October, 1893. The controversy between the parties to this appeal has arisen over the execution of a trust deed executed by the appellants to a certain trustee, conveying a tract of land in Henrico county, near the city of Richmond, containing 856 acres, to secure a debt due to the Virginia State Insurance Company of $12,229.37. There were several abortive attempts at a sale, one on the premises, and another in the city of Richmond, when a sale was made at $12,000, when, it appearing by affidavits that the price of $12,000 was grossly inadequate, and in the opinion of numerous persons, real-estate dealers and others, that the property was worth $25,000, by consent of all parties the sale was set aside by the court, and a resale ordered. The trustee advertised the sale to take place at the door of the city hall in the city of Richmond, when the appellants procured an injunction, upon the ground that the property could not safely be sold in the city of Richmond with a reasonable expectation that it would bring a reasonable price, and that such a sale would result only in a sacrifice of the property; that it was a large farm near the city, situated in the county, and capable of subdivision into several valuable truck farms; that the trustee should not be allowed to sell the whole tract unless necessary to pay the debt due on it; that, if sold in bulk, it would not bring its value, whereas the record showed that it was worth $25,000, and that land just across the road had recently sold for $100 per acre, and this, by proper advertisement and judicious offering, might be sold as well; that the 10-days notice required by the deed had not been given; that the advertisement was inserted on Sunday, the 4th, to take place on the 15th instant; that this was not a compliance with the terms of the deed in letter or in "spirit;" and that the advertisement contains no notice of the terms of sale as to the residue after the cash payment has been paid and the debt discharged. This bill was answered, and a motion made to dissolve the injunction. Upon the hearing the court dissolved the injunction by decree in the cause on the 18th of October, 1892, but reserved all other questions, and, on motion of the plaintiffs, suspended the decree upon the usual terms for 10 days, to allow the plaintiffs to present their petition to this court for an appeal, which being done, the appeal was allowed.

In the first place, it appears that the advertisement was as long as the terms of the deed required,—“ten days at the least.”

The next question is as to the place of sale, and upon this question we will remark that the deed contained no stipulation as to the place where the sale should be made; and according to the rule established by the law, and to be found in the decisions of this court, this matter was left to the sound discretion of the trustee. Shurtz v. Johnson, 28 Grat. 657, and cases cited; Walker v. Beauchler, 27 Grat. 511, and cases cited. Mr. Barton says on this subject, (2 Bart. Ch. Pr. 446): “When the deed does not fix the place for the sale, the trustee may make it in any place which, in his discretion, he may select; but he should exercise that discretion fairly and prudently,” (citing Shurtz v. Johnson, supra;) and he cannot sell more of the trust subject than is necessary to satisfy the debt, unless the interest of the owners demand it, or they request it, or unless it would be injurious not to sell the whole. This rule, of course, relates to a divisible subject, the trustee's duty in every case being to act for the best interest of all the parties. It is a settled principle in this court that trustees ought not to allow any urgency of the creditor to have an influence on their conduct, but that, whether they act under deeds of trust or under decrees of a court of chancery, they ought to consider themselves as impartial agents of both parties, and should act for the interest of the debtor as well as of the creditor, (Quarles v. Lacy, 4 Munf. 251;) and it is now incontrovertibly settled that a trustee is to be considered as the agent of both parties, bound to act impartially, and to disregard the suggestions of either inconsistent with that obligation, and that he has, in general, no greater powers touching his trust than a commissioner of a court of equity for a sale of lands under its decree, (Lane v. Tidball, Gilmer, 130; 4 Minor, Inst. 65; Chowning v. Cox, 1 Rand. (Va.) 311; 2 Minor, Inst. 285; 1 Lomax, Dig. 424.) Mr. Minor says, (2 Minor, Inst. 286:) "The general principle of his duty is to act justly, impartially, and discreetly, without permitting himself to be swayed to the one side or the other by the suggestions or persuasions of either party. He has been likened in this respect to the commissioner of the court of equity. He must conform to the terms of the deed in respect to the time and manner of giving notice, and the time and manner of sale, as well as in all other particulars, and in all points when the deed is silent he must govern himself by the general rule to sell to the best advantage, and with an impartial regard to the rights and interests of both parties." It is a principle also of such transactions that the trustee is charged with a personal confidence, and must therefore act in person and not by agent. 1 Lomax, Dig. 427; 1 Tuck. Comm. 108; Harvey v. Steptoe, 17 Grat. 289. It is the trustee's duty to forbear to sell, and to ask the aid and instructions of a court of equity, in all cases where the amount of the debt is unliquidated or in good faith disputed, when any cloud rests upon the title, when a reasonable price cannot be obtained, or when, for any reason, a sale is likely to be accompanied by a sacrifice of the property, which, at the cost of some delay, may be obviated. 2 Minor, Inst. 287; 1 Tuck. Comm. 106; Lane v. Tidball, supra; Wilkins v. Gordon, 11 Leigh, 547; Miller v. Argyle, 5 Leigh, 460; Miller v. Trevillian, 2 Rob. (Va.) 25; Bryan v. Stump, 8 Grat. 247. Judge Lomax, in his Digest, (volume 1, p. 425,) says: "These trustees may, of their own motion, apply to a court of equity to remove impediments in the way of a fair execution of their trust;" and, if the trustee fails to do so, the debtor may enjoin the sale, and ask the execution of the trust under and by the aid of a court of equity, and thus, to adopt the language of Lord Bacon, substitute for the private conscience of the trustee "the general conscience of the realm, which is chancery," which Justice Story says implies nothing more than that a trustee who does not know his duty shall be at the pains to learn it.

As we have said, the deed is without directions as to the place where the sale shall be made, and the trustee must, in the exercise of a sound discretion, such as we have above referred to, select the place; and, if he shall be in doubt, he may apply to a court of equity for a determination of that question. If he determines for himself, and either party is not satisfied with his decision, he may apply to the court of equity to have it determined before the sale by the court, according to the circumstances of the case. That this question is determinable in the light of the circumstances of the particular case is clear under the decisions. In Walker v. Beauchler, supra, Judge Staples, speaking for the unanimous court, said: "It is very true the deed does not prescribe the place of sale, and much was therefore left to the discretion of the trustee. In the exercise of that discretion, it would seem clear that the sale ought certainly to have been made at least in the county where the property was situated." And in the subsequent case of Shurtz v. Johnson, supra, Judge Binks says, speaking of a sale of land situated in York county, Va.: "It thus appears that neither Baltimore nor any other place is specially designated in the deed as the place where the sale is to be made, but by the plainest implication the selection of such place is left to the discretion of the trustee, as is usual in deeds of this character. It may not be doubted, therefore, that the trustee had the power under the deed to make the sale at Baltimore, or at any other place which he, in his discretion, might select. The real and only question is whether he exercised that power fairly and prudently; in other words, whether he committed a breach of trust." Both of these two last-named cases were brought to invalidate the sale after it had been made. In the first the sale was set aside, and in the latter the sale was sustained. And, after the sale has been made, the court interposes with more reluctance than when it is applied to in the first instance, and before the sale is actually made. Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 366; Harris v. Harris, Id. 368; Gibson v. Jones, 5 Leigh, 370; Hughes v. Caldwell, 11 Leigh, 348. In this case the trustee, in the exercise of his discretion, selected the place of sale outside of the county. The debtors, who claim that they have a tract of land worth at least $25,000, and a debt on it of $12,000, object to the place selected by the trustee, and, before the sale is made, insist that it ought to be made on the premises; that the land is worth a good deal more than the debt on it; that it is capable of advantageous subdivision, and that it ought to be sold in parcels; that it is not necessary to sell the whole to satisfy the debt, and that only so much ought to be sold as is necessary to pay the debt on it; that its appearance and situation will increase the prospects of a good sale when the sale is made on the premises in view of the bidders. The trustee, in his notice, says: "There are few estates combining more elements of value than this. In the first place, it is a large estate, very near to the city of Richmond, on an excellent road, and embracing some of the finest trucking land in the county, the soil being similar to that of the noted vegetable section of Hanover county; then, again, its nearness to a growing city, such as Richmond now is, justifies the hope of a very largely increased value in a few years; and, again, it is said to contain inexhaustible quantities of the finest clay for pottery, fire brick, tiling, etc.;" and besides, he says, "embracing, besides the excellent highland, a quantity of Chickahominy low grounds, and a sufficiency of woodland." In view of the fact that such large interests are involved, the property being both extensive and valuable, and the debt being safely secured and bearing 7 per cent. interest, in reviewing the discretion of the trustee, and considering all the circumstances of the case, we are of opinion that the wishes of the debtor in this case ought to be so far respected as to make the sale on the premises, the deed not prescribing any other place, and that, before dissolving the injunction, the chancery court ought to have so directed, and its refusal to do so is error, for which the decree complained of must be reversed and annulled.

We are further of opinion that the land should be subdivided and sold in parcels; that no more may be sold than is necessary to pay the debt; and, when enough has been realized to pay the debt, no more ought to be sold. It is true that the deed simply directs the trustee to sell the property conveyed, but this must be taken in connection with the statute, chapter 113, § 6. Code 1873, which applies to this case, which provides, in such case, that when default shall have been made in the payment of the debt, or any part thereof, by the grantor, the trustee shall sell the property conveyed by the deed, or so much thereof as may be necessary. And Judge Moncure, speaking of this subject, and construing a similar law to this, says, in Michie v. Jeffries, 21 Grat. 347: "It is the duty of the trustee not to sell more of the trust subject than the purposes of the trust require, even though the deed direct him, in case of default, to sell the trust subject, without saying, 'or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy the purposes of the trust;'" the last part of the sentence, "to satisfy the purposes of the trust," being the phraseology of the law applicable to that case. Code 1860, c. 117, § 6. He adds: "That is always implied, unless a contrary intention plainly appears;" and again: "In saying 'under and by virtue of the trust deed,' the tract of land thereby conveyed to him is to be construed and read as if the words 'or so much thereof as may be necessary' followed the words above mentioned. In saying 'under and by virtue of the trust deed,' all the terms of the deed, and of the law on which it is founded, are, in effect, embodied in the decree, except such as are expressly varied." To the same effect is Terry v. Fitzgerald, 32 Grat. 851; the opinion in that case saying: "We hold that it was the duty of the trustee to sell it in parcels, if by that mode it would bring the best price; and, although he has a discretion, it is a legal discretion, which is subject to the control of a court of equity; and if the land will bring a better price by dividing it and selling it in several lots, and the owner desires and requests it, and the trustee refuses, the owner thereby invokes the intervention and assistance of a court of equity, * * * to control him in the exercise of his discretion,"—citing Judge Moncure as saying, in Crenshaw v. Seigfried, 24 Grat. 272: "If the debtor desires that a particular and designated portion of the land, fully adequate by a sale for cash to produce the amount of the debt and expenses, such desire ought to be carried into effect. In this case the debtor does not insist that only a part of the land shall be sold, or object to selling the whole, if necessary for the payment of the debt and expenses, but only insists that it shall be laid off into particular and designated portions, having assurance that it will sell better, and will not require the sale of the whole to pay the debt and the expenses." In the same case it is said that the court having possession of the case ought, instead of dissolving the injunction, to have retained it, and directed the execution of the trust; and, further: "The court is of opinion, therefore, that the circuit court, instead of dissolving the injunction, should have continued it, retained the cause, and had the sale made under its supervision and direction." And we think that in this case the court ought not to have dissolved the injunction, but should have retained the case, and directed the sale to be made under its supervision, directing a division into portions, and making a sale only of so much as was necessary to satisfy the debt; and its refusal so to do, and its action in dissolving the injunction, was error for which, moreover, the decree of that court must be reversed and annulled.

As to the length of time that the land should be advertised before selling, the terms of the deed are not restrictive, except only so far as to prohibit a shorter notice than "ten days at the least," and in this case the court, in justice to the debtor, should prescribe a reasonable notice of at least 30 days, and not only in the newspaper, as directed by the deed, but by handbills posted and so distributed as to bring the best price attainable for the property, if these expenses are incurred at the instance and request of the debtor, as they do not diminish the amount to be received by the creditor, and in no way impair his rights. It is right to add that in this case the creditor has been liberal and not unduly aggressive in enforcing his claim. It appears that he has been as anxious as the debtor to make the property bring the best price possible, and there is no proper criticism that can be, or ought to be, made upon him, nor upon the trustee, throughout these transactions. Much has been done in a mutual spirit of friendliness; but the parties have reached the point where divergence of interest has finally culminated in disagreement, and, the debtor seeking the aid of a court of equity, as he had a right to do, we have considered the rights of the parties as they now appear, and will reverse the decree for the stated reasons, and remand the cause to the chancery court, with directions to continue the injunction, and direct the proceedings of the trustee in order to a sale of the property and the payment of the creditor's debt as soon as it can be done, having regard to the just rights of all concerned.

LEWIS, P., (dissenting.) The case, in my judgment, is so plain for affirmance that I shall be brief in the statement of my views in regard to it. In view of the evidence in the record and the settled law on the subject, it is rather a surprise that the decree appealed from should be reversed. Fortunately, however, the decision cannot be authority for any other case. Whiting v. Town of West Point, 88 Va. 905, 912, 14 S. E. 693. The principal grounds upon which the injunction was prayed for to prohibit the advertised sale were (1) that the sale ought to be made on the premises; (2) that the property ought to be sold in parcels; and (3) that the notice of sale was not sufficient,—the latter point being now abandoned.

The property is situate just outside the city limits. The place of sale is not prescribed in the deed of trust, but the provision is "that, in the event of a sale, the same shall be made after first advertising the time, place, and terms thereof for at least ten days in some newspaper published in the city of Richmond." And the statute provides that the trustee in a deed of trust which does not otherwise provide shall, when called upon to sell, make sale after first having given reasonable notice of the time and place of sale, which, of course, implies that in such a case the sale need not be upon the premises, but that it may be in any other suitable place the trustee, in his discretion, may select. Code, § 2442; 1 Bart. Ch. Pr. 448. The principle is that the trustee must exercise his discretion, so far as he has any, in an intelligent and reasonable manner. He must use every effort to sell the estate under every possible advantage of time, place, and publicity. 2 Perry, Trusts, § 6020. This elementary principle was recognized in Richards v. Holmes, 18 How. 143. There the trustee in a deed of trust, having advertised the sale to take place on the premises, adjourned the sale to a different time and place, and this action was approved. The court, speaking by Mr. Justice Curtis, said: "We consider that a power to a trustee to sell at public auction after a certain public notice of the time and place of sale includes the power regularly to adjourn the sale to a different time and place, when in his discretion, fairly exercised, it shall seem to him necessary to do so in order to obtain the fair auction price for the property. If he has not this power, the elements or many unexpected occurrences may prevent an attendance of bidders, and cause an inevitable sacrifice of the property. It is a power which every prudent owner would exercise in his own behalf, under the circumstances supposed, and which he may well be presumed to intend to confer on another." The case of Johnson v. Dorsey, 7 Gill, 269, is another authority in point. In that case, under a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage, a farm situate just outside the city of Baltimore was ordered to be sold, and the sale, which was made, not on the premises, but in the city, was upheld. Indeed, in Shurtz v. Johnson, 28 Grat. 657, a sale, by a trustee in Baltimore, of a farm situate in York county, this state, was sustained; and Judge Burks, in the course of his opinion, said: "I know of no law of this state forbidding such a sale, and no decision of any court has been cited sustaining the general proposition that a trustee who is invested with power to make sale of real estate for the payment of debts, without express limitations as to the place of sale, cannot lawfully make such sale at a place outside the territory, and beyond the jurisdiction of the state in which such real estate may be. The powers of the trustee must be determined from an examination of the deed under which he acted. * * * It appears that neither Baltimore nor any other place is specially designated in the deed as the place where the sale is to be made, but by the plainest implication the selection of such place is left to the discretion of the trustee, as is usual in deeds of this character." The learned judge also referred to Walker v. Beauchler, 27 Grat. 511, and pointed out the difference in the circumstances of the two cases. Indeed, Judge Staples, speaking for the court in the Walker Case, expressly stated that, when the place is not prescribed by the deed of trust, much is left to the discretion of the trustee. He lays down no such proposition as that in such a case the sale must, as matter of law, be on the premises, or even in the county; neither does he impugn the general principle stated by Judge Burks in the Shurtz Case, but merely says that under the circumstances of the case with which he was dealing, the war being flagrant, the sale ought to have been at least in Alexandria county, where the property was situated, and not in Georgetown, outside the state. The case is, in fact, an authority for the principle that whether a trustee has fairly exercised his discretion depends upon the circumstances of the case,—a principle universally recognized, not only in regard to selecting the place of sale, but also as to selling the estate in whole or in parcels.

Now, remarkable to say, the conclusive and uncontradicted evidence on this point in the present case is utterly ignored in the opinion just announced. It is proven as the opinion of competent judges that the property will sell to better advantage in Richmond than on the premises. This is set out at large in the answers of the defendants, which were sworn to, and which were treated as affidavits on the motion to dissolve the injunction, there being no countervailing testimony. 1 Bart. Ch. Pr. 414; Muller's Adm'r v. Stone, 84 Va. 834, 6 S. E. 223. The answers aver that the premises are greatly out of repair, and by no means attractive in appearance. It is also stated that, at a previous sale on the premises under the deed of trust, the only bidders present were from the city; that the property, after extensive advertisement, was offered on that occasion both as a whole and in parcels, and that several thousand dollars more were bid for it as a whole than in parcels. Not enough, however, was bid either way to pay the secured debt, and the chancery court refused to confirm the sale. It is also averred that there is no reasonable ground to believe that the property will ever sell for the amount of the debt, which has greatly increased by the accumulation of interest. The answer of the trustee states that he would have indulged the appellants as to the place of sale had they expressed a preference (as they were given an opportunity to do) for the sale again to be on the premises. He also says that, in view of the fact that at the previous sale on the premises not more than a half dozen persons from the country attended, he considered the chance of an advantageous sale better if the property were offered in Richmond, and accordingly advertised the sale to take place in front of the city hall. Why, then, should the advertised sale be enjoined, instead of leaving the trustee to try the experiment of a sale in the city? Surely, no one could have been injured by such experiment, for, had the sale proceeded in the city without a just or satisfactory result, the chancellor could have refused to confirm it. The appellants thus had an ample remedy for the protection of their interests, without applying, as they did, to the judge of another court for an injunction to stop the sale. It is to the interest of all parties that the property shall bring the best possible price, and, as it has once been offered on the premises without an adequate price being obtained, why should it not be offered in the city, where, according to the evidence, the chance of obtaining a fair price is better. It is extraordinary, as it seems to me, that the decree dissolving the injunction should be reversed, with arbitrary directions to sell on the premises and in parcels, in view of the result of the effort that has already been made to sell in that way, and all the other evidence in that case. It is perfectly apparent from the record that the object of the appellants is to obtain delay, and in the mean time to remain in possession and enjoyment of the property. Their appeal, in my judgment, is wholly without merit, and it is to be regretted that it should find favor in a court of justice. I am for affirming the decree.

STOCKS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 26, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER JEOPARDY—DISCHARGE OF JURY PENDING TRIAL.

When, during the trial of a capital case, the mother of a juror died, it was not improper for the court to inform the juror of the fact, and to discharge him from further service in the case; and, after so doing, there was no error in declaring a mistrial, nor in overruling, at a subsequent trial, a plea of former jeopardy, based on these facts. It is immaterial whether the accused did or did not consent to the juror's being informed of his mother's death, or to the mistrial; the emergency authorizing the discharge of the juror, and thus ending the trial, being of a nature similar to one which would arise upon the serious sickness of a juror or of the presiding judge, or sickness in the family of either, requiring his personal care and attention, or from other cause which should be recognized as affording in law a sufficient necessity to warrant such action by the trial court. Bleckley, C. J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county: R. H. Clark, Judge.

Porter Stocks was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Arnold & Arnold and Glenn & Slaton, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., and W. C. Glenn, for the State.

SIMMONS, J. It was a principle of the common law, announced by Blackstone to be "a universal maxim," that "no man is to be brought into jeopardy of his life more than once for the same offense." 4 Bl. Comm. 335. This principle was embodied in the constitution of the United States by the fifth amendment, and similar provisions exist in nearly, if not all, the states of the Union. In view of this principle, it became important, in the early days of English jurisprudence, to know when an accused person had, in a legal sense, been put in jeopardy. Some of the courts in England held that after a jury had been impaneled and sworn, and charged with the case, they must return a verdict, and if, for any reason, they did not do so, the accused could not be again put on trial. Coke, in 1 Inst. 227b, says that "a jury sworn and charged in a case of life and member cannot be discharged by the court, but they ought to give a verdict;" and in 3 Inst. 110: "If any person be indicted for treason or of any felony or larceny, and thereupon a jury is returned and sworn, their verdict must be heard, and they cannot be discharged." The rule admitted of no exceptions, not even in case of the sickness or death of the prisoner or of a juror. Accordingly, we read of juries being carried from county to county in carts, in order that they might return a verdict before being discharged. The rule was so arbitrary, and the proceedings attendant upon it were so inconvenient and inhuman, that exceptions were, in the course of time, established. So we read in the leading case of King v. Scalbert, 2 Leach, 620, that, during the trial of the prisoner for murder, one of the jurors was seized with a fit, and carried from the court in an insensible state. A juror who examined him reported under oath that he thought he would not be able to attend the trial immediately. The jury were thereupon discharged, and another jury sworn, consisting of the former eleven and an additional one, and the prisoner was convicted. This case was followed and approved by all the judges, 18 years afterwards, in Rex v. Edwards, 3 Camp. 207; and the exception thus established is now recognized by all the courts, both in England and in this country. See 1 Lead. Crim. Cas. (Bennett's Notes,) 466. An exception to the rule was also made where the prisoner became ill during the trial. See the Case of Meadow, Fost. 76, which is the earliest case holding that a jury could be discharged on this account; and see King v. Stevenson, 2 Leach, 546. To these exceptions were added others, of a different character. Failure of the jury to agree upon a verdict before the expiration of the term of the court was eventually recognized as a sufficient ground for then discharging the jury, without the consent of the prisoner, and without prejudice to the further prosecution of the case. The contrary was held in two early cases in this country. Spier's Case, 1 Dev. 491, and State v. Garrigues, 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 241. But these cases were not followed, and it is now universally conceded that such an occurrence presents a case of legal necessity. Then came the exception which allowed the discharge of the jury before the end of the term, without the prisoner's consent, when it appeared to the court that they were unable to agree upon a verdict. On this point there was great conflict among the courts in this country, a number of very respectable courts holding that nothing short of the illness of the prisoner or of one of the jury, or like physical necessity, would authorize the discharge of the jury without the consent of the prisoner; but the better opinion now seems to prevail that the court has the power to discharge them, after they have been out a sufficient length of time, and it appears that they are unable to agree. Another exception was that made in the case of Nugent v. State, (1833,) 4 Stew. & P. 72, where it was held that the sickness of the presiding judge was a sufficient ground for discharging the jury. This exception, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is now universally recognized by courts and text writers. In the case of State v. Wiseman, 68 N. C. 203, it appeared on the trial of the defendant for murder that one of the jurors had fraudulently procured himself to be put on the jury for the purpose of acquitting the accused. The judge withdrew the juror, and declared a mistrial. The supreme court, on appeal, held that this was proper, and that the defendant could be again placed on trial, and that this was so whether he was cognizant of the fraud or not. The discharge of the jury under these circumstances was placed on the ground of "legal necessity," or what was denominated "the necessity of doing justice." In the case of Simmons v. U. S., 142 U. S. 148, 12 Sup. Ct. 171, it was held that "when it is made to appear to the court during the trial of a criminal case, either by reason of facts existing when the jurors were sworn, but not then disclosed or known to the court, or by reason of outside influences brought to bear on the jury pending the trial, the jurors, or any of them, are subject to such bias or prejudice as not to stand impartial between the government and the accused, the jury may be discharged, and the defendant put on trial by another jury; and the defendant is not thereby twice put in jeopardy, within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States."

The foregoing instances are given more for the purpose of showing that the courts are not limited to exceptions already made, than because of any direct bearing those mentioned may have upon the case now in hand. All of these exceptions were founded upon the doctrine of necessity; but, in deciding as to what constitutes a necessity, the courts, as we have seen, have not been governed by an inflexible standard, and have not felt bound to confine themselves to physical or absolute necessity, but have extended the doctrine as the ends of justice seemed to require. The tendency, as was said by this court in the case of Nolan v. State, 55 Ga. 524, "has been to lower the standard so as to comprehend moral as well as physical necessity, and, in the region of the moral, to be content with very moderate tests." That which unfits a juror for the performance of his duty creates a legal necessity, and such unfitness may result from mental suffering no less than from physical pain. As civilization and refinement have progressed, there has been a growing disposition on the part of the courts to recognize the influence of the feelings and emotions upon the mind, as producing this necessity. In the case of Com. v. Fells, 9 Leigh, 613, the court regarded the condition of a juror's wife, who was about to give birth to a child, as presenting a strong case of necessity. In the case of State v. Tatman, 59 Iowa, 471, 13 N. W. 632, while the defendant was on trial for a felony, the presiding judge received a telegram from his home to the effect that his wife was sick, and he thereupon adjourned the court until the following Friday, on which day he ordered a final adjournment. On the following Monday his wife died. At a subsequent term the defendant was again put on trial on the same indictment, and pleaded former jeopardy. The plea was overruled, and the supreme court affirmed the ruling. In Hawes v. State, 88 Ala. 60, 7 South. 302, it was held that the illness of a juror's wife presented such a necessity as authorized his discharge. See, also, Parsons v. State, 22 Ala. 53. A case which closely resembles the one we are now considering is that of State v. Davis, (1888,) 31 W. Va. 390, 7 S. E. 24, where information was imparted to one of the jurors, after the greater part of the evidence had been heard in a felony case, that his son had just died. It was held that a necessity existed for the discharge of the juror, and that he was properly discharged, and that the court could substitute another juror in his place, and proceed with the trial de novo.

We think the action of the court below in this case is sustainable upon sound principle, as well as upon authority. One whose mind is disturbed and distracted by sudden grief is certainly in no condition to discharge the grave and responsible duty of trying another for his life. What judge would be in a fit condition to preside on the trial of a capital case, upon being summoned to the deathbed of his wife, his child, or his mother? And would any court hold that a judge who is informed, while trying a case, that his wife has just died, cannot return to his home, and attend her funeral, but must go on with the trial? No man of ordinary sensibilities, it seems to me, would be in a proper state of mind to discharge his functions as a judge on the trial of a case, under such circumstances, and he should not be compelled to do so. As was said in the case of State v. Tatman, supra, "the law makes no such inhuman requirements." If what has been said is true as to a judge, it is equally true as to a juror. In order to perform his duty properly, he must give his close and undivided attention to the testimony, as delivered by each witness, and to the law, as given in charge by the court. He must carry both in his mind, and carefully apply the one to the other, and it is often necessary that he should make nice distinctions in the application of the law. It is not to be expected that a juror will perform this duty properly, under the circumstances shown by the record in this case. The question to be considered is, not whether the juror, in view of the greater importance of trying the prisoner than of paying the last tribute of affection and respect to his departed mother, should put aside his grief, and proceed undisturbed in the performance of his duty, but whether, as a matter of fact, he is capable of doing this. If not, the ends of justice require that he be discharged from the jury. What was said by the court in the case of State v. Davis, supra, where the juror was discharged on account of the death of his son, will apply equally in the present case: "Observation teaches us, if, indeed, we have not learned from sad experience, that the natural result of information suddenly imparted to a father, of the death of a child, is to unfit him, for the time, to attend to business. It would have been cruel to have required the juror to remain on the jury, under such circumstances. His grief would naturally unfit him for the discharge of such an important duty. And if, as the court said in Fell's Case, the object of the trial is to obtain a fair, just, and impartial verdict, there is little prospect of it, under such circumstances. This is one of the cases spoken of in the opinion in that case, where a juror is, from the peculiar condition of his mind and feelings, manifestly disqualified from bestowing on the case that attention and impartial consideration which is necessary to a just verdict."

But it is said in the present case that the judge should not have informed the juror of his mother's death, and that, whether this was proper or not, it was unnecessary to have discharged the jury, as the trial could have been suspended, and the juror sent, in the charge of a bailiff, to attend the funeral. In reply to the first of these suggestions, I will say, for myself, that it would have been cruel and inhuman to have kept the juror confined, without the knowledge of his mother's death; and to have required him to remain in the charge of a bailiff while attending her funeral rites would have been equally so, when, according to the oath of the bailiff, he could not speak to the juror himself, or allow others to do so. To attend the funeral of a parent is regarded by the civilized world as a high and sacred duty, and funerals are often postponed to the last possible moment in order that some son or daughter from a distant place may attend. What would be thought at this day of a judge who would inform a juror that his wife or mother had just died, but that, in consequence of the duty imposed upon him to try a man for a criminal offense, he could not be excused, and must put aside his grief, and give his whole attention to the discharge of his duties? We are satisfied that under the facts of this case the presiding judge had the power and authority to discharge the juror and declare a mistrial, and that the plea of former jeopardy was properly overruled.

Our constitution provides that "no person shall be put in jeopardy of life or liberty more than once for the same offense, save on his or her own motion for a new trial after conviction, or in case of mistrial." So it will be seen that the question which has so long agitated the courts in different states, as to the right of the judge to declare a mistrial, has been settled in this state by our organic law. The granting of a mistrial is the act of the judge. He alone can grant it, and he alone, in the exercise of a sound discretion, must determine what facts would be sufficient to authorize him to grant it. Where the jury fail to agree, he is to determine, from the length of time they have had the case under consideration, and by conferring with them, whether they will be able to agree or not. In declaring a mistrial, he must, as stated above, exercise a sound legal discretion. He cannot do it capriciously. If the facts which he finds and announces, in his judgment, show a legal necessity for a mistrial, a reviewing court will affirm his judgment. If no such necessity is shown, his judgment will be reversed. We have attempted to show, in the first division of this opinion, that the facts upon which the judge below, in the case at bar, acted, authorized him to declare a mistrial, and that he did not abuse his discretion. Judgment affirmed.

BLECKLEY, C. J., (dissenting.) 1. One of the main reasons, not only for all rules of trial, but for trial itself, is protection of the innocent. The law presumes every man innocent until the contrary legally appears. When an innocent man is on trial for a capital felony, his life is in peril. The duty of preserving an innocent life is higher, both morally and legally, than that of attending any funeral whatsoever. It follows that, when the mother of a juror dies pending the trial of a capital case, the true necessity which arises is absence from the funeral, not absence from the trial. The juror, being set apart and dedicated to the work of delivering the accused from deadly peril, is to be regarded as if in a far country, or confined in chains which cannot be broken. His public trust denies indulgence to his private sorrow. His sacred duty to the dead is canceled by the more sacred duty which he owes to the living.

2. Consent for a juror to be informed of the death of his mother involves consent to accept such service as he can render after the information has been communicated to him, but does not involve any consent that the jury may be discharged, and a mistrial declared. The plea of former jeopardy should have been sustained.

CENTRAL RAILROAD & BANKING CO. v. KENT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 26, 1893.)

INJURIES TO EMPLOYEE—NEGLIGENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — DISMISSING ACTION BY APPELLATE COURT.

1. This case has already been twice before this court. According to the opinion of a majority of the court when it was decided the last time, there should not, upon the actual merits of the case, have been any recovery against the railroad company. A third verdict having been rendered in favor of the plaintiff below upon substantially the same facts, it must be set aside; and as it is manifest, in view of the repeated trials which have taken place, that the plaintiff can never show a materially different state of facts, direction is given that the case be dismissed.

2. Bleckley, C. J., dissenting: The evidence warranted the verdict, and, on the doctrine laid down in 10 S. E. 965, 84 Ga. 352, the finding ought to stand.

3. Where the plaintiff, by making a prima facie case of negligence, has put the defendant on a vindication of its diligence, and this vindication has been made in two successive trials, but the court below has failed to recognize it as complete in either instance, this court, in the exercise of its power to give direction, may decline to order a new trial, and instead thereof may direct that the action be dismissed. In the present case such direction was given in order to avoid the onerous, and apparently useless, trouble and expense to the defendant of vindicating its diligence a third time.

4. After giving such direction, this court, in its discretion, upon good cause shown, might at the same term modify its judgment; but, no such cause being shown in the present case, the motion to modify is denied.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Bibb county: A. L. Miller, Judge.

Action by S. J. Kent against the Central Railroad & Banking Company to recover for injuries sustained in an accident caused by a washout in the railroad while in defendant's employ as engineer. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and dismissed, and motion for reinstatement denied.

For former reports, see 10 S. E. 965, and 13 S. E. 502.

R. F. Lyon, for plaintiff in error. Dessau & Bartlett and A. O. Bacon, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The main case was decided July 26, 1893. The first headnote expresses the view of it then entertained by Justice SIMMONS and the writer. The second headnote states the dissent of Chief Justice BLECKLEY to the judgment rendered. Afterwards, a motion for a rehearing was made by counsel for the defendant in error, for the purpose of asking a modification of the judgment in so far as it directed a dismissal of the case in the court below. This motion, by a unanimous judgment of the court, covered by the third and fourth headnotes, was denied September 30, 1893.

A brief discussion of the case upon its merits, and of the motion for a rehearing, will now be presented:

This case was first before this court at the October term, 1889. 84 Ga. 359, 10 S. E. 965. It was then held that the court below committed certain specified errors in ruling out testimony, and that the charge of the court did not prominently bring to the attention of the jury the point upon which the case should turn. A new trial was granted by this court, and, at the next hearing, a second verdict was rendered in favor of Mr. Kent, the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and the case was again brought to this court. 87 Ga. 402, 13 S. E. 502. After a most anxious and careful examination of the entire record, a majority of the court became fully satisfied that the plaintiff, upon the facts presented, was not entitled to a recovery—First, because it was manifest, beyond doubt, that the washout was caused by the act of God, unmixed with negligence on the part of the railroad company; and, second, because, in our judgment, the company had conclusively and satisfactorily shown that it had exercised all the diligence required of it by law in ascertaining the existence of the washout, and was not negligent in failing to discover it in time to give warning of its existence to Mr. Kent before the locomotive he was driving ran into it. In the opinion beginning on page 403 of the volume last cited, and on page 502, 13 S. E., the writer undertook to show, from the undisputed facts appearing in the record, that the washout was attributable alone to the act of God. The argument need not be repeated here, but, after a re-examination and the most deliberate consideration of it, there seems to be no doubt of its soundness and correctness. In the same opinion the writer quoted the fourth headnote of the previous decision, to be found in 84 Ga., on page 352, and 10 S. E., on page 965, and also the language of Justice BLANDFORD, on page 356 of that volume, and on page 966, 10 S. E., in which he said: "The question is, was the railroad company negligent in not knowing of the washout, so as to have given the plaintiff due notice and warning?" and on the same page added: "It seems to us the pressure of the whole case is upon this point," etc. Just below these words quoted from the opinion of Justice BLANDFORD, the writer, speaking for Justice SIMMONS and himself, said: "Trying the case by the test thus made, we are of the opinion that the railroad company has conclusively shown it exercised all that ordinary and reasonable care and diligence required of it by law,"—meaning, as is obvious, that the company had used the full degree of legal diligence in discovering the existence of the washout. 87 Ga. 405, 13 S. E. 503. Again, on page 407, 87 Ga., and page 503, 13 S. E., the following language was used: "Of course, if the company, by its servants, had actually known of the washout, or the circumstances were such that it ought to have known of it in time to warn the approaching train, or if the facts showed that the company had any reason to apprehend danger at this point, and failed to provide against the same, then undoubtedly it would have been a case of such negligence on the part of the defendant as would entitle the plaintiff to recover. But we do not think this negligence on the part of the company existed, and are of the opinion that the proof shows to the contrary." There were no italics in the opinion from which the above quotation is taken, but they are used here to indicate that we were undertaking to deal with the question as to whether or not, according to the evidence, the company had, or ought to have had, knowledge of the washout in time to have given the plaintiff warning. The final conclusion upon this branch of the case is stated on pages 407 and 408, 87 Ga., and on page 503, 13 S. E., in the following words: "Our conclusion, therefore, is that, even upon the line suggested for a proper solution of this case in the opinion delivered by Justice BLANDFORD, above quoted, the verdict was unwarranted by the evidence, and ought not to stand."

It sufficiently appears from the foregoing that, when the decision reported in 87 Ga. and 13 S. E. was made, a majority of this court were convinced that, under the evidence as it then appeared in the record, in no view of the case was the plaintiff entitled to recover. In other words, we were fully satisfied that the washout which produced the calamity resulting in the plaintiff's injuries was caused by the act of God, and that there was no want of diligence on the part of the company in failing to discover it in time to give notice of it to the plaintiff. Accordingly, another new trial was granted, and it resulted in a third verdict, upon substantially the same facts, in favor of the plaintiff. At the last trial there was some additional evidence, but all the members of the court are satisfied that it does not in any material or substantial particular change or vary the case upon its actual merits, as it appeared when here the last time. Entertaining this view, Justice SIMMONS and the writer felt constrained to set the verdict aside, and also to order that the case be dismissed. All of us feel certain that the full truth of this case has been developed, and that further trials of it could not bring out anything new that would be material in substance. On each trial the plaintiff has undoubtedly made out a prima facie case. This it was easy to do, in view of the presumption of negligence raised by the law against railroad companies; but the majority are decidedly of the opinion that, on the last two trials at least, the company has conclusively and satisfactorily rebutted this presumption, and has shown itself free from all negligence or blame. It is manifest, we all think, that the plaintiff can never show a materially different state of facts,—that is, can never show a state of facts that will, or should, break down what two of us regard as a perfect reply to the plaintiff's case. Of course, a court cannot, and should not, generally, undertake to foresee or predict what a party can or cannot prove; but after a case has been tried time after time, and this court, in view of all the records sent up, and of the character of the case, is fully satisfied that in the very nature of things nothing more can be shown which could or ought to change or affect the final result, we may with propriety say it is beyond the power of a particular party to show a materially different state of facts, especially when that party has all along been represented by able, faithful, and exceedingly diligent counsel, whose efforts in his behalf make it certain that they have brought out all in his favor, and all against the company, which could be proved, and who do not themselves suggest anything material in his favor, or against the company, which further investigation might bring to light. We mean to say that neither the record nor the argument of this case, either upon the merits or upon the motion to reinstate, suggests any reasonable ground to infer that there is any probability that upon another trial any new fact or circumstance would be elicited which could or ought to affect the result. The plaintiff and his witnesses are thoroughly committed to their theory and version of the case, and so are the defendant and its witnesses. All the witnesses who have testified more than once have, in the main, thus far been consistent with themselves, and the new evidence at the last trial did not add any material features to the case as already developed. The policy of the law requires that long and tedious litigation should come to an end, and the direction given in this case was made in accordance with this policy. See the cases cited below. The defendant, in two successive trials, has vindicated its diligence to the satisfaction of a majority of this court, and there is not the slightest reason to conjecture it would not do so again and again. To protract this litigation would not only unnecessarily impose on the defendant the trouble and expense of so doing, but would be profitless to the plaintiff himself. The CHIEF JUSTICE has never disagreed with Justice SIMMONS and the writer in holding that the washout which caused the calamity in this case was due to the act of God, and that the company was not negligent as to looking after the culvert and keeping it in order. His two dissents have been based solely on the opinion entertained by him that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that, after the washout occurred, there was sufficient time for the company to discover its existence, and give the plaintiff warning. He has not meant to convey the impression that the jury ought to have so found, but he thinks they might have done so. This is the only point about which we have ever differed in the case. While his opinion on this question has undergone no change, yet, accepting as correct the judgment of the majority upon it, he agrees with us in denying the motion to reinstate the case, and in declining to modify the judgment rendered. Undoubtedly, it would, during the term at which it was rendered, be in the power of this court to modify a judgment upon good cause shown; but no such cause was shown in the present case, and, as already stated, none was even suggested by counsel for the defendant in error. Their position, as we understand it, is that this court had no power to give the direction it gave in this case. We hold otherwise, and are free from doubt in so doing. Section 218, par. 2, of the Code undoubtedly empowers this court to make a final disposition of a cause; and section 4284 expressly declares that it may "award such order and direction to the cause in the court below as may be consistent with the law and justice of the case." These sections certainly confer very large and ample powers upon this court; large enough, in our opinion, to authorize the direction given in the case at bar.

In Harris v. Hull, 70 Ga. 838, 839, Justice Hall said: "One great purpose in establishing this court was to terminate suits, and with this view it is made its duty, not only to grant judgments of affirmance or reversal, but any other order, direction, or decree required, and, if necessary, to make a final disposition of the cause, (Code, § 218;) and it is empowered to give to the cause in the court below such direction as may be consistent with the law and justice of the case, (Id. § 4284.) Litigation should never be protracted where this, with due regard to the rights of parties, can possibly be avoided. 'Interest reipublicae ut sit finis litium' is a maxim so old that its origin is hidden in a remote antiquity, and the policy which it inculcates is so essential as not to admit of question or dispute." Again, in Robinson v. Wilkins, 74 Ga. 47, one of the headnotes reads as follows: "The supreme court is authorized to make final disposition of a case, and to give it such direction as is consistent with the law and justice applicable to it, and as will prevent the unnecessary protraction of litigation;" and on page 50 the same learned justice says: "We have authority to make a final disposition of this cause, (Code, § 218,) and to that end to give to it such direction as is consistent with law and justice applicable to it, (Id. § 4284.) This, we think, has already been done, and we are unwilling to protract litigation in any case where it can be avoided, with due regard to the rights of parties." We do not mean to say that the two cases above cited correspond, as to the facts, with the one now before us, but the statements as to the powers of this court are clear, strong, and unequivocal. Of course, the powers conferred by the two above-mentioned sections of the Code should be exercised with proper care and caution, and after careful search we find nothing in the past history or records of this court evincing any disposition on the part of those who have presided in it to exercise them otherwise. In the present case the two justices who gave the direction complained of are fully satisfied of its justice and propriety, and the court is unanimous as to its power to give the direction. Judgment in the main case reversed with direction; the CHIEF JUSTICE dissenting. Judgment on the motion to reinstate denied; all the justices concurring.

STATE v. MORROW.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 11, 1893.)

ABORTION—ADMINISTERING DRUG—JURISDICTION—PURCHASING DRUG OUTSIDE OF STATE.

1. Where the evidence excepted to is not incorporated into the record, its admission cannot be reviewed.

2. Since it is unlawful to prescribe for or advise or procure any woman with child to take any medicine, or to use any instrument or other means, with intent thereby to cause an abortion, (18 St. 547,) a person who gives a woman a drug with intent to cause her to abort may be convicted, though the abortion was in fact caused by the use of instruments.

3. The courts of South Carolina have jurisdiction of defendant for the offense of advising and procuring a woman of that state to take a drug with intent thereby of causing her to abort, (18 St. 547,) though the drug was procured by defendant in another state, and sent to the woman by mail.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Richland county; W. H. Wallace, Judge.

James H. Morrow was convicted of administering medicine to a woman with intent to cause an abortion, and appeals. Affirmed.

Following is the court's charge to the jury, together with its reasons for overruling the plea to jurisdiction:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: The real issue in the case, or issues, are within a narrow compass, and, when I have explained them to you, I will have nothing more to say. The indictment is brought under the following statute: 'That any person who shall administer to any woman with child, or prescribe for any such woman, or suggest to, or advise, or procure her to take any medicine, substance, drug, or thing whatever, or who shall use or employ, or advise the use or employment of, any instrument or other means of force whatever, with the intent thereby to cause or procure the miscarriage, or abortion, or premature labor of any such woman, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve her life, or the life of such child, shall, in case the death of such child or such woman result, in whole or in part, therefrom, be deemed guilty of a felony.' There are two counts in the indictment, one charging the defendant with having procured and advised the taking of a certain drug with the intent to produce abortion, and that, in consequence of such abortion, the death of the woman was produced. That is the first count. That is your first inquiry,—whether or not this defendant did that. If he did, he is guilty, under this act; if he did not, he is not guilty, under this first section of the act. In order to convict him under this act and on this indictment, you must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt. You don't decide this case as you decide cases on the civil side of the court, by the preponderance of the testimony, because whenever a defendant is brought into court and tried on a charge of any violation of the criminal laws of the state, no matter how small or inferior the crime may be, he comes into court under the legal presumption of innocence. Every man, in other words, is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty; but, when the testimony in this case establishes his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, then the presumption of innocence fades out of the case, and the jury must so find. But, unless that presumption of innocence is rebutted, it stands in lieu of proof of innocence; and it so stands until the weight of evidence satisfies the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt. And, when it does, then he must be found guilty; if it does not do that, he must be acquitted. The second count in the indictment is brought under the second clause or section of this statute, and that clause of the statute is as follows: 'That any person who shall administer to any woman with child, or prescribe, or procure, or provide for any such woman, or advise or procure any such woman to take, any medicine, drug, substance, or thing whatever, or shall use or employ, or advise the use or employment of, any instrument or other means of force whatever, with intent thereby to cause or procure the miscarriage, or abortion, or premature labor, of any such woman, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished,' etc. That section is the same as the other, as far as it goes. The other provides that if the defendant shall do what is in this section, and the death of the woman result, then his crime is a felony. If he should do what this section provides, and no death should result therefrom, but only an intent to procure abortion is established against him, by the means recited in this statute, then the act does not declare that act to be a felony; and, in order to convict him of that, you will have to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he attempted to procure an abortion,—intended to do it,—by the means stated here in the section I have read to you. Those are the issues, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen,—those are the only issues. Whether they have been proven or not is for you to decide. Whether they have been proven beyond a reasonable doubt is for you to determine for yourselves. If you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that either or both of these offenses are made out, you will have to convict him according to the degree of offense described in the act and set forth in the indictment. If you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he procured an abortion, intending to do it by the means prescribed in the act, you will have to say 'Not guilty' on the first count. If you are of opinion, and are satisfied of it, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he attempted to procure an abortion,—intended to do it,—by the means set out here in this act, but that such means did not accomplish his purpose, but that the abortion was procured by other means, to which he was not a party, then you cannot convict him on the first count, but may on the second, if you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt.

"The solicitor asks me to charge you: 'That if the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, James H. Morrow, administered to Colie Fowler while with child, or prescribed or procured or provided for said woman while with child, or advised or procured said Colie Fowler, while with child, to take, any medicine, drug, substance, or thing whatever, with intent thereby to cause or procure the miscarriage or abortion or premature labor of said Colie Fowler, he is guilty of the offense charged in the indictment.' I charge you that in its application to the second count in the indictment. That request does not contemplate the death of the woman. 'Second. That, under the second section of the act, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant actually administered the noxious drug, or actually advised the use of any instrument or any other means, to bring about an abortion; but that, if the jury believe beyond a reasonable doubt that, from the evidence in the case, the defendant, by his counsel and advice, induced the deceased to resort to any such means, or to make any such effort to bring about the abortion or premature birth, then the defendant is guilty under the second count of the indictment.' I charge you that. There is no difference of opinion on the other side in regard to it. I do not know that it is necessary I should say anything else to you. I have undertaken to make as clear as I could what the act is. I have undertaken to make clear to you what the real issue of the case is,—what you have to decide,—and that issue is one of fact. Did the defendant, by anything he did within the scope of the means described in the act, endeavor to procure abortion upon Colie Fowler, and that, in consequence of such intent and conduct upon his part, an abortion was produced, and death ensued? If you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, he is guilty on the first count. If you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, you must acquit him on the first count. If you should acquit him on the first count, then you may inquire as to the second count, which merely charges him with the intent and an effort to procure the abortion. If you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he did, then you must convict him on that count. If you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he did, then you must acquit him on the second count. If you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty, why, you will have to say 'Not guilty.' If you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty on the first count, then you may simply write the word 'Guilty' on the back of the indictment, for that will include it. But if you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty of the first count, and are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty on the second count, then say 'Not guilty' on the first count, but 'Guilty' on the second count. If you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty of either, say 'Not guilty.' Take the record."

Judge Melton, (addressing the court:) "The rule, as I understand it, is that the plea with reference to the jurisdiction of the court can be entertained at any time. Now, I beg to say to the court that I interposed the plea at the very first moment I could, because it couldn't be interposed except during the argument."

The Court: "That is not a matter for the jury, which is the reason I have said nothing to them about it. It is a matter entirely for the court. I may say I think the court has jurisdiction. I own there is room for difference of opinion about it; but, from what thinking I have been able to do in regard to it, I have reached the conclusion that the court has jurisdiction, for this reason: The act alleged was committed in this state. To illustrate: Suppose a man in a foreign jurisdiction should procure a firearm, and charge it with suitable ammunition, intending to use it against a person in this state. So far there is no crime, no offense, so far as I know, against the law of any foreign jurisdiction,—not a matter of which any foreign jurisdiction could take cognizance. But if he comes in this state, having prepared himself, formed his intention in a foreign jurisdiction, and executes his purpose here, the offense is committed here, and he is within the jurisdiction of this court. Suppose a man in a foreign jurisdiction prepares what is sometimes described as an 'infernal machine,' intending to use it upon a person in this state. His intention is formed, and the means of death are prepared in a foreign jurisdiction,—no offense committed still. But when he comes in this jurisdiction, or sends it into this jurisdiction, there is no offense if the implement is never delivered, if it couldn't be delivered by the express company, if it should be sent by means of that agency,—no offense committed. Only committed when the instrument is delivered, and perhaps the explosion took place; then the offense is committed. No offense has been committed within the jurisdiction of any foreign power, of which that power could take cognizance,—nothing for which he could be tried. If he is not responsible here, he is not responsible anywhere. The application of this illustration to the case in hand, I think, is obvious. A man in a foreign jurisdiction—(we will take a supposititious case) only prepares the means of executing an unlawful purpose in this state, intending to do it, and it is transmitted by an agency. Up to that time no offense has been committed,—no offense within the jurisdiction of a foreign power whatever. He can't be tried there for what has been done. If he can't be tried here, he can't be tried anywhere. Suppose done in the state of New York. The state of New York cannot try a citizen of its own for a violation of the laws of this state; it can only try a citizen for the violation of its own laws. Upon the supposition that he has simply prepared the means of doing an unlawful act, intends to put them in operation, but has not done it, can't do it, must be something in which the court can act, something it can take hold of, in order to give the court jurisdiction to try him. The act is committed in this state, and is not committed until the delivery of the unlawful means for the unlawful purpose is accomplished. That's my view of it. I think this state would have jurisdiction of this offense if the facts alleged are true. [Addressing the jury:] You can retire, gentlemen."

Defendant's Exceptions.

"The defendant, James H. Morrow, excepts to the charge and rulings made by the Honorable William H. Wallace, presiding judge, on the trial of this case:

"(1) For that his honor held that the court of general sessions for Richland county, South Carolina, had jurisdiction to try and determine the charge against the defendant, James H. Morrow, for abortion, notwithstanding that it appeared in the evidence, and was undisputed, that the said James H. Morrow was not in this state at the time the alleged abortion was committed; and it did not appear that said defendant, James H. Morrow, 'inflicted any injury' upon the said Colle Fowler.

"(2) For that his honor ruled, in substance, that if the said James H. Morrow, being without this state, transmitted to the said Colle Fowler the means of bringing on an abortion, and advised its use, and the said Colle Fowler, without being thereto compelled by force or duress of any kind, made use of said means, by reason whereof she died, such bare transmission of the means of procuring an abortion, and suggestion to use the same, constitutes 'the infliction of an injury,' within the purview of the statutes of this state.

"(3) For that his honor held that the transmission by the said James H. Morrow, he being at the time without the state, to the said Colle Fowler, being within the state, of the means of doing an unlawful act, is the doing of such unlawful act by the said James H. Morrow, if the said Colle Fowler thereafter made use of said means to her hurt.

"(4) For that his honor held that the courts of South Carolina have jurisdiction to try the said James H. Morrow for the crime of abortion, notwithstanding that the evidence, beyond dispute, established that said James H. Morrow committed no act in this state.

"(5) For that his honor held, in substance, that an act, viz. the procuring and forwarding an abortifacient, done by a person at the time without this state, and not criminal at the place where done, is a crime triable and punishable by the courts of this state if such abortifacient be used in this state, by the person to whom sent, with fatal results.

"(6) For that his honor held, in substance, that an act, viz. the procuring and forwarding an abortifacient, done by a person at the time without this state, and not criminal at the place where done, becomes a crime triable and punishable by the courts of this state if such abortifacient be used by the person to whom sent in this state, without regard to whether any result is produced or not by such use.

"(7) For that his honor held, in substance, that if the said James H. Morrow procured an abortifacient at a place beyond the territorial limits of the state of South Carolina, and forwarded the same to the said Colle Fowler, she being then within the limits of said state, and the said Colle Fowler thereupon, of her own free will, used the said abortifacient, without being thereto compelled by any force or duress or threats used towards her, such act of said defendant, James H. Morrow, is a crime, under the laws of this state, and can be tried and punished by the courts of South Carolina.

"(8) For that his honor held that a state statute creating an offense not known to the common law is entitled to extraterritorial respect.

"(9) For that his honor held that a state statute creating an offense not known to the common law can be violated by a citizen of another jurisdiction, being, at the time of the alleged violation, beyond the limits of the state wherein the said statute is of force.

"(10) For that his honor charged the jury that if they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant procured, or attempted or intended to procure, an abortion by any of the means set out and prescribed in the act on that subject, they must find a verdict of guilty on the first or second count, or generally, as the case might be; whereas he should have instructed the jury that the prosecution was limited in its evidence, and the jury, in arriving at their verdict, to the means (and the proof thereof) set forth in the indictment.

"(11) For that his honor overruled defendant's objection to the indictment made upon the ground that the acts complained of in the first count thereof were not therein stated to have been done 'feloniously.'

"(12) For that his honor admitted as evidence, in reply, certain letters purporting to have been written by the defendant."

Melton & Melton and McDonald, Douglass & Obear, for appellant. P. H. Nelson and John G. Capers, for the State.

McIVER, C. J. The defendant in this case was indicted under the act of 1883, (18 St. 547,) entitled "An act to amend the criminal law by providing for the punishment of abortion." The only portions of that act pertinent to the present appeal are sections 1 and 2. Section 1 reads as follows: "That any person who shall administer to any woman with child, or prescribe for any such woman, or suggest to, or advise, or procure her to take any medicine, substance, drug or thing whatever, or who shall use or employ, or advise the use or employment of, any instrument or other means of force whatever, with intent thereby to cause or procure the miscarriage, or abortion, or premature labor of any such woman, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve her life, or the life of such child, shall, in case the death of such child or of such woman results, in whole or in part, therefrom, be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not more than twenty years, nor less than five years." Section 2 is in the following language: "That any person who shall administer to any woman with child, or prescribe, or procure, or provide for any such woman, or advise or procure any such woman to take, any medicine, drug, substance, or thing whatever, or shall use or employ, or advise the use or employment of, any instrument or other means of force whatever, with intent thereby to cause or procure the miscarriage, or abortion, or premature labor, of any such woman, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not more than five years," etc.

The indictment contained two counts, the first charging that the defendant "unlawfully did suggest, advise, induce, and procure one Collie Fowler, a single woman, then and there being pregnant with child, to take divers quantities of a certain pernicious and destructive substance, drug, or medicine, in the form and shape of pills, with intent to cause or procure the abortion," etc., and proceeds to allege that, by the use of said means, the abortion was procured, and that the death of the said Collie Fowler was thereby caused. In the second count the charge is that the defendant "unlawfully did prescribe, procure, and advise one Collie Fowler, a single woman, then and there being pregnant with child, to take divers quantities of a certain pernicious and destructive substance, drug, or medicine, in the form and shape of pills, with intent to cause or procure the abortion," etc.

The case came on for trial before his honor, Judge Wallace, and a jury, when there was much testimony taken, and, in the opening argument of the counsel for the defense, a plea to the jurisdiction of the court was interposed, upon grounds which will hereinafter appear; and, after argument thereon, the plea to the jurisdiction was overruled, and the case was submitted to the jury under the charge of the judge, which should be incorporated in the report of this case, together with his reasons for overruling the plea. The jury having rendered a verdict of guilty, and sentence having been passed upon the defendant, he appeals, upon the several exceptions set out in the record, which need not be repeated here, but which should likewise appear in the report of the case.

We propose to take up these exceptions in their inverse order. The twelfth exception imputes error in admitting as evidence, in reply, certain letters purporting to have been written by the defendant. This is manifestly based upon a misconception, for nothing of the kind appears either in the printed case or in the typewritten copy of the testimony filed in this court. Indeed, as no allusion was made to this exception in the argument of counsel for appellant, we suppose it was abandoned; but, whether abandoned or not, it certainly cannot be sustained, for the reason indicated.

The eleventh exception complains of error on the part of the circuit judge in overruling defendant's exception to the indictment, upon the ground that the acts charged in the first count are not charged to have been done "feloniously." Here, also, we are unable to find anything in the case upon which this exception can be based. It does not appear that the circuit judge was ever called upon to make, or did make, any ruling upon the subject. Besides, no such exception could be heard unless taken before the jury were sworn, (Act 1887; 19 St. 829;) and there is nothing to show that the exception was taken at the proper time. Indeed, we presume from the fact that no allusion is made in the argument submitted here to this exception that it is likewise abandoned, but, whether this is so or not, the exception must be overruled.

The tenth exception is somewhat misleading, and for that reason this exception is reproduced precisely as we find it in the record, with the italics there found: "For that his honor charged the jury that if they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant procured, or attempted or intended to procure, an abortion by any of the means set out and prescribed in the act on that subject, they must find a verdict of guilty on the first or second count, or generally, as the case might be; whereas he should have instructed the jury that the prosecution was limited in its evidence, and the jury, in arriving at their verdict, to the means (and the proof thereof) set forth in the indictment." The point of this exception, as we understand it, is that inasmuch as the statute under which this defendant was indicted contemplates two distinct and different means by which abortion may be caused,—viz. (1) by the use of drugs, and (2) by the use of instruments, involving the application of force,—and inasmuch as the indictment charges only the first, no evidence could properly be received tending to show the use of the second, and, if received, the jury should have been instructed that they could not find the defendant guilty if they believed that the abortion was caused, or attempted to be caused, by the use of instruments, involving some degree of force, and not by the use of drugs, as alleged in the indictment. To make this point available to the defendant, there should have been some request so to instruct the jury, and a refusal to grant such request. But no such request and no such refusal are to be found in the case. The copy of the testimony with which we have been furnished, in addition to the printed case, shows that there was no testimony offered by the prosecution tending to show that the abortion was either caused or attempted by the use of any other means than those set forth in the indictment; and it is a well-settled rule that the correctness of a judge's charge must be tested by its application to the case, as made by the pleadings and the evidence. The matter of the use of instruments, involving some degree of force, was introduced into the case by the defendant in his cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution, and in the examination of the witnesses for the defense, for the purpose, doubtless, of showing that the abortion was caused, or at least was more likely to have been caused, by the use of instruments, rather than by the use of the means set out in the indictment. It was a pure matter of defense, not embraced in the issue presented by the pleadings; and, if the defendant desired that the jury should be instructed as to the effect of such defense if made out by the evidence, his proper course was to present a request to that effect. But, in addition to this, the exception does not correctly represent the judge's charge. He did not say to the jury what he is represented to have said in that portion of the exception which is italicized. He did not use the word "any," which is the important word in the exception, necessary to raise the point upon which this exception is based. On the contrary, the judge, after setting out the first section of the act, under which the first count in the indictment was framed, and stating what was the charge in that count, proceeded to say: "That is your first inquiry,—whether or not this defendant did that. If he did, he is guilty, under this act; if he did not, he is not guilty, under this first section of the act." If he did what? Why, certainly if he did what was charged in the first count of the indictment, viz. cause the abortion by the use of drugs. But the judge did not stop there, for he immediately proceeded to say: "If he did not, he is not guilty." Could language make it plainer to the jury that, unless the defendant did what was charged in the first count, he could not be found guilty, no matter what else he may have done. So that this analysis shows that the jury were practically instructed, so far at least as the first count was concerned, precisely in accordance with such a request as would have been the proper mode of raising the point; and as the jury found a general verdict of guilty, which, of course, embraced the first count, if there was no error (as there evidently was none) in the instruction as to the first count, it would make no practical difference to the defendant even if there was error in the instruction as to the second count, which, however, we are not prepared to admit.

On examination of that portion of the charge which relates to the second count in the indictment, we find that the circuit judge, after setting out the second section of the act, and pointing out the difference between that and the first section, and declaring, in general terms, what would constitute a violation of section 2, proceeds to say that in order to convict the defendant, under that section, "you will have to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he attempted to procure an abortion,—intended to do it,—by the means stated here in the section I have read to you." This language, isolated from the context, would seem to afford some support for the position contended for by the appellant; but when it is taken in connection with the entire charge, as it must be, under the well-settled rule, it is apparent that it does not justify the position of the appellant, for in the very next paragraph we find that the jury, after being told what were the issues which they were to try, were instructed as follows: "If you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that either or both of these offenses are made out, you will have to convict him according to the degree of offense described in the act and set forth in the indictment." (Italics ours.) Again, the jury were told: "If you are of opinion, and are satisfied of it, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he attempted to procure an abortion,—intended to do it,—by the means set out here in this act, but that such means did not accomplish his purpose, but that the abortion was procured by other means, to which he was not a party, then you cannot convict him on the first count, but may on the second, if you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt." This, followed by the approval and adoption of the solicitor's first request to charge, as set out in the charge, shows that the judge did not intend to charge, and could not have been understood as charging, that the defendant could be convicted without the means of procuring the abortion, or attempting to procure it, being such as were set out in the indictment. Moreover, there was not the slightest evidence tending to show that the defendant either used or employed, or advised the use or employment, of any instrument, involving force, to cause the abortion; and, as the well-settled rule is that the charge of a circuit judge must be understood as applying to the case as made by the evidence, we cannot consider the charge here as open to the objection made by the tenth exception.

Again, even if the jury had believed that the abortion was in fact caused by the use of instruments, involving the application of some force, rather than by the drugs taken as alleged in the indictment, and had at the same time believed that the defendant had advised the use of such drugs, with intent to bring about abortion, the jury should still have rendered a verdict of guilty under the second count of the indictment; for it is quite clear that the second section of the act does not require that, in order to constitute the offense there denounced, the means resorted to should prove effective to accomplish the purpose intended. The offense consists in the use of the means mentioned in the act, with the intent to cause abortion, and it is immaterial whether such means effected the purpose intended or not. We are of opinion, therefore, that the tenth exception cannot be sustained.

All of the remaining exceptions, in different forms, impute error to the circuit judge in overruling the plea to the jurisdiction; but as the second and seventh exceptions seem to imply that it was necessary, in order to constitute the offense charged, that some force or duress of some kind should have been used to induce Colie Fowler to use the means resorted to for the purpose of causing the abortion, we will first consider the point thus made. To dispose of this point, it is quite sufficient to say that the act under which the defendant was indicted plainly does not contemplate any ingredient of that kind in the offense there made punishable in the manner therein prescribed. There is not a word in either section of the act which signifies that the legislature intended that the use of force or duress in any form was an element in the offense. On the contrary, the act plainly shows that no such element was contemplated as constituting any part of the offense. It is obvious from a mere reading of the act, and no argument can make it plainer. Indeed, this point was not mentioned in the argument.

The remaining exceptions may be considered together. The question which these exceptions present is thus stated in the argument of counsel for appellant: "Whether the court of general sessions for Richland county, S. C., had jurisdiction to try the defendant for his alleged violation of the statutes of this state; he having been, at the time of the commission of the only overt acts charged upon him, a citizen of, and actually in, another state." We do not think that this is a precisely accurate statement of the question as it is presented by the record in this case, for there was evidence tending to show that the defendant had had sexual intercourse with this unfortunate girl, likely to result in pregnancy; that when she discovered her condition, and communicated the same to defendant, he then formed the intention of using means to cause an abortion; that the intention thus conceived was attempted to be carried out by applying to a physician to know whether the drug which he had procured to effect his purpose would be sufficient to effect his object; and that such drug was taken by the girl at his instance and by his advice. True, he attempted to disguise what the jury under the evidence, might well have regarded as his real purpose, by saying to the physician that he had a little lady friend who had missed her regular monthly period, and desired to know what would be the best thing to bring it on; but his remark to the doctor that the girl was awfully scared about it, and would not have her condition known for anything in the world, coming, as it did, from a man who was in no wise related to the girl, and only temporarily resident in Columbia, would have well warranted the jury in concluding that the real object of the defendant was to obtain something that would cause abortion, and that he did procure a certain drug, which the girl used, by his advice, for the purpose of causing the abortion. All this occurred in the city of Columbia, in this state; and therefore it is not correct to say, as is said in the statement of the question above quoted from the argument for the appellant, that he was, at the time of the commission "of the only overt acts charged upon him, a citizen of, and actually in, another state." Under this view of the case, there would be no ground for the plea to the jurisdiction, and this would be conclusive of this appeal so far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned.

In deference, however, to the zeal and ability with which this appeal has been prosecuted, we will not decline to consider the question as it is formulated in the argument of counsel. For this purpose only, we will, for the present, disregard the testimony above alluded to as to what occurred in Columbia, and consider the case as if the only "overt acts," as they are somewhat incorrectly termed, were committed in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, though we must say it is somewhat difficult to separate the intention (which there was evidence tending to show was originally formed in Columbia) from the acts done in Washington in pursuance of such intention. Assuming, however, for the purposes of this discussion only, that there was no evidence of any act done, in pursuance of an intention to effect an abortion, except such acts as were done by the defendant in the city of Washington, then, if the acts there done were intended to take effect in this state, and did there actually take effect, we still think the court, in this state, had jurisdiction of the offense charged. The evidence leaves no doubt that, after the defendant left this state, and returned to Washington, he procured from a druggist there certain drugs in the shape of pills, which he sent, through the agency of the United States mail, to Colle Fowler, with the advice to use them for the purpose of bringing about an abortion; that she received the pills so sent, and used them according to the advice given her by the defendant; and that the abortion did take place, which resulted in the death of said Colle Fowler. Under this state of facts, the question is whether the courts of this state could take jurisdiction. There can be no doubt that it is the duty of a state to protect, as far as practicable, the lives and persons of its citizens and others temporarily resident therein against unlawful violence or injury, whether the person committing such violence or inflicting such injury be a citizen of this state at the time, or not. If such person go beyond the jurisdiction after committing the act, or be and remain beyond the limits of the state when the unlawful act is committed, it may be difficult, and oftentimes impossible, to obtain jurisdiction of the person of the party committing the act, which would be necessary to give jurisdiction. But jurisdiction of the person and jurisdiction of the subject-matter are two entirely distinct and different things; and where, as in this case, the party charged voluntarily returns to this state, and thereby submits his person to the jurisdiction of the courts of this state, we see no reason why he may not be tried and punished for any violation of the personal rights of any of the citizens of this state, entitled to the protection of its laws, even though the act by which such violation was caused was originally put in motion beyond the limits of the state, provided the effect thereby intended reached the person for whom it was intended while in this state. If the defendant procured the pills in Washington, and transmitted them by mail to the said Colle Fowler, with the advice for them to be taken for the purpose of bringing about an abortion, and she received and took them in this state, in contemplation of law it was the same thing as if the defendant, in person, had brought the pills to Columbia, and there delivered them to Colle Fowler; for while it is quite true, as a general proposition, that the principal is not liable criminally for the unlawful act of his agent, yet, if the act done by the agent is in pursuance of the authority of the principal,—done by his authority,—the principal is liable. This doctrine has been expressly recognized and acted upon by the courts of this state in the case of State v. Anone, 2 Nott & McC. 27, where the owner of a store or shop was convicted of trading with a slave, though the act of trading was done by a clerk, in his employment, in the absence of the employer; the evidence being sufficient to show that such trading was authorized by the employer. The same doctrine was also fully recognized in the cases of State v. Borgman, Id. 34, and State v. Williams, 3 Hill, (S. C.) 94, though in the last two cases the defendants escaped conviction solely on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show that the employer had authorized or directed the clerk to do the unlawful act charged. Upon the same principal, it seems to us that when the defendant procured the pills in Washington, and put them in the mail to be delivered to Colle Fowler in Columbia, for the unlawful purpose charged, it was, in contemplation of law, the same thing as if he had there delivered the pills, to the woman for whom they were intended, in his own proper person. Instead of coming in person to Columbia to deliver the pills, he simply employed the agency of the mail to do the act which he desired to have done, and which was done by his express authority and direction, in this state. So far as we are informed, there is no authority in this state as to the question of jurisdiction, but authorities elsewhere, which, though not binding upon us, are entitled to the most respectful consideration, have been cited to show error in overruling the plea to the jurisdiction. It seems to us that the authorities thus cited do not support defendant's contention; and, on the other hand, we find authorities elsewhere supporting the views which we have taken, as will be presently shown.

It is conceded in the argument for appellant, and properly conceded, as the authorities abundantly support the proposition, that "if one sends an infernal machine from one state to another, or shoots from one to another, and kills a human being, or sends poison from one state to another, to be administered to a person, and the result is the destruction of human life, such offender may be tried in the state where the death happened;" but the attempt is made by appellant's counsel to show that this proposition of law applies only in cases where the offense charged is an offense at common law, and does not apply in a case like the present, which is a mere statutory offense. It would unnecessarily protract this opinion to consider whether the crime of abortion was an offense at common law, or is a mere creature of statute,—a question which does not seem to be very clearly settled by the authorities; and we will assume for the present that abortion is a mere statutory offense, and proceed to consider whether the proposition above quoted from appellant's argument is limited to offenses at common law, and does not apply to cases like the present, in which, as we have assumed, the offense charged is of mere statutory origin. Two cases have been cited to sustain the distinction sought to be drawn by counsel for the appellant: State v. Knight, Tayl. (N. C.) 44, and People v. Merrill, 2 Parker, Crim. R. 590. An examination of Knight's Case will show that the facts are not fully reported, and the headnote shows that the only point there decided was that "the legislature of this state cannot define and punish crimes committed in another state,"—a proposition which no one will dispute. From reading the case it would appear that the defendant was indicted under a North Carolina statute, which recites in its preamble that there is reason to apprehend that evil-disposed persons, resident in the neighboring states, make a practice of counterfeiting bills of credit of the state, and, by themselves or emissaries, utter or vend the same, with an intention to defraud the citizens of this state, and proceeds to enact that all such persons shall be subject to the same modes of trial, and, upon conviction, to the same punishment, as if the offense had been committed within the limits of the state; but the case does not show that the defendant was charged with uttering or vending such counterfeit bills, either in person or by his emissaries, within the limits of the state of North Carolina. On the contrary, it may be inferred that the charge was for uttering or vending such counterfeit bills outside of the limits of the state, for the manifest object of the statute was to protect the credit of the state, and there is not a word in it that seems to contemplate that, in order to constitute the offense denounced, the circulation of such bills must be within the state. We are unable, therefore, to see what application the case has to the case now under consideration. In Merrill's Case the defendant was indicted for a violation of a statute declaring that any person who shall sell a person of color, who shall have been forcibly taken, inveigled, or kidnapped from the state of New York, shall, upon conviction, be punished as therein prescribed. It appeared that the defendant had inveigled a person of color from the state of New York to the city of Washington, and there sold him, and it was held that the courts of New York had no jurisdiction, because the offense charged was committed beyond the limits of the state of New York. It will be observed that the gist of the offense charged was the sale of the person falling within the class described in the statute, and, as that took place beyond the limits of the state of New York, it, of course, followed that the court of New York had no jurisdiction. The inveigling was no part of the offense charged in the count upon which the case turned, but was nothing more than one of the elements in the description of the person whose sale was forbidden by the section under which that count of the indictment was framed; and there was another section in the same statute which made it a distinct offense to inveigle a person of color from the state with intent to sell him, under which the court said the courts of New York would have jurisdiction. We do not see, therefore, how appellant can derive any support from Merrill's Case. It seems to us that all of the cases cited by appellant's counsel to sustain the point now under consideration decide nothing more than the broad proposition, which no one will dispute, that the courts of one state cannot take jurisdiction of offenses committed in another state; but the question here is whether the offense was, in the eye of the law, committed within the limits of this state. It seems to us that the authorities which we will now cite sustain the view which we have taken, in a previous part of this opinion, that, in the eye of the law, the offense charged was really committed here, although the defendant, Morrow, was in the city of Washington when, through an innocent agent, the United States mail, he transmitted the drugs to Colie Fowler, while in this state, with intent to cause the abortion charged, and which, by his advice, were used by her here. In 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 110, that eminent author says: "The general proposition, therefore, is that no man is to suffer criminally for what he does out of the territorial limits of the country; yet one who is personally out of the country may put in motion a force which takes effect in it, and in such a case he is answerable where the evil is done, though his presence is elsewhere. Thus, if a man, standing beyond the outer line of our territory, by discharging a ball over the line, kills another within it; or, himself being abroad, circulates, through an agent, libels here; or in like manner obtains goods by false pretenses; or does any other crime in our own locality against our laws,—he is punishable, though absent, the same as if he were present." Counsel for appellant questions this proposition, or rather the illustration given, so far as it implies, by the language "or does any other crime in our own locality against our laws," that the proposition is applicable to statutory as well as common-law offenses, and has undertaken to show that all the authorities cited by the author to sustain the text are either civil cases, or cases charging common-law offenses, except the case of Barkhamstead v. Parsons, 3 Conn. 1, which was a qui tam action. Conceding this to be true, we do not see how this can help the appellant, unless some authority can be found which recognizes the distinction sought to be drawn between statutory and common-law offenses in this respect; and we do not find any such authority, nor are we able to perceive any sufficient reason for any such distinction. The mere fact that the cases cited by Mr. Bishop to sustain the legal principles which he lays down happen to be cases of the character claimed by appellant cannot affect the legal principle, which is, substantially, this: that a person may commit an offense within this state by putting in motion a force which takes effect here, or by acting through innocent agents here, although the party charged may never have been personally present in this state. To the same effect, see 1 Whart. Crim. Law, §§ 278, 604. These distinguished text writers are sustained by numerous cases, some of which we will cite. In People v. Adams, 3 Denio, 180, affirmed by the court of appeals in 1 N. Y. 173, the indictment substantially charged the defendant with obtaining money under false pretenses, in violation of a statute of the state of New York. The allegation, in substance, was that the defendant, by exhibiting a receipt, purporting to be signed by a forwarding agent in Ohio, for certain produce to be forwarded to certain commission merchants in the city of New York, to such merchants, induced them to accept drafts drawn on them by defendant against such produce, which the commission merchants afterwards had to pay out of their own funds, the receipt exhibited being false and fraudulent. The defendant filed a plea to the jurisdiction, alleging that he was a citizen of Ohio and resident in that state at the time of the transaction referred to, and never had been in the state of New York. To this plea a demurrer was interposed, and was sustained, the court holding the offense of obtaining money by false pretenses is committed where the false pretenses are successfully used, and where the money is obtained, and that though the defendant was absent from the state of New York when the money was obtained by him, through innocent agents in that state, employed by defendant, the offense charged was, in the eye of the law, committed by defendant in the state of New York, through his innocent agents, although he was absent from the state at the time, and hence the plea to the jurisdiction could not be sustained. This case was elaborately and ably argued by very distinguished counsel, and their arguments, which are fully reported in 3 Denio, present a full review of the authorities. The same doctrine is recognized in Reg. v. Garrett, 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 611, where Lord Campbell, then chief justice, said: "A person abroad may, by the employment as well of a conscious as of an unconscious agent, render himself amenable to the law of England when he comes within the jurisdiction of our courts." In State v. Chaplin, 17 Ark., at pages 565, 566, it is said: "It is not necessary in all cases that a man should be actually present in this state to make him amenable to our laws for a crime committed here. If the crime is the immediate result of his act, he may be made to answer for it in our courts, though actually absent from the state at the time he does the act, because he is constructively present, or present in contemplation of law." And, again: "If a person absent from this state commits a crime here, through or by means of an innocent instrument or agent, it seems that the law would regard him as personally present, and hold him responsible for the offense." This case, as well as the case of People v. Adams, supra, recognizes the distinction between a case where a person abroad does an act here through a guilty agent and where the same act is done through an innocent agent or some inanimate agency; for in the former case, where the act is a felony, the guilty agent must be regarded as the principal felon, and the person abroad who employs him should be regarded as an accessory before the fact, and only punishable where he is actually is, at the time he incites his guilty agent to do the act, here. Hence the cases cited by appellant to sustain such a distinction are not applicable to this case, as there is no pretense that the agency employed by the defendant, Morrow, to transmit the drugs from Washington to Colle Fowler, in Columbia, was a guilty agent. To sustain the general doctrine which we have announced, that a person abroad may commit a crime here through the agency of innocent persons here or inanimate instruments, see Rex v. Brissac, 2 East, (New Ed.) 373; Noyes v. State, 41 N. J. Law, 418; People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend., at page 534. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

LAWTON v. PERRY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 11, 1893.)

ACTION ON JUDGMENT—MERGER—REVIVAL OF JUDGMENT.

1. Code, § 311, as amended by Act No. 124, 1885, p. 231, providing that nothing therein shall be construed to prevent an action on a judgment after 20 years from its date, and a recovery thereon, in case it shall be established by competent evidence that it, or some part of it, remains unpaid, applies to judgments obtained before, as well as after, November 25, 1873.

2. An action on a judgment obtained in 1871 may be maintained without first reviving it, where plaintiff does not seek to maintain a lien growing out of it.

3. Where a person brings an action on a judgment, which never was a lien on the land of the judgment debtor, against the heirs of the latter, instead of bringing an action to revive it, and make it a lien on the estate of deceased, and obtains a new judgment, the old judgment is merged in the new, and he is entitled to rank only as a creditor of the estate holding a debt of record.

4. Where, in an action on a judgment which constituted the only lien on the whole estate of the debtor at the time of his death, a new judgment is obtained against his heirs, the first judgment is not merged in the second, so as to let in subsequent judgment creditors to rank equally with plaintiff as a creditor of the estate. McIver, C. J., dissenting.

5. An action brought on a judgment by regular summons and complaint, wherein a money judgment alone is prayed for, is not in the nature of a scire facias.

6. The proper proceeding to revive a judgment is to issue a summons to renew execution.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Berkeley county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action by R. Rivers Lawton, administrator of the estate of James M. Lawton, deceased, against W. Hampton Perry, Josiah I. Perry, Susan M. Perry, Rosa B. Perry, Mary E. J. Perry, T. Smith Perry, H. P. Foster, R. W. Memminger, Jr., guardian ad litem, J. Lamb Perry, trustee, John Heins, and Robert Black, sheriff, to establish a judgment against the estate of J. I. Perry, deceased, to subject certain real estate descended to and in possession of deceased's heirs to payment of debts against the estate, and to set aside a certain judgment in favor of defendant J. Lamb Perry, trustee, against defendant H. P. Foster, as administrator of the estate of J. I. Perry, deceased. From the decree entered, all the parties except defendant Black, sheriff, appeal. Reversed.

W. St. Julien Jervey, for plaintiff. Mitchell & Smith, for defendant Foster. J. Lamb Perry, in pro. per. T. Moultrie Mordecai, for defendant Heins.

POPE, J. This action came on for trial before his honor Judge Izlar, being heard upon the pleadings and the testimony taken before Master Leland. The decree having been filed, appeals were taken therefrom by all the parties to the action except Robert Black, as sheriff. We do not know that we can present the matters of fact and matters of law herein involved in any juster manner than by reproducing, in its entirety, the decree of the circuit judge:

"This case was heard before me at the recent term of the court of common pleas for the county of Berkeley. The action is brought to establish a judgment against the estate of one J. I. Perry, deceased, and to subject real estate descended and in the possession of the heirs of said deceased to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, and to set aside a certain judgment obtained by the defendant J. Lamb Perry, trustee, against Henry P. Foster, as administrator of the estate of said J. I. Perry, deceased, on the ground of fraud and collusion in obtaining the same, and for injunction and general relief. The defendants answer, denying all fraud and collusion, and claiming that the judgment of the plaintiff, both under the statute affecting it and the circumstances surrounding it, is presumptively paid, and that the complaint should be dismissed. The case was referred to the master of Berkeley county to take the testimony, and report the same to the court. The testimony taken, so far as deemed admissible by me, establishes the following facts: On June 1, 1867, Thomas P.

Lockwood, trustee, obtained a judgment by confession in the court of common pleas for Colleton county against J. I. Perry for the sum of $1,935.75, which was duly entered. Execution was issued on this judgment December 22, 1868, and levy made on certain real estate of the defendant. On April 3, 1871, James M. Lawton obtained a judgment in the court of common pleas for Charleston county against the said J. I. Perry for the sum of $1,028.60. A transcript of this judgment was duly filed in the county of Colleton on the 5th day of April, 1871. No execution was ever issued on this judgment; neither was said judgment ever made a lien upon the property of the judgment debtor, by levy or otherwise. In April, 1871, an execution was issued on the judgment of Lockwood, trustee, and levy made thereafter upon certain real estate of said J. I. Perry, situate in the county of Colleton. On August 7, 1871, Lockwood, trustee, entered a receipt on the sheriff's execution book for $100 on account of said judgment. On June 18, 1872, the defendant John Heins commenced an action against said J. I. Perry for foreclosure and sale of his interest in a tract of land situate in Colleton county, containing 617 acres. Decree of foreclosure and sale, made October 29, 1872; amount of mortgage debt, $965.21. To this action Thomas P. Lockwood, trustee, was a party. Under this decree the mortgaged premises were sold. There was, after applying the proceeds of sale, a deficiency of $665.22. For this deficiency, execution was issued and lodged with sheriff of Colleton county, July 1, 1874. No further steps seem to have been taken for the enforcement of this judgment. Thomas P. Lockwood died intestate in 1875. James M. Lawton died intestate in 1877. R. Rivers Lawton, the present plaintiff, administered upon the estate of James M. Lawton, deceased, September 29, 1877. J. I. Perry died intestate June 15, 1880, survived by his widow and several children. The widow died February 26, 1886. Present action commenced September 2, 1889, and lis pendens filed in Berkeley and Colleton counties. J. Lamb Perry appointed trustee in place of Lockwood, deceased, September 11, 1889. Henry P. Foster appointed administrator of estate of J. I. Perry, September 24, 1889. J. Lamb Perry commenced action against Henry P. Foster, administrator of the estate of J. I. Perry, on the judgment of Lockwood, Trustee, v. Perry, in the court of common pleas for Berkeley county, September 24, 1889. Judgment by default rendered against Henry P. Foster, administrator, for $1,960.97, October 22, 1889, which, after entry, was transcribed to Colleton county, and execution issued thereon. Under this execution, a levy was made by the sheriff of Colleton county on certain of the real estate mentioned and described in the complaint herein. The sale under this levy was restrained by order made in the present action, after hearing, November 30, 1889. Both James M. Lawton and J. I. Perry lived in Summer-ville for several years before their deaths. James M. Lawton was, for several years before his death, in reduced circumstances. J. I. Perry owned and possessed the real estate described in the complaint at the time of his death. His heirs are now in possession of the same. R. Rivers Lawton, present plaintiff, knew of the existence of the judgment of his father against J. I. Perry when obtained, and at the time of the death of his father, but did not think estate of Perry was sufficiently valuable to compensate for the costs of an action. J. I. Perry left no personal property excepting some household goods. No administration was taken out on his estate until 1889. Income from all the real estate of J. I. Perry received by his heirs insufficient to pay taxes on the same.

"Let us first consider the judgment of the plaintiff in the light of the testimony, and of the law applicable thereto. It is contended that this judgment is presumptively paid, notwithstanding twenty years have not elapsed since the original entry thereof, and consequently the plaintiff herein has no right of action, and that the complaint should be dismissed. We cannot concur in this view. The judgment is not presumed to be paid under the statute affecting it; neither do the facts and circumstances proven warrant the court in presuming it paid, when all the testimony is considered. Even after a judgment is presumptively paid, an action may be maintained upon it, and the presumption of payment be rebutted by proof and a recovery had thereon. Code, § 311, as amended by Act No. 124, 1885, p. 231. The language of the Code is as follows: 'Nothing herein shall be construed to prevent an action upon a judgment after the lapse of twenty years from the date of the original entry thereof, and a recovery thereon, in case it shall be established by competent and sufficient evidence that said judgment, or some part thereof, remains unsatisfied and due.' This language applies generally to all judgments, no matter when recovered, and not to a particular class of judgments. It would be absurd to confine this provision to judgments obtained after 1873 alone. Under the latter construction we would have the following result, namely, that judgments obtained after 1873 could be sued upon after twenty years, and a recovery had thereon, while judgments obtained between 1st March, 1870, and 25th November, 1873, could not be sued upon, even if the period of twenty years had not elapsed from the date of original entry thereof, and here, at most, presumptively paid. The presumption of payment in the former case is much stronger than the latter, if length of time alone is considered; and the language of the statutes relating to one class of judgments is certainly no more imperative than that relating to the other class. The present action, as we have already said, is to establish the old judgment debt of James M. Lawton against J. I. Perry, and to subject real estate descended and in the possession of the heirs of the judgment debtor to the payment of the debts of their ancestor. The rule that a judgment creditor can only demand the aid of a court of equity after he has exhausted his legal remedy without satisfying his debt is only applicable inter vivos, and, as was said in Ragsdale v. Holmes, 1 S. C. 91, 'for the reason that the estate of the living debtor does not become assets for the payment of his debts until the exhaustion of the legal remedies is complete. The estate of a deceased debtor, or so much thereof as may be requisite for the payment of his debts, becomes assets from his decease. The primary mode of making them available is by an action at law, and recourse cannot be had to a creditors' bill where there is an adequate legal remedy; but where there is a devastavit, or threatened waste and insolvency, * * * unquestioned ground exists for the interference of equity.' The facts proven in this case clearly show that the personal assets of the estate of J. I. Perry, deceased, are wholly insufficient to pay and satisfy all of his just debts and liabilities, and that resort to the real estate must be had for that purpose; that there is a threatened waste of said assets, and other good grounds for equitable interference. The rule of law is well settled in this state that so long as land remains in the hands of the heir they are liable to be seized in execution under a judgment recovered against the heir for the debt of the ancestor, while, if the lands are not in the exclusive actual possession of the heirs entitled to them, they would be liable to be seized in execution under a judgment recovered against the executor or administrator. Now, it will be remembered that the judgment sought to be established in the present action against the heirs was recovered against the ancestor in his lifetime, but was never at any time made a lien upon any of the property of the judgment debtor, by levy or otherwise. In establishing this claim, held against the ancestor, against the heirs, the old judgment of James M. Lawton v. J. I. Perry is made the foundation of the action. The judgment must, therefore, necessarily be a new judgment, taking lien from its date. The same result would follow, so far as the lien is concerned, if the present action was treated as an action to show cause why the old judgment should not be revived, and execution issued to enforce the same. Otherwise, a judgment which never had a lien would be given a lien prior to subsequent judgment having lien from its entry,—a proposition not sustained by reason or authority. The proof is clear that the judgment of James M. Lawton v. J. I. Perry was duly obtained in the court of common pleas for Charleston county, and duly transcribed to Colleton county; and the proof satisfies me that no part of said judgment has been paid. The mere fact that this judgment was never made a lien upon the property of the judgment debtor, by levy or otherwise, did not destroy the judgment debt, or invalidate the claim.

"We will next consider the judgment of J. Lamb Perry, Trustee, v. Henry P. Foster, Administrator. The plaintiff herein contends that the judgment is fraudulent and void, having been obtained by collusion of the parties, and should be set aside; and, further, if allowed to stand, the action in said case being an action of debt upon the former judgment of Lockwood, Trustee, v. Perry, and not an action in the nature of scire facias to revive the former judgment, the former judgment was merged in the latter, and the lien of the former lost. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the writ of scire facias was abolished by the Code, and that there was no remedy by which the judgment of Lockwood, Trustee, v. Perry, could be revived save by action under the Code of Procedure; that the action of Perry, Trustee, v. Foster, Administrator, was in the nature of a writ of scire facias, and that the former judgment was not merged in the latter, or its lien lost; and that there was no fraud or collusion in obtaining the latter judgment. Before discussing the question of merger, it would be as well to dispose at once of the question of fraud and collusion. While the testimony does show a concert of action between the counsel representing certain of the defendants in regard to the proceedings for the appointment of a trustee in the place of Lockwood, and of an administrator of the estate of J. I. Perry, deceased, and an apparent haste in instituting the suit against Foster, administrator, we see nothing in so much of the testimony as we deem competent upon this issue that would warrant us in finding said judgment fraudulent and void. In considering the question of merger it becomes necessary, first, to determine what remedy, if any, has a judgment creditor now to revive a judgment obtained before the 1st of March, 1870. The defendants contend that the writ of scire facias was abolished by the Code, (section 424,) and that summons to show cause is only applicable to judgments obtained since the Code. This, so far as we know, is a new question. The language of section 424 is: 'The writ of scire facias, the writ of quo warranto, * * * are abolished; and the remedies heretofore obtainable in those forms may be obtained by civil actions under the provisions of this chapter.' It will be noted that the language is 'this chapter,' not 'this Code of Procedure.' A careful reading of the chapter must satisfy any one that there is no provision of the chapter applicable to a scire facias to revive a judgment. It may be, therefore, that the legislature did not have in contemplation the writ of scire facias to revive a judgment, but only writs of scire facias, as relating to such public matters as are provided for in said chapter. If this be so, then the right to revive a judgment by writ of scire facias was not affected by section 424. Again, it has been held by our supreme court that a judgment obtained prior to the Code may be revived, under process to renew execution. Patterson v. Baxley, (S. C.) 11 S. E. 1066; Leitner v. Metz, 32 S. C. 383, 10 S. E. 1062. In these cases the process used was a summons to show cause why the execution should not be renewed. It is true the question now raised was not raised in those cases. There can be no doubt but that, under the Code, the execution upon a judgment obtained before 1870 may be renewed by summons to show cause. If this be so, and the renewal of such execution necessarily revives the judgment, what is there to prevent the revival of the judgment directly by such process? It will not be contended, we think, that that which can be done indirectly by summons to show cause cannot be done directly by said process. But while it may be doubted whether J. Lamb Perry, trustee, could have revived the Lockwood judgment, either by a writ of scire facias, as it heretofore existed, or by a summons to show cause under the Code, we are satisfied that said defendant had a complete remedy to revive his judgment, namely, by action under the Code of Procedure. By section 89 of the Code it is declared that there shall be in this state but one form of action for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress of private wrongs, which shall be denominated 'a civil action.' By section 449, Code, it is declared that all rights of action given or secured by existing laws may be prosecuted in the manner provided by this Code of Procedure. Now, if the writ of scire facias was abolished by the Code of Procedure, both as a public and private remedy, (and we are of this opinion,) it only remains to show that a writ of scire facias, as it heretofore existed, was an action to bring it within the remedies given in the Code of Procedure. That scire facias, as it heretofore existed, was an action, is sustained by Tidd, Pr. 982. Co. Litt. 2906. Judge Buller, in Winter v. Kretchman, 2 Term R. 46, says: 'It has been held in a variety of cases that a scire facias is an action.' A writ of scire facias could be pleaded to, the same as another action, and release of all actions was held to be a bar to the writ. It is not a new action, however, but a continuation of the old one; and the judgment rendered is not a new one for the debt and damages, but an order that execution issue to enforce the former judgment. The definition of an 'action,' given in section 2 of the Code, is certainly broad enough to include the proceeding by scire facias to revive a judgment, and to have execution thereon. It is, without doubt, a proceeding in a court of justice for the enforcement of a right. If the judgment is dormant, it is surely the right of the judgment creditor to have it revived; and, if unsatisfied, though not dormant, it is equally his right to have satisfaction thereof by execution. A scire facias to revive a judgment and have execution thereon being regarded as an action, sections 89, 449, Code, are applicable to the case, without resort to the saving clause in the last section. Allowing the remedy to be had by action, which before the Code could only be obtained by scire facias, is merely giving to section 449 a construction in accordance with the obvious import of said section. The party seeking to enforce his right by action under the Code should allege, in his complaint, substantially the same facts which were formerly required to be stated in the writ of scire facias, and the relief demanded should also be the same. 5 Walt, Pr. 637. Such proceeding is not an action on the judgment. An action on a judgment is an action to recover the amount on the judgment, as any other money demand would be recovered, the judgment being used only as the cause of action, and as evidence of the amount of the debt. Such action is in no sense a continuation of the former suit, but a new action, while scire facias was a remedy given to avoid the necessity of an action of debt upon the judgment. As was said by Justice McGowan in Ex parte Witte, 32 S. C. 228, 10 S. E. 950: 'We have always supposed that a scire facias on judgment must pursue the terms of the judgment; that it is a continuance of the action, and must conform to the record; that the authority to issue an execution on a judgment is derived from the original judgment, which, revived, continues its vitality, with other lien and other incidents, from the time of its rendition.' When an action in the nature of a writ of scire facias is the remedy resorted to, it is but a continuation of the former suit, and the first judgment is not merged in the revived judgment, and its former lien is preserved. But, it is otherwise when the action is that of debt on a judgment, or, in other words, when the former judgment is made the cause of action of the latter. In such case the former judgment is merged in the new judgment, and, being thus extinguished, its lien is lost. 'A new judgment recovered in an old one merges it, and lets in all subsequent rights.' 7 Walt, Act. & Def. 323, 324. In Garvin v. Garvin, 27 S. C. 477, 4 S. E. 148, Mr. Justice McGowan, speaking for the court, says: "'A judgment is extinguished when, being used as a cause of action; it grows into another judgment.'" Freem. Judgm. § 210. So, the Fox judgment would be merged in that of Garvin v. Garvin if the former was the cause of action of the latter.' See, also, Freem. Judgm. §§ 215-224.

"We come now to consider what remedy the defendant Perry, trustee, pursued in regard to the Lockwood judgment. Was it an action in the nature of a writ of scire facias, or an action of debt on said judgment? To ascertain, reference must be had to the complaint in the case of Perry, Trustee, v. Foster, Administrator. It must appear from this complaint that the facts alleged are not substantially those which were formerly stated in a writ of scire facias. The relief demanded is not that the former judgment be revived, and that the plaintiff have execution thereon, but a money judgment for the amount of the Lockwood judgment, and interest and costs. The judgment rendered was a money judgment, in conformity with the prayer of the complaint. There is no order reviving a former judgment, and granting leave to issue execution to enforce the same. The action resorted to, as is clearly shown by the complaint, the place of trial, the judgment rendered, and the subsequent proceedings thereunder, was an action of debt upon the Lockwood judgment. To our mind, nothing seems clearer than that the Lockwood judgment was the cause of the Perry, trustee, judgment. This being the case, the former was, according to well-settled law, extinguished, and its lien lost. The lien of the latter judgment must therefore date from the 28th October, 1889. The former judgment, being the cause of action of the latter judgment, was properly admitted as a part of the record of the latter judgment; therefore, the rule that 'the defendant cannot avail himself of any matter of defense which is not stated in his answer, even though it should appear in his evidence,' was not violated. The view that we take of the case will dispense with the necessity of considering so much of the argument of the defendant as relates to the lien of judgment obtained before the Code, the manner of acquiring and reviving the same, and the duration of such liens. In the main, the law seems to be stated correctly. We deem it proper, however, to say that under the decisions of our supreme court we [are] of the opinion that the entry of a receipt upon the sheriff's execution book of a payment made or a judgment obtained, before 1870, would be a substantial compliance with the new rule of evidence created by the act of 1879, (now section 1831 of the General Statutes,) and would extend the lien of such judgment from the date of such entry. Patterson v. Baxley, (S. C.) 11 S. E. 1065.

"The defendant John Heins contends that the judgment owned by him, and the bond and mortgage on which it was predicated, are entitled to priority of payment over all the other debts or demands against the said J. I. Perry, deceased, save and except funeral and the expenses of last illness, expenses of administration, and debts due the public. The present judgment of this defendant is for the deficiency of the mortgage debt. It does not clearly appear at what date this judgment for the deficiency was rendered. The execution to enforce this judgment was issued and lodged with the sheriff of Colleton county, July 1, 1873. At this time final judgments were not a lien upon the property of the judgment debtor. There was no testimony going to show that this judgment was ever made a lien upon the property of the judgment debtor, by levy or otherwise. The claim of the defendant must be governed by the same principles laid down as to the claim of the plaintiff herein. The evidence is, in our opinion, sufficient to establish the debt of this defendant as a valid and subsisting claim against the estate of J. I. Perry, deceased. We do not think, however, that this defendant is entitled to any priority of payment over the plaintiff and the defendant J. Lamb Perry, trustee. Under all the circumstances of this case, we are of the opinion that all these creditors are creditors in equal degree, and that neither of them has priority over the others; that the debts of these creditors are of equal nature, and must, in case of a deficiency of assets, be paid in average and proportion, as far as the assets of said intestate shall extend. See Gen. St. §§ 1895, 1926.

"The questions hereinbefore considered dispose of the main questions presented by the pleadings, and seriously relied on in the argument of counsel. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the injunction heretofore granted be continued in full force and effect; that the master of Berkeley county do publish the usual notice to the creditors of J. I. Perry, deceased, intestate, to present and prove before him, within a certain specified time, their several and respective demands or be debarred payment; that the administrator of the estate of the said intestate do account [to] said master for all assets which have come into his hands as such administrator; that said master do report to this court of what said assets do consist, and the debts presented and proven before him, in their proper grade and order, as also upon the accounts of said administrator; that the real estate of said intestate mentioned and described in the complaint herein, and now in the possession of his heirs, is liable to sale for the payment of the debts of the ancestor; that the debts of the plaintiff and of the defendant J. Lamb Perry, trustee, and John Heins, established by this decree, be included in the schedule of debts presented and proven before said master according to their legal priority; that this decree shall not be construed to affect the homestead rights of the children of such intestate, if such rights exist; and that the plaintiff or other party have leave to apply for further orders at the foot of this decree on the coming in of the master's report on assets and debts."

To this decree of Judge Izlar the children of J. I. Perry and their trustee filed the following grounds of appeal: "(1) That his honor erred in finding that the judgment held and claimed by the plaintiff, R. Rivers Lawton, administrator, was still subsisting and unpaid, whereas his honor should have found, from all the circumstances of the case, that the same was paid and extinguished; (2) that his honor erred in finding that the judgment held and claimed by the defendant John Heins was still subsisting and unpaid, whereas his honor should have found, from all the circumstances of the case, that the same was paid and extinguished; (3) that his honor should have held that the defendant John Heins held no judgment whatsoever enforceable at law, the same never having been entered up according to law; (4) that his honor should have held that the proceedings by the plaintiff, R. Rivers Lawton, administrator, could not have been brought until the judgment had been duly revived, so as to be enforceable at law."

J. Lamb Perry, trustee, filed the following grounds of appeal: "(1) That his honor erred in not finding that the judgment held by the defendant J. Lamb Perry, trustee, was the first lien upon all the lands and premises of the deceased, J. I. Perry; (2) that his honor should have found that the judgment held by the defendant J. Lamb Perry, trustee, was the continuation and revival of the judgment obtained by Thomas P. Lockwood, trustee, and as such was a valid, subsisting, unpaid judgment, first in point of lien and time, on all the property of the deceased, J. I. Perry; (3) that his honor should have found that the action upon the judgment recovered by Thomas P. Lockwood, trustee, by the defendant J. Lamb Perry, trustee, was the proper action to be brought to revive said first judgment, and render the same enforceable by an execution at law; that such action did not operate to merge the two judgments, but that the first judgment retained all its incidents of lien and rank, and was enforceable through the medium of the second judgment; (4) that his honor should have held that the proceeds of the sales of the deceased's (J. I. Perry's) property must be first applied to the payment in full of the judgment so held by the defendant J. Lamb Perry, trustee."

R. R. Lawton, as administrator, filed the following grounds of appeal: "(1) That his honor failed to find that all testimony relating to the judgment of Lockwood, Trustee, v. Perry was irrelevant under the pleadings; (2) that his honor erred in holding that the judgment of J. Lamb Perry, Trustee, v. Foster, Administrator, was valid, the same having been obtained with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors; (3) that his honor erred in holding that plaintiff must share in equal proportion with the other creditors, whereas he should have found that the plaintiff had the first claim upon the lands of Josiah I. Perry in possession of his heirs; (4) that his honor erred in finding that the judgment of October, 1889, was a valid judgment; (5) that his honor erred in not holding that such judgment was not contrary to the statute of 13 Eliz., (Gen. St. § 1786); (6) that his honor erred in not holding that the judgment of J. I. Perry, Trustee, v. H. P. Foster, Administrator, merged the judgment of Lockwood, Trustee, v. J. I. Perry, and rendered it of no effect."

John Heins submitted the following grounds of appeal: "(1) That his honor failed to find that all the testimony relating to the judgment of Lockwood, Trustee, v. Perry was irrelevant under the pleadings; (2) that his honor erred in holding that the judgment of J. Lamb Perry, Trustee, v. Foster, Administrator, was valid, the same having been obtained with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors; (3) that his honor erred in finding that the judgment of October, 1889, was a valid judgment; (4) that his honor erred in holding that such judgment was not contrary to the statute of 13 Eliz., (Gen. St. § 1786); (5) that his honor erred in not holding that the judgment of J. L. Perry, Trustee, v. H. P. Foster, Trustee, merged in the judgment of Lockwood, Trustee, v. J. I. Perry, and rendered it of no effect."

The questions of law suggested by this appeal present matters brimful of interest, and the very able and exhaustive discussion of such questions by the circuit judge must serve as an explanation of the reproduction of the entire decree in this opinion. We cannot promise to do more than briefly refer to and decide these questions, as the time allotted for the preparation of the opinions of this court in cases heard at our last term is so near exhausted we are forced to adopt this course, but it is with some reluctance that we do so. We propose to arrange all the questions of the appeal about three propositions: (1) Did the circuit judge err in his findings of fact and conclusions of law touching the judgment of James M. Lawton v. Josiah I. Perry? (2) Did the circuit judge err in a similar way in reference to judgment of John Heins v. Josiah I. Perry? (3) Did the circuit judge err, in a similar way, in regard to the judgment of J. Lamb Perry, Trustee, v. H. P. Foster, Administrator?

1. The object of the plaintiff's action, as indicated by the allegations of his complaint, both original and amended, as well as the prayer for judgment, was, among other things, to obtain a judgment against the heirs at law of Josiah I. Perry, deceased, for $1,026.00, with interest thereon from the 3d day of April, A. D. 1871, upon a judgment obtained at that date against their ancestor, Josiah I. Perry, deceased, in his lifetime. This plaintiff had two remedies against the heirs of Josiah I. Perry, deceased. On the one hand, he might have brought an action against these heirs to revive the judgment, and make it a lien upon the estate of Josiah I. Perry, deceased; or, on the other hand, he had the right to use the judgment obtained against J. I. Perry in his lifetime as a cause of action in an action against his heirs at law. He chose the latter remedy. At law—we mean on the law side of the court—there was no necessity to make the personal representative of J. I. Perry, deceased, a party in such an action against the heirs. However, in equity, such personal representative was a necessary party. In the case at bar, although the plaintiff exhibited his complaint in equity without at first making the personal representative of the estate of J. I. Perry, deceased, a party to the action, yet, by leave of court obtained, this defect was cured. The defendants insist that the judgment obtained against J. I. Perry in his lifetime furnished no cause of action, because they allege that, by operation of law, such judgment was presumptively paid, although 20 years had not elapsed from its original entry (April, 1871) to the commencement of this action, (on 7th September, 1889.) We cannot sustain this view, being entirely satisfied with the conclusion of the circuit judge on this point. The circumstances put in evidence to warrant a plea of payment were not sufficient. Appellants also claim that the plaintiff could not bring this action until he had first revived his judgment. We must overrule this view also. If the plaintiff had sought to maintain a lien growing out of the judgment obtained in 1871, the view of appellants would have been sound; for the question has been decided that, there being no lien allowed to judgments obtained between the 1st March, 1870, and the 25th November, 1873, no such lien under such judgments could be obtained except by following the requirements of the statute of 25th November, 1873, wherein is laid down the mode for obtaining such a lien. Alsobrook v. Watts, 19 S. C. 544, 545. Confessedly, no such steps were taken in this case. We think, however, that the plaintiff, Lawton, as administrator, having elected to sue upon his judgment obtained in 1871 as a cause of action, is only entitled to rank as a creditor of the estate of J. I. Perry, deceased, holding a debt of record. 2 Black, Judgm. § 958. " * * * And an action to recover the amount of a judgment, with interest, in which a summons is issued and served as on a money demand, is an action on the judgment, and not an action to revive it." We think this view is sustained by our own decision of Garvin v. Garvin, 27 S. C. 472-477, 4 S. E. 148.

2. As to the Heins judgment, we must reverse the conclusion reached by the circuit judge. This court has quite recently, in the two cases of Parr v. Lindler, (S. C.) 18 S. E. 636, and Cook v. Jennings, (S. C.) 18 S. E. 640, held that no judgment arising in an action to foreclose a mortgage, wherein the mortgaged property is ordered to be sold, exists for any deficiency of the mortgage debt after the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property have been applied thereto, until an order of the court has been had, on the report of the officer making the sale, showing what deficiency exists, for a judgment for such deficiency, with leave to enforce its collection by an execution. In the case at bar no report was made to the court of any such deficiency of John Heins' debt, and no order of judgment for such deficiency was granted. Hence there is no such judgment in favor of John Heins against the estate of Perry, deceased.

3. We confess, frankly, that the solution of the questions raised as to the rank of the judgment presented by J. Lamb Perry as trustee (who was substituted as such trustee for Thomas P. Lockwood, the deceased trustee, against the estate of Perry) has been difficult, and it was mainly because of these difficult questions that a rehearing of the appeal herein was ordered. However, before proceeding to the consideration of the matter of difficulty as to this claim, it may be stated that we are entirely satisfied with the conclusions of the circuit judge wherein he announced that the testimony failed to establish the existence of fraud, or collusion, or impropriety in the conduct of any of the parties connected with the judgment obtained in October, 1889, by J. Lamb Perry, as trustee, against H. P. Foster, as administrator of the estate of Josiah I. Perry, deceased. All the parties or their attorneys did in connection with this judgment was to put their house in order to resist any advantage over them by the plaintiff in the action at bar. And we include in this, our conclusion, all reference to the statute of 13 Eliz.

Let us now turn to the serious questions presented in connection with this judgment. It seems that while Lockwood was the trustee of the estate belonging to the children of Josiah I. Perry, now deceased, and in the lifetime of said Josiah I. Perry, to wit, in 1867, he obtained a judgment against said Perry for more than $1,900. Not only so, but execution was issued upon such judgment in 1868, and again in 1871. When this judgment was obtained, under the laws of this commonwealth, it had a lien, from its entry, upon the whole estate, real and personal, of the judgment debtor. This lien, however, would have expired in 1887,—that is, after 20 years from its entry had elapsed,—but for the payment of $100 in part payment thereof, which payment was duly entered of record, as required by law, in June, 1871. By this payment the existence and lien of this judgment were extended in full force until June, 1891. Now, the judgment debtor, Perry, died in 1890. At that date this judgment, in the name of Lockwood as trustee, was the only lien upon his entire estate, and under our laws, in the administration of the estate, real and personal, of Perry, deceased, this judgment had a preference as to its payment. So that if the trustee, who held this judgment, had seen proper to present it, in its plight as it was in 1867, with the payment of $100 thereon in June, 1871, in the action now at bar, unquestionably the judgment would still have retained its lien and preference, for the action at bar was commenced in September, 1889, a period less than 20 years from June, 1871. But unfortunately, after J. Lamb Perry had been substituted for Lockwood as trustee of the Perry children, and a lis pendens had been filed in the action at bar, the said J. Lamb Perry, as such trustee, instituted an action on the judgment obtained in 1867, as a cause of action against Henry P. Foster, as administrator of the estate of Josiah I. Perry, deceased, and this action ripened into judgment, 24th October, 1889. When he attempted to set up this judgment obtained in October, 1889, with all the liens and rank of the judgment of 1867, it was urged that by the doctrine of merger the judgment of 1889 had absorbed all there was in the judgment of 1867, and that there was no longer such an entity as the judgment of 1867. If this last conclusion could be reached, Judge Izlar was in error in not giving the Lawton judgment a preference in rank over all other creditors. It is urged before us in behalf of Perry, trustee, that his action was in the nature of a scire facias, which was the process in existence in this state prior to 1st March, 1870, as the mode by which a judgment and execution thereunder were revived; and not only so, but that, the Code having abolished the writ of scire facias in this state, the action instituted by Perry, Trustee, v. Foster, as administrator, in September, 1889, was the only mode by which he could revive the judgment of 1867; that thereby the lien and rank of this judgment was preserved; and that, if these views are unsound, that it would be too harsh a rule to hold the doctrine of merger as destructive of the lien and rank of the judgment of 1867. We cannot sustain the view of Perry, trustee, as to the action commenced by him in 1889 being in the nature of a scire facias. His action was by regular summons and complaint, wherein a money judgment alone is prayed for. As was said by Mr. Justice McGowan in Ex parte Witte, 32 S. C. 228, 10 S. E. 950: "We have always supposed that a scire facias on judgment must pursue the terms of the judgment; that it is a continuance of the action, and must conform to the record; that the authority to issue an execution on a judgment is derived from the original judgment, which, revived, continues its vitality with other liens and other incidents from the time of its rendition." His next position—that his action was the only mode under the laws of this state whereby he might revive his judgment of 1867—is equally untenable, in the light of the repeated decisions of this court. The true course of Perry, as trustee, to revive his judgment, was to issue a summons under the Code to renew execution. This, when granted, revived the judgment. Adams v. Richardson, 32 S. C. 139, 10 S. E. 931; Wood v. Milling, 32 S. C. 378, 10 S. E. 1081; Leitner v. Metz, 32 S. C. 383, 10 S. E. 1082.

But let us examine this Perry, trustee, judgment with relation to the judgment obtained in 1867. To our minds it seems clear that, as a general proposition, it is true that a judgment between the same parties, or their privies, when used as a cause of action which ripens into a new judgment, is merged in the last judgment. Garvin v. Garvin, 27 S. C. 477, 4 S. E. 148. As was said by Mr. Justice McGowan in the case just cited: "A judgment is extinguished when, being used as a cause for action, it grows into another action." See, also, Freem. Judgm. §§ 215-217; 2 Black, Judgm. § 264. It will be noticed that one of the primary effects of a judgment is to establish a new debt. 2 Black, Judgm. § 267; Freem. Judgm. § 217. This view is easily appreciated when the cause of action was of a lower dignity than a debt by judgment. A promissory note or a debt by bond, when reduced to judgment, became a debt of record. Thus, a debt of lower rank is made one of a higher grade. Usually it happens that the cause of action is so completely absorbed in the judgment that it is not competent longer to consider such cause of action apart from the judgment. This is not universally the case, however. When a creditor of a deceased debtor obtains judgment against the personal representative of the debtor in any contest between creditors of such deceased debtor as to rank, such rank is determined by the condition of the debt at the death of the debtor. Not only so, but, when a mortgage is used as a cause of action which ripens into a judgment, such mortgage is not so merged in the judgment that it loses its lien. Pence v. Armstrong, 95 Ind. 191. So, in this state, in the case of Hardin v. Melton, 28 S. C. 47, 4 S. E. 805, and 9 S. E. 423, it was held that the holder of a judgment against a deceased debtor who, in obedience to a call for creditors under an action to call in creditors and marshal the estate, etc., rendered in his claim by judgment, and had his decree against his debtor's estate, should not be deprived of the lien of his original judgment. As the doctrine is stated by Mr. Freeman in section 217 in his work on Judgments: "Every judgment is, for most purposes, to be regarded as a new debt; the chief, and perhaps the only, exception being in cases when the technical operation of the doctrine of merger would produce manifest hardship. * * *" As to the same matter, when considered by Mr. Black in the second volume of his work on Judgments, (section 677,) that author says: "One of the most important results of the merger of a cause of action in the judgment recovered upon it is that thereby a new debt is created. * * * But whether the nature of the new debt is affected by the nature of the old claim; whether the judgment is independent of the characteristics of the cause of action it has absorbed; whether two judgments must be differently considered, and differently enforced, on account of a diversity in the nature of the demands on which they are severally founded,—these are questions upon which the authorities exhibit much variety of opinion. * * * On the other hand, it has been broadly declared that, whenever justice requires it, a judgment will be adjudged to be an old debt in a new form, and will not be regarded as creating a new debt." When Perry, as trustee, obtained his judgment against Foster, as administrator, upon the judgment of 1867 as a cause of action, such last judgment (that of 1867) had a lien on the deceased debtor's estate, created in the lifetime of the last named. So far as to dignity or rank between the judgments, (that of 1867 and 1889,) they were the equal, one of the other, for each was a judgment. There was therefore no new dignity created. Would it not be a hardship to declare this judgment of Perry, trustee, obtained in 1889, to have destroyed that of 1867? It seems to us that it should fall among the exceptions to the general rule, and not affecting the general rule. It follows, therefore, that the circuit judge was in error when he decreed that the claims of Perry, as trustee, on the one side, and Lawton, as administrator, on the other side, are of equal rank, and should be paid ratably. He should have held Perry, as trustee, entitled to set up the lien of his judgment obtained in 1867 as the first lien on all the property of Josiah I. Perry, deceased. It follows, therefore, that the circuit decree must be modified. It is the judgment of this court that the circuit judgment be modified as herein required, and in all other respects affirmed. Let the cause be remanded to the circuit court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

McGOWAN, J., concurs.

McIVER, O. J. I dissent from so much of this opinion as relates to the rank given to the Perry, trustee, judgment, and will hereafter give my reasons in writing. In all other respects I concur.

MOORMAN et al. v. ARTHUR et al.
SAME v. TOWN OF DANVILLE et al.¹
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 25, 1894.)

SALE IN BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS — INNOCENT PURCHASERS — RESULTING TRUST — PROCEEDING TO ESTABLISH — EVIDENCE — LACHES.

1. Where complainants seek to prove that land was purchased with trust funds belonging to them; that it was sold by the court, with knowledge of this fact, to pay the trustee's individual debts; and that purchasers at said sale had constructive information of said trust,—their claim is one of which a court of equity alone has jurisdiction.

2. Where land purchased by an administrator with money of his decedent was sold, to pay the administrator's private debts, to purchasers with notice, a trust in the land resulted to the widow and children of the decedent as if there had been no conversion, and not to the administrator, or creditors of the estate.

3. A sale of land by a federal court in bankruptcy proceedings is not binding on persons claiming an interest in the land, who do not appear, and are not served with any process or notice.

4. Nor are such persons precluded from attacking said sale because the bankrupt was the administrator of the estate through which they claim.

5. Rev. St. U. S. § 5057, providing that no action shall be brought by or against an assignee in bankruptcy in regard to any property transferrable to or vested in the assignee after two years from the accrual of the cause of action, does not apply to suits against purchasers from the assignee.

6. In 1870 certain property belonging to complainants and their mother was sold in bankruptcy proceedings as the property of another, and the eldest of the complainants in a suit attacking the sale became of age October 15, 1877, but was not informed of his rights in the property until April, 1886, and commenced the suit within the next year. Held, that complainants were not guilty of laches, but that their mother, who, with full knowledge of the facts, waited the above time before asserting her claims, was without remedy.

7. In a suit to establish a resulting trust it was contended that two of the defendants were incompetent to testify because they were parties to the suit and to the transactions under review, that they co-operated with the trustee in a devastavit, and were liable over to the other defendants. They were brought into the suit upon motion, and without a review by the court as to the necessity for such action. No relief was sought against them, and they were released by decrees in bankruptcy from all liability in the matter. Held, that they were competent to testify.

8. A resulting trust must arise at the time of the execution of the conveyance, and payment subsequent to the purchase will not, by relation, attach a trust to the original purchase.

9. To prove that certain land was purchased by an administrator with trust funds, three witnesses for plaintiffs testified that the administrator at the time of and after the purchase (25 years before the suit) declared that he made it as an investment for funds of the estate; but their evidence was contradictory in many details, and it seemed improbable that the administrator had funds belonging to the estate at that time. The administrator subsequently took the bankrupt act, and in a schedule attached to his petition in the bankruptcy proceedings stated that he purchased the land with funds of the estate, and that he held it in trust for the heirs, his grandchildren. No steps were taken to enforce this trust, and the administrator subsequently treated the land as his own, and made it the chief basis of credit to secure a favorable commutation of his wife's dower interest. Held, that the trust was not established.

10. To a petition in bankruptcy there was attached an inventory of the petitioner's estate, in which there was a declaration that one of the pieces of land had been purchased with trust money, and had been held by the petitioner in trust for the heirs, his grandchildren, though it stood in his own name. Rev. St. U.

S. § 5053, provides that "no property held by the bankrupt in trust shall pass by the assignment," and section 5016 provides that the "inventory must contain an accurate statement of all the petitioner's estate, * * * and whether there are any, and if so, what incumbrances thereon." Held, that purchasers of said land at a sale in such proceedings were not charged with notice of said trust.

11. Such declaration in favor of the declarant's grandchildren and against his creditors, made when he was not only insolvent, but in bankruptcy, are not admissible as declarations against title.

Appeal from circuit court of city of Danville; S. G. Whittle, Judge.

Bill by William A. Moorman and others against T. J. Arthur and others. Bill by same complainants against the town of Danville and others. From a decree dismissing said suits, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The opinion of the lower court (Whittle, J.) was as follows:

"These causes are of more than ordinary importance, both on account of the value of the property in controversy and of the legal questions involved; and they have been argued elaborately and with very great ability. The first-named cause was instituted November 11, 1886; the second, April 25, 1887. By a decree of the — term, 18—, they were ordered to be heard together. They were so argued, and will be so considered. The complainants are William A. Moorman, Samuel J. Moorman, and James C. Moorman, sons and heirs at law of James C. Moorman, deceased. The substantial defendants are purchasers immediate and mediate of the real estate sold under orders of the district court of the United States for the then district of Virginia in Re W. W. Keen, bankrupt. There is a discrepancy in the allegations of the bills in the two causes as to the property claimed, or rather as to the origin of the claim; the pleader in the second-named cause, it would seem, endeavoring to meet or conform to the facts developed by the evidence in cause No. 1. With this exception, which will be noticed later on, the allegations of the bills are substantially the same. They are that James C. Moorman departed this life in Pittsylvania county, October 18, 1863, seised of valuable real estate, and with large personal property, leaving him surviving a widow, Nannie C. Moorman, and complainants, (who at the death of their father were all infants,) William A. Moorman, having been born October 15, 1856; Samuel J. Moorman, June 20, 1858; and James C. Moorman, May 31, 1863. That the widow intermarried with one Charles Dougherty, October 29, 1867, and departed this life September 7, 1872, after the birth of a child, which died in early infancy; and that her husband, Charles Dougherty, is still living. That at the November term, 1863, of the county court of Pittsylvania county, W. W. Keen, the father of Nannie C. Moorman, and the grandfather of complainants, qualified as the administrator of the estate of James C. Moorman, deceased, executing bond as such security in the penalty of $300,000. That said administrator promptly began to collect the assets of the estate, and within twelve months from his qualification made sales of tobacco amounting to $30,000, and by February 1, 1865, made other sales of tobacco to the amount of $53,433.71, and, in addition, realized large amounts of cash from other assets of the estate. That, being unable to find satisfactory investment for these funds, (they say, in cause No. 2, he consulted and advised with his partner, James M. Walker, as to a proper investment,) in the fall of 1863, or during the year 1864, he purchased 262½ acres of land from Decatur Jones as an investment of said funds, paying $30,000 in cash of the moneys of said estate therefor, but took no conveyance of title. That in 1863 he sold Dr. T. D. F. Guerrant about 92½ acres of land, lying almost wholly in the town of Danville, in the extreme western part thereof, on Dan river. That Guerrant paid the purchase price in full, and took immediate possession of the property, renting a portion of it in 1864 to J. J. Hankins, but neglected to take a conveyance. That during the year 1864 W. W. Keen concluded to repurchase said 92½ acres of Guerrant for the benefit of complainants and their mother, Nannie C. Moorman, and during that year exchanged with Guerrant the 262½ acres, theretofore purchased of Decatur Jones therefor, said Guerrant taking possession of the latter, and said Keen, as administrator, occupying and cultivating the farm for the benefit of complainants and their mother. That W. W. Keen had purchased the 92½-acre tract from James M. Walker, who, along with said Keen, as W. W. Keen & Co., had purchased it from E. F. Keen. That W. W. Keen did not convey the property to Guerrant, and when the exchange was made did not change the title on the deed books, because he did not know how he could convey real property to himself as administrator. He therefore held the 92½ acres of land in his own name, but for the benefit and as the property of the estate of James C. Moorman, deceased. On February 6, 1867, Decatur Jones conveyed the 262½-acre tract to Guerrant. That on October 15, 1867, W. W. Keen went into bankruptcy, his petition bearing date October 5th of that year. Said petition was duly sworn to, and accompanying it were Schedules A and B, showing respectively his liabilities and assets. As the 92½-acre tract stood in his name he was compelled to return the same in his Schedule B 1, and did so, but set forth in said schedule that, 'in the year 1863 or 1864, petitioner, being the administrator of James Moorman, deceased, the general manager of his estate, and the father of his widow, and having in his hands large sums of Confederate money arising from sales of tobacco belonging to said estate, and becoming aware of the rapid depreciation of said money, and knowing of no investment which he could safely make in stocks or other securities, determined to invest a portion of the same in real estate for the benefit of said estate. Shortly after he purchased of Decatur Jones a tract of land lying in Pittsylvania county, Va., containing about 262½ acres, for the sum of $30,000 in Confederate currency, which he paid in cash, which tract of land I had intended to cultivate, with the slaves belonging to said estate. Finding, however, that the interest of the estate would not be promoted by such a course, I exchanged the said tract of land with a certain T. D. F. Guerrant for a tract of land mostly within the corporate limits of the town of Danville, with good improvements, and to which there is attached a public ferry across Dan river. The said exchange was an even one. No title having been made to petitioner by Decatur Jones for the tract of land purchased of him at the time of said exchange, he, by direction of petitioner, conveyed the same to the said Guerrant. The ninety-two acre tract referred to had been sold to said Guerrant by the petitioner, but not conveyed before said exchange was made. After said exchange the petitioner still held title to said land in his own name. His only reason for so doing was that he did not consider it competent for him to hold this land by deed as administrator, (as has been stated.) The tract of land was obtained in exchange for a tract which had been purchased with money belonging to said Moorman's estate, and has since been held as the property of said estate.' (The bills give extracts from the statement in B 1. The foregoing is the statement in full.) That, thus, W. W. Keen did not surrender said property in bankruptcy, having no beneficial interest in it, and none that, under the laws of the United States, could or did pass to his assignees or trustees in bankruptcy. In the bill in cause No. 2 the allegations in relation to the real estate in question are that some time prior to the fall of 1863 E. F. Keen sold to W. W. Keen and James M. Walker, as W. W. Keen & Co., a tract or several tracts of land situated now in the corporate limits of Danville, and which embraces the land in controversy, put them into the immediate possession, but did not make them a deed thereto until January 22, 1864, which was recorded December 11, 1865. That, in the fall of 1863, W. W. Keen, by and with the consent of James M. Walker, sold a part of said property to Dr. T. D. F. Guerrant, to wit, that part lying between what was known as the Lower Ferry road, the Upper Ferry road, James Thomas' line, and Branch street, of the town of Danville, and so inclosed there, situate in the northwest corner of said town, as shown in the plat exhibited, and put him in the possession and occupancy thereof, receiving in payment therefor the full payment in tobacco and slaves, but made said Guerrant no deed of conveyance. They there set out an exchange of the 262½ acres purchased by W. W. Keen of Decatur Jones with Guerrant for the lot above described, and say that all of said several transfers were known to and acquiesced in by James M. Walker. That said Decatur Jones had not made W. W. Keen a deed, nor was there any deed made to Keen by Walker at that time, nor by W. W. Keen & Co. to Guerrant, nor by Guerrant to Keen, it being in time of war, when men could not transact business with customary regard to the requirements of law. But the payment of the purchase money was complete, and possession was delivered. That Keen directed Jones to convey title to the 262½-acre tract to Guerrant, which, as stated, was done by deed bearing date February 6, 1867, and recorded June 21, 1867, but that Guerrant had had possession since 1864. That on November 15, 1865, after Keen had taken possession of the land sold to Guerrant, and exchanged by him to Keen, as administrator of James C. Moorman, deceased, and which possession was for the benefit of said estate, Walker conveyed to Keen his interest therein, and also his interest in several adjacent tracts, being all the property conveyed to W. W. Keen & Co. by E. F. Keen. That Keen took title in his own name for the reason given in the bill in cause No. 1, but contemporaneously advised his daughter, Nannie C. Moorman, and his family, and Decatur Jones and his wife, Harriett Jones, a sister of W. W. Keen, and Guerrant, and Walker. That at the time Walker conveyed said entire tract to W. W. Keen he had received largely over the $30,000 he had paid Jones for the 262½-acre tract,—indeed, he had received from the sales of manufactured tobacco belonging to the estate of his decedent alone net cash to the amount of $83,921.88; and he therefore increased the amount of land he got of said Guerrant, and held for said estate all the balance of that so conveyed to him by Walker; and thus, from November 15, 1865, said W. W. Keen occupied and held, for the benefit of said estate of James C. Moorman, deceased, having exchanged for a part thereof the said Jones farm, and received payment for the balance out of the said funds in his hands as administrator, the entire property so conveyed to W. W. Keen & Co., and this he did openly and notoriously; that neither complainants nor their mother nor her husband were made parties to the proceedings in bankruptcy, and that the record therein does not show any title to the property in controversy other or different from what is set forth in the statement in Schedule B 1. That on January 15, 1868, the creditors of W. W. Keen, a bankrupt, selected W. G. Banks and Charles L. Powell as trustees of the estate, which selection having been approved by the court, said W. W. Keen, by deed dated March 13, 1868, conveyed to said trustees 'all his estate and effects absolutely, to have and to hold in the same manner, and with the same rights in all respects, as the said Keen would have had or held the same if no proceedings in bankruptcy had been taken against him.' That on June 1, 1869, said bankrupt conveyed to said trustees 'each and all of the various lots, tracts, and parcels of land, whether lying in the town of Danville, county of Pittsylvania, or state of Georgia, which were listed or surrendered by the said Keen in said schedule in bankruptcy, wherein a more particular description thereof will be found,' which deed was duly recorded in the clerk's office of the hustings court of Danville. That on December 4, 1869, W. G. Banks and J. D. Coles, as special commissioners, were ordered to sell the real estate of said bankrupt, including 'house and a tract of land of about ninety acres, to which is attached a ferry over Dan river, in Pittsylvania county, Virginia.' That January 14, 1870, an order was made to the same effect, and February 25, 1870, John A. Herndon divided said tract of land into 19 lots, aggregating 91 acres and 56 poles, and returned a plat to said commissioners. On March 1, 1870, the sales were made after due advertisement, were reported to court November 15, 1870, and December 3, 1870, duly confirmed. That the purchase money has all been paid, and title conveyed, and that the original purchasers have sold and resold and subdivided the land until the names of the present owners are numberless, and many of them cannot be discovered. That some time in 1884 complainants brought suit to recover a lot of land of which their father died seised, and advised their counsel that they had heard vague rumors that they were entitled to other lands somewhere in Danville, and employed said attorneys to represent them in all matters concerning their father's estate. That in 1886 said attorneys were examining a title to a lot within the boundary of said property, and were employed to look through said W. W. Keen's bankrupt papers. They discovered the statement on Schedule B 1, and refused to pass the title. They then advised complainants of their discovery, who were thus for the first time informed of their rights in 1886. That the purchase of Decatur Jones and the exchange with Guerrant were made when there were only two judgments docketed against W. W. Keen, aggregating, principal and interest, $2,000, and that these were liens upon other lands of Keen, and did not bind either the 262½ or the 92½ acre tracts, and were satisfied and paid out of other lands of said Keen. That the facts detailed constituted W. W. Keen a trustee for complainants and their mother, and they set forth what they conceive to be the respective interests of themselves and Dougherty, the husband of their mother, in the land. That by the bankrupt act the 92½ acres did not pass, and could not have passed, under the control and jurisdiction of the district court, and that neither of the deeds referred to carried said property to the trustees of W. W. Keen, bankrupt. That said district court had no jurisdiction to order the sale of said land, or any part of it, and that the sales and conveyances made under its orders were void. That the purchasers were advised of complainant's title fully and absolutely by said proceedings and records. That complainants were infants at the date of the sales, and, while they had heard hints from members of W. W. Keen's family that the said 92½ acres of land belonged to and should have been conveyed to them, they never knew that they had any chance to recover the same until within a few months past; that W. W. Keen is dead, and the legal title to said land is outstanding in his heirs.

"In cause No. 2 the bill undertakes to meet the matters of defense relied on by the defendants in cause No. 1. And they say that the defendants, who are named, and those made defendants as unknown parties, are in possession of parts of the said land which was sold by W. W. Keen & Co. to Guerrant, and by him exchanged to W. W. Keen for the estate of Moorman, lying between the Lower Ferry road, the Upper Ferry road, James Thomas' line, and Branch street, and derived title under direct or mesne conveyance from Banks and Coles, commissioners as aforesaid; thus confining their claim to that portion of the 92½ acres embraced within the boundaries aforesaid. That at the time of the investment of the personality into land Nannie C. Moorman was discover, and knew thereof, and assented thereto. That when she intermarried with Dougherty her interest was an equitable estate of one-third in the realty. That upon the birth of a child Dougherty became tenant by the curtesy initiate in said one-third, which, upon the death of his wife, became an estate by the curtesy consummate. They conclude by making all who are known to be interested parties defendant, but waive answers under oath, ask that an inquiry be had as to the unknown claimants, and pray that all deeds and conveyances be set aside, that a deed be made to them to said property, that they be paid and reimbursed for the rents and profits, and for general relief. The infant defendants answer by guardian ad litem. The administrator de bonis non of W. W. Keen, deceased, files a formal answer, and his heirs at law disclaim all interest in the subject-matter of litigation. James M. Walker and T. D. F. Guerrant, who were not originally made defendants, but were brought in subsequently, without formal amendment, plead their discharge in bankruptcy in bar to any liability that may be sought to be fixed on them, and pray to be dismissed. Many of the defendants do not answer, but quite a number demur and answer. Some deny that the lots owned by them are within the boundary of the land sought to be recovered in cause No. 2. Some content themselves with a denial of complainants' claim, and insist that they are bona fide purchasers for value and without notice, while others make full and specific answer to the various allegations of the bills, and set out fully their several grounds of defense. They admit the death of James C. Moorman; that his heirs and next of kin are correctly named; the intermarriage of his widow with Dougherty; the birth of a child by that marriage; its death in infancy, and the subsequent death of the mother; that W. W. Keen qualified as the administrator of the estate of James C. Moorman, deceased, and gave bond as alleged; but they deny assets to the amount claimed, and from information say that the assets of the estate which came to the hands of the administrator were converted into Confederate money, and perished with the downfall of that government. They deny all knowledge of conversations between Keen and his partner, James M. Walker, or that the former ever contemplated investing money of the estate in real estate. They deny that at the date of the alleged purchase by Keen of the 262½ acres of land from Decatur Jones he had in his hands $30,000, or any amount, belonging to his intestate's estate. They admit that E. F. Keen sold W. W. Keen and James M. Walker, partners as W. W. Keen & Co., the property embraced in the deed from the former to the latter, dated January 22, 1864, (Exhibits E, F, K,) but their knowledge is derived solely from the recordation of that deed. They deny all knowledge of the alleged sale to T. D. F. Guerrant, or of the alleged exchange, and deny that any of said transactions were had with W. W. Keen as administrator of Moorman. They insist that the Jones tract (so far as any money is proved to have been paid) was paid for with the funds of W. W. Keen & Co. That the property now sought to be recovered was bought and paid for by W. W. Keen & Co. That title was taken by them, and the property was so held until the dissolution of the firm and a division of its property. That the firm existed from 1861 till late in 1865, and during its existence became possessed of several parcels of land in Danville and Pittsylvania county. That in the fall of 1865 the real estate was divided between the partners. Two parcels were released in severalty to Walker by Keen and wife, and about the same time Walker and wife released to Keen their interest in the remaining two parcels of land owned by the firm, and Keen and wife also released to Walker and W. W. Clarkson their interest in a parcel of land owned by the firm composed of Keen, Walker & Clarkson; and they insist that the land so set apart and conveyed to W. W. Keen was as his individual property, and was so held, used, and occupied by him until he surrendered it in bankruptcy. They deny that Keen paid for either the Jones tract or the Tunstall tract with the money of Moorman's estate, and insist that if he ever had intention of conveying or holding it for the benefit of that estate, he neglected it until the rights of others had attached, and he had no power to do so. They admit the bankruptcy of Keen; that he listed the property in controversy, and that he made the declaration in regard to it on Schedule B 1, given above, but they deny the truth of the facts stated therein. They admit the execution of the deed by Keen to Banks and Powell, his trustees in bankruptcy, but deny that they refer to the schedules in bankruptcy for a description of the property, or that it was necessary for them so to do. The bankrupt's property devolved upon his trustees by operation of law, and the deed did not confer upon them any other or greater rights, but merely designated the persons to carry into effect the purposes of the bankrupt act. They admit that neither complainants nor Mrs. Dougherty were technically made parties to the bankruptcy proceedings otherwise than by the aforesaid declaration of the bankrupt, and say they know of no other way in which they could have been made parties, unless some one had filed a petition for them. That all necessary steps were taken in said matter to ascertain the rights of all lienors and other parties, and to secure a free and unincumbered sale of the lands of the bankrupt. But that neither in said proceeding nor elsewhere were any steps taken to establish the pretended claim of complainants, or to maintain as true the ex parte declaration of their grandfather and trustee, W. W. Keen, on Schedule B 1, until these suits were instituted, long after his death. Later on, when it became necessary to estimate the contingent right of dower of the bankrupt's wife, he treated said land as his own, and included it in the deed in which his wife relinquished her right of dower in his lands. The claim for commutation was brought about by Keen, and the land in question formed the chief portion of the estate taken into said estimate, and he succeeded in having settled upon his wife one of the most valuable houses and lots in Danville; and he knew that, if his declaration in Schedule B 1 was true, his wife had no color of claim to dower in said land. The declaration was made when it seemed probable that it might have the effect of securing to his grandchildren a part of the property which would otherwise go to his creditors. But when the truth of the statement would have deprived his wife of property, which was settled to her use, and afterwards jointly enjoyed by her and her husband, it was not brought in any manner to the attention of the court, or of any of the parties to the proceedings. That Keen was present at the sale of the property, but did not then, or at any other time, intimate that complainants or any one else had any claim to the property whatever. That there were judgments against E. F. Keen, which attached to said property while owned by him, and passed to W. W. Keen & Co., who had notice, with said liens upon it, and that the judgments against W. W. Keen also attached, and were liens thereon. That subsequently to the conveyance of said land in severalty to Keen by Walker, Keen became a bankrupt, and the lands, subject to the liens, aforesaid passed, by operation of law, to his assignees or trustees. That the judgments against him were more than sufficient to consume all the lands surrendered by him in bankruptcy. That the lien creditors instituted a suit in the circuit court of Pittsylvania county to subject said land to the payment of their debts, but upon the application of the trustees in bankruptcy, and some of the creditors proceeding in said suit, were stopped, and the district court assumed jurisdiction, and convened said creditors before it. Afterwards an account of liens on the real estate of said bankrupt was duly taken, and said lands regularly and duly decreed to be sold for the satisfaction of the liens upon the same. That W. G. Banks, and J. D. Coles were duly and regularly appointed by a decree of said court to make sale of said lands, and in pursuance of said decree, did advertise and sell the same. That the creditors of E. F. Keen, as well as W. W. Keen, were duly convened before said court, and made parties, and said sales were duly reported and confirmed, and deeds directed to be made to the purchasers on the payment of the purchase money. That the purchase money was afterwards fully paid, and conveyances made to the respective purchasers. That there was no other property from which the liens to satisfy which the land was sold, against which said judgments could have been enforced, and said judgments were the first liens on said lands. That they had no notice or knowledge, in any manner whatsoever, of any claim of complainants, or of Mrs. Dougherty, or of the estate of James C. Moorman, deceased, to said land, or any part thereof, or of the declaration made by the bankrupt on Schedule B 1. That they are bona fide purchasers claiming under a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, and that their title is free and clear of the alleged secret trust asserted by complainants. That the purchasers at the bankrupt sale acquired not only the title of the bankrupt, but also the title of E. F. Keen, and that they, and those claiming under them, are entitled to hold said lands by the same right that the judgment creditors who were parties to said matter in bankruptcy, or convened before the court, might have asserted against the said lands, and received the title which might, in any event, have been lawfully subjected to said judgments, and are not responsible for the application of the purchase money by the court. That the declaration of the bankrupt on Schedule B 1 was merely an ex parte statement, not regularly or formally a part thereof, and not such an assertion of the claim of complainants as would bind purchasers of the land without actual notice of the same. That the declaration does not contain such a description of the lands claimed to have been purchased on behalf of complainants as is sufficient to have warned purchasers who had no notice of the occupancy of the land by Guerrant that it was the same land derived by W. W. Keen from E. F. Keen, or to have put them on inquiry as to the truth of the facts therein stated, unless said purchasers had had notice that said land had been occupied or owned by Guerrant; that the interests of complainants, if any they had, were represented by W. W. Keen, their trustee, and, he being a party to the bankrupt proceedings, they are barred thereby, although not technically parties themselves. That the matter is res adjudicata, and the action of the bankrupt court cannot be collaterally attacked. That complainants' claim, if any they had, is adverse to the trustees in bankruptcy, and, not having been prosecuted within two years, is barred by the limitation prescribed by the bankrupt act. That said claim is barred by the fifteen years' limitation. That the alleged claim of complainants, if any they have, is not a claim to the land, but to the funds which they allege were invested in land, and that the claim accrued to Moorman's administrator, and not to complainants. That the estate was insolvent, and complainants at the time had no real interest in the land. That the funds of the estate belonged to the administrator for the benefit of the creditors, as well as the heirs and next of kin; and, though it may not have been known at the time, it has been subsequently shown that the estate was wholly insolvent, and the claim is barred by the statute of limitations, because the administrator failed to institute suit for the recovery of the same within five years. That the lapse of time and laches of complainants, if not barred otherwise, should preclude them from setting up the claim they now make. To sustain their contention that there were no assets of the estate of Moorman to invest in land, to show that the estate was insolvent, and the declaration of Keen in Schedule B 1, was untrue, they refer to the record in the creditors' suit of Soyars and others v. Moorman's Administrator and others, brought in Pittsylvania circuit court in 1872, in which the administrator, Keen, was examined as to what became of the property of his intestate, and stated that it was lost by the results of the war; that the real estate of Moorman was sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of his debts, leaving large amounts still due and unpaid. They also refer to the suit of complainants against R. W. Lawson to show that the contention of complainants there is inconsistent with the claim asserted by them here. The last-named case is reported in 85 Va. 880, 9 S. E. 150, but the admissibility of the record referred to is excepted to by complainants, and, from the view I take of these causes, need not be noticed further. From the foregoing summary of the contents of complainants' bills it will be observed that their contention is that the 262½ acres of land, known as the 'Jones tract,' was purchased by W. W. Keen as administrator of their father's estate, and with its assets, and for its benefit, as an investment. That this tract was afterwards exchanged by said administrator with T. D. F. Guerrant for the Tunstall Hill property, also for the benefit of said estate; and that, while the legal title to said property was taken in the name of W. W. Keen individually, a resulting trust nevertheless arose for the benefit of the estate. That the property was afterwards listed by Keen in his schedules in bankruptcy, but with the declaration of the trust aforesaid written thereon, which affected the purchasers of the property under the proceedings in bankruptcy, and all claiming title through or under them with notice. It will also be observed that the answers deny the existence of the trust, or, if it existed, that the defendants had either actual or constructive notice of it.

"Before considering these questions, upon which, in my judgment, the causes hinge, it will be proper to notice some of the other points which have been raised and discussed. It is argued that if the claim of complainants be true,—that the trust existed, that the bankrupt court never acquired jurisdiction either of the property or parties, and that the sales under its decrees were nullities,—complainants had a full and complete remedy at law, and should have proceeded by action of ejectment, and that this court has no jurisdiction of this. It is sufficient to say that the title of complainants, if any they have, is equitable, not legal, and that they seek to set up and enforce a trust of which a court of equity alone has jurisdiction.

"Again, the question, 'For whose benefit did the trust result?' has elicited much discussion, the contention of the defendants being that it resulted, if at all, to W. W. Keen, as administrator of J. C. Moorman, deceased, or to the creditors of his estate. It would seem clear that neither position is tenable. The administrator, by converting the personality into real estate, put it beyond his reach, and the creditors can in no sense be said to have title either to the personal assets or their product. Theirs was a mere right to subject it to the payment of their debts; nothing more. They might, by proper process, have reached the personality in the hands of the administrator before conversion, and had it applied in discharge of their debts; or, after conversion, they might have proceeded against the administrator and his bondsmen, and held him and them responsible for his devastavit; or they might have followed and subjected the property into which the personality was converted, through the medium of a court of equity, to the payment of their debts. But under no conceivable circumstances would the title either to the personality or realty, by operation of law, devolve upon them. If the personality had not been converted, subject to liability for payment of debts, it would have passed to the widow and children of decedent in the proportion of one-third to the former and the residue to the latter. And surely it cannot be maintained that the relations and rights of these parties, quoad the property in which the personality was invested, were changed or altered by the conversion.

"It is earnestly insisted that the questions upon which this court is asked to pass have been adjudicated by the district court of the United States for the district of Virginia in Re W. W. Keen, bankrupt; that the decrees and orders of that court, whether right or wrong, are final and conclusive, and constitute an absolute bar to the claim which complainants are now prosecuting and seeking to enforce here. Whilst this has been the 'bloody ground,' as I may say, of the case, and counsel have shown much learning and research in its discussion, it seems to me to lie within narrow compass, to depend upon principles the justness of which must be allowed, and is of easy solution. I take it to be a fundamental principle of law, requiring no citation of authorities to sustain it, that, in order for the decrees of a court of either special or general jurisdiction to be binding, (unless in pure proceedings in rem,) two things are necessary: it must have jurisdiction of the person and of the subject-matter. The rule is founded upon principles of reason and justice, and the instances in which it has been violated have met with the unqualified disapproval and condemnation of the courts. In Underwood v. McVeigh, 23 Grat. 418, Christian, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'The sentence of condemnation and sale was a nullity, void in toto. It was rendered absolutely void by the act of the court in refusing to permit McVeigh to appear and be heard. The authorities on this point are overwhelming, and the decisions of all the tribunals of every country where an enlightened jurisprudence prevails are all one way. It lies at the very foundation of justice that every person who is to be affected by an adjudication should have the opportunity of being heard in defense, both in repelling the allegations of fact and upon the matter of law; and no sentence of any court is entitled to the least respect in any other court or elsewhere when it has been pronounced ex parte, and without opportunity of defense. An examination of both sides of the question, and deliberation between the claims and allegations of the contending parties, have been deemed essentially necessary to the proper administration of justice by all nations, and in every stage of social existence.' See, also, 7 Rob. Pr. p. 52, and Ray v. Norseworthy, 23 Wall. 136. Now, while it may be difficult in every case to answer the query of one of the learned counsel for the defendants, arguendo, as to 'who are parties to a proceeding in bankruptcy,' it is very clear that complainants were not in the Matter of W. W. Keen, bankrupt. There is no evidence, or even pretense, that they ever appeared, either in person or by counsel, or that any process or notice from the bankrupt court ever emanated against them, by publication or otherwise. This is virtually conceded; but the contention is that they were represented by W. W. Keen, either as administrator of their father's estate or as their trustee. He cannot be said to have been a party in either capacity. He was a party for the purpose of obtaining a discharge from his debts, and for none other, and was discharged June 4, 1869, as administrator. As has been stated, his power over the subject-matter ceased when he converted the personal assets of his intestate into real estate. Both as administrator and trustee, his interest was adverse to that of complainants. It would have been a case of committing the lamb to the care of the wolf. He would have had to play the double role of plaintiff and defendant at the same time. But I do not understand that the doctrine of representation applies in Virginia between trustee and cestui que trust so as to hold the latter concluded by decrees in cases in which the trustee is a party, but the cestui que trust is not. Sand. Eq. p. 197; Richardson v. Davis, 21 Grat. 706. The extent to which the bankrupt court acquired jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this suit, and the effect of its decrees in relation thereto upon complainants, will be considered later on, and in a different connection; but the fact that said court had no jurisdiction of complainants deprives said decrees of the effect claimed for them by the defendants of having adjudicated the rights sought to be litigated here, and of per se constituting a bar to complainants' claim.

"The defendants further claim that complainants' suits are barred by the act of limitations prescribed by section 5057 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which declares that 'no suit, either at law or in equity, shall be maintainable in any court between an assignee in bankruptcy and a person claiming an adverse interest, touching any property or rights of property transferable to or vested in such assignee, unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee.' It will be observed that this section in terms applies only to suits by or against an assignee. The assignee in bankruptcy of W. W. Keen is not a party to these suits, (nor am I prepared to may he is a necessary party,) and the limitation, therefore, does not apply.

"Nor does the fifteen-years limitation prescribed by the Virginia statute operate as a bar to the suits. W. A. Moorman, the eldest son of J. C. Moorman, deceased, became of age October 15, 1877, and cause No. 2 was brought April 25, 1887, within less than ten years after he attained his majority.

"It is also insisted that complainants have been guilty of such laches and delay in asserting their claim as should preclude them from recovery in a court of equity. They were informed of the facts upon which they base their right to recover, by their counsel, in April, 1886, and, as has been seen, the second suit was brought about one year thereafter, while the first was brought within seven months, and it is not shown that the defendants have been put to any disadvantage by loss of evidence or otherwise in the interval of time that elapsed between the reception of the information and the institution of the suits. 'It is well settled that laches cannot be predicated of those who are ignorant of their rights. Such a defense is, in equity, only permitted to defeat an acknowledged right on the ground of it affording evidence that the right has been abandoned. Acquiescence cannot be imputed in the absence of all knowledge of the facts of which it is predicated.' Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Grat. 763; Lamar's Ex'r v. Hale, 79 Va. 164. 'Estoppel from acquiescence,' said the court of appeals in Green's Adm'r v. Thompson, 84 Va. 411, 5 S. E. 507, 'must rest upon actual knowledge of the wrongful act, its injurious effects, and unreasonable delay.' See, also, Tunstall's Adm'r v. Withers, 86 Va. 892, 11 S. E. 565, and 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 817. The case affords no ground for the application of the equitable bar arising from laches, acquiescence, and lapse of time; but what has been said on this subject applies only to the alleged claim of complainants as heirs and distributees of James C. Moorman, deceased, and not as claimants through their mother. The case stands on a wholly different footing as to Mrs. Moorman's interest. She was fully apprised of all her rights from the first, when she was discovered, in the lifetime, and before the bankruptcy, of W. W. Keen; and no valid excuse is offered for her failure to prosecute her alleged rights. If the contention of complainants be true, all that was needful was a request that her father and trustee, W. W. Keen, execute the trust in him for the benefit of herself and children; and, had he refused, she was armed not only with such evidence as has been adduced here, but with her own and her father's, the chief actor in the drama, to sustain her. 'She was silent when she ought to have spoken, and she will not be heard to speak when she ought to be silent.' The converse of the doctrine laid down in the cases of Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Grat. 763, etc., cited above, applies with full force to the claimants of the alleged interest of Mrs. Moorman, and, if no other defense save that of laches was interposed, it would defeat a recovery.

"Having noticed briefly the several special defenses relied on by the defendants, we come now to consider the two main questions in the case: (1) Is the resulting trust, as set forth in the bills, established? and (2) are the defendants bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration and without notice? We will consider these in the order stated. It is contended that W. W. Keen first declared the trust sought to be enforced in 1863, and the evidence chiefly relied on to prove his declarations is that of James M. Walker and T. D. F. Guerrant. As an objection is raised to the competency of these witnesses, that question must first be determined. It is contended that they are parties to this suit, were parties to the original transactions, and participated in, and by their co-operation enabled Keen, the administrator of Moorman, to commit the devastavit, and would be liable over to the defendants in the event of a recovery by complainants; and, further, that Walker is responsible in his warranty of title in his conveyance to Keen. It will be remembered that Walker and Guerrant were not originally made parties to these suits, but upon the filing of the demurrer of Bethell it was suggested that they were necessary parties, and at the June term, 1889, they were made parties without objection. The court at that time was unacquainted with the record, and, acting upon the statements at bar, admitted them as parties without any consideration as to the necessity for so doing. At the January term, 1891, they filed disclaimers, and set up their discharges in bankruptcy in bar of any liability that might attach to them, and moved that the bills be dismissed as to them. The court, still not having examined the records, and not being sufficiently acquainted with their contents to pass intelligently upon the question, had the motion noted, but postponed action upon it. No relief is sought in these suits against either of said defendants, but, on the contrary, the complainants are thoroughly committed to the pursuit alone of the property into which they allege the assets of their father's estate were converted. Nor is it clear that the bills could have been so framed as to have attempted the pursuit of the property involved, and of Walker and Guerrant, by reason of their alleged participation in the devastavit of Keen, without being open to the objection of multifariousness. I can conceive of no other reason for making them parties save to exclude their testimony already taken in cause No. 1, and to prevent their examination in cause No. 2. It is by no means plain that their connection with the transaction was of such a character as to render them responsible to complainants originally, or to the defendants by way of subrogation in the event complainants should prevail. But they rely upon their discharges in bankruptcy, as above stated. See, on this subject, Neal v. Clark, 95 U. S. 704, and, as to their competency, authorities cited in Mr. Christian's note. Their liability, if any, is too contingent and remote to render them incompetent as witnesses. The exception to their competency should be overruled, and their motion that both bills be dismissed as to them should be sustained.

"It is properly conceded that a resulting trust may be established by parol evidence. The authorities are all to that effect. It is also true that if a trust be impressed upon one piece of property, which is afterwards exchanged for other property, the trust follows, and the latter is affected with the same trust. Cook v. Tullis, 18 Wall. 341, 342; Overseers of Poor v. Bank of Virginia, 2 Grat. 551; Tabb v. Cabell, 17 Grat. 160; Oliver v. Platt, 3 How. 405. But it is equally as well settled that the evidence to establish the trust must be clear, cogent, and explicit. Dyer v. Dyer, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. 335, 338; Miller v. Blöse's Ex'r, 30 Grat. 747; Jennings v. Shacklett, Id. 765; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 127; Sugd. Vend. 708; Phelps v. Seely, 22 Grat. 589. And the trust must be proved as alleged. Dyer v. Dyer, supra, citing Andrews v. Farnham, 10 N. J. Eq. 91. It will be observed that, to establish the trust, complainants rely wholly upon the declarations of W. W. Keen as made to Mrs. Jones, T. D. F. Guerrant, and James M. Walker, and the circumstances. (I allude now to the declarations alleged to have been made in the fall of 1863, and not to that written on Schedule B 1, which will be noticed later on.) It will be remembered that the bill in cause No. 1 charges that the Jones tract was exchanged by Keen with Guerrant for all the property embraced in the deed of January 22, 1864, from E. F. Keen and wife to W. W. Keen & Co., embracing not only the Tunstall Hill property, but also the lower ferry over Dan river, with the land attached, amounting in all to 92½ acres; while all the evidence shows that W. W. Keen & Co. only sold Guerrant a part of this property, witnesses varying in their opinions as to how much, though the weight of evidence would seem to show sixty-odd acres. In cause No. 2, in the light of evidence taken in cause No. 1, the charge is that the Jones tract was exchanged with Guerrant for the 60 acres, but that W. W. Keen, finding himself largely indebted to the Moorman estate as its administrator, elected to hold the residue of the 92½ acres, having bought out the interest of his partner, Walker, therein in trust for that estate. It may be remarked in passing that there is not a particle of evidence to sustain this allegation, and attempt to reconcile the discrepancy in the bills, and to sustain the declaration of Keen in Schedule B 1. The witnesses Mrs. Jones, Guerrant, and Walker testify as to the declarations alleged to have been made nearly a quarter of a century before, when the war was flagrant, and men's minds so disturbed by passing events and the condition of the country that they ceased to apply customary business methods to transactions of vital importance,—e. g. Guerrant purchased the Tunstall Hill property, for which he paid —, investing his all—slaves and tobacco—therein, and took no conveyance. He afterwards, in 1864, exchanged this property for the Jones tract, and obtained no title until February 6, 1867. Mrs. Jones was surrounded by a family of eleven helpless children, which absorbed her attention, while Walker, a man of large affairs, was engaged in manufacturing tobacco, banking, farming, trading in lands, negroes, etc., and operating in a territory extending from Virginia to Georgia. It is proper to look to the surroundings of these witnesses with a view of arriving at the weight to be attached to their recollection of a transaction which did not particularly concern them, and to which they speak twenty-odd years after the fact. It is therefore not surprising that we find their statements as to what Keen's declarations were variant and irreconcilable. Mrs. Decatur Jones, the sister of Keen, and great-aunt of complainants, was examined in both cases,—the first time, December 21, 1886; the second, September 30, 1887,—and yet, upon the second examination, she remembered nothing, and would swear to nothing. In her first deposition she proves the sale of the Jones tract to Keen, but at what time she cannot say 'to save her life.' She says the consideration was $25,000 or $30,000 in Confederate money; that she received the last payment—$5,000—herself, (the charge is that it was a cash sale;) that it was paid to her in bank notes at the residence of Mrs. Holcombe, in Danville, by Jim Walker. She says her brother, W. W. Keen, afterwards asked why she got after Walker about this money; that it was the last payment, and he had intended to make them wait for it. Walker, on the contrary, says: 'My recollection is, in the spring of 1864, or early in the year 1864, W. W. Keen requested me to pay Mrs. Decatur Jones $5,000, and I gave her the check of W. W. Keen & Co. for that amount. About the time this check was given W. W. Keen informed me that he owed $5,000, balance on the purchase of the Decatur Jones land, and requested me to give the check, and I charged it to his individual account on the books of W. W. Keen & Co.' In his second deposition he says, prior to the payment of the $5,000, W. W. Keen asked him to make it, and that he gave Mrs. Jones the firm check in the office of their tobacco factory on Bridge street. Now, it will be observed that about this transaction, every whit as likely to have fastened itself upon their memories as the declarations of Keen, these two witnesses contradict each other throughout. Mrs. Jones says the payment was in bank notes at Mrs. Holcombe's and that Keen chided her for 'getting after' Walker about it. Walker says the payment was by the check of W. W. Keen & Co., made in the office of their factory, and at the request of Keen. They not only contradict each other, but both contradict the charges of the bills and the written statement of Keen that he bought the Jones tract 'for the sum of $30,000 in Confederate money, which he paid in cash and with money arising from the sales of tobacco belonging to said estate.' All that Mrs. Jones can be induced to say looking to the establishment of a trust in the Jones tract, though hard pressed by counsel, is: 'I do not like to say, because I cannot recollect well enough to take an oath. I always understood that he [W. W. Keen] bought it [the Jones tract] for Nannie Moorman,' and they made the deed to Guerrant, because she understood that Keen had swapped the Jones tract to him for the Tunstall Hill property; but she was not present. In answer to the direct and suggestive question, 'Did Mr. Keen ever state to you that he bought this property for James C. Moorman's estate?' she answers, 'It has been so long I would not like to swear to that effect.' She proves no declaration of trust by Keen. Dr. Guerrant is also examined in both cases. He proves his purchase of the Tunstall Hill property from Keen & Walker in the fall of 1863, and thinks he held it until the fall of 1864, when he exchanged it with W. W. Keen for the Jones tract. Keen gave him as a reason for the swap that he wanted it for his daughter, Mrs. Moorman; that she was a widow, and he did not want her exposed on that farm in the country so far from him, because it was located and surrounded in a community which was largely negroes, large negro quarters, and, during war times, she would have no protection. 'That commenced the trade,—was the opening preparing our minds for the trade. * * * And in the same conversation he stated he had purchased the Jones tract for his daughter, Mrs. Moorman.' This conversation was in 1864. He was first examined February 2, 1887, and his second examination—September 30th of the same year—is substantially the same. In point of fact, Mrs. Moorman never lived either on the Jones tract or the Tunstall Hill property; but her husband owned a residence in Danville, which was sold years after the war in the suit of Soyars, etc., v. Moorman's Heirs, etc., on February 24, 1887. James M. Walker was first examined, and says: 'To the best of my recollection, in 1863, W. W. Keen had frequent conversations with me in regard to the investment of some money that he held belonging to the estate of James M. Moorman, deceased; and my recollection is that some time after the frequent conversations he informed me that he had purchased a tract of land from Decatur Jones for the estate of James C. Moorman, deceased. My recollection is this information was given me in 1863. I can't say what time I advised him, but it was prior to the purchase of the property from Decatur Jones. I don't think he held it [the Jones tract] very long. W. W. Keen informed me that he had traded the Decatur Jones property with Dr. T. D. F. Guerrant for the Tunstall property. I think this transaction was in the latter part of 1863. I know the trade was made, and Keen took possession of the Tunstall property after that.' In answer to question 12: 'Do you know whether W. W. Keen, prior to the summer of 1864, received any moneys as administrator of James C. Moorman, deceased?' he says: 'My recollection is that I was one of the appraisers of James C. Moorman's estate; that he had a considerable quantity of manufactured tobacco, leaf tobacco, and other personal property, and that W. W. Keen realized money for the sale of that tobacco; and I think that this was prior to the summer of 1864.' 'I think the date of the purchase of the Jones farm was early in the fall of the year 1863.' In answer to the question if he knew to what end or purpose Keen held the Tunstall Hill property, he answers: 'I do know, and derived my information from W. W. Keen. My recollection is that in the latter part of the year 1863, or early in the fall of 1863, W. W. Keen informed me that he had exchanged the Decatur Jones tract of land with Dr. T. D. F. Guerrant for the estate of James C. Moorman, deceased.' He was again examined September 30, 1887, and says: 'As stated before, W. W. Keen consulted me as to how he should invest this money belonging to the estate of J. C. Moorman, deceased, and did inform me that he had made the purchase of the Jones tract of land for the estate of J. C. Moorman, deceased. I don't recollect that he had any special reference to any special money,—that he purchased it with Moorman's estate, or any other money.'

"The foregoing are extracts from the depositions bearing directly upon the point under discussion. Can it be fairly predicated of them that they clearly and explicitly establish the charges of either bill? They show that only a part of the 92½-acre tract, claimed to have been exchanged by Dr. Guerrant with Keen for the Jones tract, ever belonged to him. Again, Mrs. Jones 'always understood' (from whom it does not appear) that her brother, W. W. Keen, bought the Jones tract for his daughter, Mrs. Moorman. And Dr. Guerrant distinctly testifies that Keen told him he purchased it for his daughter, Mrs. Nannie Moorman; not for complainants, not for the Moorman estate, or with its assets, but for his daughter. Walker, with equal pertinacity of statement, says Keen told him he was going to buy it for the Moorman estate, and afterwards that he had done so. Now, which of these statements is to be adopted? If the former, the trust resulted in favor of Mrs. Moorman, who knew of her rights, and, failing to assert them until the rights of others intervened, those claiming under her are estopped from doing so now. It may have been laudable in her to remain silent, and permit her father to hold, use, and enjoy her property, and finally to surrender it in bankruptcy, rather than to assert her rights, and be disowned by him; but she cannot visit the consequences of such a course upon the defendants. But is it incumbent upon a court to undertake to reconcile the serious conflict in the testimony, and to adopt that of Walker, rather than that of Mrs. Jones and Dr. Guerrant, and, too, against that justly favored class in equity, purchasers for value and without notice? Or, if it be insisted that Keen made both statements, do his inconsistent statements furnish a safe guide to the mind in search of truth? Aside from these declarations, the circumstances would seem to repel the presumption that the assets of the Moormans' estate paid for the Jones tract. The witnesses all agree that the purchase was in 1863, and the claim is for cash. It is undisputed that Moorman died November 8, 1863, and that Keen qualified as administrator at the county court of Pittsylvania following (November 16th.) There is no evidence that he left any ready money. To the contrary, Walker, one of the appraisers, testifies as to what the estate consisted of, and no money is mentioned; and, as has been seen, Keen, in his statement in Schedule B 1, says he had in his hands 'large sums of Confederate money arising from the sales of tobacco belonging to the estate.' The inference is a reasonable one, from the amount of the penalty of the administrator's bond, $300,000, that the personal estate was estimated at half that amount. But it would be unreasonable and against experience that a personal representative, qualifying after the middle of November upon the estate of a decedent who left no ready money, could have sold property and collected money sufficient to have made a cash purchase of land that year for $25,000 or $30,000 for the estate. The sale of tobacco, too, must have been after the inventory was taken, otherwise the money would have been inventoried in place of the tobacco. And yet we must conclude either that Keen did make sales and collections as supposed, to sustain the theory that the Jones tract was bought and paid for with the money of Moorman's estate, for all the witnesses una voce locate the date of sale in the fall of 1863, and Walker early in the fall, which would make it antedate not only Keen's qualification, but Moorman's death. The first moneys of the estate traced to Keen's hands were the $12,000 paid him by Harvey, James & Williams, commission merchants, in May, 1864, months after the land was purchased and paid for, if the charge in the bills and the declaration of Keen on his schedules are true. But the last payment, as has been shown, was made by the $5,000 check of W. W. Keen & Co. And, finally, after the close of the war, to wit, on November 15, 1865, W. W. Keen, when the matter was fresher in his mind than when he went into bankruptcy, several years later, took a conveyance of the Tunstall Hill property to himself individually. Thus it would seem that the circumstances are not only helpful in reconciling the conflict in the alleged declarations of Keen, but tend strongly to discredit the truth of any and all of them. 'A mere parol declaration by one that he is buying land for another is not sufficient to establish a resulting trust; there must be some proof of an actual or constructive payment by the person claiming such trust.' 1 Perry, Trusts, § 134. 'Proof of mere admissions of one that he purchased for another, without proof of some previous arrangement or advance of money by such other, is insufficient to create a resulting trust.' Id. § 137. 'A resulting trust may be set up by parol evidence against the letter of a deed,' etc., 'but the testimony to produce this result must in each case be clear and unquestionable. Vague and indefinite declarations and admissions long after the fact have always been regarded, with good reason, as unsatisfactory and insufficient.' Phelps v. Seely, 22 Grat. 573. 'The witness swears to no fact or circumstance capable of being investigated or contradicted, but merely to a naked declaration of the purchaser, admitting that the purchase was made with trust money. That is in all cases most unsatisfactory evidence, on account of the facility with which it may be fabricated, and the impossibility of contradicting it; besides, the slightest mistake or failure of recollection may alter the effect of the declaration.' Opinion of Sir William Grant in Lench v. Lench, 10 Ves. 511-518, quoted with approbation by Bouldin, J., in Phelps v. Seely, supra. And in Botsford v. Burr, 2 Johns. Ch. 405, 411, Chancellor Kent, in commenting on the value of such testimony, says: 'This is a remarkable instance of uncertainty and fallacy of parol testimony, and shows the great danger of giving much latitude to these implied trusts, founded on naked declarations in opposition to the solemnity and certainty of written documents.' See, also, McKeown v. McKeown, 33 N. J. Eq. 384, and other cases cited by counsel for defendants to the same effect. 'A resulting trust must arise at the time of the execution of the conveyance. Payment of the purchase money at the time of the purchase is indispensable. A subsequent payment will not, by relation, attach a trust to the original purchase.' Beecher v. Wilson, 84 Va. 513, 6 S. E. 209. Now, it can hardly be said that the evidence in these causes measures up to requirement. But suppose it be conceded that the trust is established. It is not pretended that the defendants had notice of it, and to give it efficacy it must be coupled on to a declaration of which they did have notice; for, says Christian, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Carter v. Allan, 'It is sufficient to say that it has been the uniform course of decision in this state, as well as the other states of the Union, to hold that the bona fide purchaser of a legal title is not affected by any latent equity founded on a trust, fraud, or incumbrance, or otherwise, of which he had not notice, actual or constructive.' 21 Grat. 249, and cases cited.

"The contention, however, is that this link is supplied by what is styled the 'declaration of trust' on Schedule B 1 of Keen's bankruptcy proceedings, which it is claimed confirmed and corroborated the previous declarations, confirmed the purchase of the Jones tract for the Moorman estate, and the payment of the purchase price with its assets, and confirmed the exchange of it with Guarant for the Tunstall Hill property. I have considered the declarations of Keen alleged to have been made in 1863, without advert- ing to the objection made to their admissibility. They were made, if at all, while he was in possession of the property, were contemporaneous with the transactions, were made when he was solvent, and were against his interest. Declarations made under such circumstances are clearly admissible. Doo- ley v. Baynes, 86 Va. 644, 10 S. E. 974. It is insisted that with the declarations of 1863 eliminated complainants are still en- titled to recover upon the declaration found on Schedule B 1. I prefer to discuss the ef- fect of this in its various bearings under the head: (2) Are the defendants bona fide pur- chasers for valuable consideration, and with- out notice? It is proved that they did not have actual notice of what was written on Schedule B 1. Did they have constructive notice? Reason and justice demand that we look at this question not in the light of after developments, but from the standpoint occupied by the defendants when they pur- chased, paid the purchase price, and took conveyance to the land in controversy, and what would the records have disclosed to a prudent, careful, and diligent examiner of the title? He would have found that the 92½ acres of land, including the ferry, composed of several parcels, was conveyed by L. M. Shumaker and wife to E. F. Keen by deed dated December 17, 1862; that E. F. Keen and wife conveyed it to W. W. Keen & Co., a firm composed of W. W. Keen and James M. Walker, by deed dated January 23, 1865; that W. W. Keen conveyed to James M. Walker his interest in three pieces of prop- erty owned by W. W. Keen & Co. for the consideration of $9,000, by deed dated Novem- ber 15, 1865; and that Walker conveyed to Keen his interest in two parcels of land owned by said firm for the aggregate con- sideration of $10,000, Walker's half interest in the whole of the property in controversy being conveyed by deed bearing date Novem- ber 15, 1865, reciting a consideration of $5,000, and that its purpose was to vest in Keen the entire title to that property, which had before been jointly owned by him and Walker. There were five deeds from Walker to Keen, and each expressed on its face that the intention was to vest in Keen, as his in- dividual property, the land which had been previously held by Keen and Walker as part- ners. In other words, they were nothing more or less than deeds of partition of the lands of W. W. Keen & Co. between the members of the firm. In this connection it may be observed that this is not only a fair inference from the deeds themselves, but is proved by Wm. Walker, and virtually admit- ted by James M. Walker on cross-examina- tion. He would also have seen that these lands were heavily incumbered in the hands of E. F. Keen, W. W. Keen & Co., and W. W. Keen by judgments against E. F. Keen and W. W. Keen. He would have dis- covered the deed of March 13, 1868, from W. W. Keen to William G. Banks and Charles L. Powell, his trustees in bankruptcy, and that the land had been ordered to be sold by the bankrupt court to discharge the liens up- on it. The record title was in all respects regular and perfect. The property appeared to be Keen's individually and in fee, and properly surrendered by him in bankruptcy, and regularly sold to pay incumbrances. Could he reasonably have been required to investigate further? The deed to the trust- ees is general in its terms, conveying 'all his estate and effects,' giving no particular de- scription of the property embraced, and re- ferring to no other paper for a description. But the contention is that the deed from Keen and wife to the trustees of June 1, 1869, did refer to the lands 'which were list- ed and surrendered by the said Keen in his schedules in bankruptcy, where a more particular description thereof will be found,' and that the defendants were by this deed directed where to go for information about Keen's property. But the whole title, by op- eration of law and the first deed, had passed out of Keen, and, had the second deed under- taken to carry title, it would have been inop- erative. Evans v. Spurgin, 6 Grat. 118. But the second paper was in no proper sense a deed conveying Keen's property. He mere- ly joined to make effectual his wife's relin- quishment of her contingent right of dower; and, besides, there is nothing in the language employed, had the deed fallen under the eye of the examiner, to have led him to suspect that the schedules would make any disclo- sure as to title other than what the records, of which we suppose him to have been ap- prised, showed, but merely a 'more particular description' of the property would have been found. So far from exciting suspicion, had any existed, the deed would have tended to allay it, for it was fair to presume it had reference to property belonging to Keen, and of which his wife would be dowable in the event of her surviving him, and not to trust property, in which neither was interested. If the declaration of Keen in Schedule B 1 is true, the land ought not to have been surrendered by him in bankruptcy. The assignees or trustees had no more right to it than if it had been an express trust, declared in the most formal manner by deed or other written instrument; and it would have been no act of bankruptcy for Keen to have conveyed the legal title to the owners of the equitable estate. Section 5053, Rev. St. U. S., provides: 'No property held by the bankrupt in trust shall pass by the assignment;' and Id. § 5016, provides what does pass, and what the inventory or schedules shall contain: 'The said inventory must contain an accurate statement of all the petitioners' estate, both real and personal, assignable under this title, describing the same and stating where it is situated, and whether there are any, and if so, what incumbrances thereon.' Surely, then, this was no place for one to look to find, not only what was not required to be there, but what ought not to have been there. The records had shown the purchaser that the property was Keen's, and how unreasonable and dangerous would be a rule that required an examiner to search for latent, hidden equities not in his line of title, and not in the proper receptacle for them, but when the law had solemnly declared they should not be to falsify and nullify the record title. A purchaser cannot be deemed negligent for omitting to look for that which he cannot reasonably expect to find. Le Neve v. Le Neve, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. 121, 205; Mott v. Clark, 9 Pa. St. 400; Siter v. McClanachan, 2 Grat. 312, 313. and cases cited by defendant's counsel. While it is true, as has been stated, the decrees and orders of the bankrupt court did not per se constitute a bar to complainants' claim, as they were not parties, it is equally true that said court did have jurisdiction sub modo of the subject-matter of these suits. The legal title to it was in the bankrupt, and he embraced it in his inventory. If it was trust property, and had been legally made so to appear, the court would have had no jurisdiction, but the mere unsupported claim that it was trust property surely could not have had the effect of ousting the court of jurisdiction. Suppose the lien creditors of a party indebted to insolvency were to file a bill to subject his real estate to the payment of their liens, and he were to set up affirmatively in his answer that while it was true he had contracted the debts upon which the judgments were based on the faith of the land, to which he had the legal title, and had possessed, used, and enjoyed it under said title as his own, nevertheless there was a secret, resulting trust in him for the benefit of his wife and children, or grandchildren, if you please, and later on in the same proceedings he and the attorney who prepared the answer were to admit that the statement was untrue, or did some act so totally inconsistent with its truth as to be tantamount to an admission that it was false, can it be believed that a court of equity would stay proceedings till the wife and children or grandchildren could be brought in by amendment, and afforded an opportunity to prove a resulting trust in the land? And if the court were to proceed and sell the land to purchasers without notice of the unproved and subsequently falsified affirmative allegation of the answer, and confirmed the sale, collected the money, applied it in discharge of liens upon the land, and had title conveyed to the purchasers, would it be contended, under the facts supposed, that the court would be ousted of jurisdiction, and its decrees be nullities? Surely the position could not be maintained, and yet the case put is the case under judgment stated differently. Let us suppose a case suggested by one of defendants' counsel,—that the bankrupt had declared that all the property surrendered by him was bought with funds belonging to his wife; could it be seriously contended that the mere assertion of such a fact, wholly unsupported, would have divested the court of jurisdiction? It would seem plain that the court was not wholly without jurisdiction, as is contended, nor do I believe there was any obligation upon it to have stayed its hand by reason of the declaration made on Schedule B 1; more particularly when it is borne in mind that Keen himself repudiated the statement, and made the property the basis of a claim for the settlement of valuable property upon his wife, in consideration of her relinquishment of her contingent right of dower, and when counsel who dictated the so-called 'declaration of trust' signed a consent decree for the sale of the land embraced in it to pay liens upon it. With what propriety could a court be asked or expected to give credence to a declaration thus discredited by client and counsel? As I understand the rule, declarations, to be admissible, must have been made when the party had no interest to make them. And surely this cannot be predicated of Keen's declaration, made in favor of his grandchildren against his creditors, when he was not only insolvent, but in bankruptcy. Ross v. Bank, 1 Aiken, 43; 1 Cow. & H. and Edw. Notes, 644, 645; Padgett v. Lawrence, 10 Paige, 170; Carpenter v. Hollister, 13 Vt. 552. It would be carrying the doctrine of the admissibility of declarations against title to a dangerous length to hold that of Keen admissible under the circumstances of this case. To do so, and maintain that it is sufficient to establish the truth of it, and impress a trust upon property, would be to hold that every insolvent, unscrupulous debtor could shield his property from creditors simply by declaring a trust in favor of his family. It is believed that no respectable authority can be found to support a rule so unreasonable, and so fraught with mischief. All that can be said of the proceedings and decrees of the district court is that, while not per se binding on complainants, because not parties, the court did acquire jurisdiction of the subject-matter of controversy, and passed the title to it to bona fide purchasers for value and without notice, actual or constructive, before their claim, if any they had, was properly and legally made to appear.

"This opinion has been extended far beyond the limits of what was either intended or desired, but an apology will be found in the voluminousness of the record and the variety of questions involved. I am gratified that the law and evidence in the case are, in my judgment, in consonance with justice and equity. A decree will be prepared dismissing both bills, with costs to the defendants."

John W. Riely, Berkley & Harrison, and Christian & Christian, for appellants. Green & Miller, Peatross & Harris, and Geo. C. Cabell, for appellees.

FAUNTLEROY, J. These causes, pending in the circuit court of the city of Danville, involving the same subject of controversy and the same questions of law, were heard together, and they are here by appeal from a decree of the said court pronounced May 26, 1891, by which the bills of complainants in both of said causes were ordered to be dismissed. In an elaborate and exhaustive opinion in writing, filed in the cause and made part of the said decree, the judge of the said court reviews all the law and the evidence in the records so fully, so ably, and conclusively, upon every point of law and fact involved in the causes at issue, that it is the judgment of this court, after mature consideration of the whole of the records brought under review by these appeals, to adopt the said opinion of the said judge of the circuit court of the city of Danville as the opinion of this court, and to affirm the decree appealed from for the reasons therein set forth. Affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 25, 1894.)

EXCHANGE OF INFANTS' PROPERTY — VALIDITY — CURATIVE ACT — ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

1. In 1884 a bill was filed, asking permission to exchange infants' property for property belonging to their father, which permission was granted, and a commissioner was appointed to execute proper deeds. These proceedings were irregular, since, if the court could authorize the exchange of infants' land, the trustee for said infants was not served with process, the bill was not brought by one having authority to do so, and the depositions were not taken in the presence of a guardian ad litem of said infants, as provided by Code 1873, pp. 931, 932. Held, that Acts 1887-88, p. 504, "providing that any exchange of land heretofore decreed or ordered by a court shall be as valid as if such exchange had been decreed or ordered after the passage of this act," did not validate such exchange.

2. Where a debtor conveys his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, he may convey property nominally held by him in trust for others, which is in reality his own, and withhold other property standing in his own name, which equitably belongs to others.

Appeal from circuit court, Amherst county; John D. Horsley, Judge.

Prior to July 25, 1884, one Benjamin Brown owned a residence and 10-acre lot in the village of Amherst Courthouse, and one Taylor Berry, as trustee for said Brown's wife and children, owned a business lot in the same place. Brown filed a bill against Berry, trustee, and said wife and children, to exchange said lots, and the court entered a decree approving the exchange, and appointing a commissioner to make the necessary deeds, which was accordingly done. The proceedings in said suit were faulty, in that prior to 1888 there was questionable jurisdiction in the chancery court to exchange an infant's real estate; that the bill was filed by Brown personally, while the statute required the same to be filed by a guardian, trustee, or some one interested in the trust estate; the trustee was named as, but never really made, a party to the suit; the depositions in the case were not taken in the presence of a guardian ad litem as provided by statute, (Code 1873, p. 932.) Subsequently, Brown, becoming embarrassed, executed a deed for the benefit of his creditors, in which he recited said exchange, and his belief that it was invalid, and conveyed the residence which he held as trustee for his wife and children to his creditors, while the business property, which was in his own name, he declared as a trust for his wife and children. His creditors attacked this conveyance as fraudulent, and sought to set it aside, claiming that said exchange was valid, and that the lack of jurisdiction in the circuit court had been remedied by Acts 1887-88, p. 504, which provided: "Any exchange of lands heretofore decreed or ordered by a court shall be as valid as if such exchange had been decreed or ordered after the passage of this act." The lower court declared said deed of trust to secure creditors void, in so far as it attempted to alter the previous exchange of property, and confirmed the decree under which said exchange was effected. From this decree the wife and children of said Brown appealed. Reversed.

J. Thompson Brown and Caskie & Coleman, for appellants. John H. Lewis, John L. Lee, and John B. Robertson, for appellees.

LACY, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Amherst county, rendered on the 15th day of October, 1890. The bill in this case was filed by the appellees Stephen Putney & Co., William Neely & Co., and Fleishman & Morris on the 2d day of February, 1888, to set aside and annul a trust deed executed by B. Brown and wife to J. Thompson Brown, trustee, on the 19th of January, 1888, to secure certain creditors their several debts set forth in the said deed,—among them, the debts of the plaintiffs in the bill, which, however, were deferred and postponed to other creditors, who were preferred, the debts due the plaintiffs being arranged in the ninth class,—and to secure in the said class all other debts due and owing by the grantor B. Brown, but omitted and not mentioned in the said deed. The trustee was directed to take immediate possession of the property conveyed by the deed, sell the same, and deduct expenses, and distribute the net result among the several creditors according to their respective rights under the deed. The deed conveys a large quantity of real estate, as to which the wife released her contingent right of dower, for which she was to be paid $400, which $400 to the wife was first secured. Subsequently, the appellees Armstrong, Carter & Co., and others, creditors secured, but postponed to the remote ninth class, filed their petitions attacking the said deed in like manner. The gravamen of the attack upon the deed in the bill grows out of the following clause of the deed of January 19, 1888: "The dwelling house, and ten acres of land attached thereto, lying in the edge of the village of Amherst C. H., in the angle of Lynch's road and the Mount Moriah road, being the same now occupied as the residence of the said Benjamin Brown and family, and being so much of the same tract that was conveyed, as 30 acres 3 roods 15 poles, to the said Benjamin Brown by Edward S. Brown, as special commissioner of the circuit court of Amherst county, in the case of Davidson v. Smith, etc., by deed dated the 19th day of May, 1884, and recorded in the clerk's office of Amherst county court on the 27th day of May, 1884, to which deed reference is here now made. This house, and ten acres of land attached thereto, is identically the same which was attempted to be conveyed to the said Benj. Brown, as trustee for his said wife and children, by a deed from Taylor Berry, as commissioner of the circuit court of Amherst county, under and by virtue of a decree of said court in a chancery cause styled Benjamin Brown v. Taylor Berry, trustee, and others, which deed is dated the 19th day of July, 1884, and was recorded in the clerk's office of the county court of Amherst county on the 4th day of August, 1884, to which, and to the said proceedings in said circuit court of Amherst county, which undertook to authorize it, reference is here and now made. But the said Benj. Brown is advised that the deed last referred to is void, and has always been void; and the said Benj. therefore disregards the said conveyance to himself, as trustee for his said wife and their children, treating it as though no such conveyance had ever been attempted to be made to him as such trustee, and has by his conveyance of the said property by this deed, as just set forth, treated the said dwelling house, and ten acres of land attached thereto, as his own, as in fact and in law it is, under and by virtue of the deed from Edward S. Brown, commissioner of the circuit court of Amherst county, in the case of Davidson v. Smith, etc., hereinbefore recited and referred to. And so, likewise, the deed from Taylor Berry, as commissioner of the circuit court of Amherst, in the cause of Benj. Brown v. Taylor Berry, trustee, and others, made under and by virtue of the same decree as in the said cause aforesaid, by which deed, dated the — day of —, 1884, and recorded the 5th of August, 1884, the fee-simple title to the property therein named and set forth was attempted to be conveyed to the said Benj. Brown, is also void, and has always been void, and therefore need not be released now by the said Benj. Brown and wife. But in order to more effectually remove all cloud from the title to said property as held by Taylor Berry, trustee for S. P. Brown, wife of said Benj. Brown, and their children, under the deed from said Benj. Brown and S. P. Brown, his wife, to the said Berry, trustee, bearing date the 12th day of November, 1879, and recorded that day in the clerk's office of the county court of Amherst, in Deed Book LL, p. 492, they, the said Benj. Brown and S. P. Brown, his wife, do hereby quitclaim, renounce, and release all right, title, interest, and benefit that was attempted to be conveyed to the said Benj. Brown by the deed from said Berry, as commissioner of the circuit court of Amherst, under said decree in the said cause of Benj. Brown v. Taylor Berry, trustee, and others, as hereinbefore mentioned. And so the effect of the failure to make the exchange of the properties as attempted to be made by the aforesaid proceedings in the circuit court of Amherst was and is to leave the ownership of and title to the said properties, respectively, exactly where it was before such attempt was made to exchange them; that is to say, to leave the fee-simple title to the dwelling house and the ten acres of land attached thereto, hereinbefore mentioned as being now conveyed by this deed, in the said Benj. Brown under the deed to him from Edward S. Brown, special commissioner of the circuit court of Amherst county, in the case of Davidson v. Smith, etc., hereinbefore referred to, and the title to the storehouse and lot in the village of Amherst C. H., in Taylor Berry, as trustee for Mrs. S. P. Brown, wife of said Benj. Brown, and their children, under the deed from said Brown and wife to said Berry, trustee, dated and recorded on the 12th day of November, 1879, and hereinbefore referred to."

The exchange of properties set forth in the said deed as above was claimed to be a valid exchange, and that the business properties in the village were liable to the debts of creditors, in lieu of the residence property above described. That the said B. Brown had been enabled to obtain his credit from the plaintiffs and others by holding himself out as the owner of the business properties. That the settlement in the said deed attacked, by B. Brown on his wife, of $400, in consideration of her uniting in the deed, and relinquishing her contingent right of dower in the land conveyed, was in excess of the true value of the wife's right. That the said deed might be set aside and annulled, and the property conveyed in the said deed be subjected to the payment of the debts of the plaintiffs, etc. Whereupon, the defendants demurred and answered, and the court decreed that the first-named cause, of Putney, etc., v. Brown, etc., be referred to a master for accounts: (1) Of all the real estate of B. Brown, and the annual and fee-simple value thereof. (2) An account of all the personal property purporting to be passed by the said trust deed. (3) An account of all the debts of B. Brown, and their priorities. (4) The value per cent. of the contingent right of dower of Mrs. Brown. (5) An account of the transactions of J. Thompson Brown, trustee. (6) An account of the transactions of J. Thompson Brown as receiver. (7) An account of the personal property mentioned in the trust deed of 19th January, 1888, to J. Thompson Brown, trustee for Mrs. Brown, and the considerations thereof. (8) Any accounts deemed pertinent by himself, etc.

B. Brown demurred and answered, as we have said. In his answer he denied any act to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. Mrs. Brown, in her answer, denied all fraud, and insisted on her legal rights. The trustees, J. Thompson Brown and Taylor Berry, answered separately, and in accordance with their view of the legal rights of their cestuis que trustent. S. P. Brown, wife of Benjamin Brown, by J. Thompson Brown, her next friend, filed her bill against B. Brown, asserting her rights under the said deeds, etc., to which B. Brown made formal answer, admitting the charges in the bill to be true. Taylor Berry, trustee, answered for his cestuis que trustent, and submitted their rights to the court.

The commissioner of the court reported as to the several matters stated above. The evidence was taken in the form of depositions, and on the 15th day of October, 1890, the court rendered the decree appealed from here. Therein, the demurrers of the defendants were overruled; sustained exception of Stephen Putney to the allowance of any dower to the wife of B. Brown in the 10-acre residence and store, except as to the surplus after satisfying the deed of September 26, 1884, to Gilliam & Co., and refused the first exception of the same parties to a commission; sustained the exchange of properties made in the suit of B. Brown v. Taylor Berry, trustee, declaring the said exchange valid and binding, and decreed that the above-described business properties be subjected to the payment of the plaintiffs' debts, and, without deciding any other questions, ordered certain accounts; set aside and annulled the deed of B. Brown to J. Thompson Brown, trustee, of the 19th day of January, 1888, conveying certain personal property for the benefit of his wife, as voluntary and void as to the plaintiffs, and ordered the sheriff to sell the same; and appointed John L. Lee as special commissioner to rent out the above-described property and insure uninsured buildings, give bond, and report to the court. And this decree being interlocutory, but settling the principles in the cause, the appellants applied for an appeal to this court, which was allowed by one of the judges.

The first error assigned here is the action of the circuit court in overruling the demurrer of the defendants to the plaintiffs' bills, and overruling their motion to dismiss the said bills of the plaintiffs. The second error assigned is as to the action of the court in holding that the exchange above referred to, made in 1884, was valid. The third assignment of error is as to the action of the court in setting aside the deed of the 19th January, 1888, as to the bona fide creditors secured therein, who are neither proved nor alleged to have been participants in the supposed fraud, whatever the court might hold as to the grantors therein.

Section 2460 of the Code of Virginia allows a bill to be filed by a creditor to set aside a conveyance, etc., declared void by sections 2458 and 2459, before obtaining judgment or decree, (this is upon the ground that the above sections refer to fraudulent acts that are void,) and expressly contains, in section 2458, a reservation in favor of a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of the fraud. And section 2459 refers to voluntary conveyances not upon valuable consideration. The bill bases its ground of procedure upon the ground that the exchange cited above, in 1884, was effectual, and that the deed assailed conveyed, therefore, property as to which the debtor had no property rights, and failed to convey property which was liable for his debts. If the debtor made a release to his wife's trustee of the business property in the village in lieu of the residence and 10 acres outside of the village, it cannot be said to be voluntary and without consideration, and it cannot be said to be fraudulent, but it was made, however mistakenly, under the honest belief that he was entitled to the residence and adjoining lands which he conveyed to secure bona fide creditors. But how can this exchange of the infants' land in 1884 be upheld as valid? The statute (Code 1873, p. 931, c. 124, § 2) provides how infants' lands may be sold, (if this attempted exchange could be treated as a sale.) It is prescribed that this suit shall be brought by the guardian, or, if held in trust, by the trustee, guardian, committee, or any person interested therein, who thinks the interests of the infants, etc., will be promoted by a sale may file a bill for the purpose, stating plainly all the estate, real or personal, to which the infant may be entitled, verified by the oath of the plaintiff, and the infants, insane person, beneficiaries, and the trustee, (when not plaintiff,) and all other persons interested, shall be made defendants, and also, where there is an infant or insane defendant. All those who would be his heirs or distributees if he were dead. This statute must be strictly followed. The bill was filed by B. Brown, who was neither guardian, trustee, nor person interested in the estate. The subsequent act of 1888, (Acts 1887-88, p. 504,) which provides for exchanges, could not be held to validate such as were made without authority of law. The trustee was not a party. The depositions were taken without a guardian ad litem for the infant defendants, and were not, therefore, taken in his presence, nor upon interrogations agreed on by him, and were in fact taken before the bill was filed. And the infants had already brought their suit to rehear the decree, rendered thus illegally against them.

The claim that improvements had been placed upon these properties by B. Brown, which could belong or be subjected by his creditors, is immaterial to the plaintiffs, because, whatever that claim was, it had been conveyed by the deed for the benefit of other bona fide creditors of the grantor. And the same may be said of any excess of $400 over the present value of the wife's contingent right of dower. So that it appears, in whatever aspect the case may be viewed, the bill of the plaintiffs could not be maintained, and should have been dismissed. The debts secured were and are admitted to be valid debts. It is nowhere otherwise alleged. The conveyance was neither fraudulent nor voluntary. It preferred certain creditors, but conveyed all the property of the grantor to secure all his creditors according to the schedule provided by the deed. The circuit court having decided otherwise, the decree of the said court must be reversed and annulled, and such decree will be rendered here as the said circuit court ought to have rendered.

DAVIS et al. v. DAYS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 13, 1893.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—ABSENCE OF REPRESENTATIVE.

Appellant's counsel not being in attendance, and no one being present to represent appellant on the call of the case for trial, the appeal will be dismissed.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Clarendon county.

Action by W. E. Davis and J. S. Davis against Harry Days. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Rhame & Davis, for appellant.

McIVER, C. J. It appearing to the court that the appellant's counsel is not in attendance upon this court, and upon the call of this case for trial no one appears to represent the appellant herein, it is ordered that the said appeal be, and the same hereby is, dismissed.

WITTE BROS v. WEINBERG.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 6, 1893.)

APPEAL—REHEARING.

No material fact or principle of law having been overlooked, a rehearing will not be granted.

On rehearing. For former report, see 17 S. E. 681.

PER CURIAM. After a careful examination of this petition, we are unable to discover that the court has either overlooked or disregarded any material fact or principle of law, and there is, therefore, no ground for a rehearing. It is therefore ordered that the petition be dismissed, and that the stay of the remittitur heretofore granted be revoked.

STATE v. BENNETT et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 30, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—IMPEACHMENT OF VERDICT—RECOMMENDATION TO MERCY.

1. The court, after the usual charge on the credibility of witnesses, observed that the confessions were made to a detective working up the case, whose pay depended on the result of the trial; that his testimony should be received like another's, and weighed by all the circumstances. Held, that it was proper to refuse to charge that his testimony was to be received with great caution and distrust, his motives to secure a conviction being different from those of a good citizen acting unselfishly.

2. The trial court's denial of a new trial for insufficiency of evidence to sustain the verdict cannot be reviewed.

3. A recommendation to mercy is no impeachment of the verdict.

4. The affidavit of a juror that he was not satisfied of the prisoner's guilt, and only consented to the verdict in the belief that the recommendation to mercy would secure a pardon or commutation of sentence, cannot be considered to impeach the verdict.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Berkeley county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Grant Bennett and Peter Burno, alias Dick Burno, were convicted of murder, and appeal. Affirmed.

B. Pressley Barron, for appellants. Mr. Jersey, for the State.

McGOWAN, J. The defendants were charged with the crime of murder, in wrecking a passenger train on the South Carolina Railroad at Lincolnton, in the county of Berkeley, of the state of South Carolina, on the night of November 28, 1891, and thereby causing the death of one Mason Parker on the said passenger train. The cause came on to be heard before his honor, Judge Izlar, and a jury. There was much testimony, which is all printed in the record, including that of an employed detective. Under the charge of the judge, the jury found both the defendants guilty, with a recommendation to mercy. The trial judge refused a motion for a new trial, and thereupon the defendants appeal to this court to reverse the judgment below upon the following grounds: "First. Because his honor erred in refusing to charge as requested, to wit: 'That the testimony of the detective is to be received with great caution and distrust, by reason of the motives and inducements to secure a conviction being different from those of the good citizen under unselfish influences.' Second. Because his honor erred in refusing the motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence, there being no sufficient testimony to corroborate the incredible testimony of the detective, the witness Bob. Lee, who was evidently the tool of the other detective, Weinbush. Third. Because, had the defendant Bennett made the confession, as testified to by the detective Weinbush, it was incompetent evidence to affect the defendant Burno; and, eliminating this testimony, there was no evidence to support the verdict. Fourth. Because his honor erred in refusing the motion for a new trial, predicated on the verdict of the jury recommending the parties convicted to the mercy of the court, and the following affidavit: 'The State of South Carolina, Berkeley County. Personally appeared Phillip H. Hutchinson, who, being duly sworn, says that he was a member of the jury on the trial of the above-stated case at the present term of the court; that he was not satisfied of the guilt of the prisoners, and only consented to the verdict because he believed that the recommendation to mercy would secure the pardon of the prisoners or a commutation of the sentence which should be passed. [Signed] P. H. Hutchinson. Sworn to before T. G. Venning, N. P.'"

As to the first exception, the judge did charge that the credibility of all witnesses is for the jury; "and in passing upon the credibility of witnesses, and the weight which you will attach to their testimony, you must consider all the circumstances,—their opportunity for knowing what they testify to, their conduct and demeanor upon the witness stand, the influences under which they testify, the inducements held out to them, and everything which is calculated to bias and influence their views and judgment,—and then say what weight you will give to their evidence. In this case you will consider the fact that the confessions in this case were made to a detective who was working up the case, and whose compensation depends upon the result of the trial. The testimony of the detectives should be received like that of other witnesses, and weighed in the light of all the surrounding circumstances," etc. This was not in the precise terms of the request to charge, but it answered the same principle in other language. We know of no law which subjects the evidence of a detective to other rules than those applied to other witnesses. No error here.

The second exception relates to an alleged insufficiency of testimony to sustain the verdict. That is a pure question of fact, of which, as often ruled, this court, in a law case, cannot take cognizance. "This court has no power to consider alleged error of the circuit judge in refusing to set aside a verdict in a law case upon the ground of an alleged insufficiency of the testimony." State v. Robinson, 35 S. C. 340, 14 S. E. 768.

The third exception is also based upon alleged error as to matter of fact. It was admitted, at the hearing in this court, "that the circuit judge instructed the jury that the testimony as to the confessions of one of the defendants was not to be considered against the other." Whether there was other testimony to authorize and sustain the verdict was a matter exclusively for the jury. No error as alleged here.

The fourth exception alleges error on the part of the circuit judge for the double reason that one member of the jury which heard the case made an affidavit "that he was not satisfied of the guilt of the prisoners, and only consented to the verdict because he believed that the recommendation to mercy would secure the pardon of the prisoners or a commutation of the sentence which would be passed," etc.; and also for the reason that the verdict contained a recommendation to mercy. (1) As to the recommendation to mercy. It seems that the practice of making such recommendations by the jury is as old as the trial by jury itself, and possibly made, for the most part, in the hope that they may have some weight with the judge or other officer having, within certain limits, the right to graduate the punishment or exercise executive clemency. But, be that as it may, in a court having jurisdiction only for the correction of errors of law, such recommendations can have no effect whatever upon the verdict regularly and solemnly rendered. See State v. Gill, 14 S. C. 414. (2) As to the affidavit of Mr. Hutchinson, (one of the jury which tried the case,) expressing his dissatisfaction with the verdict, we can only repeat what this court said in the case of State v. Senn, 32 S. C. 408, 11 S. E. 292: "This court cannot lend a ready ear to disclosures coming from the jury room. * * * The affidavits undertake to state the manner in which the verdict was reached, and especially that 'the recommendation to mercy' was to induce a commutation of the death penalty. It is very clear that it can have no such effect. The court is bound to take the verdict as rendered, and refuse to listen to any affidavits of jurors tending to impeach it. There are reasons of public policy why jurors should not be heard to impeach their verdict, whether by showing their mistakes or their misconduct. Neither can they be properly permitted to declare, with a view to affect their verdict, an intent different from that actually expressed by their verdict as regularly rendered in open court. See Smith v. Culbertson, 9 Rich. Law, 111; State v. Tindall, 10 Rich. Law, 213; 3 Grah. & W. New Trials, p. 1928, and cases cited. In the Case of Culbertson, Judge Wardlaw, in delivering the judgment of the court of appeals, said: "The mischiefs, the delays, the arts, the scandal likely to ensue, come naturally to our thoughts when we imagine encouragement given to the pursuit of jurors by disappointed suitors for the purpose of obtaining affidavits to invalidate verdicts regularly rendered. * * * Whether they have been misled by sophistry or mistake, or have adopted the determination of a majority or of a chance, they have upon their oaths unanimously rendered a verdict in solemn form, and high considerations of justice and policy place that verdict beyond their future influence," etc."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose of having a new day assigned for the execution of the sentence heretofore imposed upon the defendants.

BOWERS v. WATTS et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 14, 1893.)

APPEAL—NOTICE—SERVICE OF CASE.

An appellant who serves notice of his intention to appeal without waiting for notice of the filing of the judgment of the lower court, thereby waives such notice, and the 30 days in which to serve the case proposed for appeal, with exceptions, begins to run from the date of such waiver.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Lexington county.

Action by George W. Bowers against James R. Watts, Rhoda Watts, Jacob F. Witt, and Cornelia J. Witt. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Jacob F. Witt appeals. Dismissed.

C. M. Eford, for appellant. Thos. S. Moor-man, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This is a motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal herein on three grounds, viz.: (1) The case proposed for appeal, with exceptions, was not served upon respondent's attorney within the time required by law; (2) the return herein was not filed in this court within the time required by law; (3) neither the return nor case for appeal contains the testimony in the action essential to the determination of both the issue of fact and the issue of law raised by the grounds of appeal.

As to the first ground, it appears that the case proposed for appeal, with exceptions, was not served until after 30 days had elapsed from the service of notice of intention to appeal. Counsel for appellant argued that the time in an appeal from an order or decree filed in vacation should be computed from the time of service of written notice of the filing of the said judgment of the circuit court; and that he was not bound to serve his notice of intention to appeal until he had been served with such written notice. Such, no doubt, is the law; but such notice may be waived, and we think it was waived in this case. The appellant gave notice of his intention to appeal without waiting for notice of the filing of the judgment of the circuit court, and thereby waived such notice. The case is analogous to the nonservice of a summons and the filing of an answer by the defendant. The defendant, thereby waives such service, and the court has jurisdiction. The notice of the judgment comes from the respondent, and not from the appellant. The notice of the judgment served by the appellant in this case was mere surplusage. The object of the notice by respondent is to cut off the time for appeal after a certain time, to apprise the appellant that the respondent intends to insist on an appeal, if taken, within the time fixed by law. See Lake v. Moore, 12 S. C. 563; McElwee v. McElwee, 14 S. C. 623; Wallace v. Carter, 30 S. C. 610, 9 S. E. 659. As no excuse has been given by appellant for his default, we are compelled to dismiss his appeal, however reluctant the court is to do so. The court has before taken occasion frequently to call the attention of the bar to the fact that the court has certain rules which are intended for the orderly dispatch of the business of the court, and that whenever their protection is invoked we are compelled, however disagreeable and unpleasant it may be, to enforce their provisions. It is always unpleasant to the court, as in this case, to dismiss an appeal, and thus seemingly cut off appellant's rights; but when he has not complied with the rules, and their protection is invoked by respondent, we are compelled to accord to him his legal rights. Motion granted.

The court granted the following order: "The State of South Carolina. In the Supreme Court, November Term, 1893. George W. Bowers, Plaintiff, Respondent, vs. James R. Watts & others, Defendants, Appellants. This was a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the appellants had failed to serve the case and exceptions within the time prescribed by law. After hearing the motion with the affidavits, together with the argument of counsel, it is ordered that the motion be granted, and that the appeal be dismissed, for the reasons given orally at the hearing of the motion."

HOLMES v. BOSTON & P. R. LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

Appellee may have an appeal dismissed when appellant fails to appear on the call of the cause.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Hampton county.

Action by W. O. Holmes against the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

W. S. Tillinghast, for the motion.

McIVER, O. J. The appellant failing to appear on the call of this cause, on motion of Mr. W. S. Tillinghast, respondent's attorney, ordered that the appeal herein be dismissed.

MANN et al. v. POOLE et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 6, 1893.)

APPEAL—REHEARING.

A rehearing will not be granted on the ground that, under the terms of the former judgment and opinion, certain results may follow, where the point was not raised either in the trial court or on appeal, and therefore could not have been decided on the former hearing.

On rehearing. For prior report see 18 S. E. 145.

PER CURIAM. The rehearing is asked for upon two grounds: (1) Because, as it is alleged, the judgment of this court heretofore rendered, as it now reads, will, or at least may, estop the minors from establishing their claim for the money for which Poole undertook to give them a mortgage, under the call for creditors of said Poole to come in and establish their demands within a time limited by the circuit decree. (2) Because, by the terms of the former opinion, the minors will, or at least may, be prevented "from following the proceeds of sale as stamped with a trust for their benefit to the amount of their estate used in payment of the said goods." After a careful consideration of the whole record, we do not find that either of these points were raised either on circuit or in this court, and hence there is nothing in the former opinion which touches either of these points. Indeed, we are unable to see how either of these points could have been raised or considered here. In the first place, we do not see that the minors appealed, and no one of the exceptions filed by those of the parties who did appeal present either of the points now, for the first time, brought to our attention. It follows, therefore, that this court not only did not, but could not, have considered or decided such points. We do not think that there is any ground for a rehearing, and the petition is therefore dismissed, and the stay of the ~~re-~~altitut heretofore granted is revoked.

NEWMAN v. CLYBURN et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 14, 1893.)

APPEAL—AGREED CASE—TIME OF FILING.

Sup. Ct. Rule 1 gives appellant the whole of 20 days after agreement to file the agreed "case" with the clerk of such court, and the fact that such "case" and return were not delivered at the clerk's office till after he had left it, on the twentieth day, and so were not marked "Filed" by him till next day, did not make them too late.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Chesterfield county.

Action by John C. Newman against James Clyburn and others. On motion to reinstate defendants' appeal. Motion granted.

Boyd & Brown and R. T. Caston, for appellants. W. F. Stevenson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to reinstate the appeal dismissed by the clerk under rule 1. The facts are as follows:

"John O. Newman, Plaintiff, Respondent, against Margaret Clyburn and others, Defendants, and the Following ex parte Petitioners, Elizabeth A. Fields and others, Appellants. Personally appeared before the subscribing officer, Albert M. Boozer, who on oath says that he is clerk of the supreme court, and that he received the case and return in the above cause through the post office at Columbia, S. C., and that the envelope containing same shows from the postmarks thereon that it was received at the post office at Columbia at 1:30 P. M. on September 19th, 1893; that same was probably put in his delivery box that afternoon, after his office was closed for the day, as the afternoon delivery is generally made after his office hours; that he did not come to his office that evening, but received same out of his delivery box the next day, (September 20th,) and upon this day marked same 'Filed' in his office; and upon the affidavit of W. F. Stevenson, one of respondent's attorneys, that the same had not been filed within the required time, he dismissed the appeal. Albert M. Boozer, Clerk Supreme Court. Sworn to before me this 19th October, 1893. J. A. Sawyer, [Seal] Not. Pub. for S. C."

"John C. Newman, Plaintiff, Respondent, against Margaret Clyburn, and others, Defendants, and the Following Named ex parte Petitioners, Elizabeth A. Fields and others, Appellants. Personally appeared before the subscribing officer, R. T. Caston, one of the attorneys for the appellants in the above case, who on oath says: That he had charge of the preparation of this appeal, and that soon after the notice of appeal was served he entered into an agreement with the attorneys for respondent under which the appellants were given until August 20th, 1893, to prepare case for appeal, and respondent was given until August 31st, 1893, to serve exceptions thereto. That on August 30th, 1893, the case was made up under said agreement, and consent indorsed thereon that same should constitute the case and return for the hearing in the supreme court. Soon thereafter (on September 9th, as deponent is informed by the clerk of court) the original was filed in the office of clerk of court for Chesterfield county, and during the week following copies were furnished him, with the request that he would verify same, and, after attaching his certificate thereto, forward same to the clerk of the supreme court. As deponent lived at a distance from the courthouse, and as the clerk was very busy,—it being about the close of a long session of court, and the clerk wished to examine copy before certifying same,—deponent left same with him with the request to forward same to clerk of the supreme court. He is informed by the clerk that within a day or two thereafter he forwarded the certified copy to the clerk of the supreme court, and he is informed by the clerk of the supreme court that he received and marked same 'Filed' in his office in Columbia, S. C., on September 20th, 1893, but that the envelope containing same showed from the postmark thereon that it was received at the Columbia post office at 1:30 P. M. on the day before, (September 19th,) and was probably delivered in the delivery box of the clerk of the supreme court on that day, but, as his office was not open at the time, the same was not received by him until the next day, (September 20th.) Thus the case and return was filed one day late. Deponent is informed and believes that daily mail from Chesterfield and Cheraw to Columbia reaches Columbia about 11 o'clock A. M., and that if promptly delivered would reach the clerk of the supreme court during his office hours on that day, and deponent and the clerk of court had good reason to believe that papers sent to clerk of the supreme court by the mail of September 19th would reach him in ample time to be by him filed in his office on that day. R. T. Caston. Sworn to before me this October 20th, 1893. F. A. Waddill, [Seal] Notary Public."

"The State of South Carolina. In the Supreme Court, November Term, 1893. Fourth Judicial Circuit, Chesterfield County. John C. Newman, Plaintiff, Respondent, against Margaret Clyburn and others, Defendants, and the Following ex parte Petitioners, Elizabeth A. Fields and others, Appellants. Personally appeared before the subscribing officer, G. Julian Redfearn, who on oath says: That he is clerk of the court of common pleas and general sessions for the county of Chesterfield, in the state aforesaid. Deponent further says that the original 'case' and return in the above-stated case was filed in his office on the 9th of September, 1893, and that the agreement subscribed thereto was dated the 30th of August, 1893. That a certified copy thereof was prepared and delivered to him by R. T. Caston, one of appellants' attorneys, between the 11th and 15th of September, 1893, and that, after examination thereof, he signed and sealed same, and at the request of said attorney mailed same, a day or two thereafter, to A. M. Boozer, Esq., clerk of the supreme court, at Columbia, S. C. Deponent further says that at the time the copy above referred to was delivered to him for his certificate he was very busy, it being the closing days of a long session of court, and he retained same to verify it as soon as he had the time, for the purpose and with the understanding with the attorney for appellants that he (deponent) would forward same to the clerk of the supreme court as soon thereafter as he could do so, and that he did so forward it as above stated. G. J. Redfearn, C. C. C. P. & G. S. Sworn to before me this October 19th, 1893. Alfred W. Davis, [Seal] Not. Pub."

The respondent's attorney submitted the following affidavit: "The State of South Carolina. In the Supreme Court. Fourth Circuit, Chesterfield county. J. C. Newman, Plaintiff, Respondent, v. Margaret Clyburn and others, Defendants, and Elizabeth A. Fields and others, ex parte Petitioners, Appellants. Personally comes W. F. Stevenson, who on oath says: That he is one of respondent's attorneys and is now sole surviving attorney for respondent. That, subsequent to the dismissal of this cause for failure to file return in due time, Mr. G. Julian Redfearn, clerk of court, stated to deponent that when Mr. Caston delivered the 'case' to him, and he certified the copy of the same, he asked Mr. Caston if there was any special hurry to have the return sent on, and Mr. Caston replied that there was not; and, inasmuch as he was busy at that time, he delayed a day or two before sending, but if he had known the time expired on the 19th of September he would have mailed it on the night the conversation occurred, although he still thought he sent it in ample time. Deponent further says that the case as filed on September 9th was printed, and that there was no difference in the printed copies. That the term of court referred to by the affidavits of appellants adjourned on the 15th of September, and by appellants' own showing he could have had the return filed by the 19th. W. F. Stevenson. Sworn to before me Dec. 13, 1893. Edward McIver, [L. S.] Notary Public."

Upon these facts the court decided that the question of "excusable neglect" does not enter into this case at all. It appears that the return was actually sent and lodged in the office of the clerk of the supreme court within the 20 days required by rule 1. It was the duty of appellants to file the return, as agreed upon, in the office of the clerk of the circuit court, which was done in due time; and then it was his duty to file a certified copy of the same in the office of the clerk of the supreme court within the time prescribed. That he transmitted the return the latter part of the time in which he was required to do so makes no difference. The appellants were entitled to full 20 days, and, the return having reached the office of the clerk of the supreme court on the evening of the twentieth day, that was sufficient, though the paper was not marked "Filed" on that day. Motion granted. Order made accordingly.

TRUSTEES OF WADSWORTHVILLE POOR SCHOOL v. JENNINGS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 20, 1894.)

On rehearing. Dismissed.

For prior report, see 18 S. E. 257.

PER CURIAM. After a careful examination of this petition, we are unable to discover that any material question of fact or principle of law has either been overlooked or disregarded, and therefore there is no ground for a rehearing. For the purpose, however, of preventing any misconception as to the real ground upon which the decision rests, we deem it best to say that it is a mistake to suppose that the remarks made in the leading opinion, implying, possibly, that the recording of the fee-simple deeds might operate as constructive notice, constituted a ground for the result reached. These remarks were thrown out by the justice who prepared the opinion as an additional reason for the view taken, which, however, as shown by the remarks of the other two justices in concurring in the result, should not be regarded as one of the points decided in the case. Petition dismissed.

STATE v. BENNETT et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 23, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—JURISDICTION—AGREED RETURN.

Counsel in a criminal case may, on appeal, agree on and sign the brief, and file it as the return, though incomplete and imperfect, and thereby give the supreme court jurisdiction of the case.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Berkeley county.

Grant Bennett and Peter Burno, alias Dick Burno, appealed from a judgment convicting them of a crime, and the state moved to docket the case in the supreme court. Motion granted.

B. Pressley Barron, for appellants. Mr. Jervy, for the State.

PER CURIAM. In this case the solicitor moved to take up the appeal for argument on the call of the first circuit docket. The chief justice stated that the same was not on the docket, and that the clerk had informed him that the return had not been filed; consequently, the court had no jurisdiction of the case. The solicitor stated that he waived any technicality, and would consent to the docketing of the case, as he was desirous of disposing of the appeal. The chief justice stated that consent did not give jurisdiction; that it was necessary to file the return to give the court jurisdiction, and constitute a record for the court to act upon; that counsel could agree on the brief, and file that, under the statute, for the return. This the counsel did; and the brief was agreed to, so signed, and filed as the return, though incomplete and imperfect, the statute allowing such agreed statement to be filed as the return.

BANK OF MARION v. EVERETT et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 14, 1893.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

When appellant fails to appear on call of the case, or to file argument, as required by rule of court, the appeal will, on respondent's motion, be dismissed.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Marion county.

Action by the Bank of Marion against Everett Bros., Gibson & Co., and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Dismissed.

Woods & Macfarlan, for respondent.

McIVER, O. J. The appellants in above-entitled case having failed to appear when the appeal therein was called, and having failed to file their argument, as required by rule of this court, on motion of Woods & Macfarlan, counsel for respondent, ordered that said appeal be dismissed.

STATE v. ROBINSON et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 26, 1894.)

GAMBLING—BETTING ON DICE—VARIANCE.

1. On a prosecution under Gen. St. §§ 1715, 1716, for betting on a game of dice in a public place, a charge that it is no crime for persons to play at dice for amusement, but to allow money to be staked on the game is gambling, is proper.

2. On a prosecution for a misdemeanor, a variance between the indictment and proof cannot be first objected to on appeal.

3. One convicted of a misdemeanor cannot complain of the judge's omission to give charges which were not asked for.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Charleston county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

John Robinson, Francis Alston, N. K. Alston, Fred Froddy, Richard Steele, and Hynn Hynes were convicted of gambling, and appeal. Affirmed.

John C. Millar and Charles E. Prioleau, for appellants. Mr. Jervy, for the State.

POPE, J. The defendants were all tried and convicted of the offense of gambling at the June term, 1893, of the court of general sessions for Charleston county, in this state. Notwithstanding, after their arrest and bail, it was made their duty to appear and answer to this bill of indictment, and notwithstanding they had counsel, yet when the case was called for trial neither the defendants nor their counsel appeared in court. The offense charged being a misdemeanor, the trial, in their absence, was legal. After conviction and sentence, they have appealed to this court, and move for a reversal of the judgment of the circuit court, and for a new trial. As grounds of appeal they substantially allege: (1) That the circuit judge erred in his charge to the jury that it was no crime for persons to play at dice for amusement, but to allow money to be staked on the game was gambling. (2) That the circuit judge erred in his charge to the jury when he stated that if the testimony should satisfy them beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants were there betting their money on a game of chance, or playing at dice when money was bet, it would be their duty to convict. (3) That the circuit judge erred in not charging that the offense of gambling could only be committed at a place prohibited by the act under which the indictment was drawn. (4) That the circuit judge erred in not charging the jury that whereas the indictment charged the defendants as gaming at cards, and the proof related to gaming with dice only, the variance was fatal, thereby acquitting the defendants. (5) That the circuit judge erred in not charging that no offense was charged in the indictment as to these defendants, because it was alleged that the gaming was done at a public place, which is not within the terms of the statute. (6) That the circuit judge erred in not charging that a "bar room," not being named in the statute as one of the places where betting was inhibited, and such being established by the proof offered at the hearing, a conviction could not be had.

The first ground of appeal is not well taken. The acts of our general assembly on this subject, now incorporated in the General Statutes of this state as sections 1715, 1716, do certainly denounce betting on the throwing of dice as an offense. In general terms, the circuit judge was here seeking to enable the jury to see what was and what was not gambling. He was seeking, in other words, to impress upon their minds that the mere handling and throwing dice, where money was not bet, was not an offense under our laws.

So, too, in the second ground of appeal, he refers to playing at dice, when money was bet, in the public place, as indicated in the indictment and proof adduced at the hearing. But the appellants insist that there was a fatal variance between the indictment, which charged betting on cards, and the proof offered, which alone referred to betting on throwing of dice. Undeniably, if the defendants had raised this question in the circuit court, and the circuit judge had failed to sustain it, it would have been reversible error by this court. But no such question was passed upon by the circuit judge. No such question was raised there. It is raised in this court for the first time, and, not being jurisdictional, if we pass upon it, would not this court be undertaking to do more than the language of the constitution gives it power to do when it says, "The supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery, and shall constitute a court for the correction of errors of law," etc.? Const. art. 4, § 4. It is alleged there is a variance here. Has that question been submitted to the circuit judge? Has he passed upon the question of variance complained of, here raised for the first time? If not, where is there any error committed by the circuit judge which may and should be reviewed by this court? We fail to see it. This question is not a novel one, however. This court has held that a variance, such as here complained of, pointed out in this court for the first time, and not having been raised in the court below, will not be considered here, being too late, and involving a question of fact. State v. Senn, 32 S. C. 392, 11 S. E. 292.

The remaining grounds of appeal all relate to alleged omissions of the circuit judge in his charge. No requests were made in the court below for such charges. That being so, these grounds are without vitality. Massey v. Wallace, 31 S. C. 153, 10 S. E. 937. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McIVER, C. J., and McGOWAN, J., concur.

STATE v. MEYERS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 23, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—NONAPPEARANCE OF ACCUSED—VARIANCE.

1. Accused having failed to appear at his trial for a misdemeanor, in person or by counsel, cannot complain of the court's failure to give a charge for his benefit.

2. On a prosecution for a misdemeanor a variance between the indictment and proof cannot be first objected to on appeal.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Charleston county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Henry E. Meyers was convicted of keeping a gaming table, and appeals. Affirmed.

John C. Miller and Charles E. Prioleau, for appellant. Mr. Jersey, for the State.

POPE, J. The defendant (appellant) was tried, in his absence, and in the absence of his counsel, at the June term, 1893, of the court of general sessions for Charleston county, for the offense of keeping a gaming table. After his conviction and sentence, he appealed therefrom. The grounds raise substantially these questions: First, that the circuit judge erred in failing to charge the jury that an indictment which charged the defendant with keeping a gaming table was not sustained by proof only that the defendant kept a public place for gaming, and that such variance was fatal; second, that, in the absence of proof of the charge set up in the indictment, the circuit judge erred in not directing an acquittal; third, that the circuit judge erred in charging the jury "that the testimony tends to show that the defendant keeps a public house where liquors are sold," whereas the proof was that defendant kept a saloon."

It may be well to remark at the outset that by the laws of this commonwealth, when an offense cognizable by the court of general sessions is committed, the court of general sessions acquires jurisdiction of the person of the offender by his arrest. After his arrest, except in capital cases, he is entitled to bail, as of right; and one of the conditions of his recognizance is that he will appear at the next term of the court of general sessions of the county where the offense was committed, to answer such indictment as may be preferred against him. By our constitution such offender is allowed to appear in his defense by counsel or in person or both. This appellant, after his arrest and bail, neglected to appear at his trial, either in person or by counsel, though he had counsel. The charge being a misdemeanor, his trial was legal in his absence. After his conviction and sentence under these circumstances, he now appeals to the supreme court, and for the first time alleges error in his trial in the circuit court. As will be observed, in the first ground of appeal the appellant alleges that the circuit judge erred in failing to make a charge that appellant now thinks would have inured to his benefit. By numerous decisions of this court it has been held to be the law in this state that no such allegation of error will be considered in this court unless a request for such charge has been made to the circuit judge on the trial before him.

The second ground of appeal is not tenable. Not only did the appellant fail to make any request of the circuit judge to this effect while the offense was undergoing investigation in the court below, but in the "case" for appeal some proof of the charge does appear. This court being confined, by the provisions of our constitution, to the correction of errors of law in cases of law, is powerless to interfere here.

The last allegation of error involves the question of variance between the offense set up in the indictment and the proof adduced at the hearing. It is too late to raise that question for the first time, in a case on the law side of the court, in this court. See the judgment just filed in the case of State v. Robinson, 18 S. E. 891. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

TOMPKINS et al. v. AUGUSTA & K. R. CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 19, 1893.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—REINSTATEMENT.

An appeal, dismissed by the clerk of the supreme court because the return was not filed within the time required by court rules 1 and 2, will not be reinstated where it appears that appellant himself undertook to manage his appeal, and that the default was his own, and not his attorney's, and that he probably delayed because of his unwillingness to incur the expense of appeal until the determination of another action pending in the supreme court, involving a similar question.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Edgefield county.

Action by S. S. Tompkins and others against the Augusta & Knoxville Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. The appeal was dismissed by the clerk, and plaintiffs now move to reinstate the same. Denied.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by McIVER, C. J.:

This is a motion to reinstate the appeal dismissed by the clerk under rule 1. The appellants submitted the following affidavits:

field, to be filed and served on respondent's attorneys. Three or four days thereafter deponent received a copy of the brief, with the acceptance of respondent's attorneys thereon, and believing that the clerk of the supreme court would not file them without a certificate of the clerk of the court below that they had been filed in his office, wrote back to his attorney, N. G. Evans, and requested him to forward a copy of the brief with the certificate of the clerk that it had been filed in his office. In response to this he received a reply from Mr. Evans that the clerk of the court could not certify without the original agreement as to what should constitute the case was on file in his office, and requesting deponent to forward the agreement. By return mail he sent the agreement to Mr. Evans, and in due course of mail received a certificate on a detached piece of paper. Deponent believed he had no authority to attach this certificate to the brief, returned it to Mr. Evans, to be attached by the clerk to the brief on file in his office. On the fifth of August, the brief, with the proper certificates, was mailed at Edgefield to deponent, but did not reach Columbia until 7:30 A. M. on the 7th of August. Immediately upon receipt thereof he filed the same with the clerk of the supreme court. Deponent cannot imagine how he could have been more expeditious in the matter but by coming personally to Edgefield on the receipt of the brief from the printer, and seeing that it was filed and served, and taking it back with him, which he would have done but for the want of the necessary funds, and from the fact that he would have had to neglect the business of his employers, although then under the impression that he had twenty days more. S. S. Tompkins. Sworn to before me this, the 9th, day of August, 1893. John B. Hill, [L. S.] C. C. C. P."

"State of South Carolina, Edgefield County. In re S. S. Tompkins et al. versus A. & K. and P. R. & A. R. R. Cos. Personally appeared before me, —, a notary public, W. H. Macfeat, stenographer of the fifth judicial circuit, who took the testimony in the case of S. S. Tompkins et al. versus The Augusta & Knoxville Railroad Company, tried at the March, 1893, term of court for Edgefield county, and makes affidavit that a transcript of the testimony was furnished to the plaintiff, S. S. Tompkins, for appeal purposes, on the 3rd July, 1893. This was the earliest possible moment that same could be written out on account of other orders for transcripts which took precedent because of priority, and because of engagements in court. Deponent also says that no blame should be attached to the plaintiff, S. S. Tompkins, for any failure to receive the testimony earlier than the date above mentioned, because he filed his order for same in sufficient time, and was urgent to obtain it, but, for the reasons above stated, an earlier transcript of same was a physical impossibility. W. H. Macfeat. Sworn to before me this 9th August, 1893. John B. Hill, [L. S.] C. C. C. P."

"State of South Carolina, Edgefield County. In re S. S. Tompkins et al. versus A. & K. and P. R. R. Co. Personally appears N. G. Evans, who upon oath says: That he is one of the attorneys for the appellant in the above-stated cause. That on the sixth of July a statement for the hearing of this case was agreed upon by the attorneys for the appellant and respondent. That the attorneys for respondent were duly served with a copy of the papers constituting the case. That the case was then agreed upon, and Major S. S. Tompkins took the papers to Columbia, to have same printed. That on the 26th July deponent received the printed brief agreed upon for the hearing of this case in the supreme court, and duly served Messrs. Sheppard Brothers, attorneys for respondent, with three copies of same, and filed a copy in the office of the clerk of the court of common pleas for Edgefield county, and by the mail of the 26th July forwarded the original brief, with the acceptance of service thereon by the attorneys, to Major S. S. Tompkins, to have same filed in the office of the clerk of the supreme court. That Major S. S. Tompkins, thinking that a certificate from the clerk of the court of common pleas was necessary before the filing of the brief in the office of the clerk of the supreme court, wrote by return mail to the deponent, asking that the clerk make out said certificate. That the clerk gave deponent such a certificate on a detached paper, which was duly forwarded by the same mail to Major S. S. Tompkins, to be attached to the original brief; and he, thinking he had no right to attach said certificate to the original brief, wrote to deponent that he thought it was necessary for the clerk to make the certificate upon the brief, and send that for filing in the office of the clerk of the supreme court. Deponent at that time did not think it was necessary to have the certificate from the clerk of court of common pleas upon the brief. That the agreement between counsel was sufficient to have the case docketed in the supreme court. That the clerk of the court of common pleas did not have the agreement of counsel as to what should constitute the brief for the hearing of the case in the supreme court, and this deponent wrote to Major S. S. Tompkins, at Columbia, to send said agreement, as it was in his possession. Immediately upon receipt of same, the clerk of the court made his certificate in conformity thereto, which is upon the back of the brief as filed in his office, dated 26th July, 1893. N. G. Evans. Sworn to before me this 9th day of August, 1893. John B. Hill, [L. S.] C. C. C. P."

The respondent submitted the following affidavit: "State of South Carolina, Edgefield County. In the Supreme Court. In re S. S. Tompkins et al. vs. The A. & K. R. R. and

The P. R. R. Co. Personally came before me J. C. Sheppard, who, being duly sworn, says: That on or about the 6th day of July last, when deponent and N. G. Evans, Esq., were agreeing upon the papers which should constitute the brief for the appeal in the above-stated cause, deponent inquired of Maj. S. S. Tompkins why he had not perfected the appeal in said cause, deponent stating to Maj. Tompkins that there had been plenty of time allowed, to which Maj. Tompkins replied, in the presence of Mr. Evans, 'I have been waiting for the decision in the other case.' The 'other case' to which Maj. Tompkins referred was the case of Tompkins et al. vs. Tompkins et al., in which the title of W. R. Parks to the tract of land involved in the above-stated cause was in question, and in which the decision of this court was not filed until some time in October. Deponent mentions this matter to show that neither 'inadvertence' nor mistake caused the failure to perfect the appeal within the time allowed, but that said failure was attributable to the unwillingness of Maj. Tompkins to incur the expense incident to such appeal in advance of the action of this court upon another cause then pending. J. C. Sheppard. Sworn to before me this the 15th December, 1893. Albert M. Boozer, [L. S.] Notary Public of S. C."

N. G. Evans, for appellants. J. C. Sheppard and Joseph Ganahl, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J., (after stating the facts.) After hearing argument pro and con, the court refused the motion to reinstate the appeal. The court stated that it appeared that the neglect to file the return in the time required was not due to the default of the appellant's attorneys, but his own. The appellant himself undertook to manage his appeal, and it was his neglect which resulted in the dismissal.

The court made the following order: "The State of South Carolina. In the Supreme Court, November Term, 1893. S. S. Tompkins and others, Plaintiffs, Appellants, vs. The Augusta & Knoxville Railroad Company, Defendant, Respondent. This is a motion to reinstate the appeal dismissed by the clerk under rules 1 and 2. The showing made before the clerk was amply sufficient to justify that officer in dismissing the appeal, and there was, therefore, no error on the part of the clerk in dismissing the appeal. The only question, therefore, now before this court is whether the showing now made is sufficient to justify this court in reinstating the appeal. Under the proviso to rule 1, as amended on the 22d of December, 1892, an appeal dismissed by the clerk may be reinstated, provided it be made to appear to the satisfaction of this court that the default in complying with the requirements of the rule has arisen from some excusable neglect. Without going into any discussion of the facts stated in the affidavits, it is sufficient for us to say that the showing made is insufficient. It is therefore ordered that the motion to reinstate the appeal be dismissed."

HALL'S SAFE & LOCK CO. v. SCITES et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 20, 1894.)

MECHANICS' LIENS — AGAINST COUNTY PROPERTY.

1. The public buildings of a county are wholly exempt from the operations of the mechanic's lien law, and cannot be sold under execution or other process.

2. The county court of a county cannot be compelled by a bill in chancery to issue an order against the county funds for any debt or claim, just or unjust, against the county. The statutory law furnishes the remedy in all such cases, and it must be strictly pursued.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Wayne county.

Action by the Hall's Safe & Lock Company against Scites & Wiley and others to enforce a mechanic's lien. There was judgment for defendants dismissing the action, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Simms & Enslow, for appellant.

DENT, J. At September rules, 1892, the appellant in this case, Hall's Safe & Lock Company, filed its bill in chancery in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Wayne county against the county court of said county and J. D. Scites and C. L. Wiley, partners doing business under the firm name and style of Scites & Wiley, claiming the right to enforce a mechanic's lien against the courthouse and grounds of said county for material furnished by them to said Scites & Wiley, contractors, for the construction of said courthouse, and which material so furnished was used in said building, and never paid for, being of the value of $1,750. The county court demurred to said bill, for the reason that a mechanic's lien could not attach to a public building, and therefore the bill was without equity. On the 30th day of May, 1893, the circuit court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the bill. Thereupon the plaintiff appealed to this court, and assigns the following grounds of error: "It was error to dismiss said bill upon said demurrer, because, under the law, the plaintiff was in equity entitled to recover from the defendants Scites & Wiley the amount due the plaintiff, and, having complied with the requirements of the statute giving him a lien for materials furnished, and the county court of Wayne county being indebted to said Scites & Wiley, its contractors, the court should have entered a decree adjudicating the claim, and the order requiring the county court of Wayne county to pay the same by the issuing of a proper county order, as prayed for in said bill." The only question raised by this assignment is whether the public buildings of a county may be subjected to a mechanic's lien, as there is no other matter of equity alleged in the bill. There has been no decision by this court in relation to the question presented, but in many of the states the matter has been judicially determined, and invariably against the right to such lien; and in Phillips on Mechanics' Liens, (section 179,) the rule, as settled by these various decisions, is as follows, to wit: "Property which is exempt from seizure and sale under an execution upon grounds of public necessity must for the same reason be equally exempt from the operation of the mechanic's lien law, unless it appears by the law itself that property of this description was meant to be included; and to warrant this inference something more must appear than the ordinary provisions that the claim is to be a lien against a particular class of property enforceable as judgments rendered in other civil actions." Board v. O'Conner, 86 Ind. 536; Williams v. Controllers, 18 Pa. St. 275; Poillon v. Mayor, etc., 47 N. Y. 666; Secrist v. Delaware Co., 100 Ind. 59; Whiting v. Story Co., 54 Iowa, 81, 6 N. W. 137; Panola Co. v. Gillen, 59 Miss. 198; Bouton v. McDonough Co., 84 Ill. 384, 15 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 29. There is nothing in the statutory law of this state that would indicate in any way that it was the intention of the legislature that public buildings should be subject to mechanics' liens, as other buildings; on the contrary, there is every inference against such intention. The county court is not the owner of the county buildings. They belong to the citizens of the county, and are to be held and used in trust for public purposes alone. Section 43, c. 39, of the Code provides that "the lands, buildings, furniture and books belonging to a county and used for county purposes, shall not be subject to execution or other process," thereby clearly exempting such property from sale in any manner or for any purpose, and hence no mechanic's lien could in any manner attach thereto. Public policy and necessity both sustain this law. If such things were permitted, counties would be in continual litigation about their properties, either from just or unjust demands, and the public business would be greatly interfered with and hindered, to the great detriment of the innocent taxpayers. The assertion that, while the plaintiffs would not have the right to sell the property, yet they would have the right to have their alleged mechanic's lien enforced to the extent of requiring the county court to issue an order for the amount claimed by them out of funds due from the county to Scites & Wiley, is untenable. The bill contains no allegation that the county is in any manner or to any extent indebted to Scites & Wiley, nor can it be regarded either as a garnishee process or as a petition for a mandamus to compel the county court to issue an order for the sum demanded. A mechanic's lien cannot attach to property the sale of which the law forbids, and, this being the only ground of equity set up in the bill, the circuit court committed no error in sustaining the demurrer, and dismissing the same. Therefore the decree complained of is affirmed, with damages and costs, as the law directs.

TOUDY v. NORFOLK & W. R. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 3, 1894.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—KILLING ANIMALS ON TRACK—SIGNALS.

1. If a horse is killed by a train at a public road crossing, and the evidence shows that the train was running at the rate of 12 miles an hour, and the horse walked onto the track 25 or 30 yards in front of the approaching train, and the engineer at once gave two sharp whistles, and the evidence further shows that it was impossible to stop the train, considering its speed, after the horse got on the track, the killing of the horse must be regarded, under the circumstances, as an inevitable accident, and the railroad company is not responsible therefor.

2. The statutory requirement of blowing the whistle or ringing the bell 60 rods before reaching a crossing is intended to warn persons who are about to use the crossing in passing over the public road, and not for the purpose of preventing dumb animals from going upon the crossing.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Wayne county.

Action by H. J. Toudy against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Campbell & Holt, for plaintiff in error.

ENGLISH, J. This was an action brought by H. J. Toudy against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company on the 26th day of September, 1892, before a justice of the peace of Wayne county, for the recovery of $200 damages for a wrong done. It appears that the damages claimed were occasioned by reason of the defendant running its engine and cars over the plaintiff's horse in February, 1892, in Wayne county, and that the damages sustained amounted to $150. The defendant made answer, and pleaded not guilty. The case was heard by the justice, who found for the plaintiff the sum of $150, and gave judgment against the defendant for that amount in favor of the plaintiff, and for costs, amounting to $3.25. From this judgment the defendant appealed to the circuit court, and on the 3d day of February, 1893, the case was submitted to a jury, which found for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $150, subject to the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, which demurrer was overruled by the court. The defendant excepted, and judgment was rendered upon said verdict, and the question we are to consider is whether the evidence set out in the demurrer to the evidence is such as entitled the plaintiff to recover. The facts shown by the plaintiff are as follows: On the 12th day of February, 1892, the plaintiff's horse was killed at a county road crossing by an east-bound freight train, composed of an engine and tender and 15 loaded gravel cars, running at a speed of 10 or 12 miles an hour. The view of the railroad track is unobstructed from the point where it is crossed by the county road for a distance of 225 feet in the direction of the approaching train, but the horse did not come upon the track, according to the testimony of one of the plaintiff's witnesses, until the engine was within 25 or 30 yards of the crossing, and, according to the testimony of another, "just ahead of the train;" and the undisputed testimony was that the train could not have been stopped short of 300 feet. In addition to this, the evidence of the plaintiff was to the effect that no whistle was heard sounding or bell ringing for the crossing, but, upon the other hand, a witness for defendant stated positively that he heard the whistle blown for the crossing, and it is admitted that two sharp blasts of the whistle were given before the horse was struck. Was the killing of the plaintiff's horse in this instance the result of negligence on the part of the defendant, or was it, under the circumstances of the case, the result of inevitable accident? Patterson, in his work on Railway Accident Law, at page 35, says: "Railways are not to be held liable for injuries resulting from inevitable accident,—that is, accident not due in any way to negligence on the part of the railway, and such as no human foresight could avert." Did the defendant use ordinary care in the management of its train when approaching this crossing? Now, while it is true, as shown by the evidence set forth above, that the officers in charge of the train were in a position to have an unobstructed view of the crossing where the horse was killed for a distance of 225 feet before said crossing was reached, the evidence shows that the track and the crossing were clear and free from obstruction of any character, and the horse did not appear on the crossing until the train was within 25 or 30 yards of the crossing,—that is, 75 or 90 feet in front of the train; and according to the evidence it would have required a distance of 300 feet in which to stop the train, which was running at a speed of 10 or 12 miles per hour. It is obvious, then, that, although the view was unobstructed for a distance of 225 feet from said crossing in the direction in which the train was approaching, that fact would be of little service to those in charge of the train if two-thirds of that distance had been traversed by the train before the plaintiff's horse appeared upon the crossing. Mr. Bocock, a witness for the plaintiff, stated that he was standing at the time of the accident inside of plaintiff's palings, just 40 feet from the railroad track, and about 50 feet west of the road crossing. The horse stepped upon the crossing, and was struck by the engine. That he did not hear any whistle blown or bell rung. He also stated on cross-examination that said horse was coming along the county road, and stepped upon the railroad track just ahead of the train. That the horse came on the track so close ahead of the train that from where he was standing, as soon as the horse reached it, the engine shut him off from his view; and he did not think that it would have been possible to stop the train, considering its speed, after the horse got on the track. 3 Wood, Ry. Law, (Minor's Ed.) p. 1849, says: "And negligence cannot be inferred from the mere fact of killing. It is not necessary that the killing should be shown to have been wantonly or willfully done, but it must appear that it was negligently done, which may be established by showing that the engine driver did not use proper precautions to avoid accident. Thus, when animals are standing on the track of a railway, and can be seen by the persons running the train by the use of ordinary care, it is their duty to make use of the engine whistle to drive them off, and to slacken speed or stop the train if necessary to avoid injuring them. * * * But it is not always necessary that the engine driver should stop the train or slacken its speed on discovering stock on the track. Ordinary prudence requires him promptly to endeavor to drive them off by sounding the whistle, but does not require him to stop or slacken the speed of the train when he may reasonably believe that they will leave the track in time, and there is no cause or reason to suppose there is any risk or danger." In a note on page 1851 it is said: "Speed and punctuality in the running of trains, as well as the safety of passengers, are paramount considerations, to which private interests must yield; and to compel a railroad company to slacken the speed of its trains or stop them, whenever an animal is seen upon the track, would impose a burden upon them which would destroy all calculations as to the arrival of trains, etc., and compel them often to choose between pecuniary loss and injuries to their passengers which would be unwise and unjust," citing Maynard v. Railroad Co., 115 Mass. 458; Railroad Co. v. Ballard, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 177; Needham v. Railroad Co., 37 Cal. 409.

Under our statute, (Code, c. 54, § 61,) "a bell or steam whistle is required to be placed upon each engine which shall be rung or whistled by the engineer or fireman at the distance of at least sixty rods from the place where the railroad crosses any public street or highway, and to be kept ringing or whistling for a time sufficient to give due notice of the approach of such train," etc. Was this statutory signal given? The witness Bocock says that he did not hear any whistle blown or bell rung, and the plaintiff says no whistle was blown or bell rung on approaching this road crossing, except that when within about 50 feet of the crossing it blew two sharp blasts of the whistle. Now, suppose it be true that the statutory requirement was not complied with in this case, did that fact in any manner conduce to the killing of the horse? The statutory requirement that the whistle shall be blown 60 rods from the crossing which the train is approaching is not intended for the purpose of giving notice to horses and cattle running at large in the public road, but to give warning to travelers upon the highway, to persons who have the faculty of reasoning and understanding the object of the signal. This is illustrated in the case of Improvement Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, in which Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, says: "From the character and momentum of a railroad train, and the requirements of public travel by means thereof, it cannot be expected that it shall stop, and give precedence to an approaching wagon to make the crossing first. It is the duty of the wagon to wait for the train. The train has the preference and the right of way. But it is bound to give due warning of its approach, so that the wagon may stop, and allow it to pass, and to use every exertion to stop if the wagon is inevitably in the way," etc. The warning required is obviously intended for the driver, and not for the horses attached to the wagon; and in this connection we may ask with propriety, what possible effect could the failure to give the signal required by statute have had in causing the death of the horse complained of in this case? If the whistle had been blown 320 yards away from the crossing, can we say it would have prevented the horse from walking onto the crossing at the very moment he did? He undoubtedly was approaching the crossing at the moment the warning should have been sounded, but if he had heard it he could not have reasoned that the train was approaching, and he must keep off the track, so that his death was not occasioned by the failure to whistle, if the engineer failed to give such signal.

In the case of Fisher v. Railroad Co., 126 Pa. St. 293, 17 Atl. 607, it was held that, "where the plaintiffs' mule escaped from him, and, straying upon a railroad company's track at a public crossing, was struck by a locomotive and killed, the failure of the engineer to ring the bell and sound the whistle as the engine approached the crossing was not negligence on the part of the company, and, the mule being a trespasser, the plaintiff could not recover." The opinion of the court in that case is short, and reads as follows: "The defendant company was sued to recover damages for the loss of plaintiff's mule. The mule was killed upon the track by one of defendant's locomotives. It was loose, and for the purposes of this case must be regarded as straying upon the track. The alleged negligence of the company consisted in not ringing the bell or sounding the whistle as the engine approached the crossing near which the mule was killed. If it was the duty of the engineer to blow the whistle as notice to the mule, I do not see why the mule should not be held to the rule to 'stop, look, and listen.' To apply rules to dumb animals which were intended only for reasonable beings is dangerously near the realm of absurdity."

This court, in the case of Hawker v. Railroad Co., 15 W. Va. 628, states the law upon the question involved in this case as follows, in point 3 of the syllabus: "If the killing of the cattle on the railroad track were, under the circumstances, an inevitable accident, the railroad company is not responsible therefor, though the engineer used no precaution, such as blowing the whistle, or doing anything else. If no precaution could possibly, under the circumstances, have avoided the accident, the failure to use any precautions will not render the railroad company liable."

In the case of Flattes v. Railroad Co., 35 Iowa, 191, it was held that "where, in an action against a railroad company to recover the value of stock killed on its station grounds, the evidence fails to show negligence of the company or those in charge of the train, a verdict of the jury against it will be set aside. (2) That the rate of speed was not slackened nor the whistle sounded is no evidence of negligence when it appears that such efforts would have been, under the circumstances, unavailing to prevent the injury." Now, from the evidence in the case under consideration as to sounding the whistle before reaching the crossing as required by statute, the plaintiff on cross-examination states that he would not swear positively that no whistle was sounded or bell rung by the train upon approaching the road crossing, but that he heard no bell rung or whistle sounded except two shrill blasts of the whistle, indicating "Down brakes!" when the train had nearly reached the crossing. The witness Bocock also states that he did not hear any whistle blown or bell rung. The plaintiff, however, did hear the two sharp blasts when the train was near the crossing, which demonstrated that one may hear when the other does not; and Mr. Wyant, a witness for the defendant, who does not contradict the plaintiff's witness, says: "This train gave two shrill whistles just before striking the horse, and I heard this train beside whistle for the road crossing where the horse was killed." Starkie, Ev. (4th Ed.) p. 867, illustrates the distinction between positive and negative evidence as follows: "If one witness were positively to swear that he saw or heard a fact, and another were merely to swear that he was present, but did not see or hear it, and the witnesses were equally trustworthy, the general principle would, in ordinary cases, create a preponderance in favor of the affirmative; for it would usually happen that a witness who swore positively, minutely, and circumstantially to a fact which was untrue would be guilty of perjury, but it would by no means follow that a witness who swore negatively would be perjured, although the affirmative were true. The falsity of the testimony might arise from inattention, mistake, or defect of memory. And the author illustrates it by two persons in the same room for the same period, and one of them should swear that he heard the clock strike during that time, and the other should swear that he did not hear it; it is possible that the fact might be true, and yet each might swear truly. There seems, however, to be no controversy about the fact that two sharp whistles were given about 50 feet from the crossing. This is stated by the plaintiff himself, and the evidence shows that the horse stepped onto the track 25 or 30 yards ahead of the engine,—say that was about 80 feet. Then the train was running at the rate of 12 miles an hour,—that is, a mile in five minutes, and about 18 feet in a second,—so that in less than two seconds after the horse appeared on the crossing the two sharp whistles were sounded according to the plaintiff's own statement, so that, under the circumstances, the train was too close upon the horse to be stopped. It struck the horse in three seconds from the time the whistle sounded at the rate of speed it was running, and the accident was inevitable. The men on the train did all that was required of them, and the evidence discloses no negligence on their part. I am therefore of opinion that the circuit court erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, and in entering judgment for the plaintiff. Said judgment is therefore reversed, and this court, proceeding to render such judgment as the court below should have rendered, doth give judgment for the defendant, with costs, and the costs of this writ of error.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 1, 1894.)

JURISDICTION ON APPEAL—CONSOLIDATED SUITS—ATTACHMENT IN EQUITY—RETURN TO RULES—CHATTEL MORTGAGE—EXECUTION IN SISTER STATE—VALIDITY.

1. Where the interests are separate on appellants' part, the decree may be reversed as to one, and dismissed as to another, because the subject, as to him, is less than the jurisdictional amount.

2. Where the amount in controversy equals $500 as to one of appellants, the question is properly before the court as to him; and when the questions as to all the appellants are identical, and the claims have been consolidated and heard together, the decree will be valid or invalid as to all, and the decision on appeal will conclude the rights of all in like condition, though some of the claims may be less than $500.

3. Code 1887, § 2965, providing, in regard to an attachment, that, "if issued in a pending suit, it shall be returnable to a term of the court in which the same is pending," does not authorize the return of an attachment in equity to rules, in the case either of a regular writ of attachment, or when the order indorsed on the summons by the clerk directs the officer to whom it is delivered for service to attach the property mentioned.

4. A chattel mortgage which is valid and duly recorded where it was executed, both as between the immediate parties thereto and against third persons, will be upheld by courts of a sister state to which the property may be afterwards removed.

5. A statute relating to the record of chattel mortgages has no application to a mortgage executed outside the state, unless it expressly so provides.

Appeal from circuit court, Franklin county.

Suits by Williams, White & Co. and others against Ormond & Goforth, John Craig, and others. Plaintiffs attached certain property belonging to Ormond & Goforth, which the latter had mortgaged to said Craig before it was removed to Virginia. The mortgage was regularly executed and recorded in South Carolina, but not in accordance with the laws of Virginia. From a decree giving said attachments precedence over his mortgage, defendant Craig appeals. Reversed.

Anderson & Hairston and Staples & Munford, for appellant. Dillard & Lee and Kean & Lile, for appellees.

LACY J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Franklin county, rendered on the 26th day of September, 1892, in the consolidated causes entitled "Williams, White & Co. and others v. Ormond & Goforth and others," in which there were 13 cases consolidated and heard together. The appellees Williams, White & Co. brought their suit in equity in the circuit court of Franklin county, and for an attachment on certain personal property situated in said county, against the appellant, John H. Craig, and Ormond & Goforth, nonresidents of the state of Virginia, to have satisfaction of certain debts due by the said Ormond & Goforth to the said complainants. Ormond & Goforth are railroad contractors and constructionists doing work in the said county of Franklin, in the state of Virginia, where the said property is situated. The said John H. Craig is a nonresident of Virginia, resident in the state of South Carolina, and the mortgagee in a mortgage executed by the said Ormond & Goforth in the said state of South Carolina, on the 2d day of November, 1890, upon the property attached, now in this state, and other property then in the state of South Carolina, which was admitted to record, upon insufficient authentication by the law of this state, on the 26th day of November, 1891, by the evidence of one witness, one J. S. Brice. Upon the bringing of this suit, numerous other suits were brought for different debts of various amounts, varying in amount from $1,300 to $50, but otherwise identical in character; and, in proceedings had in them, they were consolidated and heard with the first-named suit, and the same decree rendered for all. None of these debts appear to be disputed or denied, but the point of contest between the several plaintiffs and the defendant Craig is as to the priority of the home attachments, issued and levied in the county of Franklin, and the lien of the mortgage, executed in the state of South Carolina, and duly recorded according to the laws of that state. The circuit court held the foreign mortgage ineffectual for want of proper recordation in the state of Virginia, and sustained the lien of the attachments, and decreed accordingly for their several debts in favor of the attaching creditors; whereupon John H. Craig applied for, and obtained, an appeal to this court.

The first question which arises here on the appeal is by certain attaching creditors,—Oglesby, Tutwiler & Co.,—and others who, like them, have debts of less amount than $500, it being conceded that the debts of Williams, White & Co. and Sims & Woell exceed the said sum of $500, which is necessary to give this court jurisdiction of such an appeal, which is merely pecuniary; and they, the said Oglesby, Tutwiler & Co., and others in like situation, insist that the appeal should be dismissed as to them, for the stated reason that the amount involved is less than the amount required to sustain the jurisdiction of this court. This court has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal which is merely pecuniary, and is less in amount than $500. In order that the defendant may enjoy the right of appeal when it depends on the amount, the judgment or decree must be for at least $500, principal and interest, exclusive of cost, and that the plaintiff may enjoy it, his claim must be not less than $500, principal and interest; and, if several creditors are seeking, by creditors' bill, to subject property to their debts, no one of which amounts to as much as $500, although, in the aggregate, the sum is much greater, there can be no appeal on the creditors' part, because their claims are independent one of another; but the owner of the property, when the total of debts is as much as $500, although severally the claims be less, may appeal. 4 Minor, Inst. 857; Umbarger v. Watts, 25 Grat. 167; Railroad Co. v. Colfelt, 27 Grat. 779, 780; Devries v. Johnston, Id. 808; Gage v. Crockett, Id. 735. And, where the interests are distinct and separate on the part of the appellants, the decree may be reversed as to one, and dismissed as to another, as having been improperly awarded, because the subject of controversy, as to him, is less than $500, (Cocke v. Minor, 25 Grat. 260;) but, where the amount in controversy involved in the appeal is above the jurisdictional amount as to one of the appellants, the question is properly before this court as to that one; and when the questions as to all others are identical, and the claims have been consolidated and heard together, the validity or invalidity of the decree will affect them all, and involve the validity of the decree as to all, and in all respects. The interests in such case are such that they cannot be severed in any court where they are considered, and the decision here as to the rights of one will conclude the rights of all in like condition. Witz v. Osburn, 83 Va. 227, 2 S. E. 33. We must therefore overrule the motion stated above,—dismiss the appeal as to some of the appellees for want of jurisdiction.

There are two causes of error assigned by the appellant. The first is that the attachments sued out by the appellees were invalid because they are made returnable to rules, and, being attachments in equity, they are authorized to be made returnable to a term of the court, being issued in a pending suit. The second is that priority was given to the attachments because they were issued and levied before the foreign mortgage was recorded, according to the laws of this state.

Upon the first question,—as to the validity of the attachments when they are, as here, returned to rules instead of to a term of the court,—we will remark that the statute of this state requires (section 2965) that "if issued in a pending suit it shall be returnable to a term of the court in which the same is pending." The former law of this state added, after the foregoing, the words, "Or to some rule day thereof." There is, therefore, no longer any lawful authority to return such an attachment to rules. It is argued that this is a mistake—an accidental omission—on the part of the lawgivers, because it would render the law nugatory in many cases like this, where attachments were issued after suit was brought, because, a summons having been issued, served, and returned, the requirement in the law that the clerk should indorse on a subpoena an order, to the officer to whom it is addressed, to attach the property, would be an ineffectual direction when the attachment was subsequent, and could refer only to writs of attachment, and not to such as this. But (1) the act expressly declares that any attachment issued under that chapter (chapter 141, Code) shall be, if in a pending suit, returnable to a term of the court in which the same is pending; and (2) the supposed difficulty lying in the way of indorsing it on the subpoena in the case is answered by the provision of section 2904. The provision is: "Upon such affidavit the plaintiff may require the clerk to indorse on a summons an order to the officer to whom it is directed to attach," etc. Nor is there any difficulty in the way in the subsequent provision that "any attachment under this section shall be executed in the same manner and shall have the same effect as at law, but the proceedings therein shall be the same as in other suits in equity." The contention that this proceeding is required only as to, and refers only to, technical writs of attachments, such as are issued at law independent of the summons, and not to proceedings in equity, where it is insisted that the summons and order for attachment are inseparable, is set at rest by the law, in the plainest terms. Reliance is placed on the provision: "Any attachment under this section shall be executed in the same manner as at law and have the same effect as at law. But the proceedings therein shall be the same as in other suits in chancery;" and it is claimed that the manner of return is a part of the proceedings. If there can be said to be any proceedings in a suit until the original process is returned executed, it is obvious that the above general reference to the proceedings must refer only to such proceedings as are not specially provided for in the statute. We think the circuit court erred in upholding the return of the attachments as valid.

But the learned counsel for the appellees insist that although the attachment should be invalid, and the lien thereof ineffectual, nevertheless, the suit remains, and that they are entitled to relief under their bill, independent of the attachment law. We will briefly consider the question raised as to the ineffectual registry of the foreign mortgage. The appellant insists that the law of the place of the contract, where this is also the place in which the mortgaged property is situated at the time of the mortgage, governs as to the validity, construction, and effect of the mortgage, which will be enforced in another state as a matter of comity, although not executed or recorded according to the requirements of the law of the latter state. On the other hand, the appellees insist that the laws of other governments have no force beyond their territorial limits, and, if permitted to operate in other states, it is upon the principle of comity, and only where neither the state nor its citizens would suffer any inconvenience from the operation of the foreign law. It is said in 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 190: "The general rule is that a chattel mortgage which is valid under the laws of the state where it was executed, both as between the immediate parties thereto and as against third persons, will be so held by the courts of a sister state, to which the property may be removed. And if a mortgage is valid where it is made, and if it is executed and recorded according to the laws of the state or country of its execution, it will be enforced in the courts of another state or country as a matter of comity, although it is not executed according to the requirements of the law of the latter state; and this is because of the general principle that the law of the place of contract governs as to the nature, validity, construction, and effect of the contract,"—citing numerous authorities. In Jones on Chattel Mortgages (page 299, § 299) the same doctrine is laid down. "By the comity of nations, as a general rule, a contract valid where it is made is valid everywhere, and the law of the place of the contract controls as to the construction of it. Without this rule there could not safely be commercial or business intercourse between citizens of different nations. But the laws of a nation or a state have not, ex proprii vigori, any binding force beyond the limits of its territory. Any effect they have is ex comitate." It is further there said, (section 303:) A statute relating to the recording of mortgages has no application to a mortgage made outside the state, unless specially made so, though the property be afterwards brought within the state; and it does not matter that such mortgage was made by a citizen of the state while temporarily absent in another state with such property. If the mortgage be duly recorded in the state where it was executed, and the mortgagor afterwards takes the property with him into another state, no registration of the mortgage is necessary, unless made so by positive statute of that state. Beale v. Williamson, 14 Ala. 55; Offutt v. Flagg, 10 N. H. 46; Peterson v. Kaigler, (Ga.) 3 S. E. 655; Hubbard v. Andrews, 76 Ga. 177; Kanaga v. Taylor, 7 Ohio St. 134; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 200; Hornthall v. Burwell, (N. C.) 13 S. E. 721; Bank v. Lee, 13 Pet. 107. There are decisions to the contrary, to which we have been referred, and which we have considered, but the general rule is as we have stated in the foregoing authorities. We have no express statute in Virginia requiring foreign mortgages to be recorded, and the weight of authority is that in such case our recording acts do not apply to them. The circuit court of Franklin county decided otherwise on both these propositions, and we think the decision of that court was erroneous; and the decree appealed from must be reversed and annulled; and such decree rendered here as the said circuit court ought to have rendered.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1894.)

CONTINUANCE—WANT OF DILIGENCE—EMINENT DOMAIN—EVIDENCE.

1. Upon a motion for a continuance on the second trial of a case, it appeared that, on May 28th, process was issued for a witness distant over 100 miles, and was served on May 31st, to appear June 2d; that the witness was not present; that he had done certain work, the value of which was in dispute, but that none of the attorneys had conversed with him, or knew what his evidence would be; that six months had elapsed since the court on appeal ordered the case to be tried, almost all of which time was allowed to elapse without effort to ascertain what his testimony would be. Held no error to deny the motion.

2. Upon a question as to the value of the property taken in condemnation proceedings by a railroad company, and the privilege of using certain earth and stone work, it is not error to refuse to allow a witness to testify that he had donated similar property to the company.

3. It is not error to refuse to interrupt counsel in the midst of an argument to the jury, in order to give instructions upon a question under discussion.

4. A railroad company, without lawful proceedings, entered upon certain property, and constructed expensive earth and stone work. This company became insolvent, and its franchise and property were bought out by another company. Held, that the purchaser was liable to the landowner for the land taken, without considering the benefit arising by the construction of the road, and for the damage to the residue of the tract, which was its difference in market value before and after taking, and that the amount to be awarded for the land taken, including the earth and stone work, is the fair cash market value of the land and said improvement at the time of the taking, in view of the uses to which they had been put. Lacy, J., dissenting.

5. A verdict will not be disturbed where the evidence would have warranted a larger amount of damages than that given.

Appeal from circuit court, Mecklenburg county.

T. F. Humphreys owned a tract of land upon which a railroad company had illegally entered and constructed expensive earth and stone work. The company became insolvent, and its entire property was purchased by the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company, which was compelled, by a former order of this court, to condemn and pay for the right of way over the tract in question. Upon a trial of the issues as ordered by this court, Humphreys obtained a verdict for $7,079, with interest from January 1, 1882, and, from a decree approving said verdict, the company appealed. Affirmed.

B. B. Munford and Th. N. Williams, for appellant. Finch & Atkins and W. W. Henry, for appellee.

RICHARDSON, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Mecklenburg county, rendered on the 6th day of June, 1892, in a suit in equity therein then pending, wherein T. F. Humphreys was plaintiff, and the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company was defendant. This is the second time this case has been before this court, and for a full statement of the circumstances under which the controversy arose, and the merits of the controversy, reference is made to the opinion of this court when the case was formerly here. See Humphreys v. Railroad Co., 88 Va. 431, 13 S. E. 985. For the purposes of this opinion it is sufficient to say that the appellee, Humphreys, was a subscriber to the capital stock of the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company in the sum of $1,000, which had been reduced, by payments, to $700. Humphreys was at this time the owner, by purchase, of a tract of land on Roanoke river, near Clarksville, over which, prior to the purchase of Humphreys, the old Roanoke Valley Railroad Company had erected costly stone piers in the Roanoke river, a stone abutment at the bank of said river, and an extensive earthwork or embankment from said abutment to the high ground south thereof, as and for a part of its roadway. This work was constructed without authority of law, the Roanoke Valley Railroad Company never having in any way acquired the right of way over this tract of land, though it had acquired the right of way through and over most of the other lands along its proposed railway. Before completing its road, the Roanoke Valley Railroad Company became insolvent, and, by purchase, the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company became its successor, and the owner of all the rights of way which had been lawfully acquired by it, but did not thereby become the owner of the right of way, nor of the stone and earth work aforesaid, on and over the tract of land owned by the appellee, Humphreys, which, as before stated, had never been acquired by said Roanoke Valley Railroad Company. Humphreys having subscribed, as aforesaid, to the capital stock of the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company, when that company was about proceeding to construct its road, its agents were directed to solicit the donations of the right of way by the landowners, respectively, along the proposed road, to the company. The president of the company, J. B. McPhail, after frequent and urgent importunities, representations, and promises, finally induced the appellee, Humphreys, to execute the paper known in the original record as "Exhibit A," which upon its face was an unconditional obligation on his part to convey to the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company, when thereto requested by the president of said company, the right of way through and over his said tract of land, and said paper was delivered to said McPhail, but upon the agreement and understanding between him and Humphreys that said paper should not be delivered to said company except upon just compensation by it to Humphreys for the stone and earth work aforesaid, including the land proposed to be taken, and for damages to the residue of the tract of land, unless the withholding of the paper would endanger the construction of the road. McPhail, though he had undertaken and promised to do so, and had thereby induced Humphreys to execute said paper "A," never presented to the directory of his said company the claim of Humphreys to compensation, nor did he ever take any step to secure the same, but, on the contrary, long after the building and equipment of his company's road was fully assured, and when the company had ample means with which to make just compensation to Humphreys for his property, turned said paper "A" over to his said company, and thenceforth the company claimed that, by that paper, Humphreys had made an absolute and unconditional donation of the right of way over his said land, including the valuable stone and earth work aforesaid, and that he was bound to convey the same to the company, as provided on the face of said paper. This contention was denied by Humphreys, who insisted that said paper was executed by him, and delivered to McPhail as his agent, upon and subject to the conditions above named, neither of which conditions had been performed, and that, instead of delivering said paper to the company, he should, under the circumstances, have delivered the same up to Humphreys. In the mean time, and prior to the institution of this suit, the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company instituted an action at law in the circuit court of Mecklenburg county against said T. F. Humphreys, to recover from the latter the balance due on his said subscription of $1,000 to the capital stock of said company.

At the October term, 1885, of said court, with the leave of court, Humphreys filed his bill against the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company, setting forth substantially, but more in detail, the circumstances and facts above referred to, and praying for an injunction to restrain said railroad company from proceeding in said action at law until the further order of the court; that said paper "A," executed on the 3d of October, 1881, be declared null and void; that the damages to the plaintiff's land be set off against his said subscription, etc.,—and for general relief. A temporary injunction was accordingly awarded the plaintiff, Humphreys, but on condition of his confessing judgment in said action at law for the balance due on his said subscription, and judgment was accordingly confessed. The Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company answered the bill, admitting, in effect, that it had not in any way acquired the right of way over the plaintiff's land other than by said paper "A," and insisting that, by said paper, Humphreys made an unconditional donation of said right of way, including said stone and earth work, and that he was estopped thereby from raising any question as to the company's right to said property, and that it was entitled to have a conveyance of same from Humphreys, according to the terms of said paper. Being thus at issue, both parties took depositions, and the cause, having been matured, came on and was heard by said circuit court on the 15th day of April, 1889, when a decree was therein rendered, dissolving the injunction theretofore awarded in the cause, and dismissing the plaintiff's bill. From that decree, the plaintiff, Humphreys, obtained an appeal to this court. Upon the hearing of that appeal, this court held that said paper "A," executed and delivered by said Humphreys to said McPhail on the 3d of October, 1881, was so executed and delivered upon certain conditions, neither of which had been performed, and that the same was null and void; and this court, so holding, entered a decree here, reversing and annulling the decree of the circuit court of Mecklenburg county appealed from, to wit, the decree of April 15, 1889, and remanding the cause to the said circuit court, with instructions to restore the case to its place on the docket, to be proceeded in to a final decree, and with a further instruction that, when the case should be matured for hearing, the said circuit court should direct an issue quantum damnificatus, to be tried at the bar of said court on the law side thereof, to ascertain the damages aforesaid, and that when the same should be so ascertained, and duly certified to the chancery side of said circuit court, they should be set off against said judgment at law confessed by the applicant in favor of the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company, and that the excess, if any, over and above said judgment, be decreed against said railroad company in favor of the appellant, Humphreys. When the case went back to the circuit court, that court, at the January term thereof, 1892, made an order in the cause, directing the issue required by the decree of this court, and at the May term thereof, 1892, the case was tried, and the jury rendered the following verdict: "We, the jury, upon the issue joined, find in favor of the plaintiff, T. F. Humphreys, and ascertain his damages to be $7,079.00, with interest from January 1, 1882,"—and judgment was accordingly entered on the law side of said court; and the same being duly certified to the chancery side of said court, the following decree was entered in the cause: "And this court, approving said verdict, in accordance therewith, and with the decree of the supreme court of appeals pronounced on the 14th December, 1891, doth adjudge, order, and decree that the plaintiff do recover of the defendant the said sum of $7,079.00, with legal interest thereon from the 1st day of January, 1882, till paid, and the legal costs of this suit, including the cost of said issue, and the cost awarded by the supreme court of appeals, to be credited by the judgment confessed by the plaintiff in favor of the defendant on the 9th of October, 1885, for $695.00, with legal interest thereon from the 10th January, 1885, and $9.56, cost of said judgment. And the court doth further adjudge, order, and decree that whenever the defendant shall pay the above decree, interest, and cost, that then the plaintiff and his wife do execute and deliver to the defendant a proper deed, acknowledged and ready for record, conveying to the defendant the 3.83 acres of his land taken by it in its right of way through his land, with all the earthworks and masonry thereon or thereto belonging, and all claims for damages done to the residue of his tract by reason of the construction or completion of its line of road through it." From this decree the defendant obtained an appeal to this court.

The questions to be decided by this court are presented in the five several bills of exception taken by the defendant to certain rulings of the trial court.

1. The defendant's first bill of exceptions is to the action of the court in refusing its motion for a continuance of the cause on the ground that a witness for the defendant, one W. S. Gooch, a resident of Louisa county, Va., more than 100 miles distant from Boydton, Mecklenburg county, Va., the place of trial, and who, it appeared, had been duly served with process on the 31st day of May, which process was issued on the 28th of May, 1892, to appear on the 2d of June, 1892, the time fixed for the trial, was not present. This bill of exceptions sets forth that when the case was called for trial, on the 2d day of June, 1892, and before the jury had been sworn to try the issue, the following statement was made to the court by counsel for the defendant, to wit: "That the defendant was not prepared for trial, and asked for a continuance or postponement, for the reasons then stated by counsel as follows: That some time before the trial, to wit, about the middle of May, an arrangement was entered into between Thomas N. Williams, resident counsel for the defendant company, and Beverly B. Munford, of Richmond division, counsel of the defendant company, on the one hand, and Messrs. Finch & Atkins, attorneys for Thomas F. Humphreys, on the other, by which it was agreed that the trial of this case should be commenced on Wednesday, the 8th of June, 1892; that, relying upon this agreement, Beverly B. Munford, of counsel for the company, had made arrangements which were imperative, and which could not be changed,—one in Baltimore, for the 2d of June, and one at another point on the 3d of June,—and could not, therefore, be present." The court so certifies, and it is doubtless true, that these statements were made by the counsel for the defendant who was present at the time; but it is also true that no exception was taken to any action of the court refusing to continue the case on the ground of absence of counsel. Such statements of counsel are therefore out of the case, and the only question properly raised by this, the defendant's first bill of exceptions, is as to the refusal of the court to continue the case on account of the absence of the witness Gooch. It is true that the court certifies that counsel for the defendant stated to the court that said Gooch was the contractor who did the work for the defendant company over the lands, abutments, etc., in controversy, and was a witness material for the company's defense, and that it could not go to trial in his absence; but it is equally true, as certified by the court, that neither of the counsel for the defendant company had ever talked with said Gooch about the matter in controversy in this case. And it is further certified in this bill of exceptions that on the 28th of May, it appearing to the court that the arrangement fixing the 8th of June as the time for the trial of the case was made, as was stated by counsel for plaintiff, and not denied by counsel for defendant, subject the approval of the court, and the court, being satisfied that the business of the court would be completed several days before the 8th day of June, stated to counsel that, when the cases on the docket had all been disposed of, it would adjourn, and would not be willing to wait several days longer to try this case; that thereupon counsel for the plaintiff stated that they were very desirous of trying the case at that term of the court, and that, if there was any doubt as to the court's remaining in session until after the 8th of June, they desired to fix some earlier day for the trial of the case; that thereupon, it being conceded that all the cases upon the issue docket would be disposed of by Wednesday, the 1st day of June, the court fixed upon Thursday, the 2d day of June, for the trial of the case, and informed counsel that on that day the case would be called, and either tried or continued, if proper grounds were shown for a continuance; and that, on the 2d day of June, Mr. Munford being still absent when the case was called, the court refused the motion of counsel for defendant to further postpone or to continue the case, or to delay the trial until the 8th day of June, on account of the absence of the witness W. S. Gooch. The question is, did the defendant company bring itself within the rule applicable to continuances of causes? We think it clearly did not. About six months had elapsed since the order was made, directing the issue in this case, all of which period, except a very few days just preceding the trial, was permitted to pass without any effort to ascertain, either by talking to the witness or by corresponding with him, what would be the character of his testimony, or whether it would be material or not; and notwithstanding the agreement between counsel, made about the middle of May, subject to the approval of the court, that the case should be tried on the 8th day of June, the summons for this witness was not issued until the 28th day of May,—the day on which the court fixed upon the 2d day of June for the trial of the case, and only three or four days prior to the trial. This, so far from evincing that degree of diligence required by the rule, shows gross negligence and indifference on the part of the defendant. Moreover, the witness residing more than 100 miles distant from the place of trial, the defendant could, under the statute, (section 3365, Code 1887,) have taken his deposition. The cases of Railroad Co. v. Peake, 87 Va. 130, 12 S. E. 348, and Myers v. Trice, 86 Va. 835, 11 S. E. 428, relied on by counsel for the appellant, were decided upon grounds entirely different from those insisted upon in the present case, and have no application to this case. It is perfectly clear that the trial court did not err in overruling the defendant's motion for a continuance.

2. The defendant's second bill of exceptions sets forth that, after all the plaintiff's evidence had been introduced, the defendant company, to sustain the issue on its part, introduced one J. J. Love, and, through its counsel, stated to the court that it desired to prove by said witness that he (said Love) was the owner of a property on the opposite side of the river from the property owned by the plaintiff, on which had been erected an embankment, piers, and an abutment similar to those on the plaintiff's land, and that he (Love) had given the right of way, including said piers, abutment, and embankment, to said railroad company, in order that the jury, from these circumstances, might form some estimate of the value of the plaintiff's property at the time of the construction of said railroad; but the court refused to allow the witness to be introduced for such purpose, or to allow counsel for defendant to ask any such questions. It goes without saying that the court did not err in this ruling, and it would be a useless waste of time to further consider the question.

3. The defendant's third bill of exceptions sets forth that, upon the trial of the cause, counsel for the plaintiff, in his closing speech, stated to the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of said piers, abutments, and embankments for railroad purposes, and that counsel for the defendant then asked the court to inform the jury that such statement did not embody the law, and that the plaintiff could only recover the market value of the property as of the time it was taken, which the court refused to do, stating that it would not at that time, and in the midst of the argument, give any instruction. It is clear that the court did not err in this respect. The request of counsel that the court should arrest, and thereby disarrange, the argument of counsel, in order to then instruct the jury upon the law of the case, was premature, and opposed to the well-settled rules of practice. Moreover, the instruction asked for did not correctly propound the law of the case.

4. The defendant's fourth bill of exceptions is as to the refusal of the court to give to the jury two instructions asked for by counsel for defendant, and in giving, in lieu thereof, three instructions of its own. In this exception the court certifies all the evidence in the cause. By the first instruction asked for by counsel for the defendant, the court was asked, in effect, to say to the jury that in ascertaining the damages to the plaintiff's land taken, and the damages to the residue of the tract, they should award an amount equal to the difference between the market value of the property at the time it was taken and the market value after the same had been taken. The second instruction asked for by counsel for the defendant company lays down an entirely different rule for ascertaining the value of the property taken, namely, the fair cash value of the land, right of way, embankment, abutments, and piers so taken, at the time of taking the same, and concludes by asking the court to say to the jury that in ascertaining the plaintiff's damages they should not consider the value of the property to the defendant company for railroad purposes. The two instructions thus asked for by the counsel for the defendant were properly refused by the court—First, because they are inconsistent with each other, and calculated to mislead and confuse the jury, and to leave them to grope their way in darkness and ignorance as to which of the two conflicting instructions should be their guide in arriving at their verdict; and, second, because neither of said instructions correctly propound the law applicable to the case. On the other hand, the instructions given by the court of its own motion, in lieu of the instructions asked for by counsel for the defendant, do correctly state the law of the case. (1) The first of these instructions follow the statute, (section 1078, Code 1887,) and says to the jury that they shall ascertain and determine from the evidence what would be a just compensation to the plaintiff for the land taken by the defendant, the Richmond & Mecklenburg Railroad Company, and for damages to the residue of the tract beyond the peculiar benefits derived by him, in respect to such residue, by the completion of said railroad. (2) The second of said instruction says to the jury that in ascertaining the damages to the residue of said tract they shall award the plaintiff, Humphreys, an amount equal to the difference in the market value of the residue at the time of the taking and its market value after the same had been so taken; and in ascertaining said damages they may consider every circumstance, present or future, which affected its then value. (3) "The court further instructs the jury that the amount to be awarded Thomas F. Humphreys for his land taken, including the embankment, abutment, and piers upon said land, or belonging thereto, is the fair cash market value of the said land, embankment, abutment, and piers so taken at the time of the taking, and said damages are to be assessed in view of the uses to which the said land, embankment, abutment, and piers have been put, and not necessarily in view of the use or productive value to the owner before the taking."

These instructions, and especially the third and last one given by the court in lieu of those asked for on behalf of the defendant, are so logically adapted to the principles applicable to the peculiar circumstances of the case in hand that no argument is needed to enforce them. The question presented has been clearly and definitely settled by the highest court in the land, and the doctrine there held has been recognized and enforced by many other courts of very high authority. In Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, the supreme court of the United States has so clearly stated the doctrine as to leave no room for doubt. In that case the defendant in error, Patterson, was the owner in fee of an entire island, and parts of two other islands, in the Mississippi river, above the falls of St. Anthony, in the county of Anoka, in Minnesota, which, it seems, were unproductive and valueless to him, or to any one else, for any other than boom purposes. The land on these islands owned by the said Patterson the boom company sought to condemn for its uses, and, upon its application, commissioners were appointed by the district court to appraise its value, and they awarded to the owner the sum of $3,000. From this award, both the company and the owner appealed. When the case was brought before the district court, the owner, Patterson, who was a citizen of the state of Illinois, applied for and obtained its removal to the circuit court of the United States, where it was tried. The jury found a general verdict assessing the value of the land at $9,358.33, but accompanied it with a special verdict assessing its value, aside from any consideration of its value for boom purposes, at $300, and, in view of its adaptability for such purposes, a further and additional value of $9,058.33; whereupon the company moved for a new trial, and the court granted the motion, unless the owner would elect to reduce the verdict to $5,500. The owner so elected, and thereupon judgment was entered in his favor for the reduced amount. To review this judgment, the company took the case to the supreme court of the United States on a writ of error, and that court affirmed the judgment of the circuit court. The only question applicable to the case here in hand, which was decided by the supreme court, was as to the amount of the compensation the owner of the land was entitled to receive, and the principle upon which the compensation was to be estimated. In delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Field said: "In determining the value of land appropriated for public purposes, the same considerations are to be regarded as in a sale of property between private parties. The inquiry in such cases must be, what is the property worth in the market, viewed, not merely with reference to the uses to which it is at the time applied, but with reference to the uses to which it is plainly adapted; that is to say, what is it worth from its availability for valuable uses? Property is not to be deemed worthless because the owner allows it to go to waste, or to be regarded as valueless because he is unable to put it to any use. Others may be able to use it, and make it subserve the necessities or conveniences of life. Its capability of being made thus available gives it a market value, which can be readily estimated. So many and varied are the circumstances to be taken into account in determining the value of property condemned for public purposes, that it is perhaps impossible to formulate a rule to govern its appraisalment in all cases. Exceptional circumstances will modify the most carefully guarded rule; but, as a general thing, we should say that the compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses to which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future. The position of the three islands in the Mississippi, fitting them to form, in connection with the west bank of the river, a boom of immense dimensions, capable of holding in safety over 20,000,000 feet of logs, added largely to the value of the lands. The boom company would greatly prefer them to more valuable agricultural lands, or to lands situated elsewhere on the river, as, by utilizing them in the manner proposed, they would save heavy expenditure of money in constructing a boom of equal capacity. Their adaptability for boom purposes was a circumstance, therefore, which the owner had a right to insist upon as an element in estimating the value of his lands."

The principle thus applied is, beyond all question, a just one, and Mr. Justice Field's argument in support of its application is unanswerable. The same principle applies with even greater force to the case here under consideration, for in that case the property condemned was taken as it came from the hand of nature, while here the valuable earthwork and masonry on the land taken by the appellant company had been erected for railroad purposes, and was adapted to such purposes. Here, another railroad company had erected, without lawful authority, the earthwork and masonry in question for railroad purposes, and the appellee, becoming subsequently the owner of the land, including said earthwork and masonry, was, as respects the latter, as much entitled to the fair market value of same, viewed with reference to the purposes for which they were taken and the uses to which they have been applied, as if he had erected them at the special instance and request of the appellant company, and upon its promise, either express or implied, to make just compensation therefor. The appellant company needed the appellee's property for railroad purposes, and, without lawful authority, took and appropriated it to railroad purposes, and for over 11 years has applied it to railroad purposes. It is with poor grace that the company comes now, after all the wrong and injury inflicted by it upon the appellee, and when common justice and the law call upon it to make restitution, asserting the monstrous claim that the appellee's damages must be estimated with reference to the productive value of the property before it was so taken. We repeat that the instructions given by the court in lieu of those asked for on behalf of the defendant (the appellant here) are eminently correct, and that the trial court did not err, either in refusing said instructions asked for by the defendant, or in giving the instructions which it did give.

5. The defendant's fifth and last bill of exceptions is to the action of the court in overruling its motion to set aside the verdict of the jury, and grant it a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was against the law and the evidence. It is only necessary to say that the facts proved fully warrant the verdict. Indeed, in view of the evidence, the jury might well have found a verdict for a much larger amount. This court could not, therefore, without improperly invading the rightful province of the jury, undertake to disturb the verdict. Moreover, the trial judge, both in the conduct of the case and in expounding the law applicable thereto, appears to have presided with conspicuous ability and fairness. There is nothing, therefore, of which the appellant company can justly complain. For these reasons we are of opinion that the decree appealed from is without error, and that the same must be affirmed. Decree affirmed.

LACY, J., (dissenting.) I do not concur in the opinion of the court, and file my own dissenting views. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Mecklenburg county, rendered on the 6th day of June, 1892. This is a case arising out of proceedings under the decree rendered in this court on the 14th day of December, 1891, in the case of Humphreys v. Railroad Co., which case, at its first hearing in this court, is reported in 88 Va. 431, 13 S. E. 985, which is referred to for the proceedings then had and the conclusions reached. By said decree of this court it was directed that an inquiry of damages should be made and tried at the bar of the circuit court by a jury, to ascertain the damages done to the appellant, Humphreys, by the said railroad company, by entering upon and using his land, earthwork, or embankment, and masonry on his land, or belonging thereto, at the time they were so taken possession of, and the damages to the residue of the appellant's said tract of land resulting from any work of the railroad company on said embankment after the railroad took possession thereof, the same, when ascertained, to be set off against the judgment confessed by said Humphreys in favor of the said railroad company, which judgment was for the amount of his subscription to said company still unpaid. When the case went back, a jury was impaneled, and the amount of damages found by their verdict was $7,079, with interest from January, 1882. The defendant moved the court to set aside the said verdict, which motion was overruled, and judgment was rendered on the verdict, and the defendant appealed.

The errors assigned here are: First, the refusal of the circuit court to continue the case on account of the absence of a material witness; second, the refusal of the circuit court to continue the case because of the absence of the leading counsel for the defendant; third, the exclusion of the evidence of the witness Love, by whom it was desired to show the cost, if any, to the company, of the right of way through the land of the witness, which was on the opposite side of the river, and exactly like the land of Humphreys, containing pillars in the river, and an embankment and old railway bed across the low grounds on the river; fourth, because of misdirection by the court as to the law of the case and the proper method of ascertaining and estimating the amount of damages; fifth, the refusal of the circuit court to set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial to the defendant company.

We will pass by, for the present, the first and second assignments of error, as to the action of the court in refusing a continuance to the defendant upon the ground of the absence of a material witness, and the absence of the leading counsel for the defendant, as they will appear to be immaterial, in view of my conclusions herein.

I think there was no error in the third assignment, as the fact that the witness Love had given away for nothing his property, although exactly like the property of Humphreys, could not in any way affect the amount of damages proper when the land had not been given.

The fourth assignment of error is because of the action of the court in giving the following instruction to the jury: "They are further instructed that, in ascertaining the damages to the residue of the tract, they shall award said Humphreys an amount equal to the difference between the market value of the residue of the said tract at the time of its taking and its market value after the same had been so taken; and in ascertaining said damages they may consider every circumstance, present or future, which affected its then value. The court further instructs the jury that the amount to be awarded the said Humphreys for his land taken, including the embankments, abutments, and piers upon said land, or belonging thereto, is the fair cash market value of the said land, embankment, abutment, and piers to be taken, at the time of the taking, and said damages are to be assessed in view of the uses to which said land, embankment, abutment, and piers have been put, and not necessarily in view of the use or productive value to the owner before the taking,"—having, also, on the motion of the plaintiff, instructed the jury that they should determine from the evidence what would be a just compensation to the plaintiff for the land taken by the defendant, and for damages to the residue of the tract beyond the peculiar benefit derived by the plaintiff in respect to such residue by the completion of said railroad; and in refusing certain other instructions asked for by the defendant railroad company, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that they shall ascertain and determine from the evidence what would be a just compensation to the plaintiff for the land taken by the defendant, and for the damages to the residue of the tract, beyond the peculiar benefits to be derived in respect to such residue. They are further instructed that in ascertaining the damages for the land actually taken, and to the balance of said tract, they shall award said plaintiff an amount equal to the difference between the market value of his property at the time of the taking and its market value after the same had been taken. The court further instructs the jury that the amount to be awarded said plaintiff for the right of way through his land, including the embankment, abutment, and piers on said right of way, is the fair cash market value of the land, right of way, embankment, abutment, and piers so taken, at the time of the taking, and not what the same may be worth to the railroad company for railway purposes."

The dispute as to these instructions arises upon the words italicized above, as follows: The plaintiff claimed, and the court so instructed, "that the said damages are to be assessed in view of the uses to which said land, embankment, abutments, and piers have been put," whereas the defendant claimed, and the court rejected its instruction so directing, that the amount of the damages is "the fair cash market value of the land, right of way, embankment, abutments, and piers so taken, at the time of the taking, and not what the same may be worth to the railway company for railway purposes." In determining the true measure of damages in a case like this, I will remark that the statute prescribes (sections 1077, 1078, Code,) when the condemnation is by commissioners under chapter 46, that the commissioners, after viewing the land, and having such proper evidence as either party may offer, shall ascertain what will be a just compensation for the said land, and for the damages to the residue of the tract beyond the peculiar benefits to be derived, in respect to such residue, from the work to be constructed. In this case, as is fully explained and set forth in the opinion of this court by RICHARDSON, J., on the former appeal to this court, in Humphreys v. Railroad Co., 88 Va. 431, 13 S. E. 985, before cited, the defendant company entered upon this land by virtue of a right of way in writing from Humphreys, which was set aside and annulled for reasons there stated, no condemnation proceedings being had or deemed necessary, and, as has been already shown from the decree of this court, the case was remanded for such inquiry of damages to be made by a jury, and the measure of damages stated in the instructions by the court in accordance with the statute, (section 1078, Code,) thus: "What would be a just compensation to the plaintiff for the land taken by the defendant, and for damages to the residue of the tract beyond the peculiar benefit derived by him in respect to such residue by the completion of said railroad,"—and this principle is substantially restated in different language in the second instruction. In the third instruction the provision objected to is inserted as is already set forth, thus: "And said damages are to be assessed in view of the uses to which the said land, embankment, abutment, and piers have been put, and not necessarily in view of the use or productive value to the owner before the taking." The added words, "And said damages are to be assessed in view of the uses to which the said land, embankment, abutment, and piers have been put," indicate that the character of the proceeding have been obscured or lost sight of. Our law proceeds upon the idea of a just compensation for what private property is taken for public uses, and provides for compensation to the landowner for injury to the residue of the tract by reason of the taking of a part of the land. These damages are for compensation for an injury resulting from a lawful act. Our constitution prohibits the taking of private property for public purposes without just compensation. The compensation is allowed for the actual taking, and, so far as the actual taking is the cause of a resulting deprivation of right, it is a taking in the constitutional sense, and the law requires that it likewise shall be compensated by a just compensation. If the whole, and not the part, only, be taken, just compensation for what was actually taken would be the complete measure of relief. There would be no damages beyond that to be assessed. There would be no damages to be paid in excess of just compensation for the whole, and it would not be contended that the measure of compensation could be otherwise than the full value of the property taken; for it must be borne in mind that the transaction is a lawful one, and bears in it no element of a tort.

Regarding the transaction, then, and all the proceedings thereunder, from the standpoint of compensation, where can we find any place for damages to the plaintiff for the use to which the defendant is to put the property taken, unless we are to compensate the landowner for what is not his? What are his proprietary rights in the railroad of the defendant? Does it affect his rights that this railroad, when completed, is worth $15,000 per mile, or that it is a public incorporated turnpike with but little, or a county road with no, marketable value, provided it has been lawfully taken for public purposes under the right of eminent domain? If he has received just compensation for what has been taken directly and what has been taken incidentally, all that has been taken from him having been paid for, can he go further, and lay a valid claim to the subsequent use to which it has been put? What is the proper amount of compensation we are not now considering in this case. The question is, what is the true measure of damages by way of compensation? This is a matter of law, to be decided by the court; and, when this has been correctly decided by the court, the jury must follow the direction of the court, or their verdict cannot stand. What is just compensation for what is taken is one question here. In considering the phrase, "just compensation," a learned author says, (Sedg. Dam. 606:) "The general principle running through the cases seems to be that a just compensation to the owner for taking his property for public use without his consent means the actual value of the property in money, without any deduction for estimated profit or advantages accruing to the owner from the public use of his property. Speculative advantages or disadvantages, independent of the intrinsic value of the property, are a matter of set-off against each other, and do not affect the dry claim for the intrinsic value of the property taken." Our statutes, as we have seen, however, after providing that one of these shall be set off against the other, directs that the excess of the first (that is, of the injury to the residue, if any) above the second (that is, the peculiar benefits to be derived in respect to such residue from the work to be constructed) shall affect the dry claim for the intrinsic value of the property taken; but there is no provision for an allowance for the value of the property taken in the hands of its new owner. If it is more valuable then, or less so, the question of just compensation for what is taken is not thereby affected. The true interpretation of our statute is the question to be determined in this case. "Just compensation for what is taken is the value of the land taken for the uses to which it is suitable, having regard to the existing business wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably effected in the immediate future. The inquiry in such cases must be, what is the property worth in the market, viewed, not merely with reference to the uses to which it is at the time applied, but with reference to the uses for which it is plainly adapted; that is to say, what is it worth from its availability for valuable uses?" Opinion of Mr. Justice Field in Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 410. While disclaiming to lay down a rule to govern in all cases, this we consider the true rule, and the result of the cases which I have considered. It is right that the value of the earth-work, abutment, and piers for valuable uses should be considered as constituting an element of the value of the land; but the use to which it has been put is subsequent, and independent of an ended transaction, and could not have been considered by any assessors of its value when taken, and the instructions complained of are to this extent erroneous; and, as it is impossible to determine to what extent this error may have governed the case in its results, it is error for which I think the judgment must be reversed.

NORFOLK & W. R. CO. v. MCGAVOCK'S ADM'RS.¹

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 1, 1894.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—INJURY TO STOCK—FAILURE TO FENCE.

1. Under Code 1887, § 1258, requiring a railroad company to fence its right of way along inclosed lands, and section 1261, providing that, in any action against a railroad company for stock killed on its track at a place which was not fenced as required, it should not be necessary to prove negligence on the part of the company, a railroad company cannot show that there was a legal fence at the point in question erected by the landowner, and that, therefore, it was under no obligation to erect a fence there. Lacy, J., dissenting.

2. The erection of a legal fence by a landowner at a point where the railroad company is required by law to fence will not relieve the company from the penalty prescribed by statute for failure to perform said duty.

Error to circuit court, Wythe county.

This was an action by McGavock's administrators against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company for damages to stock. A verdict was rendered against the company, and from a judgment approving the same the railroad company brings error. Affirmed.

Bolling & Stanley, for plaintiff in error. Blair & Blair, for defendant in error.

FAUNTLEROY, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Wythe county rendered at the February, 1893, term of the said court, in a suit at law by J. R. McGavock and J. C. McGavock, administrators of Randall McGavock, deceased, plaintiffs, against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, defendant. The suit is an action of trespass on the case for killing and injuring the horses and mule of the plaintiffs' intestate by the defendant in error's cars operated upon the road, and by the agents and servants of the said company, at a point where the defendant's railway passes through the inclosed lands of the plaintiffs' intestate, and where the defendant was required to fence or inclose its roadbed by section 1258 of the Code, and which it had not done. The facts of the killing and injuring of the horses and mule, as charged in the declaration, upon the inclosed land of the plaintiffs' intestate, and the failure of the defendant to fence its roadway through the said lands, and the assessed value of the said horses and mule so killed by the defendant's cars, agents, and servants, were all proved by the evidence; and the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs for $664.67, whereupon the defendant moved the court to set the verdict aside, as being contrary to the law and the evidence, and to grant it a new trial, and moved in arrest of judgment, which motions the court overruled, and entered judgment upon the verdict for $664.67, with interest from the date of the verdict, and the costs.

The statute (section 1258, Code 1887) requires the defendant company to erect along its line of railroad, through the inclosed land of the plaintiffs' intestate, a lawful fence, on both sides of its roadway, as defined in section 2038, which may be made of timber or wire, or of both, and to keep the same in proper repair, and with which the owners of adjoining lands may connect their fences, as they may deem proper, etc.; and section 1261 provides that, in any action or suit against a railroad company for an injury to any property on any part of its track not inclosed according to the provisions of this chapter, it shall not be necessary for the claimant to show that the injury was caused by the negligence of the company, its employes, agents, or servants.

The first assignment of error is the refusal of the court to permit the defendant company to introduce witnesses to show that the defendant railroad company was not bound to fence its roadway at the point where the said horses and mule of the plaintiffs' intestate were killed by it, because the said intestate himself had erected a fence, which was a lawful fence, at that point, between his land and the roadway of the defendant company passing through his inclosed land, and that, therefore, the defendant company was not liable for injury done by it to the plaintiffs' intestate's stock at that point. The court did not err in excluding this testimony. The failure of the company to erect a lawful fence along the line of its roadway between the inclosed land of the plaintiffs' intestate and its roadway, as expressly required by law, makes it amenable to the penalty of the law for its neglect or violation of the requirement of the law; and the fact that the owner of the land has himself endeavored to protect his stock ranging upon his inclosed land, by building a fence, does not condone or excuse the disobedience to and neglect of the mandate of the law by the railroad (defendant) company; and the owner of stock getting injured by the railroad cars or servants at a point on its line through his inclosed lands is entitled to recover for the injury or killing of his stock, if the defendant company has failed or refused to comply with the law requiring it to erect and keep in order at that point a lawful fence. See Code 1887, c. 52, §§ 1258, 1259, 1261, 1262; Id. c. 93, § 2038; 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 907, 927, and cases cited in note 2; Id. p. 934, and note 2.

The court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury "that although they shall believe from the evidence that the horses and stock of the plaintiffs' intestate were killed and injured on the railroad of the defendant company by the cars of the defendant company in charge of the servants, agents, and employes of the defendant company, as charged in the declaration, nevertheless, if they shall believe from the evidence that there was a lawful fence along the roadbed of the defendant company, between its land and that of the said decedent, at the place where the said injury occurred,—erected there by the said decedent or by his administrators,—then the court instructs the jury that under the statute such a fence is sufficient, and, in the absence of gross negligence, they will find for the defendant." And the court did not err in instructing the jury "that if they shall believe from the evidence that the horses and stock of the plaintiffs' intestate were killed and injured on the railroad of the defendant company by the cars of the defendant company in charge of the servants, agents, and employes of the defendant company, as charged in the declaration, and shall further believe from the evidence that the said horses and stock were so killed and injured by the defendant company at a point on said railroad at which the said railroad passes through the lands of the said decedent, Randall McGavock, and shall further believe from the evidence that the defendant company failed to fence its right of way or roadbed through the inclosed lands of the said decedent at the place of said injury, then the court instructs the jury that they shall find for the plaintiffs, and assess their damages at such sum as to the jury shall seem right, based on the evidence as to the value of said stock at the time the same was killed and injured."

The court did not err in overruling the motions to set the verdict aside, and in arrest of judgment; and the judgment of the circuit court of Wythe county is without error, and is therefore affirmed. Affirmed.

LACY, J. I do not concur in the opinion of the court, and file my own views:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Wythe county rendered at its February term, 1893. The case is as follows: The plaintiff in error company ran over, and killed and crippled, stock of the defendants in error, to the value of $664.67, whereupon the defendants in error instituted this action; and, upon and under the instructions of the court, the jury rendered a verdict for that amount in favor of the plaintiff, whereupon the case is brought to this court by writ of error.

It was proved in the case that the land adjacent to the railroad, where the horses were kept, was inclosed by a lawful fence put up by McGavock, deceased, and that the fence was pulled down in the night, and the horses escaped on the track on a dark night, and were killed or seriously damaged, and that the horses were worth as much as the amount of the verdict. This evidence was all that was offered by the plaintiff. The defendant offered to prove by its witnesses that there was a lawful fence along the right of way of the company at the place where the horses escaped on the track, though not put there by the company; that the bars in this fence were up late on the evening of the day when the horses were killed at night; and that the bars were pulled down by some unknown person in the night. But the court refused to admit this evidence, holding that by the act of assembly the negligence was established by reason of the fact that the fence was not built by the company, and so instructed the jury; that the failure to fence the right of way of the company established negligence; and that this could not be contradicted or disproved by the company by any evidence whatever,—and refused an instruction per contra offered by the defendant company.

Section 1261 of the Code provides as follows: "In any action or suit against a railroad company for an injury to any property on any part of its track not inclosed according to the provisions of this chapter, it shall not be necessary for the claimant to show that the injury was caused by the negligence of the company, its employees, agents, or servants." The effect of this statute is to shift the burden of proving negligence from the plaintiff, and place upon the company the burden of proving the negative of this proposition; but it is not intended to deny all defense to the defendant, and confine the case to a simple inquiry of damages, as is held in this case. The law does not require all parts of the railroad right of way to be fenced by the company,—only certain parts, described in chapter 52 of the said Code, (section 1259.) In this particular case there was a lawful fence erected at this spot, but the company was not allowed to prove it. The statute requires the company to cause a fence to be erected along its right of way, and one was already there in this case. I think (without expressing an opinion on any other question) that the circuit court erred in its construction of this statute, in denying all right of defense to the company; and for this cause the judgment should be reversed, and the case be remanded for a new trial to be had therein.

HARDIN v. ALEXANDRIA INS. CO.¹

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1894.)

INSURANCE—SUBSTITUTION OF NEW POLICY—LIABILITY OF COMPANY—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

1. An insurance company issued a policy upon which, at various times, a number of indorsements were made, and, when the insured applied to the agent for permission to move his property, he was told as there were so many indorsements that it would be better to cancel the policy, and take out a new one for return premium at pro rata rates. The company, however, issued a new policy at short rates, which was not delivered to the insured, who was absent, but it was left for him at his place of business. The insured property was burned after the new policy expired, but before the end of the period covered by the former policy. Held, that the insured could compel the company to issue a new policy for the full term, and pay the loss.

2. Where an insurance company furnishes a man with all needful blanks and papers, responds to his acts, approves permits of removal given by him, and pays his rent, it is bound by his acts as its agent.

Appeal from circuit court, Wise county.

Suit by J. M. Hardin against the Alexandria Insurance Company to compel it to issue a policy to him, and pay a loss sustained thereunder. From a decree for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Bullitt & McDowell, for appellant. Geo. A. Mushback and Burns & Fulton, for appellee.

FAUNTLEROY, J. The petition of J. M. Hardin represents that he instituted a suit in chancery in the circuit court of Wise county against the Alexandria Insurance Company to compel the said defendant company to issue to him, the said J. M. Hardin, a policy of insurance on a certain stock of merchandise, pursuant to a contract theretofore made by the said defendant company with him, the said Hardin, and to recover of the said defendant company the sum of $750, with interest from October 26, 1891. The cause was heard in the court aforesaid at the December term, 1892, and the decree complained of was entered, dismissing the complainant's bill, with costs against him.

The facts which appear by the record are as follows: In November, 1890, one G. W. Lovell, whose occupation was general insurance business at Big Stone Gap, Wise county, Va., went to see W. S. Reese, who told him that he wished an insurance upon his stock of liquors and bar fixtures, and asked the rate, and was told by Lovell that the rate was 3 per centum, whereupon Reese instructed Lovell to write a policy for $1,000. Lovell went to his office, where he had the blank forms and instructions of the Alexandria Insurance Company, and filled in a policy, as instructed, for $750 insurance upon the stock of liquors, and for $250 insurance upon the bar fixtures, furniture, etc., and mailed it to the "Alexandria Ins. Co., Alexandria, Va." Lovell, in a few days, received from that company a policy covering the property with insurance of $750 on the stock of liquors, and $250 on the bar fixtures, furniture, etc., in the two-story frame building, metal roof, on Wyandotte avenue, Big Stone Gap, Va., for one year from 12 m., November 25, 1890, to 12 m., November 25, 1891. This policy he delivered to the insured, W. S. Reese, and received from him the premium of $30 for the Alexandria Insurance Company. On the 2d day of December, 1890, Lovell indorsed on this policy a permit for Reese, the insured, to remove the stock of liquors to a storage house in rear of the original place, and mailed the said policy, thus indorsed, to the company for its approval. The company did approve the permit so indorsed by Lovell upon the said policy, and returned it, with its approval, to Lovell, who delivered it to Reese. On the 7th of May, 1891, Reese assigned this policy to J. M. Hardin, the appellant, by a writing witnessed by Lovell, who sent the said policy, so indorsed, with the said assignment, to the Alexandria Insurance Company, who approved it, and returned it to Lovell, who delivered it to said Hardin. Thus, in May, 1891, the original policy became the property of Hardin, the appellant, with the sanction of the company to the assignment, and to the removal of the stock insured from the two-story frame house to the storage house in its rear. On or about the 27th of July, 1891, Hardin removed the stock of liquors insured from the storage house to the Intermont Hotel, and, through Lovell, obtained from the Alexandria Insurance Company its approval and permit to Hardin of this second removal. About the 31st of August, 1891, Hardin informed Lovell that he had removed the stock of liquors to the Summerfield House or Building, and asked Lovell to give him a permit or approval of the said transfer. Lovell told Hardin that, as there were so many indorsements on the policy, it would be better to cancel it, and take out a new policy for the return premium. Hardin was in a great hurry, and told Lovell to do that. Lovell called Hardin back, and told him to wait until he could fill in the receipt for the return premium, when Hardin said to Lovell: "Show me where to sign. You can fill in the amount." This Lovell did, and filled in five dollars, according to the short-rate table, though he wrote, at the foot of the said receipt for the return premium: "Canceled pro rata, and new policy to be issued." Lovell then sent this original policy, so indorsed, to the Alexandria Insurance Company, who kept or suppressed it, and, instead of issuing a duplicate of the original policy, as Hardin expected, issued a new and different policy, according to the short-rate table, (while the original policy was according to the pro rata,) for $1,000 on stock, which device and arrangement shortened the life of the policy to the 9th of October, 1891, instead of the 25th of November, 1891, and made it expire on the 9th of October, 1891. This new policy was sent by the Alexandria Insurance Company to Lovell, but it never came to the hands, nor to the sight, of Hardin. Hardin was absent in Norfolk when it came to Lovell, and Lovell left it, he says, at the Summerfield House, which was not Hardin's place of abode, and in which he had no concern except the liquor store there.

Hardin contends and deposes that he had only $882 in stock, and had not asked for insurance of $1,000, nor for over $750. On the 26th day of October, 1891, the Summerfield House was burned down, and in it the stock of liquors was destroyed, of the value of $882. The Alexandria Insurance Company, on demand, refused to pay the insurance, and denied all liability, on the ground that the new policy expired on the 9th of October, 1891, and that no policy existed on the 26th of October, 1891.

Had the new policy issued by the insurance company, but never delivered to Hardin, been a duplicate of the original, as Hardin claimed and expected, and at pro rata rates, as the original was, it would not have expired until after the 26th of October, 1891, the date of the fire, and it would have covered the loss. It was wholly different from the policy which Lovell suggested to Hardin to obtain because of the numerous indorsements on the original,—the only reason assigned by Lovell, and urged upon Hardin, for canceling the original policy and taking out a new one. This advice and this reason were the only cause of Hardin's agreeing to Lovell's suggestion, and he reasonably understood and relied upon Lovell's statement that the new policy was to be the same as the one surrendered for convenience, only, because the original was covered all over with indorsements. The question now is, who is responsible for this change of policies? a change certainly not intended or expected by Hardin. The responsibility lies between the Alexandria Insurance Company and Lovell, on whom Hardin relied as the authorized agent or representative of the company. Either Lovell misinformed the company as to the terms of the new policy asked for by Hardin, and did not apprise the company of the reason why Hardin asked for a new policy, and that, too, on Lovell's suggestion, and the reason for the suggestion, or else the company deliberately ignored the understanding between Lovell and Hardin, and arbitrarily issued the new policy to suit itself, at short-table rates instead of according to the memorandum indorsed upon the original policy by Lovell: "Canceled pro rata, and new policy to issue." The new policy, as written, was never contemplated nor asked for by Hardin. It was the device of the company or of Lovell. If it was the work of the company, it is responsible for destroying Hardin's security for $750 insurance upon the stock insured. If it was Lovell's act, and he misled the company, whose medium he was, it is liable and responsible for his acts in the conduct of its business.

Both Lovell and the company claim that the company had never issued a commission to him as their agent, and that he was acting only as a broker. But this is playing upon words; and the whole testimony, and the transaction itself, show that he was held out to the public as the agent or intermediate of the company, by and through whom all transactions with the company by parties seeking or having insurance must pass, subject to approval. The insurance company furnished him with all needful papers and blanks, responded to his acts, approved permits of removal given by him, and paid his rent, thereby treating and holding him out as agent to the public, who had the right to deal with the company by and through him as their agent in fact; otherwise, the public would be misled and defrauded by either, or by a combination of both. The Alexandria Insurance Company must be held responsible for the loss occasioned to Hardin by a change of his policy of insurance, which was made by it, and not intended or contemplated by him, and brought about either by the agent, Lovell, or by the act of the company of its own motion, or by a combination of the company and Lovell. The decree appealed from is erroneous, and must be annulled and reversed: and this court, proceeding to render such decree as the circuit court of Wise county should have entered in the cause, will enter a decree for the appellant according to the prayer of the bill, which the circuit court erred in dismissing. Reversed.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1894.)

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—VESTING OF FUTURE ESTATE.

A provision, "I loan to my wife, E., during her natural life," all the residuary estate, "and my wish is that the property I have loaned to her after her death" be sold, and the proceeds "equally divided among my four children," or "their lawful heirs begotten of their bodies," vests the gift to the children immediately, so that an assignment by one during the widow's life is valid.

Appeal from circuit court, Madison county.

Appeal from decree in a suit in equity wherein Thomas A. Chapman was plaintiff and Thomas W. Chapman and others were defendants. The single question involved in the appeal appears from the opinion.

John E. Roller, for appellant. James Hay and T. C. Gordon, for appellees.

LEWIS, P. The testator, Thomas Chapman, after providing in his will for each of his four children, added a sixth clause, as follows, to wit: "It is my wish and desire that all of my estate, both real and personal, which I have not heretofore disposed of, I loan to my wife, Elizabeth Chapman, during her natural life; and my wish is that the property I have loaned to her, after her death, both real and personal, should be sold by my executors, and the money arising from the sale should be equally divided among my four children above named, or their lawful heirs begotten of their bodies." One of the children, James E. Chapman, assigned his interest, and died before the life tenant. The question, therefore, is whether the gift to the children under the sixth clause of the will vested immediately, or was postponed to the death of the life tenant. In support of the latter view, the appellant lays much stress on the word "loan," as manifesting an intention on the part of the testator to annex the time of the distribution to the substance of the gift. But it is clear that the will was written inops consilii, and that the word, like the word "lend" in Wade v. Bogley, 5 Leigh, 442, was used as the equivalent of "give." Nor is there anything in the will to support the appellant's contention. The object of the testator obviously was to provide a life estate for his widow and to defer the distribution for no other purpose than to give precedence to the life estate. Hence, the gift is, in substance, a gift to the children, subject to the life interest of Mrs. Chapman; or, in other words, the title is conferred immediately, though the enjoyment in possession is postponed. Hansford v. Elliott, 9 Leigh, 79; Martin v. Kirby, 11 Grat. 67; Brent v. Washington, 18 Grat. 526; Gish v. Moomaw, 89 Va. 345, 15 S. E. 868, and cases cited. Jarman lays it down, and such is the universally recognized doctrine, that, "even though there be no other gift than in the direction to pay or distribute in futuro, yet, if such payment or distribution appear to be postponed for the convenience of the fund or property, the vesting will not be deferred until the period in question;" and by way of illustration he adds: "Thus, where a sum of stock is bequeathed to A. for life, and, after his decease, to trustees upon trust to sell, and pay and divide the proceeds to and between C. and D., or to pay certain legacies thereout to C. and D., as the payment or distribution is evidently deferred until the decease of A. for the purpose of giving precedence to his life interest, the ulterior legatees take a vested interest at the decease of the testator." 2 Jarm. Wills, (5th Amer. Ed.) 458. There is, indeed, nothing better settled in this court than the rule that all devises and bequests are to be construed as vesting at the testator's death, unless the intention to postpone the vesting is clearly indicated in the will. Sellers' Ex'r v. Reed, 88 Va. 377, 13 S. E. 754; Jameson v. Jameson's Adm'x, 86 Va. 51, 9 S. E. 480. In the present case, the fact that the gift is to the children, "or their lawful heirs begotten of their bodies," does not make the gift contingent. The money arising from the sale of the property after the death of the life tenant was at all events to be equally divided into four parts, and paid to the testator's four children, "or their lawful heirs," etc., which means that it was to be paid to the children living at the death of the life tenant, or to the representatives of such as might then be dead; the words "or their lawful heirs," etc., being words of limitation, and not the substitution of a new class of beneficiaries, taking as purchasers from the testator, for to effectuate the intent of the will we must read "and" for "or," and give to the word "heirs" its usual and legal signification. Parkin v. Knight, 15 Sim. 83; Patterson v. Hawthorn, 12 Serg. & R. 112;

LAND & IMP. CO.¹

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1894.)

EQUITY PRACTICE — TIME FOR FILING ANSWER — FINAL DECREE—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Under Code 1887, § 3275, allowing a defendant to file his answer any time before final decree, it is error to refuse leave to defendants to file their answer 10 days after the rendition of a decree against them, but before its entry in the chancery order book, and during the same term of court, the answer tendered by such defendants showing a probable title in them to part of the land in suit.

2. There can be no adversary possession against a cotenant while she is under the disability of coverture.

Appeal from hustings court of Roanoke.

Bill by the North Roanoke Land & Improvement Company against William L. Williamson and wife, and Herbert D. Buford, Nugent Buford, and others. From a decree for complainant, defendants Buford appeal. Reversed.

Hansbrough & Hansbrough, for appellants.
Phlegar & Johnson, for appellee.

FAUNTLEROY, J. This is an appeal from the decree of the hustings court of Roanoke City rendered September 28, 1891, in a chancery cause in said court pending, wherein the North Roanoke Land & Improvement Company is complainant, and William L. Williamson and wife and others, and the appellants, Herbert D. Buford and Nugent Buford, are defendants. From the record in this cause, it appears that by deed of the 8th of September, 1810, one John Campbell and wife conveyed to one Robert Filson 175½ acres of land, composed of three parcels, and that by deed of October, 1810, the said Robert Filson and wife, in consideration of £1,000, conveyed the same three parcels of land, aggregating 175½ acres, to the "lawful heirs" of the said John Campbell and Rebecca, his wife. The said John Campbell and Rebecca, his wife, had at the date of the said deed of October 8, 1880, three children,—Robert, Clack R., and Susan; and after the said date of October 8, 1880, Matilda, a fourth child, was born to them, the said John and Rebecca Campbell. The said Matilda married Daniel Stoner, and from her the appellants, Herbert D. Buford and Nugent Buford, are lineally descended. There is no evidence of any partition having been made of these 175½ acres of land, and there is no record of any deed of partition vesting the title in severalty to any one in any part of these 175½ acres of land, though it is averred, without proof, that there was a deed of partition, which had been lost, and never recorded. Clack R. Campbell resided from 1843 till his death, in 1881, on a part of this undivided 175½ acres, and held exclusive possession and enjoyment of it, and built upon it. It is said in the depositions that this part was defined by rock fences, though it is not proved that the said fences were put there by Clack R. Campbell, or after he went in it, or as line fences of this particular part. Clack R. Campbell died in 1881, leaving a will by which he devised all of his realty to his wife, Lucy, for her life, with remainder after death to his niece Nannie L. Williamson for life, with remainder over in fee to the children of said Nannie L. Williamson. On the part on which the said Clack R. Campbell resided there is "lot No. 6," the part which is the subject of the controversy in this case. The aforesaid Mrs. Nannie L. Williamson had several children, the remaindermen in fee under the will of Clack R. Campbell; and a suit was instituted in the circuit court of Roanoke for the sale of the realty to which the said children (then infants) were entitled in remainder, and this suit embraced lot No. 6. The record of that suit is not in the record in this cause, and whether the proceedings had were such as are requisite in the sale of infants' land does not appear. The appellants charge that they were not. Be that as it may, it seems that there was a decree for sale, and a sale made to M. P. Preston and his associates, who sold this lot No. 6 to the appellee, the North Roanoke Land & Improvement Company, for $27,500, who being advised that there was a cloud upon the title, brought this suit in chancery in the hustings court of Roanoke City to clear the title. The Bufords, appellants, were made parties, but they lived in another county, 100 miles away, and the bill was taken pro confesso as to them and all the other parties defendants, the Williamsons only having answered the bill. The hustings court of the city of Roanoke, on the 16th day of September, 1891, rendered a decree final in form, but not in operation, during the then current term of the court, in favor of the appellees, affirming the title made to them by Preston and others, and derived from Clack R. Campbell through the Williamsons. The appellants, the Bufords, on the 26th day of September, 1891, during the same term of the hustings court moved the court for leave to file their demurrer and answer, which motion the court overruled, and refused the leave. From this decree the Bufords appealed, assigning but one error,—the refusal of the court to allow them to file their answer and make defense to the suit against them.

The answer was tendered, and the leave to file it asked for, during the term of the court at which the decree of the 16th of September, 1891, was rendered; and it does not appear that the decree of the 16th of September, 1891, had been actually entered upon the chancery order book by the clerk before the motion for leave to file the answer was made, and refused by the court upon the sole ground that it was "too late." The affidavit of G. W. Hansbrough, who appeared for the Bufords, says that he had been employed by them only the day before,—the 25th. The answer tendered by the defendants the Bufords sets forth such a defense as, if sustained, would have changed the decree rendered on the 16th of September, during the same term, and set up a title to an undivided interest in lot No. 6, sold by the Williamses to Preston, and by Preston, etc., to the appellees. The answer asserts: That by the deed of October 8, 1810, from Filson, a title to an undivided share of the 175½ acres of land inured to Matilda, the daughter of John and Rebecca Campbell born after the date and recordation of that deed, as well as to, and equally with, Robert, Clack R., and Susan, the sons and daughter of John and Rebecca Campbell born before and living at the date of the said deed from Filson. That this undivided share of the said Matilda descended in part to the said Bufords, who are shown and admitted to be her lineal descendants; also, the shares of Robert Campbell and Susan Campbell, (Thrasher,) which they conveyed by deed of August 15, 1853, to Daniel Stoner, and by Stoner to Nefinger, trustee. That no partition of the said 175½ acres was ever made, and no allotment in severalty was ever made, among the joint or common owners. That the entire four—Robert, Susan, Clack R., and Matilda, (their ancestress,)—did hold the said 175½ acres of land jointly, and that no ouster of Matilda was ever made or is charged. That the relation of joint tenants between the said four has never been changed, nor the legal title in severalty has ever vested in any one of the said four to any part of the said 175½ acres. That the statute of limitations is not applicable here, and is no bar to appellants' title.

The transaction of 1810 was an arrangement by John Campbell for the benefit of all the children who were, or who might be, born to him and his then wife, Rebecca. It gave a fee in remainder to one undivided third to Robert, Susan, Clack R., respectively, to be opened for Matilda, when born. That the "lawful heirs of John and Rebecca Campbell, his wife," meant their children, who at their deaths should be ascertained to be their lawful heirs, and that all four—Robert, Susan, Clack R., and Matilda—were deemed to be entitled jointly, is admitted and averred in the bill, where it is alleged that "they—Robert, Susan, and Clack R.—took possession of the [175½ acres] land, and that they, together with said Matilda, continued so to hold the same, jointly, openly, adversely, notoriously, and exclusively, till 1843." This establishes the fact that the whole four had title and held the land jointly, in fee, until 1843; and there is nothing in the record to show any change in the joint character of their estate, or any vesting in fee, in severalty in any one of the four in any part of the said 175½ acres of land. The entry upon, and exclusive use and occupation of, a part of the land by Clack R. Campbell, one of the tenants in common or joint owners of the undivided whole, (175½ acres,) did not destroy the joint character of the title, nor sever the part on which he so resided from the joint estate of the whole 175½ acres. The case presented in the answer of the defendants Buford showed a state of things which made it even probable that the respondents Buford had title,—a case to which the facts in the record gave strong color,—which had never been argued, and which the court could and should have given them the time and opportunity to argue and to prove. Yet, the court below in the very teeth of Code Va. 1887, § 3275, which commands that a defendant shall be allowed to file his answer at any time before final decree, refused them the privilege of answering and making their defense. See Bean v. Simmons, 9 Grat. 391; Underwood v. McVeigh, 23 Grat. 419.

This case is not within the rule of Gerst v. Jones, 32 Grat. 528, and other cases cited, which decide that where there has been a trial, and errors committed in admitting or in rejecting evidence, or in giving or in refusing instructions, and this court can see from the whole evidence certified that the party appealing could not have sustained prejudice by the ruling of the trial court,—in such a case this court will not set aside a verdict. This is a case in which no trial was had, and no decision pronounced, but the mere denial of a trial, and the refusal of the trial court to receive and consider the answer of defendants, solely on the ground alleged in the decree,—that "the answer was presented too late." The bill itself charges that the four children, including Clack and Matilda, held, jointly, adversary possession of the land until 1843; and she is shown by the record to have been at that time a married woman, under disability of coverture, and to have been alive in 1881, and presumably alive up to a much later period. The denials of the answer, had it been admitted, would have overcome any and all presumptions that there had ever been any partition of the land, and allotment in severalty. The record shows that in 1843, when Clack R. Campbell took possession of the lot in controversy, Matilda Stoner was under coverture, as the wife of Daniel Stoner, and there is no evidence to show when her disability ceased, and Clack R. Campbell could not hold adversary possession against her. No conveyance or partition of land will be presumed against a feme covert. John Campbell died in 1863, Rebecca, his wife, having predeceased him, and his heirs at that event were his said four children, of whom Matilda, the wife of Daniel Stoner, was one; and she being a married woman, and remaining such, so far as this record shows, till her death, at some period subsequently to 1881. The appellants who were defendants below were illegally and unjustly debarred, by the decree appealed from, from filing their answer and making their defense. The decree of September 26th must be annulled and reversed, the decree of September 16th suspended, and the cause sent back, with leave to the appellants to file their answer, and be allowed time and opportunity to take evidence to support their defense.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 1, 1894.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—WHEN GRANTED—DECREE—RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—FRAUD.

1. Where a vendor of land declines for over a year, without sufficient reason, to carry out his contract, he cannot, at the end of that time, after prices have fallen, ask for specific performance thereof.

2. On a bill for specific performance, the decree, if granting relief to complainant, should provide for the carrying out of the entire contract as made by the parties.

3. A concealment, to justify the rescission of a contract for fraud, must be a willful suppression of such facts in regard to the subject-matter as the party making it is bound to disclose.

Appeal from circuit court, Wythe county.

Suit by Harman Newberry against J. F. Rison and others to specifically enforce a contract for the sale of real estate. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Berkeley & Harrison, Green & Miller, and Walker & Caldwell, for appellants. D. S. Pierce, Fulton & Fulton, and R. G. H. Kean, for appellee.

LACY, J. This is an appeal from a decree rendered by the circuit court of Wythe county on the 24th day of February, 1893. This is a suit by Harman Newberry, seeking to have specific performance of a contract in writing, made by said plaintiff with the appellant J. F. Rison, acting on behalf of certain parties purchasers, Ruffin & Hairston, on the 2d day of April, 1890, agreeing to sell to the said parties three-fourths interest in 700 acres of his 706 acres of land in his Kent's Mill farm, in Wythe county. The said contract sets out that the six acres so reserved are those on which the dwelling is located, which was to be laid off compactly with some frontage on the Norfolk &

Western Railroad. The price agreed was $100 per acre, or $52,500 for the whole three-fourths interest. Newberry agreed in the said contract to unite with the said purchasers in the formation of a land and improvement company, for the development of the said farm by laying off the said land into town lots and selling the same, and he agreed to take one-fourth—his one-fourth interest reserved—in stock of said company in like manner and kind as shall be issued to the purchasers. The terms of payment were agreed on as follows: $10,000 cash upon the tender of a proper deed, $10,000 in three months thereafter, $7,500 each in six, nine, and twelve months thereafter, and $10,000, being the remainder, in fifteen months from the date of the first payment; the deferred payments to bear six per centum interest, evidenced by negotiable notes, and secured by trust deed upon the property conveyed. Newberry agreed in the said contract to furnish a plot showing the exact quantities and boundaries of the land sold; and there was a further stipulation that the said land company, when formed, should contribute one-half the cost of a railroad survey from the mouth of Reed creek to some point on New river to or near Stuart, Va., when the other half was contributed by others; the whole not to exceed $5,000 in cost. By this contract Newberry was to sell, and the others were to buy three-fourths interest in the said land. The other one-fourth interest was to be contributed by Newberry; and they were together to form a company, one-fourth of the stock to belong to Newberry and three-fourths of the stock to all others combined, the company to own and develop the whole land, less the six acres on which the dwelling stood, to be compactly laid off; and Newberry agreed to furnish a plot showing the exact quantities and boundaries of the land sold, which, being done, the six acres not sold would remain compactly laid off or left to itself. On the other hand, the purchasers were to pay $10,000 on receipt of a proper deed, which Newberry was to furnish to them. The contract was executed on the 2d of April, 1890, as stated. On the next day D. S. Pierce, attorney at law, made out an abstract of title of the said land at the instance of Rison, certifying at the conclusion and as a conclusion that "there are no incumbrances or liens on the land." On the 8th day of the same month the purchasers of the three-fourths interest from Newberry paid, in anticipation of a deed, $10,000 cash to Newberry. But, Newberry not making a deed as expected, on the 26th of June, 1890, the purchasers, by counsel, forwarded a deed to Newberry conveying the entire property to the Newberry Land Company,—the name adopted for the new company about to be formed,—which was received on the next day. Newberry objected to the stated consideration in the deed of $210,000 by the land company instead of $70,000; but it seems that he agreed to this in order to get the cash payment of $10,000 in advance. When Newberry received the deed he refused on the next day to execute it, because he said the exact quantity of land had not been ascertained. On the 16th day of August, 1890, Newberry's counsel acknowledged the receipt of the deed, and stated that when he offered the deed to Newberry, and offered it with the metes and bounds furnished by the purchasers, and proposed to draw a deed for him to sign and for his wife to sign also, Newberry said he did not like the way his six acres were laid off, and "he says he will not sign the deed until that is laid off to suit him." Four days afterwards Rison replied that the engineers had been given the contract to go by, and no other instructions, and he regretted the way the six acres had been laid off was not satisfactory to Newberry, but that, if Newberry would please inform them how he wished the six acres laid off, an endeavor would be made to arrange the plat accordingly. These directions were never given, and in the deed tendered January 25, 1893, after decree in the cause, he adopts the way the six acres are laid off, and says it is satisfactorily laid off. Newberry refused to make a deed to the company, but proposed to give further time if the purchasers would pay him yet another $10,000 in cash before receiving the deed. In 1891, (May 20th,) Newberry caused a deed to be made and tendered by his counsel, conveying three-fourths of the land to the purchasers, which the purchasers refused to accept as a proper deed, and in August, 1891, Newberry filed his bill for specific performance of the contract of April, 1890. The suit coming on to be heard upon the bill and exhibits, demurrers, pleas, joint and several answers, and exhibits as cross bills and answers to same, etc., the depositions of witnesses, etc., and upon release deeds by the parties in interest other than Newberry, John D. Stewart, K. C. Kent, and Mrs. C. W. Kent, filed in the papers, the circuit court overruled the demurrers, and held, and so decided, that Newberry was entitled to specific performance of his contract of April 2, 1890, upon his filing in court a deed with general warranty of title, executed by himself, conveying to the vendees named in the said contract of sale three-fourths interest in the land in said contract mentioned, with the reservation of six acres, therein mentioned, within 60 days from the date of the decree; it being the opinion of the court that the complainants' title to the said land is good, and that any possible defect that could arise because of the infancy of Flora Stuart, who had signed the deed of lease, could be indemnified by a reservation of the purchase money in the hands of the court for that purpose; decreed for the unpaid purchase money, credited the same by use and occupation by Newberry, and decreed a sale of the three-fourths interest if the money was not paid in 60 days from that time; decreed that each party pay his own cost, and appointed commissioners to make the sale, and authorized $3,000 to be paid into court by the defendants, to be held as indemnity against the claim of Mrs. Flora Stuart; whereupon the defendants applied for and obtained an appeal to this court.

Enough has been stated chronologically to show the proceedings between the parties pending their negotiations between the execution of the contract and the bringing of this suit. The evidence in the cause shows that the vendor, who now seeks specific performance, did not have the power—was not capable—of making a good deed to the land he sold at the time of the sale, and the decree in the cause procured and insisted on by the vendor himself shows that at that date—nearly three years after the contract was made—he was still unable to make a deed, and the circuit court was unable to cause a good deed to be made, but decreed that the parties defendants should receive a hypothetical deed, good if this young lady so willed hereafter, the court thought. The defendants pointed out the defects in Newberry's title. After long delay on his part, he at last made a deed. It appears plainly enough that for some unexplained reason he desired to get the cash payment in advance of a deed, and, receiving this, he refused to make a deed to the company which he had agreed to form with his vendees, and take the interest of one-fourth. Agreeing subsequently to do this, he then bethought him of the six acres, and found fault with the way it was laid off. Subsequently, when asked to state his objection to this, he waived it, and he put the six acres in the deed in the same manner which had so long proved an insurmountable difficulty with him when so done by others. But none of these difficulties could be surmounted by him, or were surmountable by others, until the fall in prices known as the "collapse of the boom" had come. Heretofore reluctant,—not only reluctant, but stubbornly and steadfastly refusing either to accept a deed tendered to him or to tender one himself,—he agreed to survey and plat the land, received $10,000 before he had any valid claim to it under his contract, and yet, although he had a survey made by his own chosen surveyor, he rejected that, and did not cause any other to be made, and, when the other parties caused a survey and plat to be made by skilled engineers, he objected to that, because six acres were not laid off to suit him in general terms; and, when requested to make known his wishes precisely, that they might be complied with, lets it pass, delays for another year, and then adopts what he had so strenuously and so long objected to. We have shown that he was not capable, and it appears also that he was not ready, willing, eager, or desirous during all that period. His negotiations tended to the effort which finally culminated in the demand of $10,000 more in cash before a deed was made by him. And yet he seeks specific performance at the hands of the court of a contract which he had so long not only neglected, but expressly refused, to comply with on his part, until the circumstances had so changed that the object of the contract could not be carried out. It was not possible to sell lots and stock in a company until a deed could be obtained by the company free from exception. And he himself had agreed to perform on his part something else besides selling and conveying the three-fourths of the land. He plainly agreed to contribute one-fourth of the capital stock to the company and put in his one-fourth interest in the company towards this end. So that by the contract the company was to own the whole land and he to own one-fourth of the company. But he refused to do this, and asks that the contract which he made be enforced, specifically performed in part,—performed only so far as it is favorable to him and his present views,—that is, that the other side be made to fully perform on their part and he be fully released on his part; and the circuit court has so decreed. We do not deem it necessary to go into detail as to the various questions as to the defective title held by Newberry. His delay is enough to disentitle him to specific performance. And the decree of the circuit court, presented and insisted on by the other side, sufficiently shows his inability to comply with his contract to make a good deed to the land free from just exception. The principles which govern a court of equity in passing upon such suits are so well settled, have been so universally adhered to by this court since its foundation, and are so familiar to the profession, that no extended citation of authority is deemed at all necessary. We have over and over again gone over this question, until there is nothing which can be added. Mr. Sugden says, (page 279:) "In the language of some of the judges, a party who seeks specific performance must show himself ready, desirous, prompt, and eager." Chancellor Kent said in St. John v. Benedict, 6 Johns. Ch. 111: "Specific performance cannot be considered a matter of right in either party, but is a matter of discretion in the court; not, indeed, of arbitrary and capricious discretion, depending upon the mere pleasure of the judges, but of that sound and reasonable discretion which governs itself as far as it may by general rules and principles, but which at the same time withholds or grants relief according to the circumstances of each particular case, when these rules and principles will not furnish any exact measure of justice between the parties." All application to courts to decree a specific performance must depend upon the circumstances, governed by the established principles of the court. If specific performance would work injustice, or be unreasonable, a party will be left to his action for damages. It is generally essential that a party seeking a specific performance should not have been backward: that he should not have held off until circumstances may have changed; or kept himself aloof so as to enforce or abandon the contract as events might prove most advantageous. The case of Iron Co. v. Gardiner, 79 Va. 305, is very much in point. Railroad Co. v. Lewis, 76 Va. 833; Haskin v. Insurance Co., 73 Va. 700; Ferry v. Clarke, 77 Va. 397; 2 Lomax, Dig. p. 108; Panitt v. McKinley, 9 Gratt. 1; Robertson v. Hogsheds, 3 Leigh. 667; 1 Story, Eq. § 693; Graybill v. Brugh, 89 Va. 895, 17 S. E. 558; Ford v. Euker, 80 Va. 79, 9 S. E. 500; Dinsmore v. Lyle, 87 Va. 391, 12 S. E. 610; Reynolds v. Necessary, 88 Va. 125, 13 S. E. 348; Grizzle v. Sutherland, 88 Va. 584, 14 S. E. 332; Nalle v. Railroad Co., 88 Va. 948, 14 S. E. 759; Story, Eq. Jur. § 716; 3 Pars. Cont. 301; 2 Tuck. Comm. 426.

It may be observed, upon what has gone before, that the decree appealed from did not decree performance of the contract as made by the parties, but quite a different one. The appellants did not agree to buy a two-thirds interest in the land of Newberry and pay $100 per acre for it simply. There was an agreement between the parties in the contract sought to be specifically performed that they would form a company with Newberry one-fourth owner and contributor. They were to pay three-fourths of the agreed value and Newberry one-fourth, all to go into a company for a specific purpose. The decree complained of not only compels the appellants to take a delayed and a defective title, but compels them to take three-fourths of what they substantially bargained for. It is not proved nor alleged that the appellants ever agreed, directly or indirectly, that the contract thus set up should be their contract; nor is it reasonable to suppose that they would have agreed to pay anything for an undivided interest, great or small, in this land, in order to build a town. It would have remained uncertain under such a contract where their land would lie, whether on the railroad or off of it, whether close to or at the railroad depot or remote from it; and under the court's decree it is matter of uncertainty where the appellants' part of the land will be situated. If the court decrees specific performance at all of a contract, it should do so of the contract which the parties made and the entire contract as made. The court should have decreed, if at all, upon the entire contract, and not upon a part only, and thus left not only the question of the title uncertain and dependent upon future undetermined events, but the location and situs of the land undetermined and unascertained. It cannot be said that the parties themselves purchased three-fourths only, because their contract covered effectually the entire tract,—three-fourths to be paid for in money, one-fourth to be paid for in stock, but the whole to be held (except six acres, to be laid off and designated) under one right; that is, by the company, which both sides agreed to form to this end.

Specific performance is an equitable remedy, which compels the performance of a contract in the precise terms agreed upon, or such a substantial performance as will do justice between the parties under the circumstances of the case. 22 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 909. Bouvier defines it as the "actual accomplishment of a contract by a party bound to fulfill it." Burrill defines it: "The performance of a contract in the precise terms agreed upon; strict performance." Mr. Justice Washington, speaking for the supreme court of the United States in Hunt v. Rousmanier, 1 Pet. 14, says: "Equity may compel parties to perform their agreements, when fairly entered into, according to their terms; but it has no power to make agreements for parties, and then compel them to execute the same. The former is a legitimate branch of its jurisdiction, and in its exercise highly beneficial to society. The latter is without its authority, and the exercise of it would not only be a usurpation of power, but would be highly mischievous in its consequences." Equity cannot make or alter a contract for the parties and then execute it. If the contract must be reformed before it can be executed, it can only be reformed in a suit for that purpose, or upon a bill particularly praying for that relief. Grey v. Tubbs, 43 Cal. 359; Osborn v. Phelps, 19 Conn. 63. Nor will equity reform a writing to make an agreement of a character different from that which the parties intentionally entered into. Stoddard v. Hart, 23 N. Y. 556. Under the circumstances of this case, we think Newberry is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity to have his contract specifically executed, but that this court should withhold its relief, and leave him to his action at law. And under the circumstances of this case, and the changed circumstances, this court ought not to rescind the contract at the instance of the appellee. There are no sufficient grounds alleged nor proven upon which to base a rescission. Fraud is the most frequent ground for rescission, but it cannot be said that Newberry has practiced this upon the appellants. False representations, to be fraudulent, must be a false statement of acts, positively made, not mere matters of erroneous opinions. A concealment to afford ground of rescission for fraud must be a willful suppression of such facts in regard to the subject-matter of the contract as the party making it is bound to disclose. We cannot say that there is any inadequacy of consideration, sufficient to suggest fraud; no undue influence resulting from confidence or friendship. There is no mutual mistake, no illegality, disability, coverture, or infancy. Nonperformance to justify rescission must be a total failure of performance. Under all the circumstances of this case, we will refuse specific performance, and deny the prayer for rescission, and reverse the cause, and dismiss the bill, without prejudice to the right of either party to bring his action at law for such damages as he may be advised he has sustained in the premises; that is, the parties will be left to seek their remedy in a court of law. The decree of the circuit court decreeing specific performance is for the reasons stated erroneous, and must be reversed and annulled.

STATE v. HALLBACK et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 2, 1894.)

JURY-PANEL — TRIAL JUSTICE — CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS—INFORMATION—WARRANT—RESISTING ARREST—SPECIAL CONSTABLE—APPOINTMENT.

1. Defendant in a criminal case is not entitled to have the panel full, or entirely read over, before entering on his right of challenge.

2. Gen. St. § 830, provides that a criminal proceeding before a trial justice shall be commenced on information "plainly and substantially setting forth the offense charged," on which, only, shall a warrant of arrest issue. Held, that a charge of committing a "trespass" on certain lands "after notice" showed that the offense charged was that created by Gen. St. § 2507, making "entry" on land "after notice" an offense, the term "trespass" including "entry," and the words "after notice" not occurring in section 2501, creating the offense of "trespass;" and therefore it would support a warrant, and render resistance of arrest illegal.

3. A warrant of arrest need not set out the offense.

4. Under Gen. St. § 864, authorizing a trial justice to appoint a constable to act by virtue of such appointment "only on a particular occasion, to be specified in writing," an indorsement on a warrant of arrest, appointing a person special constable "to execute the within process," is sufficient.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Berkeley county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Jerry Hallback and Robert Scott were convicted of murder, and appeal. Affirmed.

Trenholm & Rhett, for appellants. Mr. Jervey, for the State.

McGOWAN, J. "Agreed case: The defendants, Jerry Hallback and Robert Scott, were indicted as principals on a charge of murder, under the usual form of indictment, at the June term of the court of sessions for Berkeley county. Upon the call of the case the defendants demanded a full panel. The clerk reported only thirty-five (35) jurors present. The judge declined to order a full panel, and directed the clerk to present the jurors. (Defendants excepted.) Before any juror was presented for challenge, defendants demanded that the panel be entirely called over in their presence, before they should be called upon to enter on their right of challenge. The court refused such demand, and the defendants again excepted. As each juror was presented, defendants renewed their previous demands, which being refused, exception was duly taken. The jury were presented and sworn under the express notice and protest of defendants that they waived no right by such presentation and impaneling. The defendants did not exhaust their right of peremptory challenge. Counsel agree that a typewritten copy of the evidence shall be filed with this agreed case as a part of the return, to which reference can be made just as if the same were here incorporated."

The following are copies of the affidavit and warrant referred to in the testimony and exceptions:

"Affidavit: The State of South Carolina, County of Berkeley. Personally appeared before me, R. H. Sweeney, a trial justice of the said county and said state, R. B. Cuthbert, who, being duly sworn, says that on the 4th day of February, 1893, one Jerry Hallback did commit a trespass on the lands—what is known as the 'Porter Tract'—now under lease to the defendant, (deponent,) after notice, and prays that a warrant may be issued for him, he be arrested and dealt with according to law. [Signed] R. B. Cuthbert.

"Sworn to before me this February 7, 1893. R. H. Sweeney, Trial Justice."

"The State of South Carolina, County of Berkeley. Trial Justice in and for the Said County and State, to Any Lawful Constable: Whereas, complaint upon oath has been made by R. B. Cuthbert that on the Porter tract, in St. Andrews, in the county and state aforesaid, on the 4th day of February, 1893, one Jerry Hallback did commit a trespass after notice, these are therefore to command you to apprehend the said defendant, Jerry Hallback, and bring him before me, to be dealt with according to law. Given under my hand and seal this February 7th, 1893. R. H. Sweeney, Trial Justice."

Back cover indorsed as follows: "I hereby appoint Robert Halsell as a special constable to execute the within process. [Signed] R. H. Sweeney, Trial Justice. February 7th, 1893."

A book of testimony was offered, copy of which is attached to the record. Counsel for the defendants made numerous requests to charge, (16 in number,) some of which were charged, others in part, and still others were refused entirely. It will not, however, be necessary to consider any of them, except those to which objection is made in the exceptions. After a full and clear charge as to what is murder, manslaughter, and a killing in self-defense, as applicable to the facts of the case, the jury rendered a verdict of guilty, recommending Robert Scott to the mercy of the court. The defendants appeal to this court from the sentence imposed by his honor, Judge Izlar, and seek a reversal of the same upon the following grounds and exceptions: "(1) That, there being but thirty-five jurors present on the day of trial, and the prisoners having given notice of their demand for a full panel, that his honor erred in overruling such demand, and requiring defendants to exercise, against their protest, their right of challenge from such incomplete and insufficient panel. (2) That his honor erred in overruling and refusing the demand of the prisoners that the panel be entirely called over once in their hearing before entering upon their right of challenge. (3) That his honor erred in refusing to charge the jury, as requested: 'That the warrant issued by Trial Justice Sweeney on February 4th, 1893, for the arrest of the prisoner on a charge alleged as follows: "That he, the said Jerry Hallback, did commit a trespass after notice,"—was illegal and of no legal force, in that the offense charged was neither in the warrant nor affidavit "plainly and substantially set forth," and it was unlawful for any constable or private person especially appointed to execute the same.' (4) That his honor erred in charging the jury that said warrant did substantially and plainly set forth the offense charged, and was a valid legal process, and that the prisoners had no right to resist the same. (5) That his honor erred in refusing to charge the jury as follows: "That said warrant of arrest being illegal and of no legal force, it was unlawful for Halsell to attempt to execute the same, and it was lawful for the prisoners to resist any attempt at arrest thereunder; and, further, it was lawful for the prisoner to forbid Halsell any entrance in his dwelling house.' (6) That his honor erred in refusing to charge the jury, as requested by the prisoners, as follows: "That said warrant of arrest being illegal and of no legal force, then, if the jury believe that Halsell and other armed persons attempted to enforce the same, and during such attempt attacked the prisoner in his dwelling house, and the prisoner, being himself otherwise without fault in the opinion of the jury, reasonably apprehended death or serious bodily harm unless he killed Halsell, he was justified in self-defense in killing Halsell to save himself, and he should be acquitted.' (7) That his honor erred in refusing to charge the jury, as requested by the prisoners, as follows: 'If the prisoner had a right to resist arrest on account of the warrant being without legal force, or on account of the lack of authority in Halsell to enforce the same, and if, in order to avoid such illegal arrest, he took refuge in his dwelling house, then, in such case, if the jury believe that the deceased and others, with guns and pistols, surrounded such dwelling to enforce such illegal arrest, and thereupon Halsell attempted to enter said dwelling for such illegal purpose, and in such manner and threatening attitude as, in the opinion of the jury, reasonably entitled the prisoner to believe that his life was in danger, or that he was about to receive serious bodily harm, then in such case the prisoner was justified in killing Halsell, and in driving away the other members of the attacking party, and the prisoner was not precluded from repelling such an attack by the fact that he had such prior notice of such intended attack that he might have called upon the public authorities to intervene. When the said attack was actually made upon him he was entitled to repel it, no matter how long he may have anticipated or prepared for it.' (8) That his honor erred in refusing to charge the jury, as requested by the prisoners: "That Haisell had no authority to execute the warrant, inasmuch as he was not appointed in the manner provided by law, in that the alleged appointment contains no authority to arrest the prisoner, and no particular occasion is therein specified in writing." (9) That his honor erred in admitting in the evidence the said warrant, and in overruling the exception of the prisoners to such admission. (10) That his honor erred in charging the jury as to the law in reference to the consequence of resisting an officer, there being no evidence that Haisell was an officer. (11) That his honor erred in not granting the motion of the prisoners for a new trial upon the grounds hereinbefore mentioned. (12) That his honor erred in not granting a new trial as to the defendant, Scott, there being no evidence to support the verdict against him."

Exceptions 1 and 2. Under the authority of State v. Stephens, 13 S. C. 287, the first exception was abandoned; and so was the twelfth, on the ground that it does not charge any error of law, and cannot be reviewed by this court. Exception 2 charges that the presiding judge "erred in refusing the demand of the prisoners that the panel be entirely called over once in their hearing before entering on their right of challenge." This may have been demandable at one time, but it is certainly not now the established practice in this state. The principal authority relied on to sustain the demand is the case of State v. Briggs, 27 S. C. 80, 2 S. E. 854, in which is quoted the remark of Mr. Bishop, "that the defendant may require the panel to be full, and to be entirely called over in his hearing, before entering upon his peremptory challenges." But it is obvious that such reference was not intended to declare that to be the law of this state, for the double reason that this question was not under consideration in that case, and the context clearly shows that the reference was made merely as an illustration of the question then being considered, viz.: That it was error for a prisoner to be limited to twelve challenges for the reason that he had exhausted eight in another jury the week before; that the right of challenge, as allowed, is sacred. The case of State v. Williams, 2 Hill, (S. C.) 381, was an issue as to drawing talesmen, and the court said: "The prisoner is not entitled to a copy of the panel of the plea and petit jury attached to the venire. There is therefore no ground in this respect for the complaint which has been urged,—that if talesmen were to be his jurymen, that he would have no means of knowing them until they were called into the box. There is, I think, great wisdom in not allowing a copy of the panel to the prisoner. If he were allowed to have it, it might be the means of enabling him to obtain an acquittal by bribery or influence. As it is, his triers are unknown to him until court, and often until called into the box. Impartiality is thus most usually obtained for the suppression of crime and the protection of innocence." We do not think the circuit judge committed error as charged in this exception.

Exceptions 3, 4, and 9, in different forms, make the point that the warrant issued by "Trial Justice Sweeney on February 4, 1893, for the arrest of the prisoner Hallback was illegal and of no legal force, and therefore it was no process, and to resist it was no offense." This is the most important question in the case, as to which the circuit judge charged as follows: "If the officer had the right to make the arrest, and employed no more force than necessary to do it, the killing of the officer would be murder, although done in the heat of blood. If the person sought to be arrested kills the officer after he has made known his authority, he does so at his peril. It has been urged in this case that the warrant under which the deceased sought to make the arrest was illegal and of no legal force, and that it was unlawful for any constable or private person specially appointed to execute, or attempt to execute, the same, and that it was lawful for the prisoner, Hallback, to resist any attempt at arrest thereunder. I do not think that the warrant was illegal. While it may be somewhat informal, the affidavit upon which the warrant is based does sufficiently charge an offense. I think the affidavit is a substantial compliance with the formalities prescribed by law for the issuing of warrants of arrest. This being so, the deceased had the right to make the arrest thereunder; and if, in attempting to make the arrest, he employed no more force than was necessary, and was killed in the discharge of his duty, the killing would be murder, if you believe from the evidence that the deceased had made known his authority to the defendant Hallback." Was there error of law here? Section 830 of the General Statutes provides that "all proceedings before trial justices, in criminal cases, shall be commenced on information, under oath, plainly and substantially setting forth the offense charged, upon which, and only which, shall a warrant of arrest issue." There is no doubt that the proceeding involved here was commenced by information under oath. There was the offense "plainly and substantially" set forth. The manifest object of the provision above quoted was to require that the offense with which a party was charged should be set forth plainly and substantially, to enable the party accused to understand the nature of the offense with which he is charged, so that he might be prepared to meet the charge at the proper time. It certainly never was designed to require any mere formality or technicality in stating the offense. This, as we have seen, never was required, and it would be unfortunate for the interests of public justice that it ever should be. McConnell v. Kennedy, 29 S. C. 180, 7 S. E. 76. Now, the charge made against the defendant Hallback, and set forth in the affidavit on which the warrant issued, was that, on the day stated, he (Jerry Hallback) "did commit a trespass on the lands—what is known as the 'Porter Tract'—now under lease to the defendant, (deponent,) after notice," etc.; and in the warrant the charge is set forth substantially in the same way: "That Jerry Hallback did commit a trespass after notice." Now, while it is true that the specific offense with which Hallback was charged is not set forth in terms, yet, as we think, there can be no doubt or uncertainty whatever that the offense charged was that created by section 2507 of the General Statutes, which reads as follows: "Every entry on the enclosed or unenclosed land of another, after notice from the owner or tenant prohibiting the same, shall be deemed a misdemeanor." It seems that the supposed "uncertainty" arises out of the use of the word "trespass" instead of "entry," but it is clear that "trespass" is a more comprehensive term than "entry," and indeed includes it, especially when we consider the words that follow,—“after notice,”—which do not occur at all in section 2501, which creates the offense of "trespass." But it is insisted with confidence that the precise point was decided in the case of State v. Mays, 24 S. C. 191, which is conclusive of this case. It was decided in that case "that the affidavit, which is the foundation of the whole proceeding in a trial justice's court, (Gen. St. § 830,) is insufficient where it fails to set forth plainly and substantially whether the offense charged was a trespass on real estate, which is beyond the jurisdiction of a trial justice, (section 2501,) or an entry upon the lands of another after notice forbidding the same, (Id. § 2507.)" It will, however, be observed that the case of Mays was decided in 1885, when the offense of trespass on lands (section 2501) was not within the jurisdiction of the trial justice court, and the "uncertainty" alleged in that case was between two offenses, one of which was within the jurisdiction of a trial justice and the other was not. But in December, 1892, section 2501, Gen. St., was so amended, with respect to the punishment to be inflicted, as to bring the offense of trespass also under the jurisdiction of a trial justice, (see 21 St. p. 93;) so that, at the time the warrant in this case was issued, a trial justice had jurisdiction of the offenses created both by the section 2501 and that of 2507 of the General Statutes; and therefore, whether the offense charged was one or the other, the trial justice had jurisdiction of it, and that necessarily destroyed the analogy which might be supposed to exist between this case and that of Mays. "A warrant to arrest a party need not necessarily set out the offense, although it is usually recited and made a part of it." State v. Rowe, 8 Rich. Law, 17. The evidence clearly shows that Hallback knew that Halsell was an officer. He had been informed three days before that Halsell had a warrant for his arrest, and he was fully aware of the particular offense for which he was wanted. Besides, while it is true that ignorance of the alleged defect in the warrant at the time did not vary the case in strictness of law, yet there was an additional circumstance in his case which may deserve to be well weighed,—that he had before deliberately resolved upon shooting Welch, the constable, in case he offered to arrest him again, which in all probability it might be his duty to do. This was held sufficient, of itself, to warrant a conviction of murder, independently of the legality of the warrant. Rex v. Stockley, 1 East, P. C. 311; Graham v. State, (Tex. App.) 13 S. W. 1013. We see no error as charged here.

Exceptions 5, 6, and 7 depend upon the alleged illegality of the warrant of arrest, now eliminated from the case by the charge of the judge, which, we have endeavored to show, was in conformity to law.

Exception 8 complains that his honor erred in refusing to charge "that Halsell had no authority to execute the warrant, inasmuch as he was not appointed in the manner provided by law, in that the alleged appointment contains no authority to arrest the prisoner, and no particular occasion is therein specified in writing," etc. The warrant was indorsed: "I hereby appoint Robert Halsell as a special constable to execute the within process. R. H. Sweeney, Trial Justice. February 7, 1893." His honor said: "I cannot charge you that request, because I have already said to you that I think the indorsement upon the warrant, if you conclude that indorsement was made by Trial Justice Sweeney, would be sufficient authority for executing the warrant, and, during the time he was acting under that warrant for the purpose of executing it, he would be an officer of the law," etc. The authority for the appointment of a special constable is found in the proviso of Gen. St. § 864: "That nothing herein contained shall prevent a presiding judge, or a trial justice, or a coroner, from appointing a constable to act by virtue of such appointment only on a particular occasion, to be specified in writing." The objection, as we understand it, is that the constable was not directed in this indorsement, ipsisimlis verbis, to arrest the prisoner. The indorsement became a part of the paper, and must be read in connection with the body of the warrant, wherein "any lawful constable" is commanded to apprehend the defendant, etc. The duty of a constable is a matter of law, of which the courts take cognizance. See McConnell v. Kennedy, 29 S. C. 191, 7 S. E. 76.

Exception 10 is based on the assumption that there was no evidence that Halsell was an officer. In the view taken by the judge, there was conclusive evidence on that point. Besides, there is no error in charging an irrelevant proposition, unless it is shown that the defendant was injured thereby.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, and the case remanded to the circuit court for the purpose of enabling that court to assign a new day for the execution of the sentence heretofore pronounced.

CASTO v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF RIPLEY DIST.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 20, 1894.)

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—APPOINTMENT OF TEACHERS.

Under section 13, c. 45, of the Code as it stood in the edition of 1887, school trustees had no power, as individuals, to appoint teachers. Such trustees could only appoint at a meeting of which all the trustees had notice, and at least two of the trustees must concur in the appointment. The appointment must be in writing.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Jackson county.

Action by H. J. Casto against the board of education of Ripley district, Jackson county, for breach of contract. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Wm. A. Parsons, for plaintiff in error.

BRANNON, P. Action by Casto against the board of education of Ripley district, Jackson county, for failure to allow Casto to teach a school under a contract employing him to do so. The facts are that Casto and Shamblin and Boggess, two of the school trustees, were present at a meeting of the board of education; that the board appointed a trustee in place of Boggess, but the appointee did not qualify that day; that Shamblin and Boggess agreed, before leaving the place where the board of education was in session, to employ Casto to teach a school; that Fisher, the third trustee, was not present, and had no notice of such meeting; that Casto and Shamblin and Boggess went from the place where the board of education met to Shamblin's house, where, on July 15, 1889, Shamblin signed a written agreement employing Casto as teacher; and then the three started to go to Fisher's house, and on the way Boggess remarked that it was not necessary for him to go to Fisher's, as "two trustees were enough to employ a teacher," and did not go further; that Casto and Shamblin went on to Fisher's, and then Fisher and Casto signed the agreement; that, a few days before the time for the commencement of the school, the secretary of the board informed Casto that a new schoolhouse which was being built would not be completed by the time fixed for commencement of the school, and he would have to defer commencing a few days, to which Casto assented; that, after it was completed, Casto informed Shamblin that he was ready to begin teaching, and Shamblin and the other trustees took steps to get a stove for the schoolhouse, but, before obtaining it, the board of education met at the new schoolhouse, and refused to take it off the contractor's hands, and informed the plaintiff that there would be no school taught, and notified the contractor that it would sue him, as it would be liable to pay Casto for teaching; that later the schoolhouse was burned, and no other house was built; and that Casto was not able to get any other school because it was so late. The said agreement employing Casto was approved by the president of the board of education.

Is the written agreement employing Casto to teach binding on the board of education? Its validity is to be tested by section 13, c. 45, of the 1887 edition of the Code, and not by that section as amended and re-enacted by chapter 60, Acts 1891, and found in the 1891 edition of the Code. The act of 1891 made alterations in section 13. How such alterations would affect, if at all, the question we have in hand, it is not proper to say, but I deem it proper to call attention to the fact of amendment of the section. The statute provided, at the date involved in this case, that the trustees should appoint teachers by written appointment, to be submitted to the board of education, or its president when the board was not in session, for approval. After so giving power to the trustees to appoint, it contained this explicit clause: "But the trustees shall take no action or proceeding relating to the appointment or removal of teachers, or expulsion or suspension of a scholar from school, unless at a meeting of which all the trustees shall have had notice, and when at least two of their number shall be present, and concur in such action or proceeding." It is plain that the important act of appointing teachers under this act must be at a public meeting of which all the trustees have notice, and the appointment must be by writing, so that we can say it is an act of the board of trustees done in open meeting as an official act, in the face of the public, not by the trustees as individuals, at indifferent places. At such a meeting the patrons of the school may know what is transpiring, and give the trustees invaluable information touching the morality, capacity, and fitness of the teacher. It is made a safeguard against the selection of improper teachers. Under this same section, in Wintz v. Board of Education, 28 W. Va. 227, it was held that the trustees have no power, as individuals, to appoint teachers, and that it could only be done at a meeting of which all the trustees had notice, and at least two of the trustees must concur in the appointment. In this case there was surely no meeting, within the meaning of the statute, as construed by said decision. Where was the meeting? At the place where the board of education met? Of this Fisher had no notice. It was in no sense a meeting. Shamblin and Boggess happened there because the board was meeting. Two trustees must concur in the appointment. The two trustees present at that meeting, it is said, concurred in the appointment. They did not legally do so; for while Shamblin, before leaving that place, did sign the agreement, Boggess did not. Why did he not do so if he finally agreed to the appointment? The fact that he did not there sign, and the fact that, though he started to go to Fisher's, he excused himself, and did not go all the way, tend to show nonconcurrence. The fact that he remarked that it was not necessary for him to go, as two trustees were enough to appoint, shows that he did not intend to be considered as acting in the appointment. At any rate, he did not sign the agreement, nor any written appointment. The statute, in terms, requires a written appointment; not an agreement to appoint, but an actual appointment, as a final act, evidenced by writing. If, under an oral appointment, a teacher could recover for actual service in teaching, it thence does not follow that where he has not taught, so as to maintain a quantum meruit for service, he can enforce an oral appointment by recovering damages for noncompliance with it. Shall we say that the meeting of Shamblin and Fisher at Fisher's house was the meeting at which the appointment was made, or was it simply to execute or consummate what had been already done at the meeting of Shamblin and Boggess? If the latter is the correct view, then the agreement has the signature of only one of the two who made the appointment at that meeting. If we view the meeting at Fisher's of Shamblin and Fisher as the meeting at which the appointment was made, and to take into consideration the appointment of a teacher as an original proposition, I hardly think we can say Boggess had notice of it as such a meeting. The proceeding, in short, is so irregular that we cannot say that the appointment was made and completed at such a meeting as the statute contemplates. To do so we must strain the matter, and introduce a liberality which would more properly be called "looseness," where there is no necessity for such liberality, and a looseness violating the purposes of the legislature. We do not regard the appointment binding on the board of education. Its approval by its president would not validate an appointment made contrary to law; nor would the procuring of a stove for the school, nor the declaration of the board that it would be liable to pay the teacher.

Another point in the case is this: During the taking of evidence, after the plaintiff had given in evidence said agreement and the facts above stated and some others, the court asked the plaintiff's counsel if he could produce evidence different from that which he had already given as to the manner of employing the plaintiff, and, the counsel replying that he could not, the court said it was unnecessary to go further with the evidence on other points, as the court's view was that the plaintiff had been illegally employed; and this is alleged to be error. From the statement of the facts proven on the trial, we feel sure that the whole case of the plaintiff had been presented, so far, anyhow, as it touched the manner of the appointment of plaintiff as a teacher; and the plaintiff took no exception, and made no objection, to this particular action of the court, but only to its finding upon the facts. Nor did the plaintiff offer any additional evidence, or even say that he had any particular further evidence, or, indeed, any further evidence; and we do not see how we can find error in this action, such as harms the plaintiff, unless we merely imagine that some evidence was thus shut out, in the absence of even a suggestion that such was the case. We think with the circuit judge that the invalidity of the appointment decides the case against the plaintiff. We are of opinion, therefore, that the finding and judgment of the circuit court for the defendant ought to be affirmed.

REED et al. v. McCLOUD et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 3, 1894.)

ATTACHMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT.

Section 1, c. 106, of the Code, among other things, prescribes that the affidavit made for the purpose of having an order of attachment shall state the nature of the plaintiff's claim, and the amount, at the least, which the affiant believes the plaintiff is justly entitled to recover. Held, the term "justly" is not superfluous, or insignificant, but is a material qualification of the rest of the phrase, "entitled to recover," and it, or its equivalent, must be used, in order to constitute a substantial compliance with the statute.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Logan county; Thomas H. Harvey, Judge.

Action by Reed, Peebles & Co. against C. H. McCloud and others. From an order quashing the attachment issued, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

James H. Ferguson, for plaintiffs in error.

HOLT, J. This is a suit in equity, by attachment, commenced in the circuit court of Logan county on the 27th day of October, 1891; and on the 28th day of October, 1891, the plaintiffs filed the bond and affidavit for attachment against the property of defendants, and the attachment was thereupon issued and levied on certain goods, wares, and merchandise, also upon 385 acres of land made up of six contiguous tracts. Plaintiffs' bill was filed at January rules, 1892, and at the April term of the circuit court, viz on April 28, 1892, the defendants, by their attorneys, moved the court to quash the order of attachment sued out and levied, because the affidavit was defective and insufficient to authorize such order of attachment; which motion the court sustained, and quashed the order of attachment, and the plaintiffs appealed under eighth clause of section 1, c. 135, of the Code.

Under the one general government there are 44 state governments, foreign to each other within the meaning of the attachment law, whose citizens own property, or have debts due them, in other states, who constantly carry on with each other commercial dealings and business transactions in large numbers and of great value; so that the attachment law is not only useful, but has become indispensable, and the tendency is to widen its scope and enlarge its usefulness in various ways, according to the exigencies of the times. Many statutes on the subject have been enacted in Virginia and in this state, and these laws have been carefully revised, and the remedy extended, in the revisions of 1819, 1849, and 1868, and statutes since, in which the revisers have recognized the great importance and necessity of the proceeding, and have made it their special endeavor to render the law giving this remedy "clear, precise, and methodical," which has resulted in chapter 106 of the Code, (see Ed. 1891, p. 742,) giving, among other things, an attachment in equity, as well as at law, for a debt or claim, legal or equitable, owing to the greater flexibility and other advantages of the remedy in equity, and upon the claim, whether it be due or not, subject to certain provisos and conditions, (see latter clause of section 1, c. 106,) and with leave to file a supplemental affidavit in certain cases; thus showing a disposition to enlarge and advance the remedy, which, with a slight extension of the right to amend and supplement the affidavit, would be fully up to the most advanced Codes on the subject. The affidavit prescribed is short and simple. The plaintiff, or some credible person, shall state "the nature of the plaintiff's claim and the amount at the least which the affiant believes the plaintiff is justly entitled to recover," adding, in the case of foreign attachment, that the defendant is a nonresident of this state, and, in the case of a domestic attachment, some one or more of the grounds specified, with the material facts relied upon to show their existence. He shall state the amount, at the least, which he believes the plaintiff is justly entitled to recover. It is true this concise, clear, and precise formula is not sacramental, but it is nevertheless jurisdictional, and there should be a reasonable degree of certainty in so important a matter, being of interest to others as well as to the parties. It is true that, when the purchaser's title to the land attached and sold is hereafter impeached for insufficiency of the affidavit, the court may go a long way in the endeavor to uphold his title; but, where the question has been presented at the inception of the suit, the courts of this state, through a long course of decisions, have shown a disposition not to tolerate any experimentation, either by substitution or omission, with this part of the affidavit prescribed by the statute, but to abide by the words the lawmaker has seen fit to use, so that no clause, sentence, or word of this fundamental part of the affidavit shall be treated as superfluous or insignificant, and for the following reasons: (1) This part of the affidavit is short and simple. It is against public policy and general convenience to needlessly endanger the jurisdictional element of so important and useful a remedy, by involving it in the confusion and uncertainty of omitting words as meaningless, or replacing others with their equivalents. (2) It is due to the court that its time should not be consumed unnecessarily, in determining whether the word used by the affiant is the equivalent of the word used in the statute, or whether the word left out of the affidavit is insignificant, or is impliedly contained in some other word or phrase. (3) It is due to the purchaser of the land at the sale under the decree that the affidavit should follow the language prescribed by the statute. Then there is no room for courts to differ as to its sufficiency, and insufficiency in such a case may not be mere irregularity, but may make void the proceeding and the title under it. (4) The remedy, especially the one by domestic attachment, is harsh; sometimes wrongfully causing the financial shipwreck of some honest business man, without the possibility of indemnity by adequate redress. And as the statute gives so harsh a remedy, it is nothing but fair to the debtor that the plaintiff should pursue the remedy as given, on pain of having his attachment quashed. See the following authorities: Crim v. Harmon, 38 W. Va. —, 18 S. E. 753; Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. 409; Cosner's Adm'r v. Smith, 36 W. Va. 788, 15 S. E. 977; Ruhl v. Rogers, 29 W. Va. 779, 2 S. E. 798; Chapman v. Railway Co., 26 W. Va. 299, 322; Hudkins v. Haskins, 22 W. Va. 645; Delaplaln v. Armstrong, 21 W. Va. 211-213; Capehart v. Dowery, 10 W. Va. 130-135; Rittenhouse v. Harman, 7 W. Va. 380; Gutman v. Iron Co., 5 W. Va. 22; Baking Co. v. Bachman, 38 W. Va. —, 18 S. E. 382; Mantz v. Hendley, (1808) 2 Hen. & M. 306; Jones v. Anderson, 7 Leigh, 308-311, (1836.) From these cases we have a right to infer that it had become a matter of common observation that the remedy by attachment was sometimes perverted to gratify the ill will of the party against the debtor, and at other times was a contrivance to circumvent and get ahead of other creditors, or for some other mala fide purpose.

This is a domestic attachment, sued out on the ground of fraud in contracting the debt, part due and a part not due, and of converting, being about to convert, his property into money, etc., with intent to defraud his creditors, and that he had assigned his property with like intent. There are two affidavits, covering eight printed pages, but it is nowhere stated that affiant believes that the plaintiffs are justly entitled to recover the sum mentioned, $1,412.98. The word "justly" is omitted in both affidavits. But it is contended that the facts stated in the affidavit of plaintiff show with absolute certainty that the plaintiffs were justly entitled to recover in the suit the debt claimed therein. The affidavit does state the nature of the plaintiff's claim,—that is, that it arose out of contract between plaintiff and defendant, whereby, in consideration of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant at his special instance and request on the 11th day of August, 1891, plaintiffs were entitled to recover, etc. It does state the amount of the claim as being $1,412.98, at the least. It also shows that, of that sum, $612.87 was due at the date of the suit, and the balance, viz. $800.11, was not then due, but would be due four months after the 11th day of August, 1891, the date of the sale. It is contended that these facts, thus averred, show with certainty, not simply that affiant believes, but that plaintiff is entitled to recover the same in this suit. Still, all this, no matter what it may show or tend to show, is required by the statute to be stated, and, in addition thereto, the affiant is expressly required to state that he believes plaintiff is justly entitled to recover said sum in the action or suit. If the facts above stated show that plaintiff is justly entitled to recover the sum stated, then, on the theory of appellant's contention, it could all be omitted, and leave the affidavit sufficient, as being a substantial compliance with the requirement of the statute. It cannot be said that the particular words of this formula have not passed under the careful scrutiny of the lawmaker; for, as we now have it, it is, as we have seen, the result of many years of legislative consideration, and attention has been repeatedly directed to the terms "just," "justice," "justly," and, instead of being omitted as unmeaning or superfluous, they have been retained, or introduced where they were not to be found before. Hence, we must attribute to the legislature a deliberate, intelligent purpose to qualify the term "entitled to recover" with the term "justly," and thereby put the affiant under the stress of making a sworn statement that plaintiff is entitled to recover such sum,—not only justly entitled to recover it, as against the creditor, but also in regard to other creditors and other persons interested. In other words, that the claim, and the proceeding to recover it, are bona fide,—not set on foot from any improper motive, or for any unlawful purpose; and it would be contradicted when it was made to appear that affiant had sworn recklessly and falsely, or against his knowledge of the facts, as to the grounds of the attachment; and it is not meant merely as a guaranty that his claim, or the plaintiff's claim, is a just debt. If this view be correct, then this affidavit does not, in this respect, meet the requirements of the statute by any circumlocution or implication. But, grant that this omitted word does not make the phrase as comprehensive as we have supposed, why leave it out? If we turn to the statute, we find it there, (Code, c. 106, § 1;) if we turn to the form books, we find it there, (Hutch. Treat. § 1142, form 290;) and, upon principles of public policy and general convenience, in advancement of the remedy, and in aid of its usefulness, in relief of the courts, I do not think it error to require suitors by attachment to follow, in their affidavits, the language of the statute, on pain of having them quashed, although, if the jurisdiction depended alone on the sufficiency of the affidavit, and the title of the purchaser alone on the question of jurisdiction, the court might, by hunting through the whole affidavit, and by putting this and that implication together, make out enough to supply the deficiency. At this stage of the case, therefore, the court had a right to decline to search through the two affidavits to see if it could make out and supply, by implication, the one short line required by the statute, and put in the front, as the stem and support of all the rest of the affidavit, and as a guaranty that both the claims and the proceeding are bona fide. Judgment affirmed.

HARROW v. OHIO RIVER R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 20, 1894.)

CERTIORARI TO JUSTICE OF THE PEACE — WHEN LIES — ACTION AGAINST RAILROAD COMPANY — SERVICE OF AGENT — READING TO JURY FROM BOOKS.

1. The remedy by writ of certiorari, given by chapter 110 of the Code, to review the judgment of a justice, is not given as a matter of right, but is awarded by the court, or judge, for cause, on proper case shown.

2. A railroad company, by contract under seal, bound itself to make and maintain necessary cattle guards at the boundary lines of the premises of H., which it failed and neglected to do. Its trains, running through said premises, frightened and drove H.'s horse off his premises, through the gap where the cattle guard was to be made, into the premises of an adjoining owner, where the track was fenced, whereby and by reason whereof said train struck the horse, and caused its death. Held, the railroad company may be sued before a justice, and held liable therefor, as for a wrong, under section 23, c. 50, of the Code.

3. The summons to commence the suit before the justice may be served upon the freight and passenger agent of the company in the county where the suit is brought, and where such agent resides, according to section 34 of chapter 50.

4. The extent to which counsel may read to the jury, from law books, sound law, relevant to the case on trial, is left largely to the discretion of the trial judge, subject to review in case of abuse of discretion.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Jackson county; V. S. Armstrong, Judge.

Action by J. L. Harrow against the Ohio River Railroad Company to recover the value of a horse killed by defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff defendant brings error. Affirmed.

V. B. Archer and Warren Miller, for plaintiff in error. N. O. Prickitt and Wm. A. Parsons, for defendant in error.

HOLT, J. On the 22d day of January, 1892, plaintiff, J. L. Harrow, brought suit before a justice of Jackson county against the defendant railroad company for $300 damages for negligently killing his horse. It was tried by a jury. During the trial defendant saved, by bill of exceptions, various points ruled against him. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $137.78. Defendant moved for a new trial. The justice overruled the motion, and gave judgment. Defendant excepted, and had all the evidence certified, and then presented its petition to the judge of the circuit court for a writ of certiorari to the judgment; but the circuit court judge refused the writ, and to such order of refusal this writ of error was obtained. The defendant assigns as errors the various points saved by it in the action of the justice, overruling its various motions.

Error No. 1. The justice did not err in overruling defendant's motion to quash the summons,—it follows the form given in the statute,—nor in overruling the motion to quash the return of its service, for the return shows service on a freight and passenger agent of defendant residing in the county at the time, no other officer, etc., being then found in the county. See Code, c. 50, § 34. And the agent mentioned in this section, by section 20 of chapter 52, is construed to include a depot or station agent in the actual employment of the company, residing in the county wherein the action is brought. See Taylor v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 328, 13 S. E. 1009.

Error No. 2 is based on the action of the justice in overruling defendant's objection to the complaint filed by plaintiff. The pleadings in the justice's court are—First, the complaint by the plaintiff; second, the answer by the defendant. The complaint shall state, in a plain and direct manner, the facts constituting the cause of action, and, if more than one cause of action be stated therein, each shall be separately stated and numbered. Such pleadings are not required to be in any particular form, but must be such as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. Either party may except to a pleading of his adversary, when it is not sufficiently ex-PLICIT to be understood, or it contains no cause of action or defense. If the justice deem the exception well founded, he shall order the pleading to be amended, and, if the party refuse to amend, the defective pleading shall be disregarded. Code, c. 50, § 50. There are two counts in plaintiff's complaint. No. 1 states, in substance, that defendant so negligently and wrongfully ran and conducted its train that plaintiff's horse was killed by defendant by such wrongful and negligent running of its train. To this statement, or count, no objection is made. Count No. 2 states, in substance, that defendant, by written contract dated May 25, 1885, bound itself to make necessary cattle guards at the boundary lines of plaintiff's said farm, which defendant, though often requested, had neglected and refused to do; that defendant, by running its train through plaintiff's farm, drove plaintiff's horse from his land, where the cattle guards ought to have been made, onto the adjoining land, where it was killed by the negligence of defendant in running its train. The objection to this count is that it alleges a breach of contract, and cannot be joined with No. 1, which is for a wrong or tort, pure and simple. I do not think this exception well taken, and it was properly overruled by the justice. By it the killing of plaintiff's horse is stated to be due in part to the negligence of defendant in not making the cattle guards as it had, by written contract, bound itself to do. And the fact that it had bound itself by express contract to make the running of its trains through plaintiff's farm safe, in this respect, to his horses, does not make the breach of it, which is in whole or in part the proximate cause of the killing of this particular horse, any the less a wrong, within the meaning of the term as used in that part of chapter 50 of the Code which relates to the pleadings. See State v. Lambert, 24 W. Va. 399; Poole v. Dilworth, 26 W. Va. 583.

Error No. 3. The counsel for plaintiff, in his opening argument before the jury, began to read a certain part of the opinion of the court in Layne v. Railway Co., 35 W. Va. 438, 446, 14 S. E. 123. To this defendant objected, but the justice overruled the objection, and the counsel read from the opinion of the court, delivered by Judge Lucas, which states what was decided in the case of Washington v. Railroad Co., 17 W. Va. 190. The law read seems to be good law, and relevant to the case in hand, and, therefore, not ground of error. Gregory's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 37 W. Va. 606, 16 S. E. 819. If there was danger of misleading the jury, as there may have been, the defendant should have asked the justice to instruct them as to the different questions presented between the case then on trial before them and the one cited and read from, which was discussed and decided from the standpoint of a motion for a new trial, on the ground of want of evidence or insufficient evidence, after a jury had found a verdict. Here nothing was said or read encroaching upon the province of the justice to expound the law, or in defiance of any instruction given; but it was a pertinent point of law from an analogous case, which only needed the qualification already mentioned to make it useful, rather than misleading, and no doubt was intended for the court as well as the jury, as no instruction had been given, and as it is a common practice in this state to give them after the arguments to the jury, as well as before. It is quite obvious that such practice is liable to abuse, but, for the reasons given, I do not think there was any such abuse in this instance. For a discussion of the subject see 1 Thomp. Trials, § 945, et seq.; Com. v. Porter, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 263; Gregory's Adm'r v. Railway Co., 37 W. Va. 606, 16 S. E. 819, where the subject is fully examined and discussed.

Error No. 4. That the justice erred in not granting defendant's motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial; and this brings us to the facts of the case, as shown by the evidence certified by the justice. The plaintiff, J. L. Harrow, is the owner of a farm on the Ohio River Railroad, on Muses bottom, in Jackson county, W. Va., through which the defendant's railroad runs a distance of about 40 poles, or one-eighth of a mile. The plaintiff and defendant executed an agreement under seal, dated the 25th day of May, 1885, whereby plaintiff granted to the defendant the right of way in consideration of the sum of $110, and in consideration that the said company, among other things, should make and maintain necessary cattle guards at the boundary lines of said premises, which were bounded on the lower or south side by the premises of Mr. Howell. The defendant never made any of the cattle guards provided for in the contract, though it had been notified and requested by plaintiff to do so. He was the owner of the horse in question, a gelding three and one-half years old and worth $150. This horse was killed by the running of defendant's south-bound freight train on the night of the 15th and 16th of September, 1891, under the following circumstances: On the night in question this horse and another of plaintiff's came out of plaintiff's hill field, which reached down within 200 yards of the track, into the bottom field, through which the railroad runs, having pushed down the two fences between the two fields, and having crossed the track, which was not fenced. He was on the west or river side of the track, 250 feet above the line between the land of Howell and plaintiff's land, about 40 feet from the railroad; and, being frightened by the approaching down freight train, about 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, he ran down the railroad keeping about 40 feet from it, till he came to the dividing line between plaintiff and Howell, which was fenced on the dividing line from the right of way, and on the Howell farm the right of way was also fenced. The horse, instead of turning from the railroad and running off down this dividing fence toward the river, ran straight on into this lane on the Howell land, along defendant's inclosed right of way, and after running about 100 feet from the dividing line he got onto the track, and after running on the track some 150 feet he was struck by the train, crippling him so badly that he had to be killed. The track was straight from where he started to where he was struck, about 350 feet, and for about 200 or 300 yards above where he started, when scared by the train. The morning was clear when he was found. It had rained a little in the night. The railroad was nearly on a level with the place from which he started; where he was struck, there was a fill. The horse could not have passed from plaintiff's land into the lane where he was struck, had the cattle guards been there as contracted for, but none were ever made. He would have remained in plaintiff's field, where he could have escaped either way, the track not being fenced. The horse was young, large, broke to work, and was worth $150. The engineer of this south-bound freight train did not see the horse, but knew when they struck an obstruction at that place; was looking ahead at the time; had the cab window in front closed; from moisture on the window, or fog, could not see any distance ahead. The fireman's testimony is, in substance, the same.

The jury evidently based their verdict on the failure and neglect of defendant to build the cattle guard. The evidence tends to show that the running of the train, together with such neglect, was the direct, proximate cause of the accident; for, if that had been built, the horse could not have run into the railroad lane on the Howell land where he was killed, but, in all likelihood, would have veered off on his own side.

This statutory writ of certiorari is intended as a method whereby the rulings of the justice, etc., may be reviewed, especially his rulings granting or refusing to set aside verdicts; and the scope and tenor of the act show plainly that it was intended that the circuit court should be liberal in granting it, so far as it is a substitute for appeal from the judgment of a justice, so that the petitioner may have the judgment of the justice reviewed upon the merits, and such judgment or order made upon the whole matter as law and justice may require. Yet the language of the act does not warrant the construction that the writ is given as matter of right. See Code, c. 110, § 4. Upon a review of the judgment of the justice upon the merits, as it arises on a consideration of the law and evidence, we are of opinion that there is no error therein, and that the writ of certiorari was not improperly refused by the judge of the circuit court.

JENKINS v. BENNETT et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 22, 1894.)

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL—DEATH OF PARTY—ACTION WHEN SURVIVES—INSPECTION OF PAPERS IN POSSESSION OF ADVERSE PARTY—AFFIDAVIT—SUFFICIENCY.

1. A complaint alleging that plaintiff contracted to do certain work for a specified price, that he was prevented by defendants from performing it, and asking damages resulting from the loss of profits which he expected to make, states an action in tort which does not survive the death of defendants.

2. An order to compel defendant to furnish papers in his possession to plaintiff for inspection should not be granted on an affidavit alleging that such papers "contain evidence relating to the merits of the action," as such allegation is no more than an expression of plaintiff's "opinion," and not a statement of a "fact."

3. It was further ground to deny the motion that the affidavit did not show that any demand to be permitted to make the inspection had been made and refused.

4. Under Code, § 389, providing that the court may order either party to give to the other within a specified time an inspection of papers in his possession containing evidence relating to the merits of the action, and that, if compliance with the order be refused, the party refusing may be punished, a penalty for such refusal should not be imposed till it is ascertained judicially that such refusal was without good reason.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Charleston county; J. B. Kershaw, Judge.

Action by Edward N. Jenkins against Elizabeth H. Bennett and Mary J. Ross to recover damages resulting from defendants preventing plaintiff from performing work which he had contracted to perform for defendants. Pending the action, Bennett died, and Ross was appointed her administrator. The court made an order continuing the action against the representative of Bennett and against Ross individually, and made a further order requiring defendants to furnish certain papers in their possession to plaintiff for inspection. From both orders defendants appeal. Reversed.

The following is the complaint: "The above-named plaintiff, Edward N. Jenkins, complaining of the above-named defendants, Elizabeth H. Bennett and Mary J. Ross, alleges: First. That the plaintiff is a contractor and builder, residing in Charleston county, South Carolina, and that the above-named defendants were, at the times hereinafter mentioned, seised in fee simple and the owners of a certain piece of property known as the 'Old American Hotel,' situate on the corner of King and George streets, in the city and county of Charleston, state aforesaid. Second. That on the 1st day of October, 1890, said defendants, by their agent, John H. Devereux, architect, published in the Charleston News and Courier, the following advertisement: 'Office of John H. Devereux, Architect, Charleston, S. C., September 29, 1890. Proposals will be received until Monday, the 20th day of October, 1890, for the work of furnishing the materials and labor required to alter and improve the Old American Hotel property, at the corner of King and George streets, according to plans and specifications to be seen at my office and at the rooms of the Builders' and Dealers' Exchange, in this city. The bids will be open at 12 m. on Monday, 20th October, 1890, by the president of the Builders' and Dealers' Exchange, in the presence of the architect and such of the bidders as may desire to be present. The right is reserved to reject any and all bids. John H. Devereux, Architect.' Third. That thereafter, in response to said advertisement, on the 20th day of October, A. D. 1890, this plaintiff, at the Builders' and Dealers' Exchange aforesaid, according to the terms of said advertisement, offered to John H. Devereux, agent of said defendants, and put in a bid to do said work as aforesaid, and furnish the labor and material therefor in accordance with said plans and specifications, for the sum of nineteen thousand and two hundred dollars. Fourth. That the defendants, through their agent, the said John H. Devereux, thereupon accepted the said bid of this plaintiff, and thereby contracted and agreed to pay this plaintiff nineteen thousand and two hundred dollars in consideration of the performance by this plaintiff of the work of furnishing the materials and labor required to alter and improve the Old American Hotel property, at the corner of King and George streets, aforesaid, according to said plans and specifications so contracted and agreed by this plaintiff with the defendants to be done by this plaintiff at said price. Fifth. That then and thereafter this plaintiff was always ready, able, and willing to perform the said contract on his part, and duly offered then forthwith and from time to time to perform and complete the same, and to do all things necessary and usual for securing the same to be done. Sixth. That said defendants, in breach of the said contract, thereafter continuously hindered and prevented this plaintiff from performing the same, to the damage of this plaintiff by the loss of the direct profits on said contract in the sum of five thousand dollars. Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against said defendants in the sum of five thousand dollars, together with the costs of this action."

McCrary, Sons & Bacot, for appellants.
Northrop & Memminger, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This action was commenced by the plaintiff against the defendants on the 12th of October, 1891, to recover damages for the loss of profits on a contract which he alleged the defendants hindered and prevented him from performing. In the complaint (a copy of which should be incorporated in the report of the case) the plaintiff alleges substantially as follows: (1) That he is a contractor and builder, and that the defendants were "seised in fee simple and the owners of" certain real property in the city of Charleston, known as the "Old American Hotel." (2) That on the 1st day of October, 1890, the defendants, by their agent, Devereux, an architect, advertised for proposals "for the work of furnishing the materials and labor required to alter and improve the Old American Hotel property * * * according to plans and specifications" to be seen at the office of said architect and at the rooms of the Builders' & Dealers' Exchange, and that the bids would be opened at said exchange on the 20th day of October, 1890; the right of rejecting any and all bids being reserved. (3) That on said 20th of October the plaintiff put in a bid to do said work, and furnish the labor and materials therefor, according to said plans and specifications, for the sum of $19,200. (4) That defendants, by their said agent, accepted said bid, "and thereby contracted and agreed to pay this plaintiff nineteen thousand and two hundred dollars in consideration of the performance by this plaintiff of the work of furnishing the materials and labor required" to do the work advertised for. (5) "That then and thereafter this plaintiff was always ready, able, and willing to perform the said contract on his part, and duly offered then forthwith and from time to time" to perform the same. (6) That said defendants, in breach of the said contract, thereafter continuously hindered and prevented this plaintiff from performing the same, to the damage of this plaintiff, by the loss of the direct profits on said contract, in the sum of five thousand dollars," for which sum, with costs, judgment is demanded. After issue was joined, the defendant Elizabeth H. Bennett departed this life intestate, and on the 24th of February, 1891, letters of administration upon her personal estate were duly granted to the other defendant, Mary J. Ross; and on the 3d of March, 1892, a notice was served on Messrs. McCrady, Sons & Bacot, defendants' attorneys, (they having signed the original answer of the defendants as such,) of a motion "to continue the above-named action against Mary J. Ross, as administratrix of Elizabeth H. Bennett, deceased, and against her individually." This motion was heard by his honor, Judge Kershaw, who granted an order continuing the action "against the representative of the said Elizabeth H. Bennett, deceased, and also against Mary J. Ross individually." From this order Mary J. Ross, in her own right, and as administratrix of Elizabeth H. Bennett, appeals upon the several grounds set out in the record, which need not be set out here, as they raise substantially but a single question, to wit, whether the right of action in this action survives. The solution of this depends largely upon the nature of the action,—whether it is an action ex contractu or an action ex delicto. If it is the former, then the general rule is that the right of action does survive; but, if the latter, then it does not, unless the wrong which is the basis of the action has resulted in some gain or advantage to the estate of the wrongdoer. Huff v. Watkins, 20 S. C. 477, and especially the case of Caldwell v. Ford, Riley, 285, 286, where Richardson, J., explains the reason for the exception to the general rule that actions ex delicto do not survive. Now, what is the nature of the present action? To answer this question we must look alone to the allegations of the complaint, for that contains all that we can properly know of it. Looking to that source, we find that, while the complaint does set forth a contract that the plaintiff was to do certain work for the defendants, in consideration whereof the defendants were to pay the plaintiff a specified sum of money, yet there is no allegation of any breach of that contract; and it is difficult to conceive how any such allegation could have been made, for under the contract, as stated in the complaint, there was no duty or obligation imposed upon the defendants until after the work was done; and, as there is no allegation that any work was ever done, it is somewhat difficult to understand how it could be said with any propriety that the defendants had committed any breach of such contract. There is no allegation that the plaintiff had incurred any expense or made any outlay in preparation for the work, or that plaintiff had been deprived of the opportunity to obtain another job, but the only wrong complained of is that he was hindered and prevented by the defendants from performing said work, and the only damages claimed is, not any actual damages sustained by reason of loss of time or expense incurred in preparing to do the work, but simply the damages resulting from the loss of profits which he expected to make by performing the contract. It is also to be observed that the complaint does not state how the plaintiff was prevented by the defendants from performing the contract, but how that was effected is left entirely to conjecture. If this was effected by the use of force or other like means, if the defendants had unlawfully procured the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff, or had driven him from the country, then, clearly, the wrong complained of would have been a tort, remediable by an action ex delicto, and not by an action ex contractu. The wrong complained of was not any breach of the terms of the contract, nor did it arise out of any expense incurred in preparing to perform the work contracted for, as none such is alleged, but the only wrong complained of is hindering and preventing plaintiff from performing said work by some means not stated; and that was clearly a tort, and not a breach of the contract set forth in the complaint. In Hammond v. Railroad Co., 6 S. C. 130, the plaintiff, who was a mail agent, intrusted with the charge of mail matter transported over the railroad of the defendant company, under a contract with the United States government, one of the terms of which was that the mail agent should be transported free of charge, brought his action to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the defendant while traveling over said railroad. The court held that the action was ex delicto, and not ex contractu; for the contract under which the plaintiff was transported free of charge had nothing to do with the matter, the wrong complained of being the tort of the defendant company. This, then, according to our view, being an action ex delicto, and not an action ex contractu, and there being no allegations in the complaint which would bring this case under any of the recognized exceptions to the general rule, we must hold that the circuit judge erred in holding that plaintiff's right of action survived, and in granting the order appealed from.

The defendants also appeal from another order made in this case, requiring the defendants or their representatives to permit the plaintiff or his attorneys or agents to inspect and take copies of certain papers mentioned in the order. In the notice of the motion for said order it is stated that the motion would be based upon the pleadings in the action and the accompanying affidavit of the plaintiff. In that affidavit it is, among other things, stated "that subsequently to the publication of said advertisement [referring to the advertisement hereinbefore referred to, calling for bids to furnish materials and do the work proposed to be done on the Old American Hotel] there was a written contract entered into by these defendants and one John D. Murphy to perform the work and furnish the materials for remodeling the said American Hotel." And it is further stated "that said plans and specifications [referring to the plans and specifications originally prepared by the architect, Devereux] and said contract contain evidence relating to the merits of the above-named action; that he has not the possession and control of said papers, nor has he copies thereof, but deponent says he verily believes that the same are in the possession or under the control of defendants or their representatives." Upon this showing the order in question was granted, which concludes in these words: "Further ordered that, if the defendants or their representatives fail to comply with this order, that said papers shall be excluded on the trial of the cause if offered in evidence by defendants or on their behalf, and that plaintiff be allowed to give parol evidence of their contents if he be so advised; or this order may be enforced by attachment as for contempt. That plaintiff have ten dollars costs herein." Section 389 of the Code, upon which the application for this order is based, or rather so much thereof as relates to this matter, reads as follows: "The court before which an action is pending, or a judge or justice thereof, may, in their discretion, and upon due notice, order either party to give to the other, within a specified time, an inspection and copy, or permission to take a copy, of any books, papers and documents in his possession or under his control, containing evidence relating to the merits of the action or the defense therein. If compliance with the order be refused, the court, on motion, may exclude the paper from being given in evidence, or punish the party refusing, or both." Inasmuch as we are satisfied that the order in question was erroneously granted on other grounds, we will not stop now to consider whether the doubt expressed as to the scope and intention of this section in Cartee v. Spence, 24 S. C., at page 558, is or is not well founded, especially as it does not appear from the moving papers in this case whether the object of the inspection asked for is to obtain evidence to be used by the plaintiff, or to ascertain what is the documentary evidence to be used by the defendants. We think it clear that before this somewhat extraordinary power should be exercised, the moving party should show, at least prima facie, such fact or facts as would enable the court to exercise its discretion as to whether such a power as is invoked should be exercised. Now, in this case, no facts of any kind are stated in the affidavit upon which the motion was based. The bald statement that the papers desired to be inspected "contain evidence relating to the merits of the action" is nothing more than an expression of the plaintiff's opinion, and cannot be regarded as a statement of any fact. Again, we think that there should be some statement showing a necessity for the exercise of such a power. It does not appear that any request or demand to be permitted to make the inspection has been made and refused. For aught that appears, such a demand or request would have been complied with; and this, we think, ought to have appeared, especially before any order mulcting defendants with costs should have been granted. In addition to this, it does appear that plaintiff had already enjoyed the opportunity of inspecting the plans and specifications for a period of at least 20 days, which we must infer the plaintiff had availed himself; and no reason is stated, or even suggested, why another inspection was necessary. As to the contract alleged to have been made with Murphy, it is impossible for us to conceive how it could throw any possible light upon the merits of the present action. Indeed, so far as appears, an order requiring the inspection of any other papers in any way relating to the Old American Hotel property might just as well have been asked as for the inspection of the contract with Murphy. We do not think that the power conferred by section 389 of the Code can be invoked for the purpose of gratifying mere idle curiosity, or possibly a worse motive, though, of course, we are not to be understood as even intimating that the plaintiff was actuated by any improper motive in applying for the order in question, but we are simply considering the conditions upon which the power conferred by that section can be exercised. It seems to us that the order was erroneously granted, and should therefore be reversed; not because the circuit judge erred in the exercise of his discretion, but because the moving papers showed no facts upon which his discretion could be exercised.

As to the appeal from that portion of the order imposing the costs of the motion upon the defendants, it may be possible that we would have no authority to consider it if it stood alone, but when the order is reversed the provision requiring payment of costs must go with the order. See Singleton v. Allen, 2 Strob. Eq. 166. We must add, however, that we do not think this was a case for costs, unless it had appeared that the order asked for was rendered necessary by the refusal of defendants to allow the inspection of the papers referred to.

We must also say that we think it was error to impose a penalty, especially so harsh a one as an attachment for contempt, before it was ascertained judicially that defendants had refused or failed to comply with the order without good reason. It seems to us that the provisions of the section of the Code above referred to plainly imply that upon the refusal or failure to comply with the order a motion should be made, under a rule to show cause, for the imposition of the penalty, as it may be that the defendants might be able, in their return to such rule, to show sufficient reason for their failure to comply. See Mills Co. v. Walker, 19 S. C., at pages 112, 113. The judgment of this court is that both of the orders appealed from be reversed.

STATE v. JENNINGS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 15, 1894.)

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Laurens county; W. H. Wallace, Judge.

G. T. Jennings was convicted of murder, and appeals. He now moves that the appeal be suspended to enable him to move for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. Denied.

Ball, Simkins & Ball, Ferguson & Featherstone, and R. C. Watts, for appellant. Mr. Schumpert, for the State.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case, having been convicted of murder, and having perfected his appeal from the judgment of the circuit court, now moves to suspend the appeal for the purpose of enabling him to move for a new trial in the circuit court upon the ground of after-discovered evidence. Under the well-settled practice of this court it is necessary that the appellant should make such a prima facie showing as would satisfy this court that this was a proper case for the granting of the motion submitted by the appellant. After a careful consideration of the affidavits upon which the motion is made, we cannot say that such a showing has been made. It is therefore ordered that the motion be refused.

DOMINICK v. ROOF, Ex-Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 21, 1893.)

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Lexington county.

Action by F. H. Dominick, administrator, against S. M. Roof, ex-sheriff. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Dismissed.

Meetze & Muller, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. It appearing to the satisfaction of this court that the papers required to be filed herein, by consent order dated 18th December, 1893, by 11 o'clock this day, have not been filed. On motion of Messrs. Meetze & Muller, attorneys for respondent, it is ordered that the appeal herein be, and is hereby, dismissed.

REEVES et al. v. BRAYTON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 20, 1893.)

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Edgefield county.

Action by Sarah N. Reeves and others against Helen B. Brayton. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Dismissed.

Allston & Patton, for appellants. Bachman & Youmans, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal, based on the following notice and grounds: "Plaintiffs' attorneys will please take notice that the defendant will move the supreme court on Monday, December 17th, 1893, at 11 o'clock a. m., or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, to dismiss the appeal herein on the grounds (1) that the matter appealed from is not appealable; (2) that this court has not jurisdiction to hear and determine the exceptions herein, and the questions they involve, under the appeal herein. Bachman & Youmans." After hearing argument pro and con, the court granted the following order: "The State of South Carolina. In the Supreme Court. Sarah N. Reeves, Mary O. Pope, Eliza A. Lewis, Robert N. Lewis, Lena Lewis, William Lewis, and Daniel B. Lewis, Plaintiffs, Appellants, against Helen B. Brayton, Defendant, Respondent. On hearing respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal herein, and the argument of Mr. Le Roy F. Youmans, for respondent, pro, and of Mr. H. C. Patton, for appellants, contra, and it appearing that there is no appealable matter from which the appeal has been taken, ordered, that the motion be granted, and the appeal be dismissed. This order is without prejudice to plaintiffs' right to take such legal steps hereafter as she may be advised, no opinion beyond the point decided being intimated."

O'LEARY v. BRADLEY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 3, 1894.)

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of York county.

Action by George H. O'Leary against A. J. Bradley and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. The appeal was dismissed by the clerk, and defendants now move to reinstate, while plaintiff makes another for dismissal. Reinstatement denied.

J. P. Thomas, Jr., for appellants. Geo. W. S. Hart, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. There are three motions in this case, as follows: (1) The defendant, appellant, moves for an order vacating the order of the clerk dismissing the appeal under rule 1, and to reinstate the same, on the ground of excusable neglect on the part of the appellant. (2) The plaintiff, respondent, moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground of failure on the part of the appellant to file the "case," as settled, in the office of the clerk of the circuit court, as required by rule 49 of the circuit court, in the event of the first motion being granted. (3) The plaintiff moves for an order dissolving the order of injunction, granted by Mr. Associate Justice Pope pending the motion made by the defendant, appellant, to reinstate his appeal. The appellant submitted various affidavits in support of his motion, and the respondent submitted affidavits in reply thereto. After hearing counsel on both sides, the court decides as follows: The real question is whether the appellant has made such a showing of "excusable neglect" as will entitle him, under the rule of this court, to have his appeal reinstated. If this is decided adversely the motion of the respondent to dismiss, under rule 49 of the circuit court, does not arise and need not be considered. The motion to dissolve the order of injunction is dependent on the result of the first motion. There is no doubt as to the right of the clerk to dismiss the appeal, under rule 1, upon the affidavit submitted to him, and no question has been raised as to that. It does seem to us, without going into all the minute details of this case, that the appellant has not shown any sufficient reason for his neglect. The notice of intention to appeal was given as far back as 27th April, 1893. But, without discussing all the details, we are impressed with the belief that there has not been shown any excusable neglect in appellant's failure to file his return as required by the rule. The motion must therefore be refused.

The court granted the following order: "State of South Carolina. In the Supreme Court. Geo. H. O'Leary, (Respondent,) Plaintiff, against A. J. Bradley (Appellant) and others, (Respondents,) Defendants. The appeal herein was dismissed by the clerk of this court, under rules 1 and 2, and the appellant (A. J. Bradley) moves to reinstate the appeal. The respondent resists the motion, and moves to dissolve the order of injunction herein, granted by Hon. Y. J. Pope, one of the justices of this court, on November 1, 1893, staying the sale of the land by the clerk of the circuit court for York county in this state. After due consideration: Ordered, that the motion to reinstate the appeal be refused; and, the motion to reinstate having been denied, ordered, further, that the order of injunction, staying the sale of the land by the clerk of the circuit court for York county, be and the same is hereby dissolved. Let the papers be filed with this order."

STATE v. GREEN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 13, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW — CONFESSION OF CO-CONSPIRATOR — OPINION EVIDENCE.

1. A confession by a conspirator after the crime is accomplished binds him, but not his co-conspirators.

2. Where the witness had traced before the jury the peculiarities of accused's foot, and had shown how such peculiarities were reproduced in a track, it was error for him to express his opinion that the track which he saw was made by accused.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Laurens county; W. H. Wallace, Judge.

Charles Green was convicted of arson, and appeals. Reversed.

Defendant appealed from the judgment and verdict on the following grounds: "(1) Because his honor erred in refusing to charge the jury that if they believed that any confessions introduced in evidence were not made freely and voluntarily, without any inducement or circumstances inciting hope of favor in the mind of the accused, or without any threat or violence producing conclusion or fear of punishment in the mind of the accused, they must not take such evidence into consideration. (2) Because his honor erred in charging the jury that whether the confessions of George Bowers and Wade Cannon were admissible in evidence was a question for the court, and not for the jury; and after it goes to the jury they are not to consider the question of its admissibility, but whether or not they believe it, and its force and effect. (3) That his honor erred in allowing state's witness D. H. A. Mason to make prejudicial remarks on the witness stand, not connected with the case, and calculated to inflame the minds of the jurors against the prisoner. (4) Because his honor erred in allowing state's witness D. H. A. Mason to give his opinion as to when Charley Green ought to have been hung, and also to name special instances of his bad conduct. (5) Because his honor erred in allowing state's witness T. L. Johnson to give his opinion that a certain track found in the field was that of the defendant, Charley Green. (6) Because his honor erred in ruling that, if a conspiracy was established, the confession of one codefendant is the testimony of all. (7) Because his honor erred in refusing to charge, without modification, the fourth request, and in saying to the jury: 'In order to convict upon such testimony as that,—upon the testimony of circumstances,—the jury must be satisfied that the existence of these circumstances are consistent with the prisoner's guilt, and inconsistent with his innocence, because, if they are not inconsistent with his innocence, then there is reasonable doubt of his guilt, so far as these circumstances are concerned.' (8) Because his honor erred in charging the jury that, in order to constitute guilt in a felony, it is not necessary that all the parties charged should actually participate in the act which of itself constitutes the offense. If they are present, knowing of, aiding, abetting, concurring, inciting, participating in, in any way, they are all felones upon an equal footing,—they are all principal felons. (9) Because his honor erred in stating to the jury that 'It is proven here, and admitted, that the house was set fire to in the nighttime, and consumed, by others than the owner thereof.' (10) Because his honor erred in admitting in evidence the confessions of George Bowers and Wade Cannon."

J. Wright Nash, for appellant. O. L. Schumpert, for the State.

POPE, J. The appellant was tried and convicted of the crime of arson at the July term, 1893, of the court of general sessions for Laurens county, and, after having been duly sentenced, has appealed therefrom. His grounds of appeal, 10 in number, will be set out in the report of the case, and hence will not be reproduced here. After a careful examination of these suggestions of error, we find that two are well taken, thereby necessitating a new trial in the court below.

The first of these is raised by an exception at the trial to the competency of the confessions of two defendants, of whom the appellant was not one, made after the crime had been fully consummated, to affect the accused, who was not a party to such confession, on the alleged ground, as ruled by the circuit judge, "that, if a conspiracy is established, what one says is the testimony of all." Such is not the rule of law. The circuit judge for the moment overlooked the marked distinction between the acts and declarations of parties to a conspiracy before the object is actually reached, on the one side, and the acts or declarations of any party to such conspiracy, made after the object of the conspiracy is reached, on the other side. There is no doubt but that, when persons have banded themselves together to accomplish some crime, every word or act of each conspirator in furtherance of such accomplishment of the crime binds every other of such conspirators. But it is equally true that, when once a conspiracy is ended, no such ligament binds each co-conspirator, so that a confession of any one or more of such co-conspirators binds all who conspired. The confession binds him who makes it, but not his fellow conspirators. State v. Dobson, 14 S. C. 628; State v. Brown, 34 S. C. 46, 12 S. E. 662; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 333.

The next error below consisted in allowing Mr. Thomas L. Johnson, a witness for the state, to give his opinion that a track in dispute was made by the accused, Charles Green, against the objection of his counsel. The witness was evidently intelligent and conscientious. It was perfectly competent for him to trace minutely before the jury the peculiarities of the foot of the accused, and also how these peculiarities were reproduced in the track the witness saw. Beyond this we fear he ought not to have been required to go,—we mean in expressing his opinion that the track was made by Green. Such an inference should have been left to the jury. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 440; State v. Senn, 32 S. C. 400, 11 S. E. 292.

We do not deem it our duty, having been forced to the conclusion that a new trial must be had, to discuss the other alleged objections of the appellant, especially as we find no error there. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the cause be remanded, to the end that there may be a new trial of the defendant, Charles Green.

McIVER, C. J. I concur in the result only, as I am not now prepared to commit myself upon the questions raised by the first and second exceptions.

NURNBERGER'S ESTATE v. LUDEKINS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 16, 1894.)

MARRIED WOMAN—POWER TO ADMINISTER ESTATES.

Act 1891, (20 St. p. 1121.) giving a married woman the same power to contract as if single, except as to suretyship and guaranty, empowers her to sign an administration bond as principal, and therefore to administer an estate.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Aiken county; T. B. Fraser, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of C. F. Nurnberger, deceased. Petition of C. F. Nurnberger, Jr., for revocation of letters of administration granted to Mrs. Elizabeth Ludekins. From a judgment of the circuit court affirming the decree of the probate court dismissing the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Patterson & Holman, for appellant. Henderson Bros., for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. There is no controversy about the facts, which are admitted as follows: C. F. Nurnberger, a resident of Aiken county, died intestate, and his eldest sister, Mrs. Elizabeth Ludekins, filed her petition in the probate court of Aiken county to have granted to her letters of administration upon his estate. She was and is a married woman. The probate judge, after the publication of the usual citation, calling upon the kindred and creditors of the deceased to show cause why letters of administration should not be granted to the petitioner, on the — day of October, 1892, granted her such letters, and, having given the bond required by the probate court, she entered upon the discharge of her trust. Within a short time thereafter, but after the time allowed to appeal therefrom had expired, on November 25, 1892, C. F. Nurnberger, Jr., a nephew of the deceased intestate, filed in the probate court his petition praying that the letters of administration granted to Mrs. Elizabeth Ludekins should be revoked, upon the ground that she was a married woman, and therefore not entitled to letters. It seems that the petitioner was a resident of Barnwell county, adjoining that of Aiken, where the citation was published; but he does not claim that he had no notice of the application of Mrs. Ludekins, and he makes no charge of fraud against her or the court in regard to the grant of letters. The probate court rendered a decree dismissing the petition, on grounds stated. The petitioner appealed to the circuit court, and his honor, Judge Fraser, dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the decree of the probate court, saying: "I feel constrained to dismiss the appeal for the reasons given by the probate judge, and for the further reason that it seems to me that under the act of 1891 a married woman may become the administratrix of an estate. She becomes administratrix by signing a bond, and this is a contractual act, which is not inhibited by said act, but is covered by its terms." Another appeal now comes to this court, upon substantially two grounds, as follows: (1) Because his honor erred in holding that the previous grant of letters of administration to Elizabeth Ludekins was conclusive against the right of the petitioner (C. F. Nurnberger) to have the same annulled in this proceeding; (2) that his honor erred in holding that Elizabeth Ludekins, being a married woman, could take upon herself the duties of administratrix of an estate, and that such power was conferred upon her by the act of 1891.

It will be observed that, in the order required in the appointment of administrators by section 1893 of the General Statutes, a sister has priority over a nephew, and therefore Mrs. Ludekins has the better right to the administration, unless, under the law existing at the time of her appointment, she was without power or right, as a married woman, to receive the office and discharge the duties thereof. This is really the only question in the case. Did Mrs. Ludekins, a married woman, have that power, under the law, at the time of her appointment? Under the constitution of 1868, and the first laws passed under it, there has been much discussion as to what were the powers and rights of married women in this state. But, as we think, it can hardly be necessary to open the argument here, since the passage of the act of 1891, (20 St. p. 1121.) which provides as follows: "A married woman shall have the right to purchase any species of property in her own name, and to take proper legal conveyances therefor, and to bind herself by contract in the same manner and to the same extent as though she were unmarried, which contracts shall be legal and obligatory, and may be enforced at law or in equity by or against such married woman in her own name, apart from her husband: provided that nothing herein shall enable such married woman to become an accommodation indorser or surety; nor shall she be liable on any promise to pay the debt or answer for the default or liability of any other person; and provided further that the husband shall not be liable for the debts of the wife, contracted prior to or after their marriage, except for necessary support, and that of their minor children residing with her," etc. This act is clear and unequivocal in its terms. The case does not fall within either of the exceptions made, and we therefore feel constrained to concur with the probate and the circuit judges that the signing of an administration bond is a contractual act, which is not inhibited by the act, but, on the contrary, is covered by its express terms. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WALKER v. CHESTER COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 16, 1894.)

HIGHWAYS—DEFECTS—PLEADING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Gen. St. § 1087, giving the right of action against the county for damages for defects in roads, as amended in 1892 by the proviso that the person injured has not himself caused the injury or negligently contributed thereto, requires the complaint to affirmatively disclaim contributory negligence.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Chester county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Bersha H. Walker against Chester county for damages for injuries caused by a defect in a highway. Demurrer sustained, and complaint dismissed. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry & Gage, for appellant. Will A. Barber, for respondent.

MCGOWAN, J. This was an action to recover damages, alleged to have been sustained by reason of a defective highway. The complaint stated that on February 23, 1893, the plaintiff was passing along the public highway of Chester county on the Worthy's ferry road, at a point between Dry Fork and the intersection of the said road by the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway, and that by reason of a defect in the repair of the said road the buggy which conveyed the plaintiff was overturned and broken, the horse which drew plaintiff was held fast in the mire so that it had to be prized out, the harness upon the horse was broken, the plaintiff was bruised and injured in her person, and her wearing apparel was utterly ruined; that the defect in said highway consisted in a bog, caused by the excessive accumulations of water and the wear of passing wheels; that its existence was well known to the proper authorities of the defendant, and was the result of their gross negligence, as plaintiff verily believes; that by reason of the injuries suffered by the plaintiff in her person and property, and enumerated in paragraph 1 hereof, she has been damaged in the sum of $250, etc. The defendant answered, denying each and every statement in the said complaint contained; that if the highway referred to in the complaint was defective, it was due to providential causes, and not to any carelessness on the part of the defendant county, or its agents or servants; that the defendant and its agents and servants used due care and diligence in repairing said highway and keeping the same in good repair; and that, if the plaintiff were injured in her person or property, such injury was not caused by any negligence or carelessness on the part of the defendant or its agents and servants, but was owing to the carelessness and negligence of the plaintiff herself, etc. The cause came on to be heard at the October term, 1893, before Judge Gary and a jury, when the defendant interposed an oral demurrer on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it failed to allege that the plaintiff did not in any way bring about her injury or damage by her own act, or negligently contribute thereto; and, further, that it failed to allege that at the time of the injury the plaintiff's load did not exceed the ordinary weight, etc. The judge sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the complaint, whereupon the plaintiff appeals to this court, upon the ground that the judge erred in holding that the complaint failed to state a cause of action in the plaintiff against the defendant, in that it failed to allege that the plaintiff "did not negligently contribute to the accident set out in the complaint," etc.

The only question in the case is whether the circuit judge erred in sustaining the demurrer on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. As we understand it, a county was not liable at common law in a civil action for injuries received from defects in the repair of highways, bridges, etc. See Young v. City Council of Charleston, 20 S. C. 116. But the legislature, (section 1087 of the General Statutes,) by act gave a right of action to persons suffering damage through a defect in the repairs of roads, etc., but denied damages to persons hauling "loads" in excess of the ordinary weight; but, while this was the law, it was held that the general rule as to contributory negligence applied, but could only be shown as matter of defense. See Acker v. Anderson Co., 20 S. C. 495, and All v. Barnwell Co., 29 S. C. 161, 7 S. E. 58. This was the law until the amendment of 1892 was passed, which added the following remedial provisions, all in one section of the act, and clearly within the purview of the same: "Provided such person has not in any way brought about such injury or damage by his own act, or negligently contributed thereto. If such defect in any road, causeway or bridge existed before such injury or damage occurred, such damage shall not be recovered by the person so injured, if his load exceeded the ordinary weight. Provided further, that such county shall not be liable unless such defect was occasioned by its neglect or mismanagement," etc. This action was commenced after this amendment became law, and now the question arises for the first time as to its proper construction. It will be observed that no reference is made to it in the complaint, which was framed just as if the amendment had never been passed. Was it necessary that the complaint should have stated affirmatively that the plaintiff "had not brought about the injury or damages by her own act or negligently contributed thereto"? If not, we cannot understand what was accomplished by the amendment. We can hardly suppose that the lawmakers meant to more than simply to reaffirm the law as it then stood. One of the established rules of construction is that it will not be presumed that the legislature intended any part of a statute to be entirely without meaning. The legislature was restating the terms and conditions upon which damages, in a civil action, might be recovered from a county; and we rather suppose that the intention was to change the law as to contributory negligence being only a matter of defense, and to make it necessary to a right of action that the complaint should allege, as a part of the plaintiff's cause of action, that he had not in any way brought about such injury or damage by his own act, or negligently contributed thereto, the effect being merely to shift the burden of proof. The right of action being purely statutory, the proof should fulfill every requirement of the statute, and to do so it was necessary that the complaint itself should contain appropriate allegations to sustain that proof. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McIVER, O. J. I concur in the result. The right of action in this case being based entirely upon a special statute, it seems to me that the conditions upon which such right is conferred must appear in the complaint, for otherwise no right of action is stated.

STATE v. MORGAN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 17, 1894.)

MURDER—DRUNKENNESS AS A DEFENSE—ACCIDENTAL KILLING—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Drunkenness of defendant at the time of committing a homicide cannot be considered in determining intent as bearing on malice.

2. An instruction that if defendant put himself in a position to defend himself against an attack by deceased, and his gun went off accidentally, he would not be guilty, was properly limited by a condition that defendant held the gun in a proper manner, and took particular care in holding it.

3. There is no error in the use in an instruction of an illustration of the law of accidental killing where the defense is of that nature.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Greenville county; James Aldrich, Judge.

J. W. J. Morgan was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. Blythe, for appellant. Mr. Ansel, for the State.

McIVER, C. J. The defendant was indicted for and convicted of the murder of L. Washington Hipps, and, having been duly sentenced, appeals upon the following grounds: "(1) Because his honor refused to charge the jury that they had the right to consider the intoxication or drunkenness of the defendant in any event, even in determining the intent with which he acted, or whether he acted with malice. (2) Because his honor, the circuit judge, not only refused to charge the jury as above set forth, but charged the jury as follows: 'In the eye of the law a man is responsible for his acts, and a drunken man is just as responsible as a sober man, because, if the law were otherwise, a man would only have to fill himself up with whisky, and go on and perpetrate an offense, and then plead that he was under the influence of liquor. That is not the law of this state, and it never has been the law.' (3) Because his honor, the circuit judge, refused to charge the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the deceased drew the hoe to strike at the defendant he had a right to put himself in position to defend himself; and if, under these circumstances, the gun went off accidentally, he would not be guilty of any offense at all. (4) Because the presiding judge not only refused to charge the jury as above requested, but, in reference thereto, charged as follows: 'That would be correct law, gentlemen, if you also believed that he held that gun in a proper manner, and took particular care in holding it. I think this covers the case,—he must have been careful in holding it.' (5) Because his honor, the circuit judge, did not charge the jury correctly as to the law of accidental killing, and did not charge the law fully with reference to the facts of this case, but, amongst other things, erroneously charged as follows: 'If a workman in a town was on a house, and threw off a scantling, and gave due notice of the injury, and it hit some one and killed him, that would be an accident, and he should go free; but if, on the other hand, a workman in a town should throw a piece of scantling or other heavy substance off a house into a street where people are wont to pass, and it strikes and kills some one, that would be murder.' (6) Because his honor, the circuit judge, refused the defendant's motion for a new trial."

This case was submitted to us without argument on either side, and all that we know of it is derived from the record submitted here. The first remark which we have to make is that the record does not show that any requests to charge were submitted except that upon which the third ground of appeal is based; and that request was not really refused, but was simply modified by the very proper qualification that where one seeks to be excused for taking the life of another with a deadly weapon, on the ground of accident, it must appear that due care was exercised in handling such weapon. We might, therefore, under the well-settled rule, decline to consider all such grounds of appeal as rest upon refusal to charge alleged requests, where such requests do not appear from the record to have been made. But in-favorem vitae we will not hold the appellant to the strict rule in this case, and will proceed to consider the several grounds of appeal in their order.

The first and second grounds of appeal are intended to raise the question whether the alleged fact that defendant was drunk at the time the homicide was committed should be considered by the jury in determining the question of the intent of defendant as bearing upon the question of malice. In the first place, we would remark that there is nothing in the evidence upon which such a question could be raised; for there is not only no evidence that the defendant had reached such a stage of drunkenness as might, under some authorities, warrant the raising of such a question, but, on the contrary, the defendant himself said, while on the stand as a witness, that he was not drunk at the time he committed the homicide. His answer to the question propounded by his own counsel, "Were you drunk when you shot Mr. Hipps?" was: "No, sir; I was not. I had just had two or three drinks." But it seems to us that the law upon the subject of drunkenness as an excuse for crime, as laid down in 1 Bish. Cr. Law, c. 28, and especially section 401, amply vindicates the ruling of the circuit judge. See, also, State v. Bundy, 24 S. C. 444. There is nothing in this case which renders it necessary, or even proper, to go into any consideration of the supposed limitations of the general doctrine that voluntary intoxication furnishes no excuse for crime committed under its influence, which are discussed by Mr. Bishop in the chapter above referred to. These grounds must be overruled.

The third ground of appeal cannot be sustained, for, as we have seen, the request upon which that ground is based was not refused, but the proposition contained therein was modified, as common sense, as well as the authorities, clearly required. This covers also the fourth ground.

The fifth ground of appeal imputes error to the circuit judge in using the illustration which he did as to the law of accidental killing. Inasmuch as a similar illustration has been used by standard writers on the criminal law, as may be seen by reference to 1 Russ. Crimes, marg. p. 461, and 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 314, it is very obvious that this ground cannot be sustained.

The sixth ground, as has been often held, cannot be considered by this court, for it imputes no error of law to the circuit judge. Indeed, it does not appear from the record submitted to us that any motion for a new trial was ever made. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to that court, in order that a new day may be assigned for the execution of the sentence heretofore imposed.

HAMER v. BROWN et al., County Commissioners.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 16, 1894.)

FENCE LAWS—EXEMPTIONS—EXTENSION—INJUNCTION.

An owner of land within the additional exemption from the stock law in Williamsburg county, under Act 1892, cannot enjoin the commissioners from proceeding under the act merely because the removal of the old fence will oblige him, at great expense, to fence his crops against the stock running at large in the exemption, and the taxes to keep up the new fence will be a further loss to him, where he does not aver that any part of the old fence is to be removed, or new fence built, on his land, or any of his timber used for the new fence, nor seek to enjoin any tax now to be levied.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Williamsburg county; T. B. Fraser, Judge.

Action by Daniel H. Hamer against W. R. Brown, J. J. Graham, and B. B. Chandler, commissioners of Williamsburg county, for an injunction. Demurrer to complaint sustained, and writ denied. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The complaint alleges as follows: "(1) That the defendants, W. R. Brown, J. J. Graham, and B. B. Chandler, are the county commissioners of the said county of Williamsburg, having been duly elected as such at the last general election for state and county officers held in said county, and having duly qualified as such county commissioners according to law, and they are now discharging the duties of said office. (2) That the plaintiff is the owner in fee simple and lawfully possessed of all that certain tract of land in said county known as the 'Gordon Place,' containing fifteen hundred acres more or less, bounded on the north by Black river, south by lands of William Blakeley, east by lands of the estate of N. W. McCullough, and west by the public road leading from the lower bridge to Lenud's ferry; and he has so owned and been in possession of said lands since the 8th day of February, 1882. (3) That now, and ever since he has owned said lands, the plaintiff is and has been exclusively engaged in planting and cultivating said place for a livelihood, raising and producing agricultural products for the market and for home consumption, and he has no other means of support. That there are now three or four hundred acres of said land under cultivation, about two hundred thereof being planted and cultivated by the plaintiff, and the balance by his tenants, who pay him reasonable rents therefor. (4) That any of said land is reasonably worth five dollars per acre. (5) That ever since he has owned the said place the plaintiff has been planting and cultivating the same without fences, and without interruption from roaming stock or otherwise; that said place is very scarce of material for building fences, and the plaintiff could not now fence his lands under cultivation without buying material at enormous expense, and at such prices and on such terms as he is unable to pay. (6) That under the act of the general assembly entitled 'An act to provide for the exemption of certain counties in this state from the provisions of chapter 27 of the General Statutes, relating to the general stock law,' approved December 23, 1882, (18 St. at Large, p. 238,) the county commissioners for said county, for some years past, have erected and maintained a fence between the section in said act exempted and the rest of said county of Williamsburg, which fence lies east of the said plantation of the plaintiff, and does not embrace the said plantation in the said exempted territory; that the said plantation lies between the said fence and the Lenud's Ferry road. (7) That under an act of the general assembly of this state entitled 'An act to exempt certain portions of Anderson and Penn townships, in Williamsburg county, from the provisions of chapter 27 of the General Statutes relating to the general stock law,' the defendants are proceeding, against the will of the plaintiff and of the majority of the freeholders in the section of country in said act described, and in which plaintiff's said plantation is situated, and without any compensation to the plaintiff for his reasonable damages, or provision for the same, to remove the fence from where it now runs, and build another fence along the Lenud's Ferry road, so as to include plaintiff's said plantation in a general pasture provided for by the acts aforesaid, and thereby appropriate the same to the use of the stock owners in the said pasture, notwithstanding notice from the plaintiff to the defendants prohibiting the same. (8) That, in said additional section of country now proposed to be embraced in said general pasture, there are not more than ten head of cattle and twenty-five head of hogs, no sheep and goats, and very few dogs, and an absolute sale of all such stock in said 'section' would not build the fence now projected. (9) That the cattle in said general pasture roam in large herds, of from twenty-five to one hundred head; and if allowed to run at large, and about plaintiff's land, in one night a single herd could almost run over and destroy plaintiff's entire crop, and he is without sufficient means to prevent such destruction. (10) That many of the persons owning stock in the said general pasture, are utterly insolvent, and could not be made to respond in damages for any injury that their stock might do to plaintiff's crop or premises. (11) That if his plantation is inclosed in said pasture the plaintiff's tenants would desert his premises, and he would thereby lose, his rents, and his income from that source. (12) That by said actions and proceedings on the part of the defendants, the plaintiff would suffer great, permanent, and irreparable damage, and he is without other remedy in the premises. Wherefore, the plaintiff demands judgment (1) that the said defendants be restrained and enjoined from inclosing the plaintiff's said plantation in said pasture; (2) for such other and further relief as to the court may seem just; (3) for the costs of this action."

T. M. Gilland, for appellant. E. Girardeau Chandler, for respondents.

McGOWAN, J. This was an action to enjoin the county commissioners of Williamsburg from carrying into effect certain provisions of an act of the legislature, (Acts 1892, p. 361,) by which, it will be observed, certain additional territory in said county of Williamsburg was exempted from the operation of chapter 27 of the General Statutes, relating to the general stock law, and by said injunction preventing the defendants from removing the fence around the original exemption, and building another fence around the lines of the additional exemption, including the plaintiff's plantation, of 1,600 acres of land. The complaint does not state that the old fence is to be removed from, or the new fence placed upon, any portion of plaintiff's plantation, which lies entirely within the additional exemption, or that any of the plaintiff's timber is to be used in the construction of the new fence, nor does the complaint ask for any injunction against the collection of any tax now proposed to be levied. As the circuit judge states it: "The injuries which the plaintiff seeks to avoid are those which will grow out of the exposure of his crops to the stock roaming at large in this portion of the county and adjoining, on what it is proposed to call a 'big pasture,' unless the plaintiff shall, at very heavy expense, protect his crops by suitable fences, which are not now necessary, and also the loss from taxation which the plaintiff and others expect hereafter to suffer, from the carrying out of the provisions of the aforesaid act," etc. (A full copy of the complaint should appear in the report of the case.) The defendant commissioners demurred that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for an injunction; and the cause coming on to be heard before his honor, Judge Fraser, he decreed as follows: "The question presented to me is the constitutionality of the whole act, and to this I will confine my ruling, so far as the plaintiff has the right to make it in this case, leaving it for the landowners whose lands will be appropriated for the new fence to make their own points in their own way. * * * There may be serious constitutional objections to this act, as to which I do not feel at liberty to express an opinion here. The only injuries complained of in this action are such that I do not think will warrant the court in granting the injunction prayed for; and, though in a more aggravated form, they are only such as every planter endured from the colonial days until the passage of the general stock law, a few years ago. The plaintiff only complains here that it will be necessary for him to fence in his crops, to protect them from stock roaming at large. It is ordered that the demurrer be sustained; that, however, the plaintiff have leave, within twenty days, to amend his complaint in any way he may be advised; and, if not amended by that time, that the complaint be dismissed. It is further ordered that if the complaint be amended the defendants have twenty days after service of a copy of the amended complaint to answer or demur to the same," etc. The plaintiff excepts to the ruling of the presiding judge: (1) "That he erred in ruling that the injuries complained of in this action do not warrant the granting of the injunction asked for, and that the act of 1892 is constitutional; (2) that the presiding judge erred in holding that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

We think it is a mistake to suppose that the circuit judge held that the act of 1892 is constitutional, in all of its provisions. On the contrary, he was very careful to guard against any such impression, by expressly confining his rulings to the questions which the plaintiff had the right to make in this case, under the allegations and prayer of his complaint; leaving it for the land holders whose lands will be appropriated for the new fence to make their own points in their own way, as in the case of Fort v. Goodwin, 36 S. C. 445, 15 S. E. 723. The circuit judge construed the complaint as only making one specific allegation,—that the defendants are about to remove the fence "from where it now stands, and building another fence, so as to include plaintiff's plantation," without actually touching it at any point. It is not stated in the complaint whether or not certain provisos in the act have been complied with on the part of the county commissioners, etc. We think the judge did right in limiting his rulings to the case made in the pleadings; and as a consequence this court, here, cannot consider any original questions not made below, or decided by the judge. We cannot say that, in this view, he committed error in sustaining the demurrer; for, if the legislature had the constitutional right to create the first exemption from the operation of the general stock law, we cannot clearly see why, considered as the sole question, they had not the right simply to enlarge that exemption. But the judge said, further, that there might be serious constitutional objections to the act, as to which, on the complaint alone, he was not at liberty to express an opinion; and therefore, while sustaining the demand, he gave the plaintiff leave, within 20 days, to amend his complaint in any manner he may be advised, and, if not amended within that time, that the complaint be dismissed; and he ordered, further, "that if the complaint be amended the defendants have 20 days after service of a copy of the amended complaint to answer or demur to the same," etc. We also agree with the circuit judge that it was proper to give to the plaintiff the right to amend his complaint as he may be advised. The general stock law, with the exemptions made to it at different times, has given rise to questions which are important and novel, and should receive the fullest consideration; as, for example, the act under consideration, (1892,) "To exempt certain portions of Williamsburg county from the operations of the general stock law," etc., contains these provisions, as to which the complaint makes no specific allegations in regard to performance or nonperformance on the part of the defendants. The proviso of the second section is as follows: "Provided, that the said county commissioners shall levy a special tax upon the assessed value of all the cattle, hogs, sheep, dogs and goats, embraced in such section, exempted as aforesaid, sufficient to remove said old fence, and to build said new fence: and repairs," etc. And the fourth section provides as follows: "That this act shall go into effect, from and after the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of same, are complied with." It seems to us that these are important provisions, upon the question as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to have an injunction against the removal of the old fence, and the act of 1892 declared unconstitutional. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

STATE v. TRAMMELL.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 13, 1894.)

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—PROVOKING QUARREL.

1. Accused being, as he thought, insulted by a negro waiter, left the restaurant, and 20 minutes later returned, and remarked that he was going back to see about his supper. The proprietor tried to restrain him, but he went into the kitchen, and cursed the negro, who begged his pardon. In spite of the proprietor's remonstrances, accused continued to curse the negro, and then shot him twice. He asserted that the negro was advancing on him with a carving knife. Held proper to charge that, if he went into that room, and provoked the quarrel, there was no question of self-defense.

2. When only one's own safety is in question, he is bound to avoid bloodshed, if possible, by retreat.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Greenville county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

J. Luther Trammell, convicted of manslaughter, appeals. Affirmed.

Earle & Mooney, for appellant. Martin F. Ansel, for the State.

POPE, J. On the 22d day of December, 1892, in the city of Greenville, in this state, J. Luther Trammell gave an order to the proprietor of a restaurant for his supper. When seated in the dining room of such restaurant, Eugene Robinson, who was the sole waiter in such dining room, brought to the said Trammell his supper. The latter, upon discovering that one of the articles of food he had ordered was not supplied, said to the waiter, "This is not what I ordered;" to which Robinson, the waiter, replied, "You are blamed hard to please;" to which remark Trammell replied, "I don't want to take any insults from a damned negro," immediately leaving the dining room. He complained to the proprietor, Mr. Legon, who promised to send him his supper over at the Windsor Hotel. Becoming very much engaged with his other customers, Mr. Legon neglected to send the supper over to the hotel. Some time afterwards—15 or 20 minutes—Trammell returned to the restaurant, and said, "I am going back to see about my supper," to which remark Mr. Legon, the proprietor, said: "Luther, [Mr. Trammell,] for God's sake don't have any trouble here in my place. I have had trouble enough." Although Mr. Trammell said he would not, he still went through the dining room, through the pantry, and into the kitchen of the restaurant. Mr. Legon, the proprietor, caught him by the right arm. When they entered the kitchen the defendant, Trammell, said, cursing Robinson, the waiter, "You have insulted me;" to which Robinson replied, "I beg your pardon." Trammell was much excited. Mr. Legon not only had hold of his arm, but also stood between him and the waiter, and said: "Luther, he has begged your pardon. Now come on, and let us go out." Trammell did not do so, but still cursed the negro. Finally he drew his pistol, and emptied the contents of two barrels of the pistol into the body of Eugene Robinson, the waiter, causing his instant death, claiming as his justification that said Eugene was advancing upon him with a large carving knife. At the July term, 1893, of the court of general sessions for Greenville county the defendant, Trammell, was tried upon an indictment for murder, before Judge Norton and a jury. He was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to four years' imprisonment in the state penitentiary. He now appeals to this court upon two grounds, substantially as follows: (1) Because the circuit judge erred in charging the jury "that, if the defendant did go into that room, and did provoke the difficulty by his language and manner in that room, then the plea of self-defense would be gone, although the other elements of self-defense would be present in the case; and if you find that you need not consider the other elements of self-defense." (2) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: "Now, gentlemen, I desire to correct the theory of the law which the last counsel who addressed you for the defense says is his theory of the law,—that a man is not bound to retreat. Our books are full of law on that subject. Our law does require that a man should retreat."

We are not impressed with these grounds of appeal as furnishing sufficient reasons for the reversal of the judgment of the court below. In the first place, it was not error, under the circumstances testified to in this case, for the circuit judge to charge the jury as is complained of in the first ground of appeal. Clearly, one of the foundation rocks upon which the plea of self-defense must be bottomed is that it was necessary for the accused to take the life of his fellow man to protect his own, or to protect him from serious bodily harm. State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 594, 12 S. E. 556; State v. Merriman, 34 S. C. 40, 12 S. E. 619. In the case at bar, every witness on both sides who saw the difficulty testified that the waiter was where his duty called him to be; while, per contra, the accused was forcing himself into a place that the proprietor besought him not to go. Not only so, but such proprietor actually caught his arm, and placed himself in the way of the accused, so as to prevent his coming in collision with the colored waiter; and, after the waiter had apologized, the proprietor again urged the accused to leave. Under these circumstances, the charge of the presiding judge was exactly in line with his duty on such an occasion. It is high time that the shedding of human blood within the limits of this commonwealth should meet with a firm and stern upholding of the principles of the law of self-defense, when such defense is relied upon.

In the second place, the circuit judge was right in stating that under the laws of this state, if it was necessary to retreat to avoid shedding human blood, retreat should be made. Of course, this relates to the class of cases under consideration here. There are cases, however, when no retreat is demanded by the law. For instance, the honor of one's family, when in peril by the evil-minded, permits nothing save action, and no step backward is tolerated. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

DAVIS v. HOOD, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 22, 1887.)

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—FAILURE TO FILE RETURN.

Though the case or brief for argument has been properly made and served, an appeal may be dismissed, under rule 1, if the return has not been filed.

Motion to reinstate appeal from Chester county.

Action by Davis against Hood, as sheriff. An appeal from the judgment was dismissed. Appellant moves to reinstate. Denied.

J. K. Henry, for appellant. W. A. Sanders and Edward McCrady, Jr., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to reinstate the appeal dismissed by the clerk of this court under rules 1 and 2. After hearing argument pro and con, the court refused the motion, delivering its judgment orally. The return and case or brief for argument move on separate and distinct lines. The respondent may have the appeal dismissed, under rule 1, because the return has not been filed, though the case or brief for argument has been properly made up and served upon him; and he may have the appeal dismissed for default of appellant in not serving three printed copies of the case or brief on respondent, although the return has been filed in due time. See Gardner v. Mays, (decided May 23, 1887,) 7 S. E. 71; State v. Moore, (previously decided,) Id. 72.

MARJENHOFF v. MARJENHOFF et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 29, 1893.)

APPEAL—RETURN—"CASE"—TIME OF FILING—EXTENSION—DISMISSAL—REINSTATEMENT.

1. Supreme court rule 1, requiring the return to be filed within a certain time after the record constituting the return is completed, does not allow that length of time after the case is agreed on; it being no part of the return, which rule 2 states shall consist of the judgment roll, notice of appeal, and exceptions.

2. Application for extension of time for filing return must be made within the time allowed by rule for such filing.

3. Under supreme court rule 2, allowing a reinstatement of an appeal dismissed under rule 1 for default in filing return, on a showing that default arose from excusable neglect or inadvertence, it is not sufficient excuse that counsel, being pressed by business, called in counsel to assist him, and that each expected the other to do the filing.

4. Where appellant fails to file his case or exceptions as required by circuit court rule 49, appellee is entitled to have the appeal dismissed.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Charleston county.

Action by Francis W. Marjenhoff against Johannes M. Marjenhoff, trustee, and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff moves to reinstate appeal dismissed for default in filing return. Motion denied.

Trenholm & Rhett and Mr. Sinkler, for appellant. W. H. Thomas, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Counsel for plaintiff (appellant) moved, upon affidavits, to reinstate the appeal dismissed by the clerk under rule 1; and counsel for defendant trustee (respondent) moved, in case this motion should be granted, to dismiss the appeal under rule 49 of the circuit court.

As to the first motion: There can be no question as to the duty of the clerk to dismiss the appeal upon the showing made before him; and the appellant should then move to reinstate the appeal, if he has proper grounds therefor. In this case the record constituting the return was completed when the exceptions were served, on the 8th day of June, 1893. The "case" (technically so called) was not agreed upon, however, until the 18th day of June, 1893; and counsel for appellant seems to have supposed that this was necessary to complete the return. Rule 2 of the court prescribes what the return shall consist of, to wit, copies of the judgment roll, the notice of appeal and exceptions, or if the appeal is from an order, as allowed by the Code of Procedure, copies of the order appealed from, with the papers upon which the court below acted in granting the order, together with the notice of appeal and the exceptions. The case is not a part of the judgment roll, and therefore not a part of the return. See Davis v. Hood, (decided by this court Nov. 22, 1887,) 18 S. E. 941; Tribble v. Poore, (May 14, 1888,) 6 S. E. 577. The appellant complains that the time in which he was to have filed the return was cut down to 20 days. But the time,—40 days,—as required by the old rule, had expired before he obtained an extension of time from the circuit judge. Judge Izlar's order extending the time for filing the return was made on the 22d of July. The time, by that order, was extended to the 27th of July. The return was filed on that day, viz. 27th of July. The clerk dismissed the appeal on the 25th of July, before the order of the circuit judge and the return were filed in his office. The 20 days allowed by the new rule expired on the 28th of June. Under the old rule, the time expired on the 18th of July. It has been decided, as far back as Scurry v. Coleman, 14 S. C. 168, that the application for extension of time must be made within the time allowed by the rule. The circuit judge could not extend the time which had already expired.

Appellant's counsel urges that he had at the time such a pressure of business that he called to his assistance other counsel to prepare the case, which was very voluminous and difficult; that said counsel expected him to file the case, and that he was relying upon said counsel to do so; and that the matter, consequently, was neglected. Rule 2 prescribes that the court may reinstate an appeal dismissed by the clerk under rule 1, upon its being made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that the default on the part of the appellant has arisen from some excusable neglect. The court does not consider the excuse for the default excusable neglect, or an inadvertence.

As to the respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal, under rule 49 of the circuit court, in case the court reinstated the appeal under rule 2, the questions thereunder do not properly arise, as appellant's motion cannot be granted. However, it may be said that the respondent would be entitled to the benefit of rule 49, if necessary. There is no evidence before the court that the appellant has ever filed his case or exceptions, as required by rule 49. This rule is a very hard rule, and has, perhaps, caused some hardship, and may be changed; but it was then and is now in force, and parties have a right to invoke its exercise. If they apply for its benefit, the court is compelled to enforce its provisions, however reluctant to do so. Motion of appellant refused.

VENABLE et al. v. CHAVOUS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—REINSTATEMENT.

TERRY et al. v. DAVIS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—WHAT CONSTITUTES—CIVIL SUIT.

A suit for damages, wherein defendants are charged with making a fraudulent contract to defraud plaintiff, unaccompanied by attachment of property or person, or other circumstance of special damage, is no ground for an action for malicious prosecution.

Appeal from superior court, Pasquotank county; Brown, Judge.

Action by Harvey Terry and Timothy Ely against John F. Davis for damages for malicious prosecution. Judgment on demurrer for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

For report of former action, see Ely v. Davis, 15 S. E. 878.

Harvey Terry, for appellants. W. J. Griffin, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. This is substantially the same action which is reported under the caption of Ely v. Davis in 111 N. C. 24, 15 S. E. 878, being an action to recover damages for malicious prosecution. We then sustained the demurrer upon the ground that there was no allegation in the complaint of want of probable cause, nor statement of facts which, if proved, would establish the want of probable cause in the alleged malicious charge of fraud and false representation. We proceeded further to intimate—in order that the plaintiffs might understand that this litigation ought to cease—our opinion that an action will not lie for malicious prosecution, in a civil suit, unless there was an arrest of the person or seizure of property, as in attachment proceedings at law, or their equivalent in equity, or in proceedings in bankruptcy, or like cases where there was some special damage resulting from the action, and which would not necessarily result in all cases of the like kind. We affirmed the judgment below, dismissing the action. The plaintiffs seem to have immediately begun an action against the same defendants or their personal representatives. It is here again upon substantially the same complaint, with the addition of the allegation of want of probable cause. We have listened with attention to the argument of counsel, and have examined the authorities presented by him, and are still of the opinion that the action will not lie, for the reasons fully stated in the opinion above referred to, and which we deem unnecessary to repeat. It is therefore unnecessary that we should examine the other grounds of demurrer. The judgment of his honor below, sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the action, is affirmed.

WEISEL v. COBB.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

SUIT FOR ACCOUNTING—TRUSTS—SURVIVING PARTNER—POWERS.

Where the surviving partner of a firm has conveyed to "C., administrator" of the deceased partner, all the assets of the firm, for the purpose of paying first the firm debts and then the debts of the deceased partner, and "to legally account for all such moneys as may come into his hands by virtue of this assignment," he may properly bring suit against said C. individually for an accounting as to the property so conveyed.

Appeal from superior court, Pasquotank county; Brown, Judge.

Suit by Moses Weisel against George Cobb for an accounting. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The assignment by Moses Weisel was as follows: "Whereas the late firm of S. Weisel & Son had pecuniary liabilities; and whereas George W. Cobb had administered upon the estate of Samuel Weisel, deceased, who was senior member of said firm; now, therefore, in order to enable the said Cobb, administrator, to pay off all the debts and liabilities of the said Samuel Weisel, including the debts of the said firm, I, Moses Weisel, the sole surviving partner of the said firm, for one dollar to me in hand paid by said Cobb,

(the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged,) do hereby transfer and assign to said Cobb, administrator, all the stock of goods, all notes and accounts and choses in action, and all other personal property of said firm, and I do hereby vest him with full power to bring suit in his name as administrator aforesaid upon all notes and accounts, and to collect the same, and to legally account for all such moneys as may come into his hands by virtue of this assignment. Witness my hand and seal this, the sixteenth day of June, 1886."

The complaint was as follows: "Plaintiff, complaining against defendant, alleges: (1) That the plaintiff and S. Weisel were merchants in Elizabeth City, N. C., and partners doing business under the firm name of S. Weisel & Son. (2) That during the continuance of said firm S. Weisel died during the year 1886, and left this plaintiff surviving partner. (3) That shortly after the death of S. Weisel the defendant, G. W. Cobb, administered on his estate. (4) That on the 16th day of June, 1886, this plaintiff, as surviving partner of the firm of S. Weisel & Son, made assignment to G. W. Cobb, administrator of S. Weisel, of all of the stock of goods, all notes and accounts and choses in action, and all other personal property of said firm, and to sue for and collect all notes and accounts, and to legally account for all amounts and moneys so collected and received by virtue of said assignment. Copy marked 'A,' and made a part of complaint. (5) That said G. W. Cobb, by virtue of said assignment, took charge of all of the goods, merchandise, notes and accounts, choses in action, and all other personal property belonging to the said firm, of the value of thirty-three thousand dollars, or some other large sum, and commuted same to his use. (6) That by virtue and force of said assignment, defendant, Cobb, was required to legally account for and settle with this plaintiff for all of the property, goods, merchandise, notes and accounts, etc., that went into his hands belonging to the said firm of S. Weisel & Son. (7) The plaintiff has demanded a settlement and account of defendant, showing his management and disposition of said property belonging to said firm, and to him as surviving partner of same, with all of which fair, reasonable, and just request and demand defendant has refused to comply. (8) That this defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of two thousand dollars, or some other large sum, on account of money received belonging to said firm, for his management and conversion of the property herein set out, for which he refuses to account and settle. Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against defendant for the sum of two thousand dollars; that an account may be taken, showing amount of property received by defendant, value of same, amounts paid out under the assignment, also amount remaining in the hands of defendant due the plaintiff; and for such other and further relief as the nature and circumstances of the case may require, and for costs."

Grandy & Aydlett, for appellant.

BURWELL, J. The plaintiff, being the survivor of the firm of S. Weisel & Son, succeeded by right of such survivorship to all the assets of the partnership upon the death of his partner. They were vested in him as trustee—First, to pay out of them all the debts of the firm; and, secondly, to divide between himself and the administrator of his deceased partner what should remain after the payment of the firm debts according to the terms of the copartnership. The law gave him the title to all these assets, but along with it put upon him the burden of the trust. By the assignment set out in the record he stripped himself, so far as he could, of this title, and put it in the defendant (who had been appointed to administer the estate of the deceased partner) "to enable the said Cobb, administrator, to pay off all the debts and liabilities of the said Samuel Weisel, including the debts of the said firm." The plaintiff could not thus, or indeed in any way, escape his liability to the partnership creditors. That liability remained upon him notwithstanding the assignment. And his right to a share of what remained after the payment of the partnership debts was unaffected, for, far from surrendering his personal interest in the assets, as we construe the assignment, he expressly imposed upon the assignee, whom he thus substituted for himself to administer the trust, the duty "to legally account for all such moneys as may come into his hands by virtue of this assignment;" that is to say, to administer these partnership assets just as he would administer them under the law if the assignment had not been made. For two reasons, therefore, the plaintiff could call for an account of the management of these assets: To ascertain if the firm debts had been paid, and, if not, to have that done; and to ascertain if any sum was due to himself, and, if so, to receive its payment. He therefore most unquestionably had a good cause of action against the assignee, to whose care he had committed the valuable partnership assets. If it should appear on the taking of the account that the debts of the firm had all been paid, and that the balance remaining after such payment had been applied as plaintiff had expressly or impliedly agreed that it should be, there would be a judgment against him for costs, and the whole matter would be finally settled. The plaintiff, being thus circumstanced, sued "George W. Cobb," and alleged, among other things, that the value of the assets was "thirty-three thousand dollars, or some other large sum;" and that "G. W. Cobb, by virtue of said assignment," took charge "of said assets, and converted same to his use." The record shows that by consent there was a reference to state an account. The referee heard the cause, and made a report, and, upon the hearing of the case upon exceptions to that report, "G. W. Cobb" made a motion to dismiss the cause for the reason that the assignment spoken of was made to "G. W. Cobb, administrator," and upon this motion the action was dismissed. The facts set out in the complaint constituted a good cause of action in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant. If, upon the taking of the account, it shall be found that on a proper settlement of the partnership business there was a balance left after the payment of all the liabilities of the firm, the question will arise, was the plaintiff entitled to any part of this balance under the terms of the copartnership? And, if that be answered in the affirmative, the question will arise, did the plaintiff expressly or impliedly agree that the defendant should apply the balance so due him to the payment of the individual liabilities of Samuel Welsel? And, should this also be answered in the affirmative, there would arise the further question, has the defendant used that fund in the prescribed way? About this last question the plaintiff had a right to inquire. He is the trustor. It is his privilege to demand of the trustee an account. As we have said, the plaintiff, a surviving partner, was invested with the title to all the partnership assets as a trustee. He transferred that trust to "George W. Cobb, administrator." The duty of winding up the affairs of S. Welsel & Son, there being a surviving partner, was not imposed by law on the administrator of Samuel Welsel. He received these valuable assets, not as administrator, we think, but the title to them was put in him because he was such administrator. At any rate he took them in some capacity and for some purpose from the plaintiff, who by this action demands an account of his trusteeship. He is, we think, clearly entitled to it. If "George W. Cobb, administrator," has applied those assets as they were legally and properly applicable, all well. That will protect "George W. Cobb." If either "George W. Cobb" or "George W. Cobb, administrator," has misapplied them, it is not well, and "George W. Cobb" must answer for the breach. The action should not have been dismissed. Error.

STATE v. WALTON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

FALSE PRETENSES—EVIDENCE.

1. On a trial for obtaining money under false pretenses, evidence of other similar transactions by defendant is admissible.

2. On a charge of inducing the county treasurer to cash an order, by falsely representing it to be genuine, it is no defense that the order was for a bill of stationery for a county officer, where the bill had not been authorized by the county commissioners.

v.188.E.no.22—60

Appeal from superior court, Gates county; Graves, Judge.

J. T. Walton was convicted of obtaining money under false pretenses, and appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant is charged with intending to "cheat and defraud J. F. Bond, as treasurer of the county, out of the money, goods, and chattels in the custody of said Bond, and unlawfully, feloniously, and designedly did falsely pretend to the said Bond, as said treasurer, that a certain paper writing, in words and figures," etc., "was a true and genuine order for the payment of money," etc., "and that he owned the same, and had the right to transfer it to the said Bond, as treasurer, and receive the money therefor, to the amount mentioned in said paper writing, being $41.32, whereas, in truth and in fact," etc. Upon the trial the jury found the defendant guilty, and he appealed from the judgment pronounced.

The Attorney General, for the State.

MacRAE, J. The first exception cannot be sustained. In order to show the scienter and the intent, and for that purpose only, the state offered evidence of similar transactions on the part of the defendant. The question of the admissibility of evidence of this character has been so clearly stated by Ashe, J., in the case of State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742, that we have only to reproduce a part of the opinion in that case: "It is a fundamental principle of law that evidence of one offense cannot be given against a defendant to prove that he was guilty of another. We have been unable to find any exception to this well-established rule, except in those cases where evidence of independent offenses has been admitted to explain or illustrate the facts upon which certain indictments are founded, as where, in the investigation of an offense, it becomes necessary to prove the quo animo,—the intent, design, or guilty knowledge. In such cases it has been held admissible to prove other offenses of like character, as, for instance, in indictments for passing counterfeit money, the fact that the defendant, about the same time, had passed other counterfeit money of like kind, has been uniformly held to be admissible to show the scienter or guilty knowledge. So, on a charge for sending a threatening letter, prior and subsequent letters from the defendant to the person threatened have been received in evidence, explanatory of the meaning and intent of the particular letter upon which the indictment is found." Many authorities are there cited and illustrations offered. The charge in the present case was that the defendant did falsely, etc., pretend to the county treasurer that a certain paper writing was a true and genuine order for the payment of money, as it purported to be, and that by means of said false pretenses the defendant obtained the money from said treasurer. The defense was the absence of any intent to defraud. There could not be more direct evidence of such intent than the facts that the defendant had presented other false papers to the treasurer, and obtained money upon the same, and upon the discovery thereof had refunded the money. In State v. Wilkerson, 98 N. C. 696, 3 S. E. 683, where the defendant was indicted for falsely obtaining from the county commissioners an order for the payment of money, evidence was admitted of continuous transactions of the same character, and the state proposed to prove the obtaining of other orders of the same kind, without producing the orders; and, testimony having been admitted, the court said: "The extent of the general rule which requires the production of a written instrument to prove its contents, and admits of secondary evidence when it is lost or destroyed, is often misconceived. The rule does not apply to cases where the orders come up on a collateral inquiry, and a party is not expected to be prepared to produce them." In that case, no point was made upon the admissibility of the evidence, except as above stated. The decision in the case of State v. Bullard, 100 N. C. 486, 16 S. E. 191, where evidence was offered as to reports that defendant had been guilty of similar offenses, is not in conflict with that which is cited above. The witness had testified to the good character of defendant, and the state proposed to ask the witness if he did not know that it was extensively talked about and said that the defendant practiced a fraud upon the firm of A. B. This was admitted after objection by defendant, and the defendant excepted to the answer. The court said, "The inquiry allowed in this case was of a specific act of deceit and fraud, and this resting on rumor only," etc.

The second exception, to the refusal of his honor to admit evidence as to the stub book kept by the defendant in the office of the register of deeds, and the stub therein which would show the order was issued for a bill of stationery, etc., is also untenable, because the evidence offered was irrelevant. It was not corroborative of the evidence of defendant as to intent, or competent for any other purpose. It did not in any manner tend to show the representation of defendant to the county treasurer that the order presented was a genuine one. Admitting this evidence, still the question was, did the defendant obtain the money by means of the false representation charged? If said representation was false, the reiteration of it would not tell in favor of defendant. It is said for the defense that a man might collect an honest debt by means of false pretenses, and there would be no intent to defraud; and several authorities are cited, which it will be unnecessary to consider, for, according to the testimony in this case, even if there had been such an indebtedness as claimed, the county commissioners had never ordered its payment. The county treasurer had no authority to pay the same, except upon such order. The fraud was practiced upon him, and the money was obtained upon the false representation that it was a genuine order. The intent to deceive was established to the satisfaction of the jury by the proof of the false representation that the paper presented was a genuine order, when, whatever may have been the motive of the defendant, this representation was, to his own knowledge, false, the commissioners never having made such order. It was calculated to deceive, because it was apparently genuine, and attested by the proper officer. It did deceive, because by means of it the defendant obtained the money. State v. Phifer, 65 N. C. 321. We see no error.

LASSITER et al. v. RAPER et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

SUFFICIENCY OF PLEADING—ALLEGING CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

In an action on an administrator's bond, a plea "that since the final account and settlement of said estate, and the institution of this suit, the time elapsed is sufficient in law to bar a recovery against these defendants," and they plead "the statute of limitations in bar of plaintiffs' recovery," is bad, as containing but an allegation of law.

Appeal from superior court, Pasquotank county; G. H. Brown, Judge.

Action by L. C. Lassiter and another against Caleb Raper and others on an administrator's bond. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Grandy & Aydtlett, for appellants.

SHEPHERD, C. J. In Bayard v. Malcolm, a case reported in 1 Johns. 453, Chief Justice Kent remarked: "I entertain a decided opinion that the established principles of pleading, which compose what is called its 'science,' are rational, concise, luminous, and admirably adapted to the investigation of truth, and ought consequently to be very carefully touched by the hand of innovation." It was but in keeping with the spirit of these views that our present system of civil procedure was framed and enacted, and we find this court, very shortly after its adoption, repudiating the idea that loose and uncertain pleading would be tolerated. In Crump v. Mims, 64 N. C. 767, the court said: "We take occasion here to suggest to pleaders that the rules of common law as to the pleading, which are only the rules of logic, have not been abolished by the Code." In Parsley v. Nicholson, 65 N. C. 210, it was said: "The rules of pleading at common law have not been abrogated. The essential principles still remain, and have only been modified as to technicalities and matters of form." In Oates v. Gray, 66 N. C. 442, it was said that the object of the Code was "to abolish the different forms of action, and the technical and artificial modes of pleading, used at common law, but not to dispense with the certainty, regularity, and uniformity which are essential in every system adopted for the administration of justice." After other decisions to the same effect, it again became necessary, as it now is, to emphasize these early declarations of the court, and it was therefore remarked in Vass v. Association, 91 N. C. 55, that "it was a false notion, entertained by some of the legal profession, that the Code of Civil Procedure is without order or certainty, and that any pleading, however loose and irregular, may be upheld. On the contrary, while it is not perfect, it has both logical order, precision, and certainty when it is properly observed. Bad practice, too often tolerated and encouraged by the courts, brings about confusion and unjust complaints against it." It is hardly necessary to say that it was one of the elementary principles of the common law pleading that "facts, only, are to be stated, and not arguments or inferences or matters of law," (1 Chit. Pl. 214;) and that it is still essential to state the facts, which, indeed, is the chief office of pleading, is apparent from the explicit language of the Code, (sections 233-243,) which provides that there must be a "plain and concise statement of the facts constituting a cause of action;" and the same rule, of course, applies to a defense set up in the answer. Rountree v. Brinson, 98 N. C. 107, 3 S. E. 747. In accordance with the foregoing principles, the court held that a complaint "which merely states a conclusion of law,—that is, that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff, and that the debt has not been paid,—is demurrable both at common law and under the Code." Moore v. Hobbs, 79 N. C. 535. So, in Rountree v. Brinson, supra, in which the defendant pleaded that "the bond was executed by this defendant to the said R. H. Rountree for an illegal and usurious consideration," it was held that the plea was bad because it did not set forth the facts constituting the defense of usury. In Pope v. Andrews, 90 N. C. 401, the plea that "the plaintiff's alleged cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations" was held bad. The court said: "We have before adverted to this insufficient manner of setting up the effect of the lapse of time as an impediment to the suit. This averment that the demand is barred by the statute is but stating a conclusion of law, and not the facts from which it is deduced. This is neither in conformity to the former nor the present mode of pleading the defense." In Humble v. Mebane, 89 N. C. 410, the plea of the statute of limitations was held to be defective, "in that it failed to state when the cause of action accrued, and when the wards arrived at full age." See, also, Love v. Ingram, 104 N. C. 600, 10 S. E. 77. In Turner v. Shuffler, 108 N. C. 642, 13 S. E. 243, the language of the answer was that the defendants "plead the statute of limitations of ten, seven, six, and three years, as prescribed in the Code, to all said claims, and aver that they are unable to plead the same more definitely to each and all of said claims." This was held defective. The court said: "This is clearly bad and insufficient pleading. The court might, in its discretion, have allowed appropriate amendments; but it was not bound to do so, nor is the exercise of its discretion reversible here." In the case of Pemberton v. Simmons, 100 N. C. 316, 6 S. E. 122, cited by counsel for defendant, the defense was the presumption of payment under the Revised Code, (chapter 65,) and the defective plea seems to have been aided by a reference to "the whole of the pleadings." Whatever may be the true ground of the judgment, it cannot be considered as an authority against the principles laid down in the unbroken line of decisions to which we have referred, and especially in view of the more recent decision of Turner v. Shuffler, supra. It must be manifest that, according to the above authorities, the plea in the present case is fatally defective. The plea is as follows: "That since the final account and settlement of said estate, and the institution of this suit, the time elapsed is sufficient in law to bar a recovery against these defendants, or either of them, and they, and each of them, pleads the statute of limitations in bar of plaintiffs' recovery in this action." This simply amounts to the plea in Pope v. Andrews, supra, which was held to be defective. It contains no facts whatever, but is a simple allegation of law, and nothing more. There are no facts in the other parts of the answer which lend any aid to the plea, and from which any legal conclusions can be deduced. Indeed, it is remarkable that there is but one date in the entire pleading, and that is simply as to the death of the intestate. It would introduce inestimable uncertainty and confusion, and bring merited reproach upon our present method of procedure, were we to uphold the plea in this case. It is a very simple requirement of the Code, as well as the common law, that the facts constituting a cause of action or defense shall be plainly set forth. This has not been done by the defendants, and we are therefore of the opinion that the ruling of his honor must be affirmed.

DAVIS v. TERRY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—RIGHT TO DECREE—COUNTERCLAIM—SUFFICIENCY.

1. A party to a land contract containing a condition that such party should pay one-half the cost of a survey does not forfeit his rights under the contract by a refusal to pay as costs a sum greater than half thereof.

2. The fact that a party to a land contract brought an action to reform it does not show such a repudiation as will defeat his right to maintain a subsequent action for its specific performance.

3. A counterclaim for the malicious prosecution of a prior action, which fails to allege the facts showing want of probable cause in instituting such action, is bad.

Appeal from superior court, Pasquotank county; Bynum, Judge.

Action by John F. Davis against Harvey Terry and others for the specific performance of a contract to convey land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Harvey Terry, for appellants. W. J. Griffin, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. This is an action for the specific performance of a contract to convey a certain part of what is called the "Great Park Estate." Under the terms of the contract the defendants Ely and wife, through their attorney in fact, Terry, covenanted, in consideration of the sum of $5,000, (which has been paid by the plaintiff,) to convey to the plaintiff one-half of said real estate, to be ascertained by a survey, running a line nearly north and south, the said survey to be made at the joint expense of the parties. The defendants in the same agreement also covenanted to convey to the plaintiff 1,300 acres of land adjoining the Great Park estate, which we may designate as the "Hall Tract." The survey was made by one Cassall, and a deed was prepared containing one-half of the said estate according to the survey, and also including 1,300 acres of adjoining land, according to the contract as it was written. This deed was tendered to the plaintiff upon the condition that he pay to the said Terry the sum of $700, which was stated to be one-half of the expenses of the survey. The plaintiff refused to pay this amount on the ground that the charge was excessive, being more than one-half of the said expenses, and his contention was sustained in an action brought against him for the said amount, the recovery being only for the sum of $400. This amount was paid by the plaintiff, and he has been in possession of the estate for many years. Since that time he has demanded a conveyance according to the survey and the terms of the contract, but the defendants have refused and now refuse to execute the same. Very clearly the plaintiff did not forfeit his rights under the contract because of his refusal to pay the excessive charges of the defendants, and the only ground upon which a specific performance is resisted is based upon a supposed repudiation of the contract by the plaintiff. This is a total misapprehension on the part of the defendants, as the action brought by the plaintiff (upon which the defendants rely as sustaining their defense) was not for the purpose of rescinding the contract, but for its correction by including all of the Hall tract, and enforcing the contract with the variation as corrected. The plaintiff alleged that he was induced to enter into the contract by reason of the false and fraudulent representations of the defendant Terry, the agent of the defendants, as to the quantity of land embraced in the Hall tract. The testimony tending to establish the alleged fraud was properly excluded by the court on the ground that the plaintiff expressly disclaimed any purpose to rescind the contract, and that it would be in contravention of the spirit and policy of the statute of frauds to correct the contract by adding additional land upon verbal testimony alone. The ruling of the court was affirmed upon appeal, (Davis v. Ely, 104 N. C. 16, 10 S. E. 138,) but we explicitly declared that the plaintiff could enforce the performance of the contract in its present form, and this is precisely what he is seeking to do in this action. We are wholly at a loss to understand why the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief prayed for, as it is not pretended that he is barred by the statutes of limitations, or that he has been guilty of such laches as will stay the hand of a court of equity. The motion for nonsuit, therefore, simply on the ground that the plaintiff had brought the said action to correct the contract, was properly overruled. This being determined, there is nothing in the other objections to a decree for specific performance, as the issues were submitted without objection, and found against the defendants without a single exception, either to the rejection or admission of testimony or the charge of his honor. According to these findings, the plaintiff has complied with all of the terms of the contract, and is "the equitable owner of that part of the Great Park Estate set out in the complaint, and entitled to a conveyance therefor from the defendants Ely and wife." The exception to the judgment upon such findings is manifestly untenable.

The other exceptions are addressed to the rulings upon the counterclaim of the defendants. As it is admitted in the answer that the facts set forth in the counterclaim are the subject of another action now pending in the courts of this state, the counterclaim would have been abated had the objection been insisted upon by proper pleading. This seems to have been waived, and cannot now avail the plaintiff. Hawkins v. Hughes, 87 N. C. 115. The other objections, however, were properly raised, and in apt time. In an action brought by the defendants against the plaintiff upon substantially the same allegations, it was decided by this court, upon demurrer ore tenus, that the complaint did not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, for that it failed to allege or set forth facts showing that the prosecution of the suit by the plaintiff against the defendants to reform the deed, etc., (which was the basis of the action,) was without probable cause. The court said that "this omission was in itself fatal to plaintiff's action." Ely v. Davis, 111 N. C. 24, 15 S. E. 878. As this disposes of the counterclaim, it is unnecessary to consider the other exceptions relating thereto. We are of the opinion that there was no error and the judgment must therefore be affirmed.

SAWYER v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF ELIZABETH CITY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

PARTNERSHIP—WHAT CONSTITUTES—AGREEMENT.

An agreement setting out that B. has employed S. as clerk to superintend his store as long as B. chooses; that S. shall have half the net profits, and is a half owner of all the goods, moneys, accounts, notes, etc., belonging to the store,—constitutes B. and S. partners; and S., as survivor, can recover the store's bank balance.

Appeal from superior court, Pasquotank county; George H. Brown, Judge.

Action by Alfred Sawyer, as surviving partner of the firm of T. S. Berry, against the First National Bank of Elizabeth City, N. C., for balance due said firm on deposit account. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The agreement held to be a partnership agreement is as follows: "North Carolina, Camden County. Agreement is this day entered into between T. S. Berry of the one part and Alfred Sawyer, Jr., of the other part, both of the county of Camden and State of North Carolina, as follows, to wit: The said T. S. Berry is now selling goods at Bell-cross and has employed the said Alfred Sawyer, Jr., as a clerk to superintend the said store as long as the said Berry chooses to employ him, and the said Sawyer is to have for his services one half ($\frac{1}{2}$) of all the profits the said store makes after paying all expenses of the said store and further the said Sawyer is to-day one half ($\frac{1}{2}$) owner of all the goods, moneys, accounts, notes etc. that belong to the store and further the said Berry is not to make any charges as rent for said store, warehouse or dwellinghouse where the said Sawyer now lives, for this & his daily service is his compensation is equal division of profits with the said Berry. Witness our hands & seals this May 30th 1891. [Signed] T. S. Berry. [Seal.] [Signed] A. Sawyer. [Seal.]"

Grandy & Aydlett, for appellant. W. J. Griffin, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. We think his honor was correct in holding that, on the face of the contract, a copartnership existed between the plaintiff and T. S. Berry, deceased. Tested by our old cases, it is very clear that the absence of any personal liability on the part of Berry to the plaintiff for compensation for his services, and the presence of a right to demand an account in order to ascertain his half of the profits, (which half interest is directly conferred upon him by the contract,) would constitute a copartnership. Cox v. Delano, 3 Dev. c. 89; Holt v. Kernodle, 1 Ired. 199. Whether there should be any modification of the rule as to making the sharing in the profits an absolute test of copartnership in all cases (see Fertilizer Co. v. Reams, 105 N. C. 283, 11 S. E. 467,) is a question that does not arise on this appeal, as we have here, not only a community in the profits, but also a community in the capital. In this class of cases, says Mr. Bates, "the conclusion is irresistible that there is a communion of interests in the profits, and not a portion of them as compensation, for each has as much right as the other, and hence that a partnership results." Bates, Partn. §§ 31, 32. Apart from any holding out, we think that under our decisions the creditors of the firm could have recovered of the plaintiff, and, if this be so, it must follow that he is entitled to the assets as surviving partner. We have examined the other exceptions, although they were not very strenuously pressed on the argument. They are without merit. Affirmed.

STATE, to Use of TREASURE STOVE WORKS, v. PROUDFOOT et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Jan. 20, 1894.)

RELEASE OF SURETY—FAILURE TO APPROVE BOND.

1. P. was duly appointed a constable of Jackson county, and, in pursuance of an order of the county court of said county, directing that he should not transact any business as such constable until he should file his bond as such constable in the penalty of $5,000, conditioned according to law, to be approved by the clerk of said court, he executed a bond conditioned according to law in the penalty aforesaid, with two sureties, who, with him, acknowledged said bond before said clerk, and left it for record, and he thereupon took the oath of office, and entered upon his duties as constable. In a suit upon such bond against P. and his sureties for failure to pay over money collected by him as such constable said sureties are not relieved from liability for the default of their principal by reason of the fact that said bond was not approved by the county court.

2. The failure of an officer to obtain an approval of his official bond as required by statute does not affect his liability or that of his sureties, if it was otherwise legally executed and delivered.

3. The approval of an official bond by the court is not intended to increase or decrease the liability of the officer and his sureties, but is intended for the protection and indemnity of the public against any default which may occur in his official acts.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Jackson county.

Action in the name of the state, for the use of R. P. Thompson and W. H. Francis, partners doing business under the firm name of the Treasure Stove Works, against J. H. Proudfoot and others, on an official bond. From the judgment for a part of defendants, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Warren Miller, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Riley, N. C. Prickett, and Okey Johnson, for defendants in error.

ENGLISH, J. On the 27th day of May, 1889, J. H. Proudfoot was appointed a constable for the county of Jackson to succeed one B. F. West, who had on that day resigned. On the 7th day of June, 1889, said Proudfoot, with I. M. Adams, W. Lytle, and W. Lytle, Jr., as his sureties, executed a bond conditioned for the faithful performance on the part of said Proudfoot of all of his duties as such constable according to law, and that he should account for and pay over all money that might come into his hands by virtue of said office to the party or parties entitled to receive the same, which bond was acknowledged before and approved by T. H. B. Lemley, then clerk of the county court of said county, in the vacation of said court, on the 7th day of June, 1889; said county court having on the 27th day of May, 1889, by an order entered of record, provided that said Proudfoot should not transact any business as such constable until he should file his bond as such constable in the penalty of $5,000, conditioned according to law, and said bond should be approved by the clerk of the said court. At the date of said bond the said J. H. Proudfoot took the oath of office prescribed for a constable, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of said office, and continued to act in that capacity until the 13th day of July, 1892, when he tendered his resignation as such constable to the said county court, which resignation was by said court accepted, and said office was declared vacant. At an election held on the 4th day of November, 1890, the said J. H. Proudfoot was elected constable of said county, and was so declared by the county court on the 10th day of November, 1890. He, however, did not execute bond as such constable after he was so declared elected, nor take the oath of office required, but continued to act as constable until the 11th day of July, 1892, when, on motion of the prosecuting attorney of said county, a rule was awarded against him to show cause why he should not give bond, and why said office of constable should not be declared vacant; and on the 13th day of July, 1892, the said Proudfoot resigned said office, as above stated. On the 13th day of October, 1891, while said Proudfoot was acting as such constable, he received on an execution placed in his hands for collection in favor of Treasure Stove Works against A. W. Kidd & Sons the sum of $124.33, with interest thereon from the 22d day of August, 1891, and $3.10 costs, and no part of said sum has ever been accounted for or paid over by said Proudfoot, or any person for him. This state of facts existing, an action of debt was brought to the September rules, 1892, in the name of the state of West Virginia, which sued at the relation and costs of R. P. Thompson and W. H.

Francis, partners doing business under the name and style of Treasure Stove Works, against said J. H. Proudfoot, as late constable, and I. M. Adams, W. Lytle, and W. Lytle, Jr., sureties on his official bond. The defendants I. M. Adams and W. Lytle cravedoyer of the writing obligatory, demurred to the declaration, in which demurrer the plaintiffs joined, and thereupon they pleaded conditions not broken, and issue was thereon joined, the demurrer was overruled and disallowed, and the cause was submitted to the court in lieu of a jury, which resulted in a finding for the defendants I. M. Adams and W. Lytle, to which finding and judgment the plaintiffs excepted, and moved the court to set aside said judgment, and grant them a new trial of said action, which motion was overruled, and moved the court also to certify all the evidence given or heard upon the trial, and presented their bill of exceptions, which was signed and sealed and saved to the plaintiff, and made a part of the record.

Did the circuit court err in finding for the defendants I. M. Adams and W. Lytle, and dismissing the action as to them? It is a conceded fact that said J. H. Proudfoot, together with I. M. Adams, W. Lytle, and W. Lytle, Jr., entered into and executed the bond declared on by the plaintiffs. It was also ordered by said county court that said Proudfoot should not transact any business as such constable until he should file his bond as such constable in the penalty of $5,000, conditioned according to law, and directed that said bond should be approved by the clerk of said court; but said court did not at any time take the acknowledgment of or approve said bond, while our statute (Code, p. 111, c. 10, § 14) provides that every constable shall give bond with good security, to be approved by the county court. Now, it must be conceded that the county court had no power to delegate its right and duty to approve such bond to the clerk of said court when the statute expressly provides that the bond shall be approved by the county court, but the question for our consideration is: Did the failure on the part of the county court to perform its duty by approving said bond relieve the sureties in said bond in voluntarily executing the same, acknowledging it before the clerk, and delivering it for record? Can said sureties complain that the bond was not approved? The manifest object of the law requiring its approval is not that the sureties may in any manner be benefited thereby, but that the public—the people who may intrust their claims to the constable for collection—may be protected. The court in this case, with a view of affording such protection, entered its order directing that said Proudfoot should not transact any business as such constable until he should file his bond as such constable in the penalty of $5,000, conditioned according to law, which bond should be approved by the clerk of said court; and at the date of said bond the said Proudfoot took the proper oath of office, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of said office. The said bond was acknowledged before said clerk and approved by said clerk, it is presumed, by satisfying himself as to the sufficiency of said sureties; and while it cannot be said that this action on the part of the clerk in vacation was an approval of said bond by the county court, yet it was acknowledged before him, and delivered to him for record, and the action of said sureties in thus executing and delivering said bond enabled said constable to qualify and assume the duties of the office. Murfree, in his valuable work on Official Bonds, under the head of "Approval of Bonds," (section 175,) says: "Attempts are frequently made by officers and their sureties to evade the responsibility of their official bonds on the ground that the bond was not approved by the proper officer or in the appropriate manner or not approved at all. They have usually failed for the obvious reason that, if the officer has been inducted into office, and thus enjoyed the advantage afforded by the execution of the bond, it does not lie with him or his friends to controvert the validity of their obligation because of the omission of a ceremonial which is not intended for their protection, but the precise reverse,—to protect the public against them. The courts in such cases very readily accept slight proof of approval of bonds under which the obligors have gone into office. Hence, in Missouri, a bond was held to be approved because it was handed to the clerk of the county court in vacation, who marked it 'Filed,' and put it away in a proper place in his office. Indeed, the court went so far as to say that the failure of the county court to either approve or reject at all in no degree invalidated the bond." The case referred to by the author is found in 7 Mo. 46, styled Jones v. State. The second point of syllabus reads as follows: "The failure of the county court to approve or reject a constable's bond taken by the clerk in vacation will not invalidate the bond. The duty enjoined upon the county court in this respect was intended for the security of the public, and their omission to perform such duty cannot injure the constable and his securities." The Missouri statute under which this decision was rendered provides that the bond shall be approved by the court or clerk in vacation, and, if taken by the clerk in vacation, shall be approved or rejected by the court at the next term. So, also, in the case of Moore v. State, 9 Mo. 198, it was held that "a bond given by a collector is valid against him and his securities, although not approved by the county court." Upon this point, see, also, State v. Fredericks, 8 Iowa, 553. In the case of Lytle v. Cozad, 21 W. Va. 199, which was a contest in reference to the validity of a commissioner's bond executed by a commissioner under the statute before proceeding to make sale of land, one of the securities claiming and showing that he had signed the bond and delivered it to said commissioner with the agreement and understanding that others were to sign it as securities before it was delivered, Green, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "When one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he who has enabled such person to occasion the loss must sustain it."

The question as to the effect of a failure to properly approve an official bond was before the supreme court of Arkansas in the case of Auditor v. Woodruff, 2 Ark. 73, and it was there held that, although the statute requires the official bond of the state treasurer to be approved by the governor, and that approval to be indorsed thereon, before the commission issues or the person qualifies or proceeds to discharge the duties of his office, yet the failure of the governor to indorse such approval or to approve the bond neither creates nor destroys, increases nor diminishes, the obligation of the contract, which, if in every other respect legally executed, is perfect. The statute, by implication, imposes on the person whose bond is required to be thus approved the duty of submitting it to the executive for his approval. The design of the legislature in requiring the bond to be approved by the governor was to provide for the public as well as individuals an undoubted assurance that the security is perfect, and amply sufficient to indemnify them for any loss or injury which they may sustain by failure of the officer to perform his official duties. But the failure of the governor to approve the bond neither discharges the officer nor his securities. The approval is not a condition precedent until the happening of which the obligation of the contract remains, as it were, suspended, so that it does not attach upon the obligors. The bond became perfect by execution and delivery as at common law. And in the case of Taylor v. Auditor, reported in 2 Ark. 174, it was held that the failure of an officer to obtain an approval of his official bond as required by the statute does not affect his liability, or that of his sureties, if it was otherwise legally executed and delivered. These cases, as we think, state the law correctly.

Counsel for the defendants in error, in their brief, rely upon the case of People v. Van Ness, 70 Cal. 85, 21 Pac. 554, where it is held that "an official bond, like every other deed, is not operative until a delivery, nor are the sureties liable thereon for any breach until after delivery. There can be no delivery of an official bond until its approval by the proper authority." This is quoted from the syllabus of the case, and, turning to the opinion of the court, we find Thornton, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "There was no delivery of the second official bond executed by Van Ness and sureties until the day on which it was approved by the governor.

We cannot see how there could have been any delivery until that date. The bond was not in a condition to be delivered until that date. Prior to that time it was inchoate, and imperfect as a bond. Like every other deed, that bond was not operative until delivery. It follows that the parties to the second bond were not liable for any breach until after its delivery," etc.; citing Sacramento v. Bird, 31 Cal. 74. But when we turn to that case we find that it simply lays down the proposition that "when an official bond, proper in form and substance, is signed and sealed by the obligors, and approved by the proper officer, and filed in the office appointed by law, it is both executed and delivered to the people of the state of California,"—a proposition which must be readily conceded; but the question is whether other acts on the part of the obligor and his sureties may not constitute a delivery, although in some respects they may fall short of this standard. By a decision of the supreme court of the same state, reported in 29 Cal. 429, in the case of People v. Evans, it was held that "the sureties on an official bond are liable under the statute, notwithstanding it was approved by the wrong officer or board;" and in the case of People v. Edwards, 9 Cal. 286, it was held that "the defect in the approval of a sheriff's bond cannot be set up as a defense in an action on said bond against the sureties. The object of the law in requiring the approval is to insure greater security to the public, and it does not lie in the obligors to object that their bond was accepted without proper examination into its sufficiency by the officers of the law." The opinion in this last case was delivered by Field, J., who for many years has been one of the justices of the United States supreme court. On this point we quote the American & English Encyclopedia of Law, under the head of "Bonds," (page 466,) where it is said: "In some states an official approval is required as a condition precedent to its validity, and of the title of the principal to his office. Such an approval is a condition required for the protection of the public, and its omission can in no instance inure to the benefit of the obligors. Attempts to invalidate bonds for such reasons have usually failed." So in the case of McCracken v. Todd, 1 Kan. 149, it was held that "the sureties on a sheriff's bond cannot take advantage of an omission to have the bond approved, and its amount prescribed by the probate court, where the amount is within the statutory limit. The deposit of such bond for record held to be a delivery." In the case under consideration the constable's bond was executed by the principal and his sureties, and in pursuance of an order of the county court, which fixed the penalty of the bond at $5,000, was acknowledged before the clerk of said county court in vacation, and approved by him in pursuance of the direction of said court, and was admitted to record in said office. By depositing the bond in said clerk's office, executed in the penalty prescribed by said court, said constable and his sureties gave said court the option of accepting or rejecting the same at the next term thereof; and, besides, if the court was not satisfied with the security in said bond, under section 20 of chapter 10 of the Code the court might at any time require from said constable a new bond, or an additional bond to that already given, to be approved by such court; but it does not appear that said court at any time required a new or additional bond, although it was recorded in the clerk's office of said court, and the court must have had notice of its character. The weight of authority, however, as we have seen by the cases above cited, leads to the conclusion that sureties on a bond of this character cannot take advantage of the fact that the bond has not been approved by the proper court or officer to shield themselves from liability occasioned by the default of their principal, as the approval of the bond neither adds to nor detracts from the obligation of parties signing such bond; and, if the bond in controversy could not be considered good as a statutory bond, there is nothing to prevent its being held good as a common-law bond. Murfree on Official Bonds says, (section 64:) "It very often happens that a bond executed in consequence of a statute, and with the design, by conformity to its terms, of being a valid statutory or official bond, falls short of the statutory requirements, and fails to become a bond of that peculiar character. In such cases the question arises whether the bond so imperfect or defective is absolutely void or valid as a common-law bond, irrespective of the design to impart to it a statutory and official character. The rule upon this subject is well stated in a recent case in Illinois. The court says: 'We have several times held that an obligation entered into voluntarily, and for a sufficient consideration, unless it contravenes the policy of the law, or is repugnant to some provision of the statute, is valid at common law, notwithstanding the attempt may have been made to execute it pursuant to a statute with the terms of which it does not strictly comply.' * * * And if an officer and his sureties of their own accord fix upon the amount of the penalty, (within the prescribed limits,) execute the bond, and deposit it with the proper custodian, it is not only good as a common-law bond, but, in Kansas, valid as a statutory bond as well, although the proper court neither fixed the amount of the penalty nor approved the security;" citing McCracken v. Todd, 1 Kan. 148, above quoted. In the case of Supervisors v. Dunn, 27 Grat. 615, Staples, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "A person who signs, seals, and delivers an instrument as his deed will never be heard to question its validity upon the ground that it was not acknowledged by him, nor proved at the time of the delivery. It is the sealing and delivery that gives efficacy to the deed, and not proof of the execution." And this, we think, propounds the law correctly upon this point.

In the case under consideration, however, the county court fixed the amount of the bond, and directed that it should be deposited with its clerk. It is, however, insisted by counsel for the defendants in error that the successor to the constable did not qualify in a reasonable time after the expiration of his official term, and that the sureties should be exonerated. In this case said Proudfoot was elected his own successor, and was so declared on the 10th day of November, 1890. He failed to qualify or give bond, but continued to perform the duties of his office, and while acting as such constable, on the 13th day of November, 1891, received the execution mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration, less than a year after his election. The case of Com. v. Fairfax, 4 Hen. & M. 208, is cited and relied on to show that the sureties in this bond were released, but that decision was under a Virginia statute which required that the sheriffs should be nominated and commissioned annually, (see section 1, c. 80, of the Revised Code,) the sixth section of which provides that every person commissioned and qualified as aforesaid should be continued in office for one year after his qualification, and might, with his own consent, and the approbation of the executive, be continued for two years, and no longer, etc.; very different from the provision in our constitution (article 4, § 6) which provides that such officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices until their successors are elected or appointed and qualified. In the case of Monteith v. Com., 15 Grat. 172, the sheriff was re-elected, and gave bond and qualified, and it was held in that case that it could not be held that he continued to hold over under his first election on the ground that his successor had not qualified so as to subject his sureties in his previous bond. Article 6, § 23, of the Virginia constitution then provided that such officer should continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices until their successors were qualified, and Allen, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, among other things, said: "In the case under consideration the sureties are liable for the discharge of the duties of the office for the term for which the bond recites he was elected, and thereafter until a successor qualifies." Upon this question, see, also, Ex parte Lawhorne, 18 Grat. 85; also Com. v. Drewry, 15 Grat. 1, which last-named case is very similar in its facts,—the sheriff held over, and it was held that his sureties were liable for acts performed after his term expired. Again, section 21 of chapter 10 of our Code provides for the relief of sureties on such bonds on petition when they apprehend pecuniary loss, but these sureties, with full notice of the law, allowed their principal to go on and perform the duties of the office, and thus put it in his power to receive claims from the public, and, when a default occurred, they claim to be released, because he has held over an unreasonable time, which they had it in their power to prevent. Numerous authorities have been cited to show that sureties are liable only for the term for which the officer was elected or appointed, but most of them refer to officers of corporations who are required to be elected annually, and under provisions of statutes and by-laws so different from our constitution and statutes that we think they should have little controlling influence in this case. My conclusion, therefore, is that the circuit court erred in finding for the defendants I. M. Adams and W. Lytle, the sureties in said bond, and giving judgment for them. The judgment complained of is reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Jackson county, in order that a proper judgment may be rendered therein, there being no evidence that J. H. Proudfoot and W. Lytle, Jr., were before the court; and the defendants in error must pay the costs of this writ.

HALSTEAD v. HORTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia:
Jan. 27, 1894.)

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—CONTINUANCE—APPEAL—EXCEPTIONS.

1. A new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence unless the case comes within the following rules: (1) The evidence must appear to have been discovered since the trial, and, from the affidavit of the new witness, what such evidence will be, or its absence satisfactorily explained. (2) It must appear from facts stated in his affidavit that plaintiff was diligent in ascertaining and securing his evidence, and that the new evidence is such that due diligence would not have secured it before the verdict. (3) Such evidence must be new and material, and not merely cumulative; and cumulative evidence is additional evidence of the same kind to the same point. (4) The evidence must be such as ought to produce an opposite result at a second trial on the merits. (5) And the new trial will generally be refused when the sole object of the new evidence is to discredit or impeach a witness on the opposite side.

2. A motion to postpone until another day the submission of the case to the jury is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court under all the circumstances, and the appellate court will not reverse a judgment on the ground of a refusal to postpone, unless such refusal plainly appears to have been an abuse of such discretion.

3. Where a party intends to review in the appellate court the action of the trial court in rejecting or admitting evidence, he must make such ruling the subject-matter of a formal bill of exceptions, or he must in some way distinctly and specifically make such ruling a ground of his motion for a new trial.

4. A case in which these rules are applied.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Greenbrier county. Action by Virginia Halstead against John D. Horton under the civil damage law. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. W. Arbuckle, for plaintiff in error.
Henry Gilmer, for defendant in error.

HOIT, J. This is an action of trespass on the case, brought in the circuit court of Greenbrier county on the 29th day of February, 1892, by the plaintiff, Mrs. Virginia Halstead, against defendant, John D. Horton, under section 20 of chapter 32 of the Code, (see Ed. 1891, p. 236,) averring that she was injured in property and means of support in consequence of the intoxication of her husband, John J. Halstead, caused by defendant, on the 27th day of November, 1891, at the town of Ronceverte, by said defendant then and there unlawfully selling and giving him intoxicating liquors, whereby, among other things, defendant caused her husband to lose, squander, and waste the sum of $600, her sole and separate property, then in her husband's possession, laying her damages at $5,000. The case was tried by a jury on the plea of not guilty, and on the 15th of July, 1892, the jury returned a verdict for defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant her a new trial, because the same was contrary to the law and the evidence; also on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, and because the defendant procured the verdict by false evidence, and a fraud upon the jury; but the court overruled the motion, and gave judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff obtained a writ of error. All the evidence is certified, but no instruction was asked by either party, and none was given. During the progress of the trial, after plaintiff had introduced her evidence in chief, and defendant had closed his evidence, plaintiff called John G. Tobin, who stated: "I know John D. Horton. I have seen John J. Halstead." Witness was then asked by plaintiff: "Did you see John J. Halstead, and examine him at the time he was robbed in Ronceverte? If so, did he have any money?" Question objected to by counsel for defendant. Objection sustained, and plaintiff excepted. Plaintiff, by her counsel, then moved the court to continue the case until next morning, (it being about 5 o'clock P. M.,) that plaintiff might get an important witness, (John F. Bowes,) stating he had been regularly summoned, and had gone to Caldwell, about four miles from the courthouse. The court overruled plaintiff's motion, and refused to continue the case, to which ruling of the court the plaintiff excepted, and prayed that her exception be saved to her, which was done.

The law of the case involved in the trial is as follows: "If any person having a state license to sell spirituous liquors * * * shall sell or give any such liquors * * * to any person who is intoxicated at the time, or who is in the habit of drinking to intoxication, when he knows or has reason to believe such person * * * is intoxicated or is in the habit of drinking to intoxication, or if he permit any person to drink to intoxication on any premises under his control, * * * he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined not less than twenty nor more than one hundred dollars." Code, c. 32, § 16. "Every husband, wife, child, parent, guardian, employer or other person, who shall be injured in person or property, or means of support, by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, shall have a right of action in his or her name, * * * against any person who shall, by unlawfully selling or giving intoxicating liquors, have caused the intoxication, in whole or in part, of such person." Code, c. 32, § 20. The undisputed facts are as follows: About the 27th day of November, 1891, at the time in question, John D. Horton had license to sell whisky, etc., at his premises in the town of Ronceverte. On that day the husband, John J. Halstead, came to defendant's saloon, having about $288 in currency and a check on the Bank of Ronceverte for $312, the proceeds of the sale of a lot of cattle, the sole and separate property of plaintiff. John J. Halstead told defendant, Horton, he had a check, and wanted him (Horton) to go to the bank to identify him. Defendant went to the bank, and said to the cashier, "Mr. Morton, this is John Halstead, from Nicholas county, ex-sheriff." Defendant went out of the bank, and the cashier cashed Halstead's check for $312. Horton sold him a quart bottle of whisky before they went to the bank. Halstead went back to the saloon. He went to a restaurant, got his breakfast, drank some out of the bottle, became intoxicated to insensibility. When he came to, he was in the "lockup," and all his money was gone. The only question in dispute was, was the sale or sales by Horton unlawful? There is no question on this evidence that the husband, John J. Halstead, was then and before in the habit of drinking to intoxication; but did defendant know, or have reason to believe, that such was the habit of John Halstead? Halstead had been in Ronceverte in the fall of 1890, about November, "was on a spree several days," and was in Horton's premises during that spree; but defendant says in his evidence that about July 14, 1890, he went to Buckhannon, Va., under a contract to superintend some grading, and was only at home on Sundays to see his family, until December 3d; that he would come home Saturday night, and go back to Buckhannon on Monday. Plaintiff, on her motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, files the affidavits of three witnesses, who state that there was a camp meeting in Greenbrier county, eight miles west of Lewisburg, beginning on the 16th day of August, 1890, lasting about one week, and that defendant, Horton, was at the camp meeting for several days; but this does not cover the time in November, 1891, when Halstead was drunk and drinking in Ronceverte; but this would only go to the credit of the witness, "and the general rule is that a new trial will not be granted to enable the party asking it to discredit a witness who testified against him on a former trial." State v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 703. When in the evening, about 5 o'clock P. M., at the close of her evidence in rebuttal, plaintiff moved the court to continue the case until the next morning, to enable her to have present and examine the "important witness John T. Bowes, who had been summoned, had been present, but was then absent, being at a place about four miles away, the court, in the exercise of its wise discretion, and as is often done in such circumstances, could without error have continued the case until morning; but there is nothing in this record to show that the court, in refusing to do so, abused such discretion, or in any respect plainly committed error. There is no affidavit of his materiality, no statement of what plaintiff expected to prove by him, whether it was in rebuttal or in chief, or anything by which this court can determine upon its competency, much less its importance; and the business of the court may have been urgent and pressing, and, in any event, the plaintiff then had it in her power as matter of right to suffer a nonsuit. The question asked the witness John G. Tobin by plaintiff and rejected by the court would seem to have been relevant and material, for the loss of $600 from the person of John J. Halstead, as caused by his intoxication, is expressly averred in the declaration; and it would seem to have been also admissible in rebuttal, as tending to show that it was not upon his person when he was put in the "lockup." But the counsel for plaintiff seem to have abandoned the question, although, when the objection was sustained, they noted an exception. At any rate, they did not modify the question so as to relieve it from the objection of assuming an important fact not proved. There is nothing but the inference to be drawn from the question itself to inform this court what answer the witness was expected to give. It is not made the subject of a formal bill of exceptions, as distinguished from a mere note of exception in passing, made during the trial, and found in the certificate of evidence; nor is it made one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial; nor does it appear to have been in any way brought to the attention of the trial court on such motion, so that it could be reviewed. Under our statute, the evidence, not the facts, is certified. It often covers hundreds of printed pages, with exceptions noted by the dozen, sprinkled throughout the certificate. It would be unreasonable to expect the circuit or appellate court "to explore the entire mass for the ascertainment of defects which the exceptor himself would not or could not point to their view." See opinion of Justice Daniel in Camden v. Doremus, 3 How. 515, 530; 2 Thomp. Trials, § 2786; Gregory's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 37 W. Va., 606, 609, 16 S. E. 819.

The first ground assigned on the motion for new trial is that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence. No instructions were given or refused, and the rulings of the court as to the evidence have already been considered. As to the evidence, that was conflicting, so that the verdict cannot be disturbed as plainly contrary to the evidence. The second ground is that of newly-discovered evidence, and on this plaintiff filed six affidavits and defendant five counter affidavits. Plaintiff filed her own affidavit and the affidavit of her husband, who attended to this suit, and transacted her business, showing satisfactorily (1) that the newly-discovered evidence hereafter mentioned was discovered since the former trial; (2) that reasonable diligence on the part of plaintiff and of her husband and agent was used, but did not and could not have secured it at the former trial. The remaining questions are: (3) Is it material in its object, and not merely cumulative, corroborative, or col. ate. al? and (4) Is it such as ought to produce, on another trial, an opposite result on the merits? See Carder v. Bank, 34 W. Va. 33, 11 S. E. 716, where the rule is laid down, and the cases in point are collected and cited. See Betsall's Case, 11 W. Va. 703; 16 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 564.

Affidavit No. 6 filed by plaintiff is that of Robert A. Rutherford, and is as follows: "West Virginia, Greenbrier County. Robert Rutherford, on his oath, says that in November, 1891, he was at the saloon of John D. Horton, in the town of Ronceverte; that John J. Halstead was in the saloon, intoxicated, at the time, and purchased while in there a bottle of whisky from said Horton, and paid him for it; that Halstead and Horton were talking as friends, and, after Halstead went out of the saloon, affiant thought he was too tight then to 'make it' around Moore's corner, and he stepped to the door to see if he (Halstead) would 'make it,' or if the police would get him. He saw him go towards Eldridge's restaurant, and remarked to some boys who were there that he (Halstead) was all right, as he had passed the corner. Affiant says that this was the day before it was charged that Halstead had been robbed of his money in Ronceverte. Affiant further says that he never gave this information to the plaintiff in this case until after the trial of the case against Horton at the present term of this court. R. A. Rutherford. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 18th day of July, 1892. S. R. Patton, Notary Public." This witness says, in substance, that in November, 1891, the day before it was charged that Halstead had been robbed of his money, he was at the saloon of John D. Horton, in the town of Ronceverte; that John J. Halstead was in the saloon, intoxicated, at the time, and purchased while in there a bottle of whisky from said Horton, and paid him for it. Cumulative evidence is generally said to be additional evidence of the same kind to the same point. Black, Law Dict.; People v. Superior Court, 10 Wend. 285, 294; Parker v. Hardy, 24 Pick. 246, 248; Able v. Frazier, 43 Iowa, 175, 177; 1 Greenl. Ev. (15th Ed.) § 2. Plaintiff introduced no evidence upon this point except that of her husband. He says: "In November, 1891, I went to Horton's saloon. Got a drink of whisky from him. Went to the bank, where they did not know me. Went back to get Horton to identify me, and got another drink. Horton went to identify me at the bank. I got $312. Went back with him to saloon. Got another drink, and a quart of whisky. Took a drink or two out of it in saloon. Then went to get breakfast, and can't tell what became of balance of it. I suppose Horton knew I was in the habit of getting drunk. He saw me the fall before. * * * I was not drunk when I got the quart." This evidently covers the same time and place that affiant Rutherford speaks of. Rutherford says he was intoxicated, so much so as to attract his attention, and to cause him to watch and see if, when on the street, "the police would get him." Halstead says he was not drunk when he bought the bottle of whisky. When he would be of the opinion that he was intoxicated he does not say, unless we are to infer that he means intoxication to that degree that he lost memory and sensibility, — being helpless, and not knowing when his money was taken. "Intoxicated," within the meaning of the statute, is such as attracts observation, and becomes known to others, or gives them reason to believe the person is intoxicated; and of this a bystander would generally be a better judge than the party himself, whose opinion on the subject for obvious reasons is worth but little. There is no question that he was in the habit of becoming intoxicated, that he did become so on this occasion, and, by his own testimony, had taken three drinks in a short time. But the newly-discovered evidence of affiant Rutherford is certainly evidence of the same kind and to the same point, except that one spoke from what he saw, the other from what he felt; but it was not "additional" evidence of the same kind, to the same point, but antagonistic and contradictory, and therefore not cumulative; and the plaintiff is not bound by the mistaken opinion of her own witness.

Is it such as ought to produce on another trial an opposite result on the merits? For the purpose of this motion, credit will be given to the affidavit, unless something appears to discredit it. The counter affidavits do not tend to discredit the affidavit of Rutherford, for none of them touches the same point, but all relate to the point made on the trial, did Horton see and know Halstead when he was on a spree in Ronceverte, in the fall of 1890, and therefore know that he was in the habit of becoming intoxicated? The affidavit of Rutherford is in for the present purpose, and not discredited. How are we to determine that it ought to, or would likely, produce a verdict for the plaintiff on the merits? It must not be taken by itself, but "in connection with that exhibited on the trial. The question is not whether a jury might be induced to give a different verdict, but whether the legitimate effect of such evidence would be to require a different verdict." Hitchcock, J., in Ludlow v. Park, (1829,) 4 Ohio, 5, 44. On the vital point that on that morning in November, 1891, in his saloon in Ronceverte, defendant, John D. Horton, sold whisky, in a bottle or otherwise, to John J. Halstead, when he was intoxicated, the newly-discovered evidence set forth in this affidavit stands alone amid all the direct evidence on both sides. Plaintiff's witness Halstead says he was sober when he bought of Horton the bottle of whisky. Her witness Quinn Morton, the cashier of the bank, says he was sober when Horton introduced him to get the check cashed. Horton says he left him in the bank, and did not see him again for more than 24 hours. When he saw him in the saloon, he bought a bottle of whisky, to take home to his wife, and he was sober. He did not see him drink anything. That his saloon keeper, Wikoff, was in the saloon at the time, and no one else, when Halstead bought the bottle of whisky, which was not opened, but wrapped up; and that he individually never sold him a drink of whisky in his life; and that he did not know as matter of fact, and had no reason to believe, that Halstead was in the habit of drinking to intoxication. The saloon keeper, M. F. Wikoff, says he came in about 9 o'clock in the morning. He saw Horton sell him the bottle of liquor. He came there twice that day. The next day he was drinking; did not see him drink, and refused to sell him any liquor for that reason. Defendant's witness Edward Eldridge says that about 9 o'clock of the morning in question Halstead came to his restaurant for his breakfast; had his bottle with him. He looked sober, took a drink out of his bottle, ate his breakfast, paid for it, and went away. Charles Lee, witness for defendant, saw Halstead come in and get the quart of whisky; had it wrapped up; said he wanted it for his wife. He got nothing to drink while witness was in there. Halstead is in the habit of becoming intoxicated, but the jury has already found that defendant did not know of such habit. He was certainly sober that morning. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that at or about the time Halstead bought the bottle of liquor of Horton he had become intoxicated, and Horton knew it, or had reason to believe it. Can we say that, if this new testimony had been before this jury, it would have been enough to entitle plaintiff to a verdict on this point,—enough on behalf of the one with the laboring oar to outweigh and overcome the testimony of every one of the witnesses who testified on this point, including all plaintiff's witnesses who were examined on this point as well as the witnesses introduced by defendant who so testified,—and make it the duty of the jury to find an opposite verdict on the merits? As I have already shown, the affidavits of Kelly, Knight, and Dwyer only tend to show that defendant, Horton, was in the county of Greenbrier several days after the 16th day of August, 1890, and therefore it is not true, as stated by him, that about July 14, 1890, he went to Buckhannon, Va., and was only at home on Sundays until December 3d; but this only tends to discredit or impeach the witness, and does not show that he was at home in November, 1890, when Halstead was at Ronceverte on a "spree," or in any way tend to show that Horton knew or had reason to believe that Halstead was in the habit of drinking to intoxication; or to contradict Horton where he says he had never seen Halstead but once before, (November, 1891,) and that was about four years before that time, when he met him over at Lewisburg, when Halstead was introduced to him as ex-sheriff of Nicholas county, and he was then sober. There is no controversy about the law of the case, but I may mention that the law on the subject when Pegram v. Stortz, 31 W. Va. 220, 6 S. E. 485, was decided has been amended, dispensing with the notice then required, among other changes, and now reads as found in section 20, c. 32, of the Code, (Ed. 1891, p. 236.) See Abb. Tr. Ev. 775; Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1124 Judgment affirmed.

OHIO RIVER R. CO. v. BLAKE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 3, 1894.)

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS — COMPETENCY OF JURORS — WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS — NEW TRIAL — DAMAGES.

1. The record need not show in terms that a jury formed under section 17, c. 42, of the Code, in a proceeding to take land or material therefrom for public use, are freeholders.

2. The record in such a proceeding shows that the jurors were "drawn, elected, tried, and sworn in the manner required by law." It will be presumed they were freeholders.

3. No objection having been sooner made against a juror for want of freehold qualification, it is too late after verdict in such a proceeding to make such objection based on affidavit or other evidence dehors the record.

4. An objection to a juror for want of qualification comes too late after verdict.

5. In such case, the release of a portion of the compensation found by a jury as suggested by the court as a condition of the refusal of a new trial, and the refusal of a motion for a new trial on account of excessiveness in the amount found, is not error for the reason, if for no other, that the evidence furnishes data on which the compensation can be measured, and the reduced sum is not excessive. Remittitur.

6. Can the court, in an action for a tort, where the law furnishes no rule for the assessment of damages, on a motion for a new trial, based on excessiveness of damages, suggest the release of a part, and, upon such release being made, refuse a new trial? Cases of Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 1, and Unfried v. Railroad Co., 34 W. Va. 260, 12 S. E. 512, discussed in this regard.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Cabell county.

Condemnation proceedings by the Ohio River Railroad Company against Capple B. Blake. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Vinson, McDonald & Thompson, for plaintiff in error. Campbell & Holt, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, P. Under section 14, c. 52, Code 1891, the Ohio River Railroad Company made application to a justice of Cabell county to appoint commissioners to ascertain the compensation which it should pay to Capple B. Blake for gravel which it proposed to take from land of Blake for use on its road, and, commissioners having been appointed, and returned their report to the circuit court, and Blake having excepted to it and demanded that such compensation be assessed by a jury, and a jury having assessed it, the company moved the circuit court to set the verdict aside, and, its motion having been overruled, the company brought the case here. The plaintiff in error points out as error that the court ought to have set aside the verdict because some of the jurors were not freeholders, as required by statute and constitution in such a case. Counsel say—First, that the record ought to show on its face that the jury was made up of freeholders; and, second, that at any rate, when it is shown dehors the record that it was not so composed, the verdict ought to have been annulled.

1. The record does not show its own error by its omission in words to say that the jury consisted of freeholders. It says that they "were drawn, selected, tried, and sworn in the manner required by law." The word "selected" imports that they were freeholders,—that is, that they were set apart from all other persons as required by law, which required them to be freeholders,—and we would assume that legal qualification was an essential element in the act of selection. We would not assume that in it the law was not observed, and use this assumption to overthrow a proceeding, rather than presume what is reasonable to sustain it. The word would, from common understanding, import this; but, as used in such a proceeding, it has a legal signification, since section 14, c. 52, Code, says that, if a jury be demanded, proceedings shall be according to chapter 42, and, turning to it, in section 17 we find that it says that "a jury of twelve freeholders shall be selected and impaneled," and hence the use of the words, "selected in the manner required by law," in the record of a proceeding under section 17, implies that the jury were freeholders. And the word "tried," in the order, imports that the jurors were tested as to their fitness and qualifications under the law. In Stephen's Case, 4 Leigh, 679, a capital felony case, the record said the jury came and were "elected, tried, and sworn the truth of and upon the premises to speak," and it was held that it need not expressly show that they were freeholders. Here the record says more in saying they were elected and tried in the manner required by law. I think that if it had not said so the presumption would be that the law was observed, and so the Stephen Case holds. This view is supported by Bridge Co. v. Comstock, 36 W. Va. 264, 275, 15 S. E. 69, and Railroad Co. v. Patton, 9 W. Va. 658.

It is argued that there ought to have been an order to summon freeholders, and that we are to infer that the jury was formed from the jurors attending for the trial of causes generally. Section 17, c. 42, which applies, says the jury shall be selected and impaneled in such manner as the court may direct, and that "the cause shall be tried as other causes." Trial includes the selection of a jury, and I construe this statute as authorizing the formation of such a jury from those in attendance; and section 6, c. 116, has the broad provision that "all jurors required for the trial of cases in any circuit court including cases of felony, shall be selected" from those so in attendance for trials generally. Why except a jury in condemnation cases from these provisions? It is a case in the court. And then, how can we say in what way they were selected? No exception under this head was made at the time. We would presume they were selected as they should have been, as above stated.

2. But though the record is not vulnerable in falling on its face to show these things expressly, still the fact that some of the jurors were not freeholders is shown. Was this ground for new trial? No, because the exception came too late. The appellant knew its right to have freeholders on the jury. It could have had the court ask every juror as to his qualifications, or itself asked him. When the jury was being impaneled the court "called on the attorneys, if they had any objections to the jurors, or any of them, or to the manner in which they were sworn, to say so." The freehold qualification was not mentioned. It was a thing that could be either waived or required. It was thus waived. Are long, tedious, costly trials to be made nugatory, and justice delayed, for such causes? If the attorneys for the company did not know that the jurors were incompetent, they could have known by a few questions. It does not appear that they were ignorant of the jurors' disqualification, but, if they had been, I would say that it would make no difference, because, where a party is given by law the right to have jurors of certain qualifications, and sits by and does not ask them, especially when called on by the court to make any objection or suggestion, it is a waiver. Section 18, c. 116, Code, says that "no exception shall be allowed against a juror after he is sworn upon the jury on account of his age or other legal disability, unless by leave of the court." While the constitution gives the right to have jurors of certain qualifications, yet the legislature has the right to regulate the time of its enforcement to the end of the speedy administration of justice. Under this statute, in Thompson's Case, 8 Grat. 637, it was held that objection to a venireman in a criminal case is too late after he is sworn. In the condemnation case of Railroad Co. v. Patton, 9 W. Va. 658, it was held that the objection that jurors were not freeholders came too late after verdict.

The second point of error assigned is that, on the motion for a new trial, because the amount of compensation fixed by the jury was excessive, the court gave Blake election between accepting a less sum or a new trial, and, she accepting that sum, the court refused a new trial, whereas it ought to have given it. This assignment of error is based on the cases of Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 1, and Unfried v. Railroad Co., 34 W. Va. 260, 12 S. E. 512; the latter following the syllabus of the former case. The law which these cases propound is that in all actions for damages, where the verdict is so enormous in amount as to clearly indicate prejudice, partiality, passion, or corruption in the jury in arriving at their conclusions, the defendant is entitled to a new trial, and it is error to allow the plaintiff to elect to take a less sum, suggested by the court, when there are no data before the court by which the smaller sum can be rightly and definitely ascertained, but which is fixed by the discretion of the court, unaided by evidence. This doctrine we cannot apply to the present case for two reasons: First, we do not regard the finding excessive so as to justify a court in setting it aside for that cause, and, this being so, of course there is no reversible error to the prejudice of the railroad company. The company took all the gravel bed, or all the gravel in a parcel of nearly 6 acres of land, on the Ohio river and on said railroad, 15 miles from the growing city of Huntington, and 12 miles from the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, containing a deposit of 13 feet of gravel, valuable in paving streets in towns and for railroad ballast. Removal of the ballast would remove the soil of the valuable land, and injure the residue of the tract. The assessment of $2,933 seems to me high, but not so as to justify us in overruling the verdict. A calculation of the product of this gravel deposit at a fair price under the evidence would produce more than double this sum, not to say anything of the destruction of soil and injury to the residue of the tract. The jury fixed it. We see no partiality or prejudice. We cannot value it as farming land. The owner is entitled to its peculiar value from its happening to contain a valuable deposit of gravel. And the second reason why said cases do not call for reversal, but justify the action of the circuit court in allowing a remittitur, or partial release of damages, is that, as above stated, we have data or basis on which to fix compensation, and show that the sum fixed can do no injustice to the company. It is not like an action of tort, where there is no settled basis of estimation of damages. Here I could stop as to this assignment of error, so far as the decision of the case requires; but, as it is germane to the subject, I add that my examination has started doubt in my mind as to the correctness of point 23 in the syllabus in Vinal v. Core. It was obiter, because the court held that the verdict was not excessive, and could not have been set aside; and therefore the question whether, had it been so excessive as to call on the court to set it aside, it was error to accept a partial release of the damages found by the verdict, did not arise. Where there is a verdict, legally speaking, excessive, the right and duty of the court to set it aside cannot be questioned. What is the point of objection? That the amount is too large. Then, if the court allows a part to be released, can we say that the defendant is deprived of the right to have the amount fixed by another jury, and that the court arbitrarily fixes the damages in allowing a reduction and usurps the function of a jury? I think not. The court has power over the question of damages. That settles the point. It has power to say whether the damages found are too great. This inevitably concedes that it has right to say that a given sum is too great, but that another sum is not; that, if the verdict had been for a given sum, it would not disturb it. Then, why can it not suggest a certain sum as a proper one? If the verdict were set aside, a new one may come back to the court for review. It may do so repeatedly. Why may not the court accept a reduction at once? It gives the court a healthy power and control over verdicts, and ends litigation. The defendant is not hurt. The appellate court can yet be called upon to say whether the substituted sum is excessive. Where the action is based on contract, or in any case where there are legal rules or principles by which damages may be ascertained, it is clearly within the power of the court, as all concede, to allow a partial release, and render judgment for the reduced sum; but in actions based on tort involving negligence, malice, wanton wrong, and like elements, where the damages are unliquidated, and there are no fixed rules of law by which to fix them, then it is said there can only be a new trial, and no release of part of the damages can be allowed, because it would deprive the party of a jury right under the constitution, and be an arbitrary assessment by the court. But the issue and assessment have been once before the jury, and the judge does not act arbitrarily in suggesting or accepting a less sum, but by the light of the same evidence which guided the jury. My opinion is that not only in actions for damages based on contract, or for civil injuries, where the law furnishes rules and principles for measuring damages, but also in actions based on tort, though the law does not furnish such rules and principles, but the amount of damages rests with the fair, impartial, and enlightened conscience of a jury, on a motion for a new trial the court may suggest or accept a less sum, and if the plaintiff accept it, overrule the defendant's motion for a new trial. The authorities are somewhat divided. Earlier authorities denied the proposition, perhaps, but later ones uphold it, and the great and decided preponderance of the highest authorities sustains it, to the ends of the exercise by the court of a salutary power over verdicts, and especially to end litigation. I cite the following cases to support the opinion just expressed: Railroad Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 646, 6 Sup. Ct. 590; Cattle Co. v. Mann, 130 U. S. 69, 9 Sup. Ct. 458; Branch v. Bass, 5 Sneed, 366; Corcoran v. Harran, 55 Wis. 120, 12 N. W. 468; Baker v. City of Madison, 62 Wis. 150, 22 N. W. 141, 583; Davis v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 13, 32 Pac. 646; Diblin v. Murphy, 3 Sandf. 19; McIntyre v. Railroad Co., 47 Barb. 515, affirmed in 37 N. Y. 287; Hayden v. Sewing Mach. Co., 54 N. Y. 221; Doyle v. Dixon, 97 Mass. 208; Guerry v. Kerton, 2 Rich. Law, 507; Blunt v. Little, 8 Mason, 102; Young v. Englehard, 1 How. (Miss.) 19; Woodruff v. Richardson, 20 Conn. 238; Black v. Railroad Co., 10 La. Ann. 33; Belknap v. Railroad 49 N. H. 358; Collins v. City of Council Bluffs, 35 Iowa, 432; Lombard v. Railroad Co., 47 Iowa, 494; Whitehead v. Kennedy, 69 N. Y. 462; Jewell v. Gage, 42 Me. 247; Rolling Mill Co. v. Gillen, 100 Ill. 52; Railroad Co. v. Hodge, 6 Bush, 141; Cotton Wool Co. v. Mills, 28 N. J. Law, 60; Pratt v. Press Co., 35 Minn. 251, 28 N. W. 708; Clark v. Brown, 116 Mass. 504; Lambert v. Craig, 12 Pick. 199; 1 Suth. Dam. 813; Railroad Co. v. Rahman, 22 Ohio St. 446; Reddon v. Railroad Co., 5 Utah, 344, 15 Pac. 262. As to torts, this doctrine is denied by some cases. Nunnally v. Talliaferro, 82 Tex. 286, 18 S. W. 149; Carliste v. Callahan, 78 Ga. 320, 2 S. E. 751; Koeltz v. Bleckman, 46 Mo. 320. I have found but few cases clearly denying it. I observe that the opinion in Nudd v. Wells, 11 Wis. 415, referred to by Judge Green in Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 60, has been called, as it was, obiter, and not followed in the later Wisconsin cases cited above. Some of the cases admit a qualification in this: that where, in cases of tort, the amount of damages found by a jury is so enormous as to give evidence of prejudice, partiality, passion, or corruption in the jury, the verdict ought to be set aside, and a new trial granted, without allowing a remittitur of part, and this because of such bad influences operated in producing the unjust verdict, so it likely operated upon the jury in passing on other matters in the case. Lowenthal v. Streng, 90 Ill. 74; Stafford v. Hair Cloth Co., 2 Cliff. 82. There is force in this view, and yet why should not those other matters stand on their own merits? If there was no issue, and only the quantum of damages to be passed on by the jury, or if, where there are other issues, and the finding as to them is plainly right, why should not a remittitur be allowed? True, in cases where the case is nicely balanced, or involving credibility of witnesses, it would seem proper to apply this qualification; but that is only to say that this action is within the discretion of the court, and this question only an element in its exercise, and it can refuse a remittitur when it thinks bad influences may have tainted findings on other matters; for the allowance or disallowance of a remittitur is within the sound discretion of the trial court, and its refusal to allow it would not, as I think, be a ground for reversal. As I construe point 23 of the syllabus in Vinal v. Core, supra, it places the ban on a remittitur in all cases based on tort, for it says that in all cases where there are no settled rules by which to measure damages, and the verdict is so large as to justify its being set aside, it must be unconditionally set aside. It applies the qualification above mentioned,—that where passion, prejudice, or corruption appear, no remittitur can be allowed; and as, under point 22, a verdict cannot be set aside for excess unless so enormous as to furnish evidence of those bad influences, it amounts to saying there cannot, in tort cases, be any remittitur. I have doubt about Vinal v. Core and Unfried v. Railroad Co. in this respect. My opinion is that it does not follow because a court sets aside a verdict in a case in tort because the damages are so excessive as to be attributable to partiality, prejudice, passion, or corruption, that those vices taint the finding on other matters so as to exclude a remittitur, but it is still within the discretion of the court to receive the release. If the court is satisfied with the case on other issues, it may allow it. I think the Ohio case of Railroad Co. v. Rahman, 22 Ohio St. 446, states the rule well as follows: "Where the damages assessed by a jury are excessive, but not in a degree to necessarily imply the influence of passion or prejudice in their finding, the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may make the remittitur of the excess the condition of refusing to grant a new trial." Affirmed.

MILLER v. COX et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 27, 1894.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—DEED OF TRUST FOR WIFE — EVIDENCE OF VALIDITY — STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—POWERS OF REFERENCE.

1. Where during the pendency of a suit against an insolvent husband, instituted for the purpose of obtaining a judgment on a note executed by him, said husband executes a deed of trust on his real estate to a trustee, to secure to his wife the payment of a sum of money which he claims she had loaned to him, which he had used in his business, and which sum was barred by the statute of limitations when said trust was executed, and amounted to nearly the value of the real estate, such trust deed cannot, as a lien, take precedence over judgments obtained by the bona fide creditors of said husband on debts created before said trust was executed, on the unsupported testimony of the husband and wife as to its validity.

2. Where money belonging to the wife as her separate estate is delivered to her husband, and used by him in his business, the law presumes it was intended as a gift, and not as a loan; and, in order to constitute such delivery a loan as against the husband, the wife must prove an express promise of the husband to repay, or establish by the circumstances that it was a loan, and not a gift.

3. Where the facts and circumstances tend to show that a gift was intended, and that the husband used and dealt with the property as his own, the mere parol testimony, of the husband and wife, of a private understanding between themselves that the transaction was by them considered or intended as a loan to the husband by the wife, and not a gift, will not, as against the creditors of an insolvent husband, rebut the presumption of a gift.

4. In taking an account the commissioner may take the depositions of witnesses to enable him to act upon the subject, under his general notice, and a special notice is not necessary.

5. If, at the date of said deed of trust, the claim thereby sought to be secured is barred by the statute of limitations, that fact has a strong tendency to defeat said trust deed as a lien in favor of the wife against bona fide creditors of her husband.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Roane county: V. S. Armstrong, Judge.

Action by C. C. Miller against James S. Cox and others to cancel a trust deed, and for other relief. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chas. E. Hogg, for appellant. Wells & Pendleton and Wm. A. Parsons, for appellees.

ENGLISH, J. On the 28th day of November, 1888, J. S. Cox, a resident of Roane county, W. Va., executed his note for $100, payable to Charles E. Hogg six months after date, for value received, at the Merchants' National Bank of West Virginia, at Point Pleasant, which note was indorsed by said Charles E. Hogg, and delivered to W. H. T. Spencer, and was also indorsed by W. H. T. Spencer, and delivered to Rankin Wiley, Jr., and by Rankin Wiley, Jr., was indorsed and delivered to C. C. Miller. On the 3d day of September, 1889, said C. C. Miller obtained a judgment in the circuit court of Mason county upon said note against said J. S. Cox, Charles E. Hogg, and W. H. T. Spencer for $101.60 and costs. At the time said note was executed, said J. S. Cox was the owner of a tract of land situated on Reedy creek, in Roane county, W. Va., containing 125 acres, and on the 19th day of August, 1889, said J. S. Cox conveyed said tract of land to one George C. Brown, as trustee, to secure to his wife, Margaret J. Cox, the payment of a note for the sum of $1,000, payable one year after date, which deed of trust was recorded on the 19th day of August, 1889, about 14 days before said judgment was obtained upon said note. At the February rules for the circuit court of Roane county, said C. C. Miller filed his bill in equity against said James S. Cox, George C. Brown, trustee, and Margaret J. Cox, praying that said deed of trust might be declared voluntary and void, alleging that it was made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said defendant James S. Cox, and because the same was without any consideration whatever deemed valuable in law; that the same might be set aside; and that the said tract of land might be sold to satisfy said judgment and costs, etc. The defendant Margaret J. Cox demurred to the plaintiff's bill, which demurrer was sustained. The bill was amended at bar, and thereupon said Margaret J. Cox filed her answer. Subsequent to the amendment of said bill, no demurrer seems to have been interposed by the defendants, or either of them. It is, however, contended by counsel for the appellees, that Charles E. Hogg and W. H. T. Spencer, against whom the judgment was obtained, jointly with J. S. Cox, were necessary parties to the suit. This question was, however, fairly presented in the cause of Howard v. Stephenson, 83 W. Va. 116, 10 S. E. 66, and it was in that case held that where a judgment had been obtained against R. and S., and a chancery suit was brought to enforce the lien of said judgment against the lands of S., it was unnecessary to make R. a defendant in said chancery suit, as in it the plaintiff sought no redress against him or his property. Green, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is also claimed that the necessary parties defendant to this suit were never made parties defendant. First, it is claimed, as the exhibits filed with the bill show that the judgments which the plaintiff seeks to enforce were judgments, not against the defendants only, but also jointly against others, these others were necessary parties to this suit. The question, as stated by Barton in his Chancery Practice, (pages 133-138,) is: 'No one should be made a defendant against whom there can be no decree or relief granted in the suit;' and Sanders, in his Suit in Equity, (page 191,) and this court, in Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 60, lay down the rule as follows: 'All persons materially interested in the subject of the controversy ought to be made parties in equity.' See page 78. But, as Sanders says on page 191: 'This rule, however, is restricted to those who are interested in the property which is involved in the issue, and does not extend to persons who have an interest in the point or question litigated.' As in this suit the only decree asked for, or which could have been rendered, was a decision against the land of Stephenson the defendant and appellant, to pay this plaintiff's two judgments, no decree was entered, or could have been obtained, in this suit, against any of the other defendants in these judgments, in favor of the plaintiff in the chancery suit, and it was therefore unnecessary to make any of them defendants." This ruling was followed and approved in the recent case, decided by this court, of State v. Bowen, (which has not yet been officially reported,) 18 S. E. 875, and we see no cause for departing from said ruling in this case.

The questions raised by the first and second assignments of error raise the question as to the correctness of the ruling of the circuit court in holding the deed of trust given by James S. Cox to George C. Brown, trustee, dated on the 19th day of August, 1889, to secure Margaret J. Cox, his wife, the payment of $1,000, a valid lien, and giving it priority over the judgment lien of C. C. Miller for $101.60; and these assignments of error may be considered together. In determining the bona fides of this transaction, and determining whether said deed of trust was executed with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the appellant, we are allowed to look at the circumstances which appear in the record. So far as appears therefrom, this tract of land, which the defendant J. S. Cox testifies was worth about $1,200, was all of the property, real or personal, possessed by the defendant J. S. Cox. An execution sued out upon the appellant's judgment had been returned by the sheriff "No property found." At the time the deed of trust was executed by said Cox to secure his wife the payment of $1,000, suit was pending in the name of said C. C. Miller against him, which resulted in the judgment sought to be enforced in this case, about 14 days after said deed of trust was recorded. A judgment had been rendered against him on the 22d day of March, 1889, for $50, and costs amounting to $8, in favor of W. A. Parsons; and another judgment in favor of W. H. Wolfe, cashier, was rendered against him in the circuit court of Jackson county on the 13th day of November, 1889, for the sum of $102.87, and costs amounting to $11.01,—all of which debts existed at the date of said trust deed. The fact that the notes executed by said J. S. Cox to C. E. Hogg were causing trouble and apprehension in the mind of said Cox is apparent from the fact that said Cox told C. P. Adams that the note held by him would have to be paid, and that he was making arrangements to sell two horses to pay the Hogg notes; that he would pay them as soon as he could, and, if he had to have the money when it became due, requested him to be as lenient with him as possible; that he did not obtain judgment enough against Ball; that he had expected to pay Hogg. And E. M. Riddle in his testimony, when asked what, if anything, he heard said Cox say about the payment of the Hogg notes, and what his intentions were with reference to the payment of them, (this deposition was taken the 10th day of July, 1891,) answered: "As to dates, I don't remember, but it's been a year, probably. In company with Mr. Cox, he asked me if I knew he had made an assignment, and I told him I had not heard it. He said it was reported he had made an assignment, but that he had not, but by way of a deed of trust to his wife to secure her in some money that he had used of hers. He first stated that he did not do this to defraud any of his creditors out of his honest debts, but that he had executed two notes to C. E. Hogg for attorney's fees that he considered unjust, and that he did not think he had any right to, and would not, pay them; that there were other agreements between him and Hogg that Hogg had not complied with." The plain and unmistakable inference to be drawn from this conversation with E. M. Riddle is that said Cox did not regard the debt evidenced by the notes executed to C. E. Hogg as a just debt, and that he had executed the deed of trust for the purpose of avoiding the payment of the same. "He did not think he had any right to, and would not, pay them." He did not wish to defraud any of his creditors out of his honest debts, but he had given the deed of trust, and he did not intend to pay these unjust notes. And while it is true that, in his deposition, said Cox denies that the said note and trust deed were executed for the purpose, or with the intention, of hindering, delaying, or defrauding the plaintiff, or any of his other creditors, or any other person, yet he does not deny the conversation detailed in the deposition of said E. M. Riddle, as above set forth. In this conversation with the witness Riddle he indicates the motive which induced the execution of the trust deed; and, while it is true that the declarations of the grantor made subsequent to the conveyance are not admissible to affect the title of the grantee, (see Casto v. Fry, 33 W. Va. 449, 10 S. E. 799,) yet in cases of this character they may be considered as a circumstance to show the motive which actuated the grantor in making a voluntary conveyance. She says in her deposition: "He would repay to me amounts. He would borrow it back again after awhile. The last money he borrowed was about 1882, and was something over $1,000, some of which he used in buying cattle and horses, and some in lawsuits." Seven years had elapsed since the last money was loaned to her husband, according to her own statement, and he had used the same in his business transactions; but when suit has been instituted against him upon a claim which he regards as unjust, and judgment is about to be obtained against him, he seeks to shelter his property from the impending judgment, which he regards as unjust, and which he tells Mr. Riddle he will not pay, by executing a note to his wife for money she had given him to use in his business more than seven years before, and executes a deed of trust on his land to secure the same. In answer to the question why, after waiting so long, it occurred to said J. S. Cox that it was his duty to execute this deed of trust for the benefit of his wife, the conversation detailed by Mr. Riddle with said Cox clearly indicates the motive and supplies the answer.

In the case of Zinn v. Law, 32 W. Va. 447, 9 S. E. 871, this court held that: (1) "Where a wife delivers money or property of her own to her husband, which he uses in his business, the presumption is that such delivery was intended as a gift; and, in order to constitute such delivery a loan as against the creditors of the husband, the wife must prove an express promise of the husband to repay, or establish by the circumstances that it was a loan, and not a gift." (2) "When the facts and circumstances tend to show that a gift was intended, and that the husband used and dealt with the property as his own, the mere parol testimony of the husband and wife of a private understanding between themselves that the transaction was by them considered or intended as a loan to the husband by the wife, and not a gift, will not, as against the creditors of an insolvent husband, rebut the presumption of a gift." And this ruling, as I think, propounds correctly the law upon the facts stated. In the case of Crawford v. Carper, 4 W. Va. 56, a father-in-law appears to have advanced to his son-in-law, at different times, a considerable amount of money. The son-in-law afterwards, becoming insolvent, executed his note to his father-in-law for the amounts so advanced, and immediately confessed judgment in favor of his father-in-law for the amount of said note, with the manifest intent of giving his father-in-law the first lien on his land. The debt for which said note was executed, and judgment confessed, was barred by the statute of limitations; and Brown, P., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "While it was all very right, if the debt was just and real, that it should be acknowledged and paid by the debtor, as between the parties, yet still the important question remains whether, under the circumstances of the case, it could be so done as above stated, so as to intercept the other bona fide creditors whose debts were not so barred; and I am free to say I think it could not, because it comes clearly within the first section of chapter 118, Code 1860, and is just such a case as it was the intention of the statute to prohibit." This section corresponds precisely with section 1 of chapter 74 of our Code. The ruling in the case of Crawford v. Carper, supra, was approved and reaffirmed in the case of Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 651. So, also, in the case of Bank v. Atkinson, 32 W. Va. 203, 9 S. E. 175, in which it appeared that the wife allowed the proceeds of her real estate to go into the hands of her husband, which money was used by him in his business, and after several years the husband purchased real estate in the name of his wife, which purchase he claimed was made with such proceeds, it was held that "if, when such purchase is made, any claim which she may have on him for such proceeds of her real estate is barred by limitation, that circumstance tends strongly to repel the wife's claim to exempt the land against creditors." And in the same case it was held that the law will not, from the mere delivery by the wife of her money to the husband, or from the permitted receipt by him of her separate estate, imply a promise by him to repay her, but will require more,—either an express promise, or circumstances to prove that in such matters they dealt with each other as debtor and creditor. To thus raise a debt against him to the prejudice of creditors, the proof must be clear, full, and above suspicion. Both J. S. Cox and his wife state that the last money he borrowed from her was in 1882, which must have been about seven years before the note for $1,000 was executed which was secured by said deed of trust. They both state that a memorandum book was kept in her drawer by said Margaret J. Cox, in which the amounts she loaned him and the amounts he repaid her were set down; but that this memorandum book had been lost about two years before said note was executed, and that for that reason they could not ascertain the exact amount, and she agreed to take the note for $1,000 secured by said trust deed. The cause was referred to a commissioner, who was directed to ascertain the liens existing against said land, their nature and priority, and in whose favor they existed, who ascertained and reported said trust deed of $1,000 to be the second lien upon said land, if the court should hold that said trust deed was valid; a judgment in favor of W. H. Parsons for $50, with interest and costs, the first lien, and the judgment of plaintiff for $101.60, with interest and costs, the third lien, upon said land; and the judgment of W. H. Wolfe, cashier, for $102.87, with interest and costs, the fourth lien binding upon said land. The court, in acting upon said report, excluded the depositions which had been taken before the commissioner by the plaintiff because no special notice had been given by the plaintiff of the time and place of taking the same, decreed that said trust deed was a valid and binding lien upon said land, confirmed the report of the commissioner as to the order and priority of said liens, and directed a sale of said land to satisfy the same, in accordance with the priority so ascertained; and from this decree this appeal was taken.

It is assigned as error that the court sustained the exception to the plaintiff's depositions for the reasons above stated, which point I regard as well taken, as it has for years been the practice in Virginia and in this state to take depositions before a commissioner, in reference to a matter referred to him, without giving any notice other than the general notice of the time and place of taking the account. Sanders, in his Suit in Equity, (page 627, § 536,) says: "Under the general notice given by the master commissioner when the order or decree is placed in his hands, the master or commissioner may take the depositions of witnesses without giving special notice to the parties of their being taken. See, also, the case of McCandlish v. Edloe, 3 Gratt. 330, where it is held (third point of syllabus) that "in taking an account the commissioner may take the depositions of witnesses, to enable him to act upon the subject, under his general notice, and a special notice is not necessary." See, also, 2 Bart. Ch. Pr. p. 641.

Returning again to the question as to the validity of the trust deed executed by said J. S. Cox to secure his wife the note for $1,000, we call attention to the case of Maxwell v. Hanshaw, 24 W. Va. 405, where this court held that "a transfer of property, either directly or indirectly, by an insolvent husband to his wife during coverture, is justly regarded with suspicion, and, unless it clearly appears that it was entirely free from any wrong intent or purpose to withdraw the property from the husband's creditors, it will not be sustained. In such transfer there is a presumption against the wife in favor of the husband's creditors, which she must overcome by affirmative proof." In the case under consideration the circumstances which lead us to the conclusion that said deed of trust was executed with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said J. S. Cox may be summed up as follows: First. The intimate relation of husband and wife existed between the grantor and the cestui que trust. Second. The claim was barred by the statute of limitations at the time said note and deed of trust were executed. In support of this proposition see Wells, Mar. Wom. § 662, where it is said: "If the husband receives moneys of his wife under an agreement to refund them, it seems, in New York, that the statute runs at the time of the agreement, in the absence of any specified time of repayment;" citing Fletcher v. Updike, 3 Hun, 350, where the same is clearly held. And our statute expressly provides (section 15 of chapter 66 of the Code) that a married woman may sue without joining her husband, where the action is between herself and husband, and where it concerns her separate property. As to this she is under no disability, and the statute of limitations does not apply. See section 16 of chapter 104, which expressly excepts suits in regard to her separate estate. Third. The declaration of said grantor to E. M. Riddle that he had not executed said trust to defraud any of his creditors out of his honest debts, but that he had executed two notes to C. E. Hogg for attorney's fees that he considered unjust, and that he did not think he had any right to, and would not, pay them; that there were other agreements between him and Hogg that Hogg had not complied with. Fourth. The deed of trust was executed during the pendency of the suit on one of said notes he had executed to said Hogg, and said trust was recorded only 14 days before the judgment was obtained. Fifth. Although said J. S. Cox and his wife both state that an account was kept between them of the amounts loaned to her husband and returned to her by him at different times, said memorandum book was not produced. Sixth. Said money was used by the husband in trading in stock and in lawsuits, and the law would presume a gift instead of a loan. Applying to these facts and circumstances the legal principles announced in the authorities above cited, my conclusion is that, while said deed of trust must be regarded as good enough between the parties thereto, it cannot be allowed to take precedence over the claim of the plaintiff or the other bona fide creditors of said J. S. Cox, and must be held void as to the judgment of the plaintiff, C. C. Miller. The decree complained of must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with costs to the appellant.

ALLEN v. BOLEN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

DEEDS—RECORDING.

Under Act 1885, c. 147, providing that no unregistered conveyance of land shall pass any property as against purchasers for value, a prior registered deed takes precedence of a junior registered deed, though the latter was executed first.

Appeal from superior court, Rutherford county; R. F. Armfield, Judge.

Ejectment by J. W. Allen against Maggie Bolen and another. There was judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Justice & Justice, for appellant.

CLARK, J. No question affecting the homestead is involved in this case, though that view was strenuously pressed on the argument. The father of the defendant had his homestead, embracing three tracts of land, allotted to him in 1879. The defendant put in evidence that her father executed to her, on June 18, 1883, a deed for the locus in quo, which is one of said three tracts. This deed was registered March 13, 1891. The father's homestead was reallocated in 1890, other land being put in place of that conveyed to defendant. The interesting question whether a homesteader can have a second homestead allotted to him when he has conveyed away the whole or part of his allotted homestead is not before us, as there is nothing here calling in question the validity of the homestead of 1890. The homesteader was expressly empowered to convey the homestead land by Const. art. 10, § 8, in the manner there provided. Having legally conveyed his homestead in the constitutional mode, the homesteader cannot now claim the locus in quo as part of such homestead, nor does he do so. The plaintiff bought at execution sale (September, 1890) under a judgment against the grantor in said deed, which judgment was docketed May 6, 1889. The sheriff executed a deed to plaintiff December 22, 1890, and it was registered January 21, 1891.

There is no question arising here as to what estate was conveyed by the father to his daughter, if the registration laws were complied with, for the conveyance to the daughter, made in 1883, prior to the lien of the judgment docketed in 1889, carried as to the plaintiff a fee simple, although the land had previously been allowed as a part of the grantor's homestead. The question is solely between the grantee in the deed and the purchaser under execution against the grantor. The defendant claims under a deed from her father, which was registered March 13, 1891. The plaintiff claims under a sheriff's deed, under an execution against the grantor, which was registered January 21, 1891. The grantor (homesteader) is barred by his deed. He has no interest in the locus in quo, and is asserting none. This case comes under the provisions of chapter 147, Acts 1885.¹ Though the deed purports to have been executed prior to the passage of the act, it does not come within the proviso thereof; for there was no actual notice at the sheriff's sale that the defendant was in possession, nor constructive notice, for upon the evidence the grantor, not his daughter, remained in possession after execution of the deed in 1883, receiving all the time the rents and profits, and listing the land for taxes in his own name, and at first the grantor seemed disposed to object to the assignment of the homestead of 1890, but afterwards assented. This would indicate, if anything, that he was apparently in possession for himself. There was certainly neither actual nor constructive notice that the defendant was in possession or had any deed. Under the act of 1885 the plaintiff's prior registered deed takes the property in preference to the junior registered deed, though executed first. This is the rule as between mortgages under Code, § 1254, of which the act of 1885 is a copy verbatim et literatim; thus applying to the registration of deeds the same rule applicable to the registration of mortgages. These words, having been construed as to the registration of mortgages, when they are copied and used by the legislature as to the registration of deeds must bear identically the same meaning. It cannot be said that the plaintiff, who purchased at an execution sale, took the land subject to the rights of the grantee under the unregistered deed. The principle that such a purchaser stands in the place of the judgment debtor is excluded by the statute in so far as it relates to unregistered conveyances, a judgment creditor and a purchaser under execution being within the terms of the act. The grantor is barred by his deed. He cannot claim the land as his homestead, and is not doing so. The defendant cannot avail herself of the unregistered deed to keep off the grantor's creditors. The locus in quo was therefore, as to the creditors, simply former homestead land, as to which the grantor had waived his homestead in the constitutional mode, by deed with the prescribed formalities. The grantee not having made her deed available by registration, as the statute requires, the land remained subject to execution for the grantor's debts, and the sheriff's deed gave the same title to the plaintiff as if the grantor had himself executed a deed, instead of the sheriff, on December 22, 1890, and the plaintiff had registered it on January 21, 1891, as he did the sheriff's deed, prior to the registration of defendant's deed, on March 13, 1891. The plaintiff (purchaser at execution sale) had no notice that this land had ever been embraced in a homestead, as the allotment of 1879 was not recorded as required by Code, § 504. He had no notice, by registration or otherwise, that the defendant held a deed for it, nor any notice, actual or constructive, that she was in possession. There was no objection made at the sale. The homesteader was in possession of another duly allotted and registered homestead, to which he had filed no exceptions. He made no claim then nor since to this tract as part of his homestead. In fact, he had solemnly waived all claim to the land by deed. If, under these circumstances, the plaintiff did not get a good title, no purchaser at an execution sale would ever be safe. The policy of our law is to encourage bidders at such sales, so that property may bring a fair price. Error.

SHEPHERD, C. J., (concurring.) As the purchaser under the execution sale seems, in the opinion, to be assimilated to a mortgagee under the act of 1885, I desire to express my disapproval of any inference which may possibly be made to the effect that the said act was intended to abrogate the well-known principle that the rights of such a purchaser or of a judgment creditor shall not prevail over any equities existing against the judgment debtor. This principle occupies too important a place in our jurisprudence to be repealed by implication. The act simply provides that no unregistered conveyances, contracts to convey, or leases for more than three years "shall be valid to pass any property" as against creditors (that is, docketed judgment creditors) and purchasers for value; and it clearly has no application to defenses not based alone upon such unregistered conveyances, etc., and which attached to the property while in the hands of the judgment debtor.

ROWLAND v. OLD DOMINION BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—CREDIT FOR PAYMENTS ON STOCK.

1. A contract by which the stock taken out by a borrower, and assigned to the association, when the mortgage is executed, is forfeited to the association on default, without allowance of credit on the mortgage for the payments made on the stock, is unconscionable, and, though upheld by the laws of the association's own state, will not be enforced in North Carolina.

2. When the foreclosure has realized enough to pay the sum borrowed, with interest at the rate stipulated on the face of the mortgage, and expenses, and the association has allowed nothing for payments made by the borrower on his stock, which he assigned to the association when he made the mortgage, such assignment is to be treated as merely a pledge of additional security for the loan, and the borrower is entitled to a return of the stock.

3. When the mortgagor and his land were in North Carolina, and he there applied for a loan to a Virginia association having a local board of managers and treasurer, and there executed the mortgage, the North Carolina usury laws apply, though the application was sent to the home office, and the money remitted from there, and the bond is payable there, and the local board and treasurer are styled agents, not of the association, but of the local members.

Appeal from superior court, Vance county; Bryan, Judge.

Action by W. H. Rowland against the Old Dominion Building & Loan Association, a Virginia corporation, and T. M. Pittman, for an accounting. From the judgment on report of referee, Pittman appeals. Modified.

Pittman & Shaw, for appellant. H. T. Watkins, for appellee.

BURWELL, J. The defendant association is a corporation of the state of Virginia. Its home or principal office is in Richmond, in that state. It organized a branch of its business at Henderson, in this state, and there had what is styled a "local board" of officers or managers. One Noell, of Vance county, applied, through the local board, to the home office, for a loan of $1,000, on May 31, 1890, "upon bond and mortgage of the property" mentioned and described in his application. He stated in his said application that he understood he was to pay, if he secured the loan, the necessary expenses of securing the repayment of the money, including the charges of counsel for examining title and preparing securities, and that he would furnish an abstract of title. This application was accompanied by a certificate of the local board that the property offered as security was worth $1,500, and that the loan was one which it was desirable for the association to make. In order that he might have the privilege of borrowing money from this association, it was necessary that he should become one of its stockholders; and it seems that, at this stage of the business, it was required of those who would be borrowers that they should subscribe for stock whose par value was double the sum proposed to be borrowed. And so Noell subscribed for 20 shares of the stock, par value $2,000, in order to get a loan of $1,000. He then received the sum loaned him, ($1,000,) and secured its repayment to the association, with 6 per cent. interest thereon, and also the payment of installments due on the stock subscribed for, (60 cents per share each month till the stock was worth par,) by a deed of trust on his property mentioned in his aforesaid application, and worth $1,500. At the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, he executed the following paper: "For value received, I hereby assign to Old Dominion Building and Loan Association twenty shares capital stock therein, this day redeemed at $50 per share. Witness my hand this 7th day of July, 1890. [Signed] T. A. Noell."

We gather from the record that this Virginia corporation insists that, by virtue of these contracts and this conveyance in trust, it has the right to exact from this borrower, in return for the $1,000 loaned him, payments on 20 shares of stock, at $12 per month, until the stock reached the par value of $2,000, and also $5 per month interest on the sum borrowed until the same time, and also fines for lack of the promptness prescribed in the by-laws of the association for the payment of these dues. Considered apart from all questions about expected profits, the contention of this association is that this borrower has agreed to pay back the money borrowed, with 6 per cent. interest, and then to give it, in addition, a bonus of $1,000 for making the loan, and when this is done it will call the game over, and quit. Upon such a settlement, the account would stand thus: The association loans $1,000. It receives entrance fees, $20; appraiser's and attorney's fees, $15; interest on $1,000 at 6 per cent., $5 per month for 166½ months, $833.33; dues at 60 cents per share per month till they amount to $1 per share, $2,000; total receipts, $2,868.33; to which should be added as a proper debit, 6 per cent. interest on $2,000 for one-half of 166½ months, $833.33; grand total, $3,701.66. In other words, the borrower assumed, it says, a liability to pay $3,701.66 for $1,000 and its use for 166½ months, or about 20 per cent. for money. And against this liability is held up the hope that the business of the association will be immensely profitable, so that by reason of such profits the shares will arrive at their par value in a much shorter period than 166½ months. The foundation of such a hope is not easily discerned. Profits, if any come, must come from the pockets of the members alone. They must feed upon one another,—the borrowing members on the non-borrowing members, or vice versa,—for no other victims are in reach. Expenses must be met. Losses, inevitable in every business, will occur. And expenses and losses may not only destroy all hope of profits, but may bring the deluded borrower to the necessity of paying back for the benefit of creditors of the association the money he borrowed after he had settled the debt, as he thought, by the payment of his monthly dues through all the tedious years of his bondage to the association, for, however valid between the borrowing members or stockholders and the association may be their agreement that his debt shall be considered extinguished when he has paid in $100 per share, creditors of the association might rise up, and object to the consummation of this arrangement, upon the very plausible theory that the assets of a corporation should not be applied to the use of the stockholders until the creditors are paid in full. This would be a rude awakening from the pleasant dream that he had borrowed money at 6 per cent. and knew an easy way to pay it back. But it is an awakening that may come to all those who have entered into contracts such as that set out in this record, if the contention of the association is sustained.

We have examined the charter of this association to ascertain from what source it obtains capital to be thus invested. Section 7 provides that "paid-up stock may be issued and sold at the price of fifty dollars per share," and that a dividend of $1.50 per share shall be paid semiannually on such stock and that when the favored stock matures the holders shall be entitled to draw out $100 per share. Thus, it appears that what it takes from one stockholder, under the pretense that it is lending money at 6 per cent., it gives to another with lavish hand. It is both a taker and a giver of usury. It appears that the trustees named in the deed of trust have sold the property thereby conveyed to them, and out of the proceeds of that sale there has been repaid to the association all of the debt—principal and interest—due from Noell on account of money borrowed by him. In the settlement made, the borrower got no credit for what dues he had paid in on his stock. According to the rules which govern the making of such settlements, as prescribed by the decisions of this court in Mills v. Association, 75 N. C. 292, and other cases, if credit had been allowed for those payments no complaint could be made by the borrowing stockholder or his assignee. Overby v. Association, 81 N. C. 56. Such a settlement would have justly and equitably adjusted the account between the association and the borrowing stockholder, and would have terminated his connection with it. But.

when the association chose not to give such credit, it decided to maintain Noell's relation to it as a stockholder. Indeed, in its answer, which was filed after the sale of the mortgaged property, it expressly alleged that he "is a stockholder in the defendant association for twenty shares of stock," and "claims the right to enforce a fine of ten cents on each share of stock, if monthly payments are not made when due." This allegation would seem to put an end to the controversy, if coupled with the fact that it is now conceded by all parties that out of the proceeds of the sale the debt for borrowed money was paid in full. If a "stockholder for twenty shares of stock," he must own that stock. If he owes the association nothing, it has no lien on the stock. If he owned it, as appears to be granted, he assigned it to the defendant Pittman, who here claims it, and is entitled to take it, with its privileges and burdens. But, apart from this allegation of the defendant that Noell is a stockholder, we think that a careful consideration of all the various transactions between the parties will lead to the conclusion that the legal effect of the assignment of the stock heretofore set out was merely to place it in the hands of the association as additional collateral security for the loan that day made to the stockholder. The sole consideration for that assignment was the loan. The only charge for that loan was interest at 6 per cent. It was clearly expressed. The association has received back its loan, and all the interest it charged. To give it the stock now would be to allow it to keep what it has paid nothing for, and what it has no warrant to claim as a gift.

It has been strenuously argued before us that the decisions of the court of appeals of the state of Virginia must be allowed to control us in our construction of the contract between this association and its borrowing stockholder, and our determination of his rights thereunder. It was said by that court in the case of White v. Association, 22 Grat. 233, when considering an arrangement between the parties then before it, similar to that we are here considering, that "if the transactions and dealings of this association with its members are warranted by the statute, and that statute is warranted by the constitution, though they may operate harshly and oppressively, it is not the province of the court to relieve. The fault is in the law, which the legislature alone can alter, or in the improvidence of the party, which neither the court nor the legislature can relieve." We feel no such constraint. We cannot allow such a bargain as this association says it made with the borrowing stockholder to be enforced in the courts of this state. It is unconscionable. It violates the law of this commonwealth, as construed by repeated decisions of this court. The rights of the parties must be settled here, where the contract was made. It is in no true sense a Virginia contract. The labored efforts of the association to make it so appear but add to the conviction that it is not so in fact. Where a party litigant in the courts of this state asserts that his rights are to be adjudicated, not by the laws of this state, but by those of another; that a contract illegal here shall be enforced because it is legal under the laws of another forum,—he must be able to show clearly and conclusively that his case is one that entitles him to make such a demand. In this case the borrower was in this state; he applied for the loan here; there was a local board of managers here; it had a treasurer; the money was paid to the borrower here; he secured its repayment by a mortgage on land situated here; and the mortgage was executed here. Calling it a Virginia contract does not make it one. Sending the application to the "home office," as it is called; remitting the money from Richmond; calling the local board and its treasurer the agents, not of the corporation, but of the members who live in that locality; providing in the bond that it shall be paid in Virginia,—all these things cannot enable the foreign corporation to evade the usury laws of this state.

Under the laws of this state and the decisions of this court, what a borrowing stockholder of a building and loan association pays into the treasury of the association on stock account is a fund to be applied to the extinguishment of his debt. He has drawn out money in bulk. He pays back by littles. Mills v. Association, supra. The proper method of stating the account between the borrower, Noell, and the association, would require that the former should have had credit for what he had paid in on his stock. Had this been done, the stock would have been extinguished. It was not done. The stock, therefore, by the act of the corporation, still exists, and belongs, we think, to the assignee, Pittman. The judgment should be modified in conformity to this opinion. Modified.

HOLT et al. v. HOLT et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

WILLS—BEQUEST IN TRUST — DISPOSAL BY WILL OF CESTUI QUE TRUST.

Testator provided for his widow, and made equal distribution of his estate among all his children but A., a bachelor of mature years and intemperate habits, and bequeathed to trustees a certain sum, "to be by them held in trust for my son A.; and this I intend as A.'s full share of my estate; and they shall from time to time use so much interest, as it accrues, for his decent support, but not for his excessive indulgence. Any balance of interest is to be invested." The residuary clause named several sources from which the residue would arise, but did not specify this fund. Held, that A. had not merely a life estate therein, but the entire beneficial interest, and could dispose of the fund by will.

Appeal from superior court, Alamance county; Bryan, Judge.

Action by W. L. and E. C. Holt, executors of the will of Alexander Holt, deceased, against Thomas M. Holt and others, trustees and executors under the will of E. M. Holt, deceased, to construe a clause in the latter will. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Haywood & Haywood and Strong & Strong, for appellants. J. W. & P. C. Graham and E. S. & Junius Parker, for appellees.

MacRAE, J. The object of this action is to obtain a construction of item 13 of the will of E. M. Holt, deceased, as to the disposition to be made by the trustees named therein (the defendants in this action) of the fund bequeathed to them in trust, it being left in doubt whether the bequest in said item was intended to be limited to the beneficiary during his life, or was simply restrained by a provision limiting his power of disposal thereof. The said beneficiary having, by his last will, treated the bequest to himself as an absolute one, and in his turn disposed of the same, it was necessary, for the protection of the trustees, that the question should be submitted to the court, and it is properly presented in this proceeding. "Item 13. I give and bequeath to the trustees hereinafter appointed the sum of thirty thousand dollars, to be by them held in trust for my son Alexander Holt; and this I intend as Alexander's full share of my estate." So far there can be no question of construction. The above language plainly gives an absolute equitable estate in the whole fund to the cestui que trust. But there is added to the foregoing this further clause: "And they shall from time to time use so much of the interest, as it accrues, for his decent support, but not for his excessive indulgence. Any balance of interest is to be invested in good securities." The question arises, upon the last-quoted portion of the said item, whether it does not so qualify and limit the bequest as to give to the said Alexander only a right during his life to such part of the interest accruing upon the principal as might be set apart to him by the trustees "for his decent support." The elementary principle regarding the construction of wills, for which it is no longer necessary to cite authorities or to give reasons, is that the intent of the testator is to govern, and that this intent is to be ascertained from a consideration of the whole will, in the light of the surrounding circumstances. As, by law, a will like that we have before us must be in writing, it cannot permit parol evidence to be adduced either to contradict, add to, or explain the contents of such will. 1 Jarm. Wills, § 349; Kinsey v. Rhem, 2 Ired. 192. "But though it is the will itself, and not the intention as elsewhere collected, which constitutes the real and only subject to be expounded, yet in performing this office a court of construction is not bound to shut its eyes to the state of facts under which the will was made; on the contrary, an investigation of such facts often materially aids in elucidating the scheme of disposition which occupied the mind of the testator." 1 Jarm. Wills, § 363. It will be observed that there are no admissions in the pleadings bearing upon the question, nor is there any testimony offered to aid us in our investigation. In this case we are strictly confined to the will,—not the item itself to be construed, but to the whole will,—and to the circumstances of the case, to be gathered from a careful reading of the will. As no two cases are precisely alike, we can derive but little aid from the application of recognized principles under other and different circumstances. The will was evidently drawn with great care, by a skilled hand, and under intelligent direction. We find no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the great object of the testator, a man of large wealth and with a numerous family, was to make abundant provision for his widow during her life, and to provide for some of his grandchildren, and of the residue of his estate to make a just and equal distribution among all his children except Alexander, and he was to have a liberal provision in full of his share in the estate. It appears upon the face of the item under consideration that with regard to this son there was an apprehension in the mind of the testator that this share, if placed in his own hands, might be dissipated in excessive indulgence. It was suggested on the argument, as a reason why the intention of the testator was to give only a life estate in the fund, or such part of the interest upon it as the trustees might deem just and necessary for his support, to this son, that he was unmarried, and that he had reached that period of life when it was not probable he would ever marry, and therefore that he could have no family to be cared for. However true this may be, we are not at liberty to give it consideration, because it does not appear by the will, nor by the admissions of the pleadings, nor by any evidence to that effect. In a disposition by will, no words are necessary to enlarge an estate devised or bequeathed from one for life into one absolute or in fee. Indeed, it is generally necessary that restraining expressions should be used to confine the gift to the life of the legatee or devisee. If there had been no residuary clause in this will, under the principle that one will not be presumed to die intestate as to any part of his property when, by a reasonable construction of the will, such presumption can be avoided, it would have been conclusive that the testator intended an absolute gift for the benefit of his son Alexander, though limited as to his enjoyment thereof. McMichael v. Hunt, 83 N. C. 344. The provisions for the disposition of the residuum are found in items 20 and 21, and it will be found that the sources from which this residuum might be derived are referred to as

(1) all stocks and bonds not heretofore disposed of; (2) all property, both real and personal, not heretofore disposed of; (3) the proceeds of property in Charlotte and Lexington hereinbefore directed to be sold; (4) all the residue of my estate arising from the collection of debts, (5) or otherwise. None of these, unless it be the last, would embrace the remainder in the fund bequeathed to his son Alexander, and the care with which the will was drawn would prevent us from determining that the words "or otherwise" were intended to control the character of the bequest in item 13. We find that in the other items of the will where life interests were devised or bequeathed the intention is plainly expressed, and words of disposition equally explicit are used as to the remainders. See items 2, 3, 4, and 5. Instances of absolute gifts of personalty may be found in items 11 and 12, without any express words to show the extension of the bounty to the distributees or assigns of the beneficiaries. The words "and their heirs" are used where real estate is the subject of disposition, as in item 9, and where it was desired to provide a right of survivorship among certain beneficiaries, as in item 10; and when the proceeds of sales of stocks and bonds were to be divided among his sons and daughters, those shares given to married daughters were to be held by trustees, for them and their heirs. Items 13 and 17 are in their nature very similar, the evident object being to restrain the disposition by the beneficiaries in such manner as to do them injury rather than good. In neither of these items are there plain words restraining the gifts to the lives of the legatees. Indeed, in item 17 it appears that it was in the contemplation of the testator that in a certain event the legatees therein named should take an absolute estate freed from the interposition of trustees.

It was suggested on the argument, by the learned counsel for the defendants, that if the bequest was intended to have been an absolute one, and not merely for the life of the beneficiary, his power of disposition was necessarily such that he might defeat the purpose of the testator by an assignment or transfer of his interest in the fund bequeathed to him; but it is plain to us that the trustees in item 13 held the legal title to the fund for the purpose of the administration of the trust, the payment of the interest to the cestui que trust according to his necessities, and not for his excessive indulgence. The cestui que trust had no control over the fund, not even of the accumulation of interest over what may have been paid to him by the trustees; therefore, he had no power nor equitable right to dispose of principal or of any part of the interest which was not paid over to him, and he could not defeat the object of the testator by any conveyance of his interest to take effect during his lifetime. If there might have been such a conveyance, by deed or will, of the fund, to take effect after his death, as to have enabled him to partially defeat the object of the testator, the difficulties in the way of such conveyance made it a remote possibility. A general rule of construction is that in a bequest of the interest, no express disposition having been made of the principal, it goes to the legatee of the interest, unless, indeed, it appears from the nature of the subject or the context of the will that the interest, only, was intended for the legatees. McMichael v. Hunt, supra. Without doubt, prior words in a will may be controlled and modified as to their meaning by subsequent expressions, and, as we have before said, the intent of the testator is to be reached from the whole will. If, by the context, it appeared that the intention of the testator was to give to his son Alexander a life interest only, there would be no difficulty in controlling the general words in the first clause of the item, the effect of which, without modification, would have been to have given an absolute title; but, taking the will for our guide, and examining its every provision to enable us to reach the true intent of the testator, we are of the opinion that for satisfactory reasons he gave to his son Alexander, in full of his share in the estate, the sum of $30,000, and that he placed this sum in the hands of trustees, with power and discretion to pay over to his said son so much of the interest as was necessary for his decent support, and the balance to hold for his benefit, and subject to such disposition as he might make thereof by will, or, in case of his intestacy, to go, in course of distribution, to his next of kin according to law. There is no error. Affirmed.

DUNNING et al. v. BURDEN et ux.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

DEVISE OF LAND—CONSTRUCTION—CONDITIONAL LIMITATION.

A will devised a life estate in a part of his land to testator's wife, with remainder to the two children of a deceased son, provided that, if said children should die "leaving no lawful heir (either or each of them) of their body," the remainder should go to the children of another son and of a daughter. The children of the second son and daughter were provided for in succeeding paragraphs of the will. Held, that the remainder should go to the children of the second son and daughter only on condition that both the children of the first son should die without issue. Clark, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Bertie county; Bynum, Judge.

Action by W. D. Burden and Ella C. Burden, his wife, against R. J. Dunning and others. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Reversed.

F. D. Winston and Peebles & Martin, for appellants. St. Leon Scull, for appellees.

AVERY, J. Our attention is called—for the purposes of construing the devise of the home place after the death of the testator's wife, and especially the contingent limitation over to the children of his son Abram and his daughter Sarah—to the second item of the will, which provides as follows: "After the death of my beloved wife, Cilvia Harmon, I give and bequeath the said lands and plantation whereon I now reside to the children of my deceased son Moses R. Harmon, to them and their lawful heirs forever: provided, however, if the said Ella C. Harmon and Walter M. P. Harmon should depart this life leaving no lawful heir (either or each of them) of their own body, I give and bequeath the said lands and plantation above named to the children of my son Abram T. Harmon and the children of my daughter Sarah Dunning, wife of Andrew J. Dunning, to them severally and their heirs forever." We think that the language is clearly susceptible of the interpretation that the testator intended the share of his realty, set apart to the two children of his son Moses, as a provision, primarily, for each of them at all events during their lives, and, in case both should leave issue then surviving, then to vest a moiety in the issue of each, but if only one should die, leaving a child or children, that such surviving issue would take the whole. If the words in parentheses, "either or each of them," had followed the name of Walter Harmon, or the word "life," the meaning would manifestly have been that, if either should die without lawful issue, the limitation over should take effect immediately, and the survivor, though blessed with numerous offspring, should forfeit forthwith his or her interest for life, and abandon all claim to the executory devise for such children, because of the barrenness or celibacy of the other. Such an arrangement of the words would have impelled us to adopt the construction contended for by the plaintiff. However unnatural or unreasonable the purpose to make his bounty to one branch of his family depend upon such a contingency might have seemed, we would have been controlled by the unmistakable meaning of the language used. But the purpose of the testator, apparent from a fair construction of his words, was that if either or each (in the sense of both) should leave surviving them issue, ("lawful heirs of their own body,") then the limitation over to the children of Abram T. Harmon and Sarah Dunning would be defeated, and the fee would vest,—an undivided moiety in the issue of each, if both should leave issue surviving them, or if only one should leave a child or children surviving them, then the whole in such issue. By this interpretation we not only give to the language employed its natural and obvious meaning, but we arrive at an interpretation consistent with the purpose on the part of the testator, which the law imputes to him in all cases where the words used are ambiguous, to provide equally for those who are nearest to him, and especially for his lineal descendants. Schouler, Wills, § 479 et seq. Looking to the whole of the will to determine whether we can discover any general intent or leading purpose which is either in harmony with or repugnant to the interpretation we have given to the clause in question, we find that in the two succeeding paragraphs the testator provides for the plaintiffs,—children of his daughter Sarah Dunning and of his son Abram Harmon,—by a sale of two tracts of land named and of all other property, real and personal, not specifically devised, and a division of the proceeds of such sales between the children representing the two. The leading purpose of the testator seemed to be to make his grandchildren, issue of his three children, the objects of his bounty. If either or both of the children of Moses should leave issue, it seemed to be his wish that they should represent Moses, just as though they were inheriting the land, devised by the greatgrandfather, from the grandfather per stirpes. To make the issue of Ella forfeit all claim to a share in the ancestor's bounty, because Walter failed to leave lawful issue, neither harmonizes with the terms of the particular item which gives rise to the controversy, nor is in accord with the purpose pervading the whole will. The evident intention of the testator was to do what the parental instinct would naturally prompt him to do,—provide by any limitation not too remote for the lawful lineal heirs of either or both of the two children of Moses; but if (by a second marriage of their mother, for instance) there should be in esse, at the time of the death of either or both without lawful issue, any person, not a descendant of the testator, who might inherit from such descendant, then, in that event, it was the testator's purpose that the land should certainly vest in the surviving brother or sister and the issue of such survivor, or, on failure of issue, should be limited over to the other lineal descendants of the testator, the children of Abram and Sarah, rather than pass by inheritance or devise to some person not of his blood.

Entertaining the view that we do, we think that none of the authorities cited, either to sustain the contention that the fee would vest on the death of the testator's wife, or of his grandson Walter, have any bearing upon the question of interpretation which gives rise to the controversy as to the title of the "home place." There is no such analogy to any of those cases as would make them controlling authorities in our interpretation of the will now before us. The contingency in which the plaintiffs would become the owners and entitled to the possession of this land has not arisen, and will not arise unless Mrs. Ella Burden should die without issue surviving her,—an event altogether possible, but not now probable. There being nothing in the will which discloses a general intent inconsistent with the particular intent expressed in item 2. and the particular intent being in accord with the natural feeling which, as a rule, governs a testator in disposing of his property, we think that the judgment should be reversed. Judgment must be entered below on the case agreed for the defendants for costs. Reversed.

CLARK, J., (dissenting.) The clause is artificially drawn, but it would seem that the plain meaning of the testator is this: He gave the property to Ella and Walter, the children of his deceased son Moses, and their heirs, with a defeasance that if either should die without heirs of the body, that share should go over to the parties named, and if each of them should die without heirs of the body, then the whole should go over. The defeasance, with remainder over, applied to "either" of them who should die without heirs of the body, and to "each of them" if both should die without heirs of the body. I think the result below was correct.

STATE v. HILL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

LARCENY—FELONIOUS INTENT—SECRECY—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

1. Secrecy is not such an essential accompaniment of larceny that an attempt to conceal the taking must be shown.

2. The remark by a prosecuting attorney, in reply to that of defendant's counsel that defendant was a respectable white man, that he himself was a colored man, and that if defendant was a colored man the jury would convict him in five minutes on the evidence, if error, is cured by an instruction that the question was not whether defendant was a white man or a colored man, but whether the evidence satisfied them that defendant, just as he appeared before them, was guilty.

Appeal from superior court, Bertie county; Bynum, Judge.

John Hill was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant took some meat from a store to his wagon, and claimed that Charles Godwin told him to do so and said that it was his. Defendant's counsel, in addressing the jury, alluded to defendant as a respectable white man, and that it was unreasonable to suppose that a man of such appearance would steal the meat. Counsel for the state, in reply, said: "Now, gentlemen of the jury, I am a colored man; you are white men. If the defendant was a colored man, you would convict him in five minutes on this evidence." On objection of defendant's counsel, the court held it legitimate argument in reply to what had been said for defendant. The court afterwards charged: "The question for you is, not whether the defendant is a white man or a colored man,—not whether the evidence is sufficient for you to convict a colored man on, or a white man,—but it is for you to consider whether the evidence is sufficient, and does satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt that this defendant, just as he appears before you, is guilty."

F. D. Winston, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

AVERY, J. Secrecy is usually a part of the evidence of a felonious intent, but it is not an essential accompaniment, so as to make it incumbent on the state to show an attempt to conceal the taking in every instance. State v. Powell, 103 N. C. 424, 9 S. E. 627; State v. Fisher, 70 N. C. 78. In the most favorable aspect of the testimony as to the manner of taking and carrying the meat out of the store, the question of the intent of the defendant was one for the jury; and, whether he went out of the store carrying it in front of him, or under his overcoat, it was proper for the court below to leave the jury to determine whether it was taken to the wagon at the request of Charles Godwin, and under the belief that Godwin had bought it, or whether it was the purpose of the defendant to deprive the true owner of it and convert it to his own use. If the solicitor abused his privilege, as counsel for the state, in his comments in reference to the color of the defendant, it was not such an extreme case as to take it out of the general and well-established rule that the court may either stop counsel at the time, or caution the jury in its charge not to be influenced by the remarks complained of. Greenlee v. Greenlee, 93 N. C. 278; State v. Bryan, 89 N. C. 531; Kerchner v. McRae, 80 N. C. 219; State v. Weddington, 103 N. C. 364, 9 S. E. 577; Hudson v. Jordan, 108 N. C. 10, 12 S. E. 1029. We must not be understood as holding that, as a reply to what had been said by the defendant's counsel, the remarks of the solicitor upon this subject were not within the line of fair and legitimate debate. There was no error.

AYDLETT v. PENDLETON et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

LEASE—CONSTRUCTION—NOTICE OF TERMINATION—RES JUDICATA.

1. A lease permitted the lessee to erect a building on the land. The lease stipulated that the lessee should remove the building on 30 days' notice, and that it should continue till lessors sold the land, and that the lessee should have 30 days after the sale to remove the building. Held, that a sale of the land by the lessors ipso facto terminated the lease, and the lessee had 30 days in which to remove the building.

2. Where the owner of the land conveyed a life estate to his wife, with remainder to others, and the wife conveyed her life estate, there was a "sale," within the meaning of the lease.

3. The purchaser from the wife was a proper person to give notice that the lease was ended, and the failure of the remainder-men to join was immaterial.

4. A notice by said purchaser that he had bought the land, that the lease was ended, and demanding possession, was sufficient, though it did not expressly require the removal of the building.

5. In an action by the wife, before her conveyance, to recover possession from the lessee, a decree that the lessee had not forfeited the lease is not binding on the wife's grantee in a suit by him to recover possession from the lessee.

Appeal from superior court, Pasquotank county; Graves, Judge.

Action by E. F. Aydtlett against A. L. Pendleton and others to recover land. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Grandy & Aydtlett, for appellant. W. J. Griffin, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. In this action to recover possession of land, the defendant A. L. Pendleton, Jr., alleges in his answer that he holds the premises as assignee of a lease thereof made by A. L. Pendleton, Sr., and his wife, Jane R. Pendleton, in 1878, to one Kramer; and he avers that the plaintiff is the owner of an estate in said land for the life of Mrs. Jane R. Pendleton, who is now living; but he insists that, notwithstanding plaintiff's title, he should not be required to surrender possession to him, for the reason that the lease mentioned above has not been determined. That lease was made, as was therein expressed, "for the purpose of permitting D. S. Kramer to erect a building on said lot," the rents of which were to be collected by the lessee, and one-third thereof was to be paid to the lessors A. L. Pendleton and wife, Jane R. Pendleton, "for the use and occupation of said land." This lease contained the further stipulation: "That the said D. S. Kramer and his assigns are to have entire control and management of said building after the same shall have been erected, and remove the same off the land of said Pendleton and wife after thirty days' notice, in writing, from them to do so. A. L. Pendleton and wife further agree with said Kramer and his executors, administrators, and assigns that the lease of said land shall continue until they sell said lot, and after sale they agree to give Kramer and his assigns thirty days' notice to remove said building, and to place the same on their land adjoining said lot, provided they own the same at the time, upon the same terms and conditions as are provided in this lease. It is further agreed by the parties to this instrument that the lease shall be determined only on the sale of the land and the giving of thirty days' notice, as hereinafter mentioned; and the said Pendleton and wife shall have a lien on said building for one-third of the rent actually received, and not paid to them or their assigns. It is further agreed between the parties that the one-third rent for said building so received shall be paid to Pendleton and wife within five days after the receipt of the same." We construe these provisions to mean that the term of this lease was to end whenever the lessors, A. L. Pendleton and his wife, Jane

R. Pendleton, should dispose of all their interest in the land so leased. It was to continue in force, they stipulated, until they sold the lot; but they agreed that after its determination, by that act of theirs, the lessees should be allowed to remove the building to be erected by them, at any time within 30 days after notice. The expression "that the lease shall be determined only on the sale of the land and the giving of thirty days' notice" must be considered in connection with what precedes it. The act of selling the lot, when consummated by the lessors, the parties agreed, should work a determination of the relation of landlord and tenant, created by the contract; but the lessees had the right, as we have said, within the period prescribed, to enter upon the premises to remove the building put thereon by them under the terms of the lease.

We come, therefore, to the inquiry, had the lessors sold the lot before this action was begun? The defendants, in their answer, make the following allegation: "On or about the 1st day of March, 1883, the said A. L. Pendleton, Sr., executed a deed for the land in question in this suit, wherein he conveyed an estate in the same to his wife, the said Jane R. Pendleton, for her life, with the remainder as follows: One-third thereof in fee to one Robert Williams, one-third thereof for life to one George Pendleton, and the remaining third to one Kate Pendleton, for life, with contingent remainders over." And upon the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence the deed referred to, and thus fully established the fact that A. L. Pendleton, Sr., one of the lessors, parted with all his interest in the premises at the date of that deed. The defendants, in their answer, also allege, as we have said, that the plaintiff holds the life estate of Mrs. Jane R. Pendleton, which she acquired under the aforesaid deed of her husband, to whom, it appears, the land belonged at the date of the lease to Kramer; and upon the trial the plaintiff established his ownership of that life estate, by proving that the tenant for life had conveyed her estate in the premises to a trustee, with power of sale, which power had been lawfully exercised, and at the sale so made he had purchased, and the estate of Jane R. Pendleton had been conveyed to him. Having thus shown that both A. L. Pendleton, Sr., and Jane R. Pendleton had sold the land, and no longer had any claim thereto or interest therein, the plaintiff had thereby established that the term of the lease had been determined; for, as we construe the contract, the lease was to terminate whenever such sale was consummated.

We think that the plaintiff, who had thus become the owner of the estate for the life of Jane R. Pendleton, was the proper person to give to the occupants of the lot (the assignees of the original lessee) notice that the lease was ended, and that they must take notice of that fact, and conform to the terms of the agreement under which they held the premises. He was entitled to the possession of his property,—the lot. The defendant had the right, at any time within the prescribed period, to remove his property,—the building. In this there was nothing that concerned any right of the remainder-men, and their failure or refusal to join the tenant for life in the giving of the notice cannot affect his rights. He acquired the property, not subject to the provisions of the lease, but fully relieved of them. The plaintiff, upon the trial, showed that on April 22, 1892, he gave the defendants notice that he had purchased the premises, and that the lease was ended, and that the date of his purchase was February 20, 1892. This suit was begun on July 6, 1892. Hence, if we concede that the lease was not to be determined until 30 days after notice of the sale by the lessors, there would still have been a determination of the lease before the beginning of the action. The notice was sufficient. It did not, it is true, specially require the removal of the building. It did distinctly notify them that the plaintiff insisted upon his right to take possession of his land. This was ample notification, we think, that they should remove from the land the fixtures that, under the terms of the lease, they had the right to take away. To hold otherwise would be to stick in the bark. From what has been said, it follows that his honor erred when he told the jury that "the lease had not been determined." We think that the allegations of the answer, and the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, and not controverted, abundantly established the fact that it had been determined.

We deem it unnecessary to consider the exceptions taken by the plaintiff to evidence introduced by defendants to show that A. L. Pendleton, Jr., one of the defendants, was the assignee of the lessee, Kramer. As the case is presented here, it seems to us that the fact that the defendant A. L. Pendleton, Jr., (whose tenant the other defendant was,) claimed the land in controversy as assignee of the lease to Kramer, was insisted upon by both plaintiff and defendants; hence it seems to have been a work of supererogation to prove it, and entirely unnecessary to examine the evidence by which it was sought to establish what each party insisted was true.

The answer contained the following allegation: "In the year 1884 the said Jane R. Pendleton, believing that the sale to her had worked a termination of the lease, instituted a suit against the parties in possession, one T. B. Wilson and one R. W. Berry, for recovery of possession; and, the said suit coming on for trial at fall term, 1884, the following judgment was made: 'This action having been brought for the possession of a certain tract of land situated in the town of Elizabeth City, bounded as follows, viz. situated on the corner of Main and Water streets, 16 feet wide on Water St., and 39 feet on Main St., it is ordered and adjudged that the defendants have not forfeited the lease in this cause pleaded, and that they are still entitled to the possession under said lease, and that defendants recover costs.'" Assuming that this judgment was rendered as alleged, it does not in any view, we think, affect the plaintiff's right. It was then properly adjudged, perhaps, that the lease had not been determined, for Mrs. Jane R. Pendleton had not then sold her interest in the leased premises. Since the rendition of that judgment, she has done so, and upon that sale the plaintiff founds his right. New trial.

AYDLETT v. NEAL et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

Appeal from superior court, Pasquotank county; Graves, Judge.

Action by E. F. Aydlett against Alethia Neal and A. S. Neal to recover land. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Grandy & Aydlett, for appellant. W. J. Griffin, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The matters involved in this appeal are substantially the same as those considered by us in the case of Aydlett v. Pendleton, (decided at this term,) 18 S. E. 971. For the reasons stated in the opinion filed in that cause, there must be a new trial; and it is so ordered. New trial.

GODWIN v. EARLY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 20, 1894.)

PARTITION BY TENANT IN COMMON—PLEADING.

In a special proceeding under Laws 1887, c. 276, to sell land in partition, a complaint which fails to allege that plaintiff is in possession is defective merely, and the court is not without jurisdiction to grant an amendment.

Appeal from superior court, Hertford county; Graves, Judge.

Special proceeding by John W. Godwin against B. F. Early and others to sell land for partition. The court dismissed the petition, because it failed to allege that plaintiff was in possession, and afterwards denied plaintiff's motion to amend. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

B. B. Winborne, for appellant.

MacRAE, J. The special proceeding begun before the clerk having been transferred to term for trial of issues raised by the pleadings, the judge had jurisdiction of the same, by virtue of chapter 276, Laws 1887. It seems to be now settled by repeated adjudications that the petition is defective unless it sets forth that the petitioners are tenants in common and in possession, the general rule being that possession of one tenant in common is possession of all, where there has been no actual ouster. Alsbrook v. Reid, 89

N. C. 151; Wood v. Sugg, 91 N. C. 93; Osborne v. Mull, Id. 203; McGill v. Buie, 106 N. C. 242, 11 S. E. 284. We think, however, that the failure to allege possession did not deprive the clerk or the judge of jurisdiction; it simply constituted a defective statement of a cause of action. Garrett v. Trotter, 65 N. C. 430. Of the proceeding for partition the clerk had jurisdiction, and, by virtue of the statute above, this jurisdiction was transferred to the judge. When his honor then denied the motion for leave to amend the petition in this respect, upon the ground of want of power to grant it, there was error. The reasoning is the same as that upon section 908 of the Code concerning amendment of process or other proceeding begun before a justice of the peace. To apply it to the case before us, we may use the language of Merimon, J., in Manufacturing Co. v. Barrett, 95 N. C. 38: "The superior court cannot create and supply its jurisdiction, but it can amend a process or pleading to make the jurisdiction appear properly, when in fact it did exist, but did not so appear; thus rendering effectual a large and important class of judicial proceedings that otherwise would very frequently entirely fail, to the injury of individuals and the prejudice of the public." Reversed.

DAVIS v. AUGUSTA FACTORY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 27, 1898.)

INJURIES TO EMPLOYE — NEGLIGENCE — EVIDENCE.

It appearing from the plaintiff's evidence that the machinery of the defendant from which the plaintiff's daughter received injuries resulting in her death, though not of the latest, safest, and most-improved design, was nevertheless safe when properly operated; and, it not appearing that the defendant failed to give the deceased warning of the dangers incident to its operation, (if, with reference to the character of this machinery, the age, capacity, and experience of the deceased, and all the surrounding facts and circumstances, it was the duty of the defendant to give her such warning,) the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and there was no error in granting a nonsuit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Richmond county; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Irena Davis against the Augusta Factory to recover for the death of plaintiff's daughter. From a judgment of nonsuit, both parties bring error. Affirmed.

C. Snead and E. F. Verdery, for plaintiff in error. J. B. Cumming and B. Cumming, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. This was an action by Irena Davis against the Augusta Factory for the homicide of a minor daughter. According to the evidence, fairly construed, the machine of the defendant from which the daughter received injuries resulting in her death was, though to some extent dangerous, entirely safe when properly operated.

It is true that this machine was not of the latest, safest, or most-improved design, but it was entirely suitable for the purposes for which it was made, and, relatively to others used within a recent period, it was improved machinery, and of a kind still manufactured by the best machine works, and employed in first-class factories. It is not incumbent upon persons or corporations using machinery in the prosecution of their business to procure the very best and safest machinery which can possibly be made. It is sufficient if the machinery is of a kind in general use, and reasonably safe for all persons who operate it with ordinary care and diligence. "No manufacturing or business establishment of any kind is bound at its peril to make use only of the best implements and the best machinery and the safest methods." Cooley, J., in Railroad Co. v. Smithson, (Mich.) 7 N. W. 791. The machine in the present case undoubtedly came up to the required standard, and there was no evidence at all that it was in any particular out of repair; the testimony of all the witnesses showing, on the contrary, clearly and unequivocally, that it was in perfect order and condition. In Black's Proof and Pleadings in Accident Cases (page 28) we find the following: "In an action by an employee to recover damages for an injury received from a machine which the employee had to operate, the employee, to recover, must affirmatively establish: First, that the machine or appliance was defective; second, that the master had knowledge or notice or ought to have known such fact; third, that the employee did not know, and had not equal means with the master of knowing, such fact." The master is "bound to exercise reasonable care in the choice of the instrumentalities of his business, and the specific degree of care that he must exercise is measured by the nature and character of the business, the appliances used, and the risks therefrom to those employed." Wood, Mast. & Serv. §§ 345, 346, and cases cited under both sections. To the general rule as stated by these text writers, there are some exceptions, for the law undoubtedly "recognizes some distinction between the duty which a master owes his adult servant or employee, and that which he owes to an employee who, from his youth or inexperience, or other mental immaturity or infirmity, is not able, without instruction, to understand the perils to which he is exposed in the course of his employment. This distinction, as near as we can express it, is this: that, as to the latter class of servants, the master must give them full instructions with respect to the dangerous character of the machinery with or about which they are employed, and of the means necessary to be used to avoid those dangers." See note to Fisk v. Railroad Co., (Cal.) 13 Pac. 144, and cases there cited. In this connection it may also be profitable to examine Sullivan v. Manufacturing Co., 113 Mass. 398, and the comments thereon in Wood, Mast. & Serv. § 351. And see 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 897, under title "Master's Duty to Instruct Inexperienced and Minor Servants." It is impossible, however, to lay down any inflexible rule applicable alike to all cases where minors are employed, as to what warning will be requisite; and, without doubt, in some cases even minors are not necessarily entitled to any warning at all as to the character of the machinery about which they are at work, or as to the proper method of operating it and avoiding obvious dangers. Much depends upon the nature of the machinery, the age, capacity, intelligence, and experience of the employe, as well as all the surrounding facts and circumstances.

It appears that in the present case the plaintiff's daughter was 15 years of age. It may be that the danger connected with the running of the machine by which she was injured, and the proper method of operating it so as to insure safety, were so obvious that there was no real duty devolving upon the defendant to give her any special warning or instructions at all. We do not so decide, nor is there occasion for so doing, because, even if she was entitled to such warning, there was no evidence showing that the defendant failed to give her ample warning of the dangers incident to the operation of the machine in question. The declaration alleges such failure, but there was no proof to sustain this allegation. The only evidence upon the subject was to the effect that when asked by her mother, shortly after the injury, whether she knew the danger to which she had exposed herself, the daughter replied that her aunt Ellen, who had been previously employed at the factory in operating this same machine, had never told her of the danger. Even if this evidence was properly received, it entirely fails to show that the deceased had not received full and ample instructions concerning the proper way in which to operate the machine so as to avoid danger, either from the superintendent, or some other employe of the defendant whose duty it was to give such warning. There is no reason whatever for presuming that this duty devolved upon the aunt of the deceased. In order to authorize a recovery by the plaintiff, it was certainly necessary to allege a failure to give such warning; and, in our opinion, the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to prove this fact, there being no presumption that, if it was the duty of the defendant to give any warning at all, it had failed to do so. See 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 654, 655, tit. "Burden of Proof." As the plaintiff signally failed to establish this fact, she did not make out a prima facie case, and the judgment of nonsuit was right. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed. Cross bill of exceptions dismissed.

GITHENS et al. v. MURRAY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 8, 1894.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—NOTICE TO AGENT—PARTNERSHIP.

Under the rule that notice to an agent is notice to his principal, merchants employing a broker to take orders for them for the sale of goods, which orders they fill, or decline to fill, according to their own discretion, are chargeable with actual notice received by such broker that a member of a partnership, with whom they have previously dealt only through that broker, has withdrawn from the firm, and that a new partner has been admitted; and if, after such notice, the new partnership orders goods through the same broker, it is his duty to inform his principals of the change, and his omission to do so will not render the retired partner liable upon such orders, though the merchants fill them in ignorance on their part of the previous dissolution. It is within the scope of a broker's agency to ascertain the persons, whether members of a partnership or not, by whom goods are ordered of or through him; and his principals can have no right to bind any person who, to his knowledge, has neither ordered nor received their goods.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Bibb county; C. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by Githens, Rexsamer & Co. against R. B. Murray and another. There was judgment for plaintiffs for a part, only, of their claim, and, a new trial having been denied, they bring error. Affirmed.

Lanier, Anderson & Anderson, for plaintiffs in error. S. A. Reid and Hardeman, Davis & Turner, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Githens, Rexsamer & Co. brought, in a justice's court, two suits upon open accounts against Murray & Co., a firm composed of R. P. Murray and R. C. Keen. The cases were taken by appeal to the superior court, there consolidated, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs for $37. Being dissatisfied with the amount of their recovery, they moved for a new trial, to the overruling of which they except.

It affirmatively appears that the firm of Murray & Co. was actually dissolved on the 15th day of October, 1891, and that the verdict in the plaintiffs' favor covers the price of all goods sold to the firm before the dissolution. It also appears that J. C. Edwards, the plaintiffs' broker, had actual knowledge of the dissolution about the time it occurred, and that there had never, prior to that time, been any dealings whatever between the plaintiffs and Murray & Co., except through this broker. The goods for which the plaintiffs further seek to hold R. C. Keen liable were sold and delivered upon orders placed through Edwards after he had actual knowledge that Keen had retired from the firm. The only point of difference between the parties arises upon the question as to whether or not the knowledge of Edwards regarding the dissolution was binding upon the plaintiffs, so as to prevent Keen from becoming liable to pay for goods sold after he had ceased in fact to be a member of the firm. The relation which Edwards sustained to the parties will appear from the following extract from his testimony, the truth of which was not disputed: "My duties with reference to Githens, Rexsamer & Co. were, that I sold their goods, on a brokerage basis, for commission for everything that I sold. I had no special duties at all. I did not handle the goods at all. I simply sold them. I did not pass upon the responsibility of the parties dealt with. I did not determine who were the members of any firm that I sold to. That was not a part of my business. I was expected, however, only to sell to good parties. To a certain extent, they relied upon my determination. They expected me to go to work, and sell to a man that was good, and if they looked him up, and found him reported badly, they would not ship the goods; but I have never had them turn down any order I sent in. In these cases, Mr. Murray gave me the orders. I sold every one of them to him, himself. I cannot name the date when I first knew of Mr. Keen's withdrawal. Mr. Taylor came to me, and said he was going to buy them out, and asked me if it was a good scheme, and I told him that I thought so; and about a week after that he came to me, and told me he had bought him [Keen] out, and I went on selling goods. I did not know how the firm was going to be styled, and I put it down as I did before."

It will thus be seen that Edwards knew, not only that the firm of Murray & Co. had been dissolved by the retirement of Keen, but that a new firm had been formed, of which Taylor was a member. Whatever may have been the extent of Edwards' agency in representing the plaintiffs, we entertain no doubt that it was his duty to inform his principals of this change in the firm; and we are quite certain that his failure to do so would not render Keen, the retired partner, liable upon orders for goods given by Murray for the new partnership to the plaintiffs through this same broker, notwithstanding the plaintiffs had no personal knowledge of the dissolution, and filled these orders in entire ignorance of that fact. When a broker undertakes to sell goods for another, it is certainly within the scope of his agency to ascertain to whom he is selling. Indeed, it would be utter nonsense for any broker to undertake to sell the goods of other persons without knowing who were the purchasers; and of course, if he deals with a partnership, he must know who compose it. As to all goods sold by the plaintiffs to Murray's firm on orders placed by him through Edwards after October 15, 1891, Edwards undoubtedly knew that the firm was then composed of Murray and Taylor, and that Keen no longer had any connection with it. This being so, there is no principle, either of law, justice, or fair dealing, which would authorize the plaintiffs to hold Keen responsible for the value of goods ordered by the new firm. He had nothing to do with ordering them, did not receive them, and derived no benefit from their purchase. Moreover, he had never in any manner dealt with the plaintiffs, other than through Edwards, acting as their broker, and consequently did nothing to induce them to believe he had been, or continued to be, Murray's partner. All the facts were known to Edwards, and under the circumstances of this case the plaintiffs were chargeable with the knowledge he had. The plaintiffs having recovered from the firm of Murray & Co., composed of Murray and Keen, all they were entitled to recover against that firm, and there being no complaint on their part of any failure to recover, as against Murray, the balance of their accounts sued on, there was no error in overruling their motion for a new trial. In fact, the entire controversy was as to the liability of Keen, and the judgment rendered is for the full amount which he is either legally or morally bound to pay. Judgment affirmed.

In re CONTEMPT BY TWO CLERKS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 6, 1893.)

PER CURIAM. The statute requires that criminal cases be transmitted to this court within, or immediately after the expiration of, 15 days from the date of serving the bill of exceptions. It is the duty of all clerks to know of this requirement, and comply with it; they must comply with it. But as the statute, in its application to criminal cases, is recent, the two clerks who have heretofore been ignorant of it are excused, on that ground, from the pains of contempt for past failures. Hereafter they, as well as all other clerks, must take notice of the statute, and render obedience to its mandates. Rules discharged.

EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. RY. CO. v. HEAD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 18, 1893.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

It appearing that if the railway company negligently erected the danger signal post, by placing it too near the track of the railway, this fact must have been well known by the deceased engineer, the plaintiff's husband, and it also appearing by uncontradicted evidence that he unnecessarily left his place upon the locomotive, and exposed himself to danger, for the purpose of getting a view of a hot journal, when he could have done so safely without leaving that place, his death was caused, in part at least, by his own negligence, and his widow was not entitled to a recovery from the company.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; M. J. Clarke, Judge.

Action by Ruth Head against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company to recover for the death of plaintiff's husband. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial defendant brings error. Reversed.

Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, for plaintiff in error. W. M. Bray, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. A post was erected by the defendant near the line of its railway for the purpose of supporting a contrivance commonly called a "telltale," designed to warn employes upon trains of their approach to a bridge. The plaintiff's husband—an engineer in the service of the company—left his seat upon the locomotive for the purpose of looking at a hot journal under the tender. While leaning outward and looking downward for this purpose, the locomotive being in motion, his head came in contact with this post, and he was killed. The plaintiff, his widow, brought an action to recover damages for his homicide, alleging that it resulted from the negligence of the company in placing this post too near the track, and that her husband was without fault and blameless.

As to the distance of the post from the rail at the time of the killing, the evidence was decidedly conflicting. Assuming as true the evidence for the plaintiff, there can be no doubt that the company was negligent in this respect. On the other hand, according to the evidence for the defense, a contrary conclusion might well be reached. In the view we take of this case, however, it is immaterial what may be the truth as to this disputed question. Granting that the post was erected too near the track, the evidence establishes, almost to a certainty, if not absolutely, that this fact must have been known to the deceased. He passed over the road almost daily for a considerable period of time. The post, as already stated, was near a bridge; and, in view of all the evidence, it is almost impossible to conceive that he was ignorant of the existence of the post, or unaware of the distance it stood from the track. Under these circumstances, although it may have been his duty to look after the journals under the tender, and keep himself informed as to their condition, we think he should have exercised some care in selecting the place at which he would attempt to perform this duty. It would have involved only a few seconds' delay to wait till the post was passed; and common prudence, surely, would have suggested the propriety of first looking to see whether there was anything which would render this attempt perilous at the particular point on the line of the road which his train was then passing. Certainly, if he could get a view of the journal without exposing himself to danger at all, he ought to have done so. The evidence is clear, strong, and undisputed that, without leaving his seat in the cab, and without subjecting himself to any peril whatever, he might have seen the hot journal fully as well as from the position he actually assumed.

To look at the journal from his seat would, it is true, have required a slight inclination of his head outside of the window of the cab, but not enough to bring his head in contact with the post, or in such proximity to it as to be dangerous. Inasmuch, therefore, as there was a way in which he could have performed his duty with respect to the hot journal with absolute safety, and he disregarded the safe method of so doing, and adopted another, which was in the highest degree dangerous, he was certainly guilty of some contributory negligence; and, this being so, his widow had no right to recover from the company. Under the facts appearing in the record, the verdict in her favor was contrary to law, and the court ought to have granted a new trial. Judgment reversed.

SMITH et al. v. CLEVELAND, C., C. & ST. L. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 24, 1893.)

NONSUIT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

According to the evidence produced by the plaintiffs, the witness being the person who had actual knowledge of the fact, the car alleged to have been unreasonably delayed in its passage from East Rome to Rome was sent forward and delivered with as much dispatch as possible under the actual circumstances which existed at the time. This being so, there was no error in granting a nonsuit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action in attachment by Smith & Ramey against the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Smith & Ramey sued the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Company in a magistrate's court, where there was a decision in favor of plaintiffs. Defendant took the case by appeal to the superior court, and on the first trial thereof there was a verdict for defendant. A motion for new trial was granted, and, upon the second trial, plaintiffs made a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the security on the appeal bond was the same as the security on the replevin bond, (the action having begun by attachment,) and therefore amounted to no security. This motion was overruled, and to this ruling plaintiffs excepted. The same motion had been made on the former trial of the case, and the court had then overruled it, and allowed the bond amended so as to remove the objection, and to these former rulings no exceptions pendente lite were ever filed. At the conclusion of the testimony for plaintiffs, a motion for nonsuit was made, which was granted upon the ground that, under the law and evidence, plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

For plaintiffs, the following evidence was introduced: On January 15, 1891, Smith & Ramey, who were brokers of Rome, Ga., and agents there of the East St. Louis Packing Company, ordered a car of meat from the packing company, which car they bought on their own account, telegraphing to the packing company that they would accept the car of meat delivered. The car arrived in East Rome January 22, 1891. The bill of lading was made out to "shipper's order, notify Smith & Ramey," and indorsed in blank, and was in the First National Bank of Rome, with draft attached, which draft was drawn on Smith & Ramey. Plaintiffs had the car sold to Hamilton & Co. When it arrived in East Rome, Ramey notified the yard master of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company to bring it into Rome immediately, which he promised to do within half an hour. The car was not delivered in Rome until more than 36 hours after it arrived in East Rome, and Hamilton & Co. refused to take it when it arrived in Rome, because of the delay in delivering it, as they had bought elsewhere, and could not afford to wait. Because of the fall in the price of meat, caused by the delay between East Rome and Rome, which were separate stations, about half a mile apart, plaintiffs sold the car at a loss of $93.75 from what it should have brought, had it been delivered promptly. The car could be brought from East Rome inside of two hours. Even if the track was very much blocked, and a great deal of switching had to be done, two hours would be ample time. Plaintiffs were held responsible by the packing company for any loss on the car, and actually paid it the $93.75 loss. Plaintiffs were prepared to produce the bill of lading and pay the draft whenever the railway company was ready to deliver the car, and the reason they did not do so was because the railway company did not produce the car. The car of meat was sold to Simpson, Glover & Hight, who paid the face of the draft, less $93.90. Plaintiffs paid no money on the draft, but sent the $93.75 direct to the packing company. No meat was ever delivered on the side track in East Rome, and brought to Rome in drays. The freight was paid, but not by plaintiffs. "Shipper's order, notify Smith & Ramey," usually means that the freight is to be delivered on presentation of the bill of lading indorsed by the shipper. Simpson, Glover & Hight, when they paid the drafts, got the bill of lading from the bank, got the meat, and gave up the bill of lading to the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company. The difference between the $93.90 and $93.75 is exchange. The entry of "Canceled" was on the bill of lading when plaintiffs got it, and the entry thereon, "To be delivered only on presentation of bill of lading properly indorsed," was not put on there after plaintiffs got it, Ramey, who was the main witness for plaintiffs, thought.

Ramey did not have the bill of lading when he went to the depot of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company, but it was in the bank, with sight draft attached. He had not paid the draft, and did not accept it. Sight drafts are not accepted. It was presented to him, and he refused payment. He was ready to produce the bill of lading in this way: He would have gotten the money from Hamilton & Co., paid the draft, and gotten the bill of lading, if the car had been placed that day. The packing company telegraphed the bank to sell to Simpson, Glover & Hight. Ramey did not receive the money, and never had the bill of lading in his possession until he got it from the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company, after Simpson, Glover & Hight had paid the draft and gotten the meat. There was no unreasonable delay until the car reached East Rome. Hamilton & Co.'s meat was always delivered on the side track at their warehouse, which was a short distance from the freight depot of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company. They never had any meat delivered in East Rome. Meat fell about 40 points while the car was delayed in East Rome. Plaintiffs introduced the checks given by Simpson, Glover & Hight, freight bill, and invoice of the meat. They also introduced the bill of lading. Upon this bill of lading were the entries that it was to be presented by the consignee without alteration or erasure, and the direction, "Shipper's order, notify Smith & Ramey, Rome, Ga." Also, that the goods were to be delivered only on presentation of the bill of lading properly indorsed, and an indorsement in blank by the packing company. The destination of the freight was stated to be Rome, Ga. By the bill of lading, the defendant agreed to transport, with as reasonable dispatch as its general business would permit, to destination, if on its road, or otherwise to the place on its road where delivery was to be made to connecting carrier, and there to deliver to the consignee or connecting carrier upon the conditions: Neither defendant, nor any other carrier receiving the property for carriage to destination, was bound to carry by any particular train, or in time for any particular market; and any carrier, in forwarding the property from the point where it left its line, was to be held as forwarder only. Responsibility of any carrier to cease as soon as the property was ready for delivery to the next carrier or the consignee, and each carrier to be liable only for loss or damage occurring on its own line, etc. The yard master of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company at Rome testified that he did promise Ramey to deliver the car of meat in Rome in a short while, but did not do so because of the crowded condition of the railroad yard; that the car was delayed about 36 hours; and that he got the car in as soon as he could.

TOLBERT v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 9, 1893.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—IDENTIFICATION OF DEFENDANT.

In view of the evidence, there is ground for grave apprehension that the little girl who was assaulted may have been mistaken in identifying the accused as the guilty person. But this was a question for the jury, and, the presiding judge having approved the finding, this court is constrained by law to recognize the doubt as having been rightly solved against the prisoner.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

Tom Tolbert was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

The plaintiff in error was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape on Nannie Perry, nine years old. He moved on the general grounds for a new trial, which was denied, and he excepted. The testimony of the girl is to the effect that the crime was committed by the defendant between two and three o'clock in the day. He introduced four witnesses whose testimony tends to prove an alibi. It also appears that on the second day after the commission of the offense the defendant went twice to the house of the girl's mother, and told her he had heard he was accused of the crime, and that he could prove where he was that day. The girl was absent at his first visit, but was present at the second, and identified him as the man who assaulted her. One witness testified that he saw the defendant about a block below the house where the assault was said to have occurred, going in the direction of the place where he was located by the proof of alibi, about one o'clock on the same day.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES—FAILURE TO TRANSMIT MESSAGE ACCURATELY.

Under the act of October 22, 1887, (Acts 1887, p. 111,) an electric telegraph company is not liable for the penalty of $100 for a verbal, though material, inaccuracy in the transmission of a message. The words, "shall transmit and deliver . . . with impartiality and good faith, and with due diligence," relate, so far as the purposes of this act are concerned, to the time within which the transmission and delivery must be accomplished, and not to accuracy and correctness in sending and transcribing dispatches.

Bigby, Reed & Berry, and Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, for plaintiff in error. D. W. Rountree, in pro. per.

LUMPKIN, J. The act of 1887, prescribing the duty of electric telegraph companies as to receiving and transmitting dispatches, and fixing penalties for violations thereof, was intended to prevent discriminations, and to secure promptness in the transmission and delivery of telegraphic dispatches. With reference to the latter object, its terms relate to the time within which these companies must perform the services required, and not to the accuracy and correctness with which such services may be rendered. In deciding the question presented by the case at bar, we have given the act a most thorough examination and consideration, and are entirely satisfied with our conclusion that the general assembly did not intend to impose upon telegraph companies a penalty of $100 for a mere verbal error in the sending of a dispatch, or in the transcribing of it at the receiving office, even though the error be a material one. To hold otherwise than we do on this question would be to give to the act an exceedingly harsh construction. The elements of impartiality and good faith are not involved in this case, but the defendant in error contended that the requirement to transmit with "due diligence" means to transmit accurately as well as promptly. We do not think the words quoted can fairly have this interpretation, especially in view of the rule that penal statutes must be construed strictly, and should not be so enforced as to impose a penalty in a case admitting of doubt. We are fortified in our judgment by the fact that the proviso of the first section of the act distinctly declares that nothing in the act "shall be construed as impairing, or in any way modifying, the right of any person to recover damages for any such breach of contract or duty by any telegraph company, and said penalty and said damages may, if the party so elect, be recovered in the same suit." It will thus be seen that, for any damage resulting from mere verbal mistakes or errors, the complete remedy of the party injured is fully guarded and preserved. The penalty may be recovered where the company fails to transmit and deliver a dispatch with that degree of promptness which due diligence requires, and actual damages may be recovered wherever they are caused by the negligent mistakes or errors of the company, irrespective of the question of punctuality. These views, we think, cover, and are in perfect harmony with, the entire scope and purpose of the act, so far as it bears upon the case at bar. Judgment reversed.

WESTERN UNION TEL. CO. v. PATRICK.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 24, 1893.)

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES — FAILURE TO DELIVER MESSAGE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The sender of a telegraphic message having erroneously given the address of the sendee as a particular street number in a city, and the telegraph company having promptly carried the message to that number, and being unable to deliver it, because the sendee was not to be found there, the sender is not entitled to recover of the company the penalty prescribed by the act of 1887, (Acts 1887, p. 111,) unless it affirmatively appears that the company knew the proper address of the sendee, or could have readily ascertained the same. If, upon examination of the city directory, the initials of the sendee's given name, as contained in the message, were not found, the company would not, in order to escape the penalty, be bound to send the message to a person whose surname in the directory was the same as that of the sendee, although, in point of fact, this person was really the sendee, whose given name, as set out in the directory, corresponded to one of the initials in the address, the other initial not appearing in the directory.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by J. Lee Patrick against the Western Union Telegraph Company for failure to deliver a message. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Bigby, Reed & Berry, for plaintiff in error. Carter & Barnes, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. In this case the sender of a telegraphic message recovered against the telegraph company the statutory penalty for failure to deliver with due diligence. It appears from the evidence that he gave the wrong address to the company. The message was directed to "Col. O. M. Bergstrom, 47 S. Pryor St., Atlanta, Ga." but the person for whom it was intended did not stay at that number, and could not be found there; and it does not appear that he was known, or had ever before been called, by the title of "Colonel." He was a young man living with his father at another number on South Pryor street, and employed as a bookkeeper by a firm doing business on that street. Nothing was known of him at the telegraph office, and, according to his own testimony, he had never before received a telegraphic message. The name "O. M. Bergstrom" did not appear in the city directory. The name given the sendee in the directory was "Magnus Bergstrom," and he was generally called by that name. At No. 47 South Pryor street, (which was the city police station,) they refused to receive the message, and no one there knew of such a person as O. M. Bergstrom. Inquiries were made at the jail to ascertain if there was a person of that name among the prisoners, the city directory was consulted, other places in the neighborhood of No. 47 were visited, notice was posted, and another messenger was sent out to continue the search. Finally, the sendee was found by inquiring of another person of the same surname, who, on reading the message, said it was intended for his son. It does not appear that there was any delay in transmitting the message, or in taking it to the place designated by the sender. It was received by the company and taken to that place on Saturday evening, and was delivered on Monday morning; but as the law does not require delivery on Sunday, except in a work of charity or necessity,—Telegraph Co. v. Hutcheson, (Ga.) 18 S. E. 297,—and as no such reason appears for requiring it here, the delivery may be treated as made on the next morning after the evening on which the message was received.

Under this state of facts, we do not think the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The taking of a message to the place designated therein, it is true, does not necessarily absolve the telegraph company from making any further effort to find the sendee, if he cannot be found at that place. Gray, Com. Tel. § 23. If a wrong address is given, and the company knows, or can readily ascertain, the proper address, or where the sendee can be found, reasonable efforts must be made to find him and deliver the message. But, before a recovery can be had by one who has given a wrong address, he must show that his giving the wrong address was not the cause of the delay. Where the sender has acted in a manner calculated to mislead the company and delay the delivery of the message, there can be no presumption that the delay is the fault of the company, rather than of the sender. In this case there is no showing that the company knew the right address. According to the evidence, it did not. Ought it to have found the right address sooner than it did? The evidence fails to show want of diligence in this respect. On the contrary, the company appears to have exercised all the diligence that could reasonably be expected of it. It is true, the proper address might have been ascertained sooner than it was, if the means which finally proved successful had been sooner adopted, but it does not follow that the company was bound to resort to that means at all. We think, where a telegraph company has promptly taken the message to the place designated by the sender, and has ascertained that the sendee is not to be found there, it is not bound, in order to escape the statutory penalty, to take the message to another address, which it does not know, and has no reason to believe, is the right one. Though it may know that there are persons in the city who have the same surname, or who have both the surname and one of the initials of the name given in the message, yet if their names are in other respects different, and the company has no further reason for supposing that one of them is the person intended, it is under no duty to go to any of them. If the defendant had known that there was a person named O. M. Bergstrom residing on the street designated in the message, although not at the number designated, there would have been good reason for supposing that the address given in the message was incorrect, and that this was probably the person intended; but the company was not bound, on finding the name "Magnus Bergstrom" in the city directory, to suppose that the person so described was the one intended. To look up every person in the city whose name is in part the same as that given in the message may often prove a good way of finding the proper person, but to do this would in many instances involve an amount of work on the part of the company altogether out of proportion to its compensation for the service of transmission and delivery, and the omission to do so would not show a want of ordinary and reasonable diligence. At any rate, we are satisfied that there was no such delay in this case as would entitle the sender to recover for want of due diligence, impartiality, and good faith on the part of the company. To uphold a recovery under such circumstances would be to put a premium upon carelessness on the part of the senders of messages, not to speak of the inducement it would afford to unscrupulous persons to deliberately mislead the telegraph company for their own profit. Judgment reversed.

STEWART, Tax Collector, v. ATLANTA BEEF CO. SAME v. ARMOUR PACKING CO. SAME v. NELSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 3, 1893.)

PROPERTY SUBJECT TO TAXATION—WRONGFUL COLLECTION OF TAXES—LIABILITY OF COLLECTOR.

1. In the general tax act, approved December 26, 1890, the twenty-second clause of the second section is in these words: "Upon all packing houses doing a cold storage business in this state, whether carried on by the owners thereof, or by their agents, five hundred dollars in each county where said business is carried on." Held, that a packing house which uses cold storage for preserving its own commodities alone, and does not receive and store for the public, or any part thereof, is not "doing a cold storage business," within the meaning of this clause, and therefore is not subject to the imposed tax.

2. Neither the evidence of a member of the legislature which passed the act, nor that of the comptroller general, touching the meaning and purpose of the same, was admissible to aid in construing the statute and arriving at the legislative intent. Other rulings complained of, as to the rejection and the admission of evidence, were immaterial to the substantial legal merits of the case, in view of the uncontested facts, and of the correct construction of the law, as above announced.

3. A tax collector who, by issuing an execution for taxes against one not engaged in the business on which the tax in question has been imposed, coerces, through a levy by the sheriff, the payment of such tax, together with the cost of collection, is personally liable in an action brought against him for such wrongdoing by the party so coerced; and the recovery may extend to the whole amount paid to the sheriff, irrespective of whether it reached the collector's hands or not. In the verdict and judgment, the description of the defendant "as tax collector" will not vitiate; the words quoted being merely descriptive of the person, and having no legal effect otherwise.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; Howard Van Epps, Judge.

Three actions—by the Atlanta Beef Company against A. P. Stewart, tax collector, the Armour Packing Company against the same defendant, and Nelson, Morris & Co. against the same defendant—to recover certain taxes paid. There was a judgment for plaintiff in each case, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

The Atlanta Beef Company, by its petition, alleged that it was a partnership composed of certain citizens of Illinois and Missouri, doing business in Atlanta, Ga., under the firm name of the Atlanta Beef Company, and elsewhere in Georgia under a name made from the location, and doing no other business in Georgia, except to sell dressed meats. As a necessary part of its business, and as a necessary means for carrying on its business, it has a place in Atlanta, Ga., where its fresh meats are put and temporarily held for sale. When shipments of fresh meats from other states to Georgia began, the meats came into Georgia, to the place of sale, in refrigerator cars, and were sold directly from such cars to local butchers and consumers. When the business increased, it became necessary to unload the cars into storehouses containing refrigerators, to keep the meats cool, to avoid spoiling. Petitioner leased a store in Atlanta, in which to keep its fresh meats shipped from Illinois for sale in Atlanta and contiguous territory, and since then has done the business of selling such meats at that store. It has not engaged in any other business in Georgia, and said products have been kept only for preservation temporarily, and for as short a time as possible, while its goods were for sale. It has never done any storage business in Georgia, of any character. There is not, nor has there ever been, any packing house doing a cold-storage business in this state. Among the specific taxes mentioned in the act of December 26, 1890, is one covered by the twenty-second subdivision of section 2: "Upon all packing houses doing a cold storage business in this state, whether carried on by the owners thereof, or by their agents, five hundred dollars in each county where said business is carried on." The same act, in its fourth section, enacted that such specific taxes should be paid, for the fiscal years for which levied, to the tax collectors of the counties where such vocations are carried on at the time of commencing to do the business specified, and further, that, before any person so taxed should be authorized to carry on the business, they should go before the ordinary of the county, and register, and at the same time pay their taxes to the tax collector, etc., and failure to register, or, after registering, to pay the tax, should subject the offender to a punishment mentioned. Petitioner never was a packing house in Georgia, nor a packing house doing a cold-storage business in Georgia, but has ever been only a seller of fresh meats, and products thereof, sent from Illinois to Georgia in regular interstate commerce, of all which the tax collector of Fulton county, A. P. Stewart, had due notice. A storage business is storing the goods of others for compensation, and cold storage is storing such goods for compensation in receptacles or rooms kept cold to preserve them, and such was the meaning of the words when the tax act was passed. Notwithstanding the facts aforesaid, said Stewart, on January 28, 1891, issued a fi. fa. against petitioner, for $500, for said alleged special tax for 1891, and interest thereon from January 1, 1891, and costs, falsely alleging in the fi. fa. that petitioner had a packing house doing a cold storage business in Fulton county, and delivered the fi. fa. to the sheriff of the county, with orders to collect it. Whereupon, the sheriff, on January 29, 1891, seized certain property of petitioner, described, over its protest, to sell to pay the fi. fa. Petitioner needed all this property to carry on its business, but was compelled to give bond for its forthcoming at such sale. The property was advertised for sale, and petitioner did all it could to prevent the sale, but could not, because no judicial interference could be had with a tax sale. Under compulsion, it paid the sheriff $536.20 on May 27, 1891, in full of the fi. fa., principal, interest, and costs, of which $514.70 was paid to said Stewart, tax collector. The declaration then set forth a similar course pursued by Stewart as to tax for 1892, levy, attempt by petitioner to prevent the issuing of the fi. fa. and levy, and to prevent the sale thereunder, after advertisement of the sale, similar payment by petitioner of $507.32 to the sheriff, of which $503.32 was paid to Stewart. It was further alleged: No demand has been made of any one for such alleged tax of $500, except of petitioner, Nelson, Morris & Co., and the Armour Packing Company, which two companies, like petitioner, are engaged in the sale of beef sent to this market from other states, though there are many other persons in Atlanta and Georgia so selling fresh meats. Said tax collector claims that none are liable for the tax, except said three companies dealing in western beef. Efforts have been made to levy taxes from, or put burdens on, sellers of western beef, which would not be borne by citizens of Georgia selling beeves raised in Georgia, but such efforts have heretofore not been put in statutes. The section of the tax act of 1890 above quoted was intended solely to accomplish that purpose.

In the issuing of the fi. fa., and levy thereof, the tax collector and sheriff, while claiming to act as officers of Georgia, in pursuance of law, were acting without authority of law, and in defiance of law, which protects petitioner's legal rights; and in his conduct said Stewart did not represent the state of Georgia, in discharging duties imposed upon him by its constitution, or the constitution of the United States, or laws in pursuance thereof. Under the facts aforesaid, petitioner owed no such taxes for 1891 and 1892 as in the fi. fas. described, nor under the alleged tax act. The claim of said sum from it for these years is a tax upon interstate commerce, and an unconstitutional interference with one of the necessary instruments of carrying on such commerce; and in so far as the statute of 1890, or any other statute of Georgia, would try to authorize or command the same, it would be contrary to the provisions of the constitution of the United States, and void, because no power but the congress of the United States can "regulate commerce among the several states," and the commerce above mentioned is such commerce. Said act is also unconstitutional because violating the provisions of the constitution of the United States, declaring that "citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states," (Const. art. 4, § 2,) and to "the equal protection of the laws," (Const. Amend. art. 14, § 1.) Under the facts aforesaid, there is by said act, and practice thereunder, a discrimination in favor of the citizens of Georgia vending fresh meats, against petitioners, citizens of other states engaged in the same business. Said section 22, so enforced, is unconstitutional, because contrary to the constitution of Georgia, requiring taxation to be ad valorem, and uniform upon every species of property taxed, and "on every class of subjects." Const. art. 1, § 27. As a license tax, such tax is not uniform, but varies, in order to catch some and relieve others of the same class in like business. The failure to register and pay the tax is made a crime for some, but not for all, classes of subjects or business licenses. The issuing of said fi. fas., and causing the property to be levied on was illegal, and a trespass on petitioner's rights, and put it to great expense of attorney's fees and other charges. Damages were laid in the sum of $50,000. Process was prayed against said Stewart, "tax collector."

To this declaration the defendant demurred upon the grounds that he was not liable in manner and form set forth, and the petition set up no cause of action against him, and that there was no law or equity in the petition. These grounds of demurrer were overruled. The jury found for plaintiff against Stewart, "as tax collector of said Fulton county," $1,043.52; and, defendant's motion for new trial being overruled, he excepted. The motion contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc.; also, that the verdict and judgment following it are illegal, for they should have been, if for plaintiff, for so many dollars, against A. P. Stewart, and not against A. P. Stewart as tax collector; that is, not against the tax collector, because, in no view of the case, is plaintiff entitled to recover of A. P. Stewart as tax collector, the official. Because the verdict and judgment are for $1,043.52, when the pleadings and evidence show, if at all, that defendant received only $1,018.02, the balance upon collection by the sheriff being retained by the sheriff as his cost. Because the demurrer was overruled. Because the court admitted, over defendant's objection, the following evidence of one Burbank: "There is in Atlanta some who do a cold-storage business,—take compensation for storage. One concern here, I believe, is the Georgia Ice Company. I don't know how long they have been engaged in the business. I think, perhaps, they have been in the storage business only in the last three or four years. They built a separate establishment. In the last three or four years, there have been other persons doing a cold-storage business here,—the Automatic Refrigerator Company." The objection to this evidence was that the witness could describe the business, but it was for the jury to decide if it were a cold-storage business. Because the court, upon the following question, admitted it and the answer, and overruled defendants' objection: "Suppose, for the sake of the argument, that their (Swift & Company's) house and the Atlanta Beef Company were the same. Did they ever do any cold-storage business, where they got compensation for it?" The witness answered, "None." Defendant objected to the witness' conclusion as to what is a cold-storage business, upon the ground that he must describe the business, and the jury decide if it were a cold-storage business. Because the court, on plaintiff's objection, held the following question immaterial, and excluded it; defendant insisting it was material, and claiming he could show that plaintiff made a profit in making sales, and thereby there was a consideration in keeping its fresh meats on cold storage for sale: "State to the jury whether or not, in making sales, these plaintiffs make a profit or a loss." Because the court, on plaintiff's objection, held the following question, and answer it elicited, immaterial; defendant claiming he could prove that they would practically have no business left, if they did not use a cold-storage feature: "What would the business of the Armour Packing Company and these other two plaintiffs [three cases were tried together] amount to here, if you do not use a cold-storage feature?" Because the court, on plaintiff's objection, refused to permit defendant to prove—he offering to do so—that plaintiff had a packing house plant, and was a packing house. The court held that in the then stage of the case this evidence was im-material. This was on cross-examination of plaintiff's witness Connally, and before plaintiff had closed its evidence. Because the court refused to permit defendant to show, if a purchaser bought a bill of goods on a certain day, and desired to take part then, and leave the remainder with plaintiff—in plaintiff's cold-storage room—until the next day or two, that plaintiff could not sell him the goods at the market price if he refused to allow part of them to stay there until the next day or day after. Because the court ruled as follows: "I think a man selling his own goods out of an ice box would not make himself amenable to the tax of carrying on the business of cold storage. I will allow you [defendant] to show in any way you can, legally, that he made the sales, and then charged for storage after the sales; but I don't think the mere keeping for a day or two, until the purchaser calls for them, without adding anything to the amount of the price, would make it a cold-storage business." Because the court, over defendant's objection, permitted plaintiff's witness Falvey to testify to what constitutes a cold-storage business in and out of this state, and how they are built and conducted. Defendant's objection was that plaintiff must first show that the witness was an expert in the matter, and he insists that the witness was never qualified as an expert. It appears from the record that Falvey testified that he owned for two years the Automatic Refrigerating Company; that he did no storage, but ran it for his own use; that when he went there he found the Armour Packing Company in there, paying a rental of $200 a month to the Automatic Refrigerating Company for their rent and the cold air furnished it, having a part of the building; that in the other part of it promiscuous things were stored for different merchants throughout the city; that he knew about cold storage as a business for compensation for the storage, elsewhere than in Atlanta, as a general business; that he went through different concerns; that he had seen houses in Cincinnati, New York, and Chicago running cold-storage houses. The witness described these houses, and the manner in which they were run, etc. Because the court, over defendant's motion to exclude it as hearsay, refused to rule out all or any part of the evidence of Falvey, he swearing: "What I know about these places and this place that I conducted is what I learned on inquiry." Defendant thereupon moved to rule out the witness' entire testimony on the subject, because hearsay. Because the court, over defendant's objection, admitted the following evidence of one Beaty, "as well as all other of his evidence:" "I was in New York in 1890 or 1891, and visited the cold-storage warehouse there. That was on the same principle as this Automatic Refrigerating Company here. I went through the departments, and saw the contents of the different rooms. I looked at the temperature at which the atmosphere was held. I don't know that I inquired particularly after their charge for business, but it was the understanding in all that business that they charged for space or per pound for certain length of time." Defendant objected to this evidence on the same ground as the other,—that witness did not claim and was not shown to be an expert,—and also on the ground that it was out of the state, and going out of the state to get a meaning for the words "doing a cold-storage business." It appears from the record that Beatty's testimony as to his "expertness" was similar to that of Falvey, except that he did not seem to have visited as many cold-storage houses. Because the court, over defendant's objection and on plaintiff's motion as immaterial, refused to admit evidence of Henry, a butcher, "The size of my ice box, and the height, is about three feet," and refused to permit an answer to the following question, "Is the ice box that you have in your place of business sufficient for you to carry on a cold-storage business in it?" Defendant contending that he could show that the ice boxes of Henry and other butchers were not sufficient for that purpose. Because the court, over defendant's objection that it was material, excluded the evidence of Henry that he had seen, he supposed, anywhere from 30 to 40 carcasses in plaintiff's cold-storage room at one time, and because the court ruled: "I don't think it is material, under the instructions I am going to give the jury. It don't amount to anything, how much he keeps. I don't think the magnitude of the business has got anything to do with it. I shall hold that they were not doing a cold-storage business, if they were merely taking care of their own goods." Because, over defendant's objection as material, the court excluded the following evidence which was offered by defendant, to wit: "I offer first to prove by the comptroller general of the state, who is the head of the tax department, as a part of the history of the passage of this act, that it was intended by the legislature that the act bearing the words, 'Upon all packing houses doing a cold storage business in this state,' etc., and that by that act it was intended to lay a tax of $500 upon all packing houses doing a cold-storage business in this county and others, whether carried on by a citizen of this state or by a nonresident hereof, and that the act meant by its words such parties as are a packing house in or out of this state, who bring their meats here, and put them in their cold-storage rooms,—such rooms as they have described by plaintiff's evidence as theirs,—and keep them there, in a state of preservation by ice, until they find a purchaser, and offer them for sale, and sell them, and that this act was intended to tax that class of people or business." (2) And because the court thereupon ruled: "I cannot allow that, because, if that was the intention of the legislature, they have been quite inapt in language to convey their intention in statutory law. I cannot hunt for their intention outside of the wording of the statute." (3) Because the court excluded the following evidence which was offered by the defendant, to wit: "Then I offer to prove by Col. Martin, a member of the legislature at that time, the history of the act, and I offer to prove the same things by Col. Martin that I offered to prove by the comptroller general." Upon which the court ruled: "I disallow that. I hold that a legislator cannot enlighten the court as to the intention of the legislature. He may be mistaken. He may have misunderstood the whole concern." Because the court erred in charging: "In view of the evidence, I charge you, gentlemen, that these plaintiffs had the same right that any other citizens of this state had to take ordinary precaution for the preservation of their merchandise until they sold it. If it suited their fancy, or the exigency of the business which they carried on required, that they should have cool receptacles in which to keep their meat in a state of preservation until they sold it, they had a perfect right to keep their meat in this way, and by so doing they did not become amenable to the tax for doing a cold-storage business in this state. The evidence is undisputed that there is a well-recognized business known as 'cold-storage business. It is as specific and identic as the business of a physician or a lawyer. The evidence is undisputed that other persons engaged in that business provide facilities for cold storage for perishable articles, such as meat, and charge a fee or reward for their care and custody by that means of warehousing." Because the court erred in charging: "The words of this statute that I shall now read are to be construed in their ordinary signification. The legislature in 1890 passed an act which, by the twenty-second subdivision of the second section, declares or levies upon all packing houses doing a cold-storage business in this state, whether carried on by the owners thereof or by their agents, $500 in each county where said business is carried on. These words, 'doing a cold-storage business,' are to be interpreted according to their ordinary signification, as used in the act; and the evidence is undisputed that there is a well-recognized business, known among merchants as a 'cold-storage business,' and the essential ingredient of that business is that the person engaged in it takes goods on storage for the public, charging a reward for keeping them. The legislature must be construed to have intended that business, and not to have intended to levy a tax of $500 upon a nonresident, who was authorized to transact business in this state, selling his merchandise, who merely provided facilities in the way of cold storage for taking care of his own goods until he could dispose of them." Because the court erred in charging as follows, and in directing a verdict, the general issue being in, and defendant contending before the jury that he was not liable: "That being the view which the court entertains of the law of this case, and the facts being undisputed, I direct a verdict." Because the court erred in holding and charging: "I hold that the plaintiff cannot recover interest since the payment, inasmuch as the defendant here acted in his official capacity, but that the recovery must be limited to the amount of money which the state has illegally in its custody through the collections made on these fl. fas. The exact sum of money that they paid, whether it was paid as principal or cost or interest, is recoverable." Alleged to be error because the charge meant and held, if anything, that the state had illegally in its custody, through the collection made on these fl. fas., the tax, interest, and costs sued for, when it was the jury's province to decide that fact, and because the charge practically directed a finding against the defendant.

The legal questions made in these cases are, in substance, the same as those made in the case of Stewart against the Atlanta Beef Company, (this term,) except that the Armour Packing Company alleged that it was a partnership doing business under that name in Missouri, engaged in preparing and selling meats, and the products thereof, very extensively, in commerce between the states of the United States and with foreign nations; that part of its business was curing and packing meats for commerce, which gave it the name of a packing house, and shipping to other states fresh meats, and the products thereof, to be sold daily to customers calling for same; that as necessary to this department, and as an instrument for carrying on said commerce, it had places where meats were put and temporarily held for sale in various states, one of such places being space in a storehouse in Atlanta, and also space which it leased from the Automatic Refrigerating Company, etc.; other allegations being similar to those made by the Atlanta Beef Company. And Nelson, Morris & Co. made allegations similar to those of the Armour Packing Company.

John W. Cox, for plaintiff in error. N. J. & T. A. Hammond, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. These three cases involve the same questions. The facts are stated by the reporter.

1. The obvious meaning of the phrase, "doing a cold-storage business," is carrying on the business of storing commodities in a cool place, for hire or reward. It would certainly not be contended that one who, for his own comfort or convenience, kept fruits, meats, or other perishable goods, in a refrigerator, box, or room cooled artificially, would be carrying on a cold-storage business. It would make no difference, in principle, if a person engaged in the sale of such articles kept them, for the purpose of preservation until sold, in such a room, or other place. The real business thus conducted would be that of a dealer in such commodities, and the method employed for storing and preserving them would be a mere incident to that business. The business of storing for hire the goods of other people is of an entirely distinct character. The difference between the two classes of business indicated is very plain; and the proposition that a dealer in goods of any kind, who merely uses a cold-storage receptacle for preserving his wares until sold, is not engaged in carrying on a cold-storage business, is so manifestly beyond contention that, to our minds, it does not admit of elaboration or discussion; and it is entirely immaterial what may be the size of the receptacle, room, or other place in which the goods are stored. We therefore are fully satisfied that the defendants in error were not liable to the tax imposed by the clause quoted (in the first headnote) from the general tax act passed in 1890; it appearing beyond dispute from the evidence that these parties used the cold-storage process for no other purpose than to preserve their own commodities, and that they did not receive or store, for hire or otherwise, any goods whatever for other persons.

2. While the opinion of a member of the legislature which passed an act, or that of the comptroller general, as to its meaning and purpose, might possibly often be valuable and instructive in construing the act and arriving at the legislative intent, it can not be seriously contended that courts can properly resort to sources of this kind in ascertaining the legislative will as expressed in a statute. These gentlemen might differ as to what an act did mean, which would only increase, rather than relieve, any difficulty a court might have in construing the law. But aside from this, which is only thrown out as a suggestion in passing, this method of arriving at the meaning of a public statute cannot, after careful reflection, receive the sanction of any fair mind. The motion for a new trial complains of various rulings made by the court in rejecting and in admitting evidence. It is unnecessary to state or discuss them more in detail, as they could have had no effect whatsoever upon the proper determination of the cases now under review. The correct result was undoubtedly reached, and it is therefore immaterial whether, in the rulings referred to, the court did or did not err.

3. In view of the construction this court has placed upon the clause of the general tax act in question, the tax collector had no legal authority to issue the executions against the defendants in error, or have the same levied by the sheriff, and thus compel the payment of the taxes to which he supposed they were liable. What he did, and caused the sheriff to do, was entirely unlawful, and his conduct as to these defendants was therefore that of a mere wrongdoer or trespasser. Accordingly he is personally liable to them, not only for the money collected by the sheriff as taxes on these void executions, but also for the costs of collection which that officer exacted. A tax collector has no authority, colore officii, to deprive any citizen of his money or his property, unless expressly authorized so to do by law; and he will not be protected, though apparently proceeding under the forms of law, when there is no law to authorize or justify his action. The verdicts and judgments rendered in the cases before us are valid and binding upon Stewart individually. The words "as tax collector," following his name, neither vitiate these verdicts and judgments, nor render them applicable to the defendant only in his official capacity. These words are merely descriptive of the person, and otherwise they have no legal effect whatever. Judgment affirmed.

CENTRAL RAILROAD & BANKING CO. v. ROBERTSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 8, 1894.)

APPEAL—RECORD—STATEMENT OF EVIDENCE.

Under sections 4696a and 4696c of the Code, the presiding judge may require the official stenographer, not only to take stenographic notes of the evidence in civil cases, but to write the same out in longhand for use by the judge, in case he should need the stenographer's report for the purpose of aiding him in examining, revising, and approving any brief of evidence which may be presented to him, if there should be further proceedings by motion for a new trial or otherwise. And, where he has not caused the notes to be written out in longhand before a brief is presented, he may do so afterwards, should he deem it necessary in order to test the brief and make it accurate, the expense being subject to his discretion, as provided in section 4696c. The statute gives the judge no power to require the party moving for a new trial, or his counsel, to make up the brief of evidence from the official stenographer's report, or to produce the report, or a copy of it, in verifying the brief.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Houston county; A. L. Miller, Judge.

Action by George B. Robertson against the Central Railroad & Banking Company. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

Complaint for damages was brought against the railroad company, and after verdict for the plaintiff the defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was dismissed for want of an approved brief of evidence. To this ruling the defendant excepted. The facts on which the ruling was made are as follows: "When the cause came on for trial, the court, as is usual, inquired whether counsel desired the evidence taken down by the official reporter. Counsel for plaintiff stated that he did, but counsel for the company replied that he did not, as he had his own stenographer present, who would take down the evidence for him. The court, thereupon, acting under section 4696c of the Code, directed the official reporter to report the evidence and charge of the court. When the motion for new trial came on to be heard, movant's counsel presented for revision and approval a brief of the evidence, which he stated was not made up from the report of the official reporter, but which he also stated was a correct brief of the evidence introduced on the trial. The court requested the counsel to present for approval a brief made up from the official report, or at least to furnish the court with the report of the official stenographer of the court, by which the court could revise and correct, if need be, the brief that counsel had presented. The counsel for movant declined to do either, whereupon the court dismissed the motion for want of a brief of evidence that the court could approve. The court stated to counsel at the first presentation of his brief what was true then, and is true now,—that the court did not recollect the evidence, not having charged his mind with it, and relying nearly entirely upon the report of the official stenographer upon which to approve the brief. The court could not, in justice to the other side, accept as correct a brief made up from the stenographic report made by the private clerk and stenographer of counsel for the movant." Before the judgment of dismissal was rendered, counsel for the movant insisted before the court that he was not bound to go to the expense of getting a brief of the official stenographer's report, when he already had a brief of the evidence, which was correct, which had been filed, and which could be tested at the time; that it was the duty of the court to examine the brief as presented, and, if it were not correct, then to reject it, or have it corrected so as to conform to the facts, and, if correct, to approve it as a brief.

R. F. Lyon, Steed & Wimberly, and J. R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. M. G. Bayne, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The facts necessary to an understanding of the rulings made in the present case will be stated by the reporter.

Section 4696a of the Code makes it the duty of the official reporter, "when directed by the judge, as hereinafter set forth, to exactly and truly record, or take stenographic notes of, the testimony and proceedings in the case tried, except the argument of counsel." Section 4696b, as amended by the act of October 12, 1885, provides for the compensation of reporters for services rendered in criminal cases. Section 4696c provides for their compensation for services in civil cases. The last section contemplates that there may be an agreement between counsel for the parties that the evidence shall be recorded, or, in case of disagreement, that the presiding judge may direct the same to be recorded. In the absence of such agreement, it is within the power of the judge to fix the reporter's compensation at a rate not exceeding 10 cents per 100 words, and to prescribe the manner in which payment shall be made. Construing together sections 4696a and 4696c, we have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the authority of the judge in civil cases is not limited to directing the stenographer merely to take down stenographic notes of the evidence, but we think he undoubtedly has the power to require the stenographer to write the same out in longhand, so that the judge may use the report, if needful, in examining, revising, and approving the brief of the evidence which may be presented to him, should there be a motion for a new trial or other proceedings in the case. Nor is this power of the judge confined to the time when the brief is presented. He may thereafter require the stenographer to write out his report, if this should be necessary in order to enable the judge to test the brief and make it accurate. The report of the testimony and proceedings upon the trial of a case are in no sense a brief of the evidence, and were never so intended. This report may be, and doubtless very often is, quite useful in preparing and verifying a brief of evidence. The parties can, by agreement, have the report made, and arrange between themselves and the stenographer for his compensation. If no agreement is made, the presiding judge may, of his own motion, direct the stenographer to take down in shorthand the testimony and other proceedings; and he may also, as already stated, prescribe by whom, and what amount, the stenographer shall be paid. If there should be no necessity for writing out the notes in longhand, the judge, in fixing the amount of the stenographer's compensation, would of course allow him less than would be allowed in case he should be required to write out his report. It being within the power of the judge to require the testimony and proceedings not only to be taken down, but also to be written out, it is his right to use the stenographer's report in passing upon, correcting, and approving the brief of evidence, and in verifying the motion for a new trial. There is no law, however, which requires a party moving for a new trial, or his counsel, to make up a brief of the evidence from the official stenographer's report. It is simply incumbent upon the movant's counsel to prepare and present to the judge a correct brief of the evidence; and in so preparing it he may resort to his own memory, to notes taken by himself, or to any other source, so that the brief he does present for approval be fair and accurate. The presiding judge has no power or authority to require any party to produce the stenographer's report, or a copy of it, in verifying a brief of evidence. We have already seen that the judge may have the use of such report simply by directing it to be made, without reference to the wishes of the parties. It follows from the foregoing that the judge erred in declining to examine the brief of evidence tendered by movant's counsel, and consequently in dismissing the motion for a new trial for want of a brief. The principle of the ruling made in this case will also be applicable to the preparation of a brief of evidence to be inserted in a bill of exceptions, where there has been no motion for a new trial, but where, in reviewing the action of the trial court, a consideration of the evidence is necessary. Judgment reversed.

FARMER v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 12, 1893.)

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE — REMARKS OF COUNSEL — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The killing of another because of a past attempt by him to debauch the slayer's wife is not justifiable homicide. It is only where there is an absolute necessity that a killing be perpetrated, to prevent adultery, that the case will stand upon the same footing of reason and justice with other cases of justifiable homicide, under section 4334 of the Code. Jackson v. State, (Oct. term, 1892,) 18 S. E. 298.

2. The use of grossly improper remarks by counsel for the state in his argument to the jury is not cause for a new trial, when the verdict is fully as favorable to the accused as the evidence would warrant, and when it appears that the presiding judge, upon having his attention called to the misconduct of counsel, promptly ordered him to confine himself to the evidence, which order was obeyed, and counsel for the accused made no motion to have a mistrial declared, nor preferred any request to charge the jury on the subject. The court, however, should have unequivocally rebuked the counsel, and instructed the jury to disregard entirely the improper remarks, even without a request. The omission to do this is attributable alone to inadvertence.

3. On the facts disclosed in the record, there was no error in holding a night session of the court, or in the direction given the next morning by the court to the progress of the trial.

4. There was no error, as against the accused, in the charges complained of. The verdict for voluntary manslaughter was fully as favorable to him as the evidence authorized, and the court properly refused to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Jackson county; N. L. Hutchins, Judge.

Tom Farmer was convicted of manslaughter, and, his motion for new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

Following is the official report:

Farmer was indicted for murder, and was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted. The grounds of the motion are as follows:

(1) That the verdict is contrary to evidence, and without evidence to support it.

(2) That the court erred in refusing to charge as follows: "Where the defendant justifies the killing upon the ground of self-defense, in order to make good the defense, it must appear that at the time of the killing the danger was so urgent that it was necessary for the defendant to kill, in order to save his own life. But, where the defendant justifies the killing upon the ground that the deceased had attempted to debauch his wife, the doctrine that the danger must be imminent at the time of the killing does not apply. You may consider any evidence of indignities offered wife of defendant by deceased prior to the killing, and say whether or not the homicide was justifiable. The statute is that 'all other instances which stand upon the same footing of reason and justice as those enumerated, shall be justifiable homicide.' You are to consider the evidence, and say whether or not the present case 'stands upon the same footing of reason and justice as the cases of justifiable homicide specified in the Code.' This was not given in the form requested, but the Code section was given in charge, with the judge's explanation of its meaning.

(3, 4) S. J. Tribble, of counsel for the state, in his argument to the jury, said: "This is only one of the many instances where the rich landlord shoots down the poor tenant, and it should be stopped." Also: "Old man Farmer [the father of defendant] said he had enough trouble on his hands. Yes, gentlemen of the jury, he has. This is the second one of his boys who has committed the offense of murder, and the county demands at your hands that these murderers be convicted and hanged." Also: "Two other sons of old man Farmer are murderers." The defendant assigns error, in that the court did not stop such argument and statements, and instruct the jury that they were to pay no heed to them. The court certifies this ground with the qualification that when the attention of the court was called by counsel to the objection that the young associate counsel of the state was indulging in appeals to the jury, not, as counsel considered, authorized by the evidence, (the precise language not recalled,) the court cautioned him, and ordered him to confine himself to the evidence in the case, and he conformed, and there was no further complaint or objection; and, so far as the court heard, some of the statements objected to were founded on evidence admitted without objection.

(5) The trial judge forced counsel to proceed with the case until late in the night of the second day of the trial, when Mr. Thomas, counsel who had prepared the case for trial, and who was leading counsel, and the one the defendant most relied on, was sick, and unable to proceed, and so stated to the judge. The night was bad and rainy, and the ground muddy; and, being forced to go on with the case that night, Mr. Thomas was taken sick, and the next morning was desperately sick, and unable to work, and in consequence thereof could not properly argue the case. He informed the judge that night that he was just out of a sick-bed, where he had been confined for days, and did not have the physical strength to go on with the case that night, and asked that the court take recess until morning, which the court refused to do. The court makes the following statement as to this ground: Mr. Thomas inquired of the judge, privately, about the usual hour of recess in the afternoon, whether or not the court intended to hold a night session, and was informed that such was the intention, as there were other parties in jail under indictment for felonies, one of them for murder, awaiting trial, and the week's session was drawing to a close. To this Mr. Thomas may have stated that he was not feeling well, but did not ask the court to take recess then because of his sickness or indisposition. When, during the night session, after the argument of two of the counsel in the case had been heard, the court inquired of Mr. Strickland, partner and associate counsel of Mr. Thomas, whether or not Mr. Thomas preferred to go on then, or wait until morning, Mr. Thomas having stated, at the hotel, while at the supper table, during the short recess, that he was not well, and complained that there was to be a night session, Mr. Strickland soon reported that Mr. Thomas had concluded to go on that night, but the jury being weary, and desiring that recess be then taken, it was done. Next morning it was reported that Mr. Thomas was sick, and, after suspending the trial for more than an hour,—it being stated that he would likely be able to appear and proceed within an hour or two,—the court left it to Mr. Strickland, the associate counsel, to proceed with the argument himself, or move a continuance on the ground of Mr. Thomas' sickness. Mr. Strickland decided, after consultation with his other associate counsel and client, not to ask for a continuance. About that time, Mr. Thomas appeared in court, and proceeded to argue the case. Counsel did not make a request, in open court or elsewhere, that the court take recess until morning on account of his sickness.

(6) The court charged the jury: "Having given you in charge the law of justifiable homicide,—that is to say, the doctrine of self-defense, defense of family, property, etc., and of acting under the fears of a reasonable man that a felony is intended to be committed on his person, habitation, or other property, (the instances enumerated by the Code where one may kill another, and be justifiable in doing so),—I am requested to give you in charge section 4334 of the Code, and leave you to determine whether the case is one of justifiable homicide under that section. The language of that section is, 'All other instances which stand on the same footing of reason and justice as those enumerated, shall be justifiable homicide,' and has been considered by the supreme court to mean that the principles of defense, of some sort, standing upon the same reason and justice as those enumerated and given in the charge, must enter into the transaction, to make the homicide justifiable, and that no case can stand on the same footing of reason and justice as the enumerated cases do, unless defense, of some sort,—the prevention of some impending or pressing wrong,—enters as an element therein. Defense against some urgent and pressing danger must have operated upon the mind of defendant when he shot and killed deceased, or he was not justifiable. An instance of justifiable homicide standing upon the same footing of reason and justice as those above enumerated in the Code, under this section, is the killing of a man to prevent him from attempting or consummating an impending adultery with or seduction of his wife, but not to avenge a past adultery with her, for the killing after the act is done, which would have been justifiable homicide to prevent, would be to kill in a spirit of revenge, which the law would not justify. No words, no matter how opprobrious or offensive or insulting, used to or of the defendant or his wife, would make a case standing on the same footing of reason and justice as the case of homicide enumerated in the Code; for it is expressly declared that provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures shall [not] be sufficient to free the person killing from guilt of the crime of murder." The errors specified as to this charge are (1) that the jury was restricted in the application of section 4334, whereas they should have been left free to say, without restriction, whether or not the case on trial was an instance which stood upon the same footing of reason and justice as those enumerated; and (2) that the charge confines the jury to the application of that section and cases standing on the law of self-defense and defense of habitation, etc., whereas the defense set up in one of defendant's theories, and the section of the Code under consideration, contemplate cases entirely out of the doctrine of self-defense.

(7) The court charged, in immediate connection with the foregoing: "You will observe that the question we are now on is not the reduction of homicide from murder to manslaughter of some grade, but the absolute and unconditional justification of the killing, under this and other sections of the Code, on the principle of justifiable homicide. If the killing, as above charged, was the result of that sudden impulse of passion supposed to be irresistible, and there was not an interval between the provocation given and the homicide sufficient for the voice of reason and humanity to be heard,—sufficient for the passion aroused by the provocation to cool down,—then the defendant may be guilty, not of murder, but of voluntary manslaughter, depending upon the nature of the provocation given, but would not be justifiable homicide. Whether there was time between the provocation and the homicide for the passions aroused to cool down, in a reasonable man, is a question to be determined by the jury. In the cases enumerated in the Code as justifiable homicide, each of them contemplates immediate and pressing danger,—the circumstances reasonably believed to be such. It is defense of self; defense of habitation, property, person, or family; defense against one who manifestly intends or endeavors, by violence, to commit a felony on the other; defense against a mob violently intending and endeavoring to enter one's house to assault some person therein. It is defense against real, imminent, and impending danger. The mere fear of any violence, to prevent which the killing is done, shall not justify it; for the circumstances must be such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man, and the person killing must act under the influence of such fears, and not in a spirit of revenge. Not only must it be in defense, but must be absolutely necessary, in reality, or in his belief or fears, as a reasonable man, as the circumstances appear to him, to prevent the attack; and even in the case of self-defense, or in defense of wife or child, the danger must be so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing, or as he, under the fears of a reasonable man, believes it to be, so that, in order to save his own life, he, as a reasonably cool and courageous man, believes the killing was absolutely necessary. Whenever a homicide is committed in a spirit of revenge for a past offense, or for a provocation by words, etc., it is not justifiable. When done under pressing necessity, or under the fears of a reasonable man, to defend life or limb or wife against a felonious attack, it is justifiable. Where the case made is not enumerated in the Code, and is subject to be put upon this section of the Code, it must be shown to stand upon the same reason and justice as those enumerated, and not to be in conflict with them. Unless it so appears, it cannot be justifiable homicide; that is to say, no offense at all." The errors are (1) that the Code section is construed by the judge for the jury, without allowing them to consider it themselves, and they are instructed that it may be reduced from murder to manslaughter, whereas the section itself contemplates only justifiable homicide; and (2) that the court coupled the Code section under consideration with other sections on the subject of self-defense, and made them stand on the same plane, and did not leave the jury to say whether or not they occupied the same or a different plane.

Thomas & Strickland, for plaintiff in error.
R. B. Russell, Sol. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The law classifies cases. The jury determine, on the facts in evidence, and on the law as given them in charge by the court, to what class the particular case belongs. With reference to justifiable homicide, the law has specified several instances which fall within that class, and has then added a general description of other instances, in these terms: "All other instances which stand upon the same footing of reason and justice as those enumerated shall be justifiable homicide." Code, § 4334. When the enumerated instances to which this general description refers are examined, it is found that in all of them, without exception, one of the elements is present and impending danger, real or apparent. Another suggestion which arises from an examination of these instances is that the killing must be for prevention; and another, that it must be necessary, either really or apparently, as a measure of prevention. Code, §§ 4330-4333. As these several characteristics, either expressly or by plain and manifest implication, mark each and every one of the enumerated instances, and as they are characteristics involving the principle and reason on which justification depends, they must, as matter of law, be present in each and every one of the nonenumerated instances, in order to put the latter on the same footing of reason and justice with the former. These characteristics are the very things which make up the reason and justice of the enumerated instances, for in penal law the distinction between prevention and revenge is fundamental. Aggressive acts perpetrated to avenge a past injury are never justifiable. This is a rule without any exception. On the other hand, acts done to prevent an apprehended injury are sometimes justifiable, and sometimes not. If they are done when the injury is really or apparently about to take place, and if the doing of them is either really or apparently necessary to prevent it from taking place, they are justifiable, provided the gravity of the impending injury be such as to warrant the means used in the given instance to prevent its perpetration. The injury attempted or contemplated may be so slight as that the law would rather it should not be prevented at all, than that it should be prevented at the cost of human life or of great bodily harm. If the line of thought which we have suggested and pursued be sound, it follows that the law itself virtually says—and consequently that the court may instruct the jury, as matter of law—that the killing of a man because of a past attempt by him to debauch the slayer's wife is not justifiable homicide, and that such a killing is not upon the same footing of reason and justice as the instances of justifiable homicide to which section 4334 of the Code refers. Under the evidence, there was really no question for reference to the jury on the subject. But, even had the prevention of a future act of adultery been the occasion of the killing, the danger must have been present and impending, and the killing to prevent it, in order to be justifiable, must have been necessary, or at least apparently necessary. Jackson v. State, (Oct. term, 1892,) 18 S. E. 298.

2. The facts of the case touching improper remarks by counsel for the state in his argument to the jury are set forth in the official report. It will be noticed that the cause of complaint, as embodied in the motion for a new trial, is somewhat mitigated by the explanatory note of the presiding judge. But the impropriety was very great, and the court should have unequivocally rebuked the counsel, and instructed the jury to disregard entirely the improper remarks, even without any request to do so. The omission to deal thus with the matter is attributable alone, we think, to inadvertence. The failure of the counsel for the accused either to move to have a mistrial declared, or to request any charge to the jury on the subject, and thus to invoke a ruling by the court, is all that prevents this from being cause for a new trial. Gross impropriety in the argument of cases seems to be a widely prevalent evil in conducting trials, both civil and criminal. It is one which ought speedily to disappear entirely, and for the good of justice, and the honor of its administration by judicial tribunals, we hope it will.

3. Touching the night session of the court, the facts and circumstances are explained by the presiding judge, and, in the light of his explanation, there was no error either in holding that session, or in the direction given the next morning to the progress of the trial.

4. As against the accused, there was certainly no error in any of the charges of the court complained of. The verdict was only for voluntary manslaughter. It was quite as favorable as any that could have been rendered under the evidence and the law applicable thereto. A new trial was properly refused. Judgment affirmed.

HOLLAND v. SPARKS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 8, 1894.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—DEATH OF PERSONS ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE.

1. Negligence relatively to the safety of any particular person is the breach of some diligence due to that person. Where no duty of diligence appears relatively to the person injured, there can be no presumption of its breach, notwithstanding the broad language of section 3033 of the Code. That section imposes the burden of proving the observance of such diligence as was due, not the burden of proving that none was due. For a railroad company to be exempt from liability for a personal injury done by the running of its locomotives or cars, it is only necessary for it and its agents to exercise all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, (if any) due from it and its agents relatively to the person injured. A failure of diligence by these agents towards the company, unless that failure also involves negligence as between the company and such person, will afford the latter no cause of action, and, in case of his death from the injury, would be no cause of action in favor of any person legally interested in his life.

2. Relatively to persons casually near the margin, but outside, of a railroad company's track in the country, where there is no road ex-pathway in customary use by pedestrians, the company owes no duty or diligence in respect to the speed of its trains; and if, in consequence of very high speed, a train, or some of the cars, leave the track, and thereby a person thus casually exposed be wounded or killed, there is no cause of action, in the absence of evidence disclosing that there was reason for anticipating the presence of some one near the line of the road at the scene of the accident, or that the servants of the company in charge of the train actually saw some person there before the derailment occurred.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Bibb county; O. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by Lizzie Holland against W. B. Sparks, receiver of the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad, to recover for the death of plaintiff's son. There was a judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. C. Duncan, Owens Johnson, and Willingham & Lane, for plaintiff in error. Gustin, Guerry & Hall, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. Relatively to one to whom no diligence whatever is due, there can, in legal contemplation, be no negligence at all in causing him a personal injury. Where some degree of diligence is due to another with reference to his personal safety, failure to observe that degree of diligence will be negligence as to that person. In other words, negligence relatively to the safety of any particular person is the breach of some diligence due to him. When an action is brought for a personal injury caused by the running of a locomotive or car of a railroad company, the presumption of negligence does not arise against the company unless it appears that, at the time of the injury, there was due from the company to the person injured some degree of diligence to prevent that injury. The burden of proving it owed no diligence is not upon the company, but the plaintiff must show that, relatively to the safety of the person injured, some diligence was due by the company. As soon as he does this, the presumption immediately arises that the company's negligence caused the injury, and in order to escape liability it must rebut this presumption by showing the observance on its part of such diligence as was due. After much deliberation we are satisfied that nothing, even in the broad language of section 3033 of the Code, relieves the plaintiff, in cases of this character, from the necessity of showing that a duty of diligence, such as we have mentioned, existed, or imposes upon a railroad company the burden of proving, negatively, the contrary. A presumption of negligence is neither more nor less than a presumption that there was a breach of diligence. Such a breach could not, of course, be presumed in a case where it was affirmatively proved, as a matter of fact, that no diligence at all was due. If, therefore, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to make the duty of diligence relatively to the person injured appear, and he fails to do so, the case must stand upon the same footing, for, as to what a plaintiff is required to show, "that which does not appear does not exist." When the presumption of negligence has once been raised against a railroad company under the section above cited, and the company satisfactorily shows that its agents exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to prevent the particular injury for which the action was brought, it establishes its observance of the diligence due by it. What will constitute the amount or kind of diligence which will be required as "ordinary and reasonable" must necessarily vary under different circumstances. It cannot be measured or ascertained by any fixed and inflexible standard, because the words just quoted are themselves relative terms, and what, under some conditions, would be ordinary and reasonable diligence, might, under other conditions, amount to even gross negligence. For instance, for most purposes, running a passenger train through the country at a rate of 25 miles an hour would be safe, prudent, and proper, while to run the same train at this rate over a crossing in a crowded city would amount to wantonness. The measure of diligence due, therefore, by a railroad company to any person, is a relative one, and what is, or is not, due diligence must be arrived at in every case with reference to the surrounding circumstances and the relations which, for the time being, the company and the person in question occupied towards each other. A person injured by the running of a railway train must, as we have already indicated, depend for recovery upon the negligent failure of the company, either by itself or through its servants, to observe proper care and caution to prevent inflicting upon him the very injury of which he complains; and it is clear, from what has been said above, that there should be no recovery because of negligent conduct on the part of the company's servants which in no proper sense involved the breach of a duty due to the person injured. The failure of diligence by these servants in respect to any duty they owed to the company itself, unless that failure also involved negligence as between the company and the person injured, would afford the latter no cause of action. See Bish. Non-Cont. Law, § 446; 1 Shear. & R. Neg. § 8; O'Donnell v. Railroad Co., 6 R. I. 214. Of course, in case of the death of such person in consequence of the injury, such failure would not be a ground of action in favor of any party legally interested in his life. In the present case it was insisted that the servants in charge of the defendant's freight train were running it at a high and dangerous rate of speed, and that this conduct on their part amounted to negligence. Most probably it was a violation of the duty which these servants owed to the company, and to those whose property was being transported by the train, and in this sense their conduct may have been negligent. But we do not think their failure to observe due care and diligence in running the train was negligence as against one in no way connected therewith, and whose injury by its rapid running and derailment was a consequence so remote as to require almost the gift of prophecy to anticipate it. We are not aware of any statute or rule of law requiring the courts to hold railroad companies liable in a case of this kind.

2. Applying the doctrine above announced to the facts of the present case, we are convinced that the court below was right in granting a nonsuit. The plaintiff's son was walking along or near the track of the railroad company. Being warned by a companion of the rapid approach of a freight train, he stepped aside, and undoubtedly went a sufficient distance from the track to escape injury if all the cars had remained on the rails; but, for some reason unexplained, several of the cars left the track, and he was stricken by one of them and killed, at a distance of about 20 feet from the rail. The place where the tragedy occurred was in the country, where there was no road or pathway in customary use by pedestrians. The deceased was simply walking along or near the track, and there can be no room to doubt that the unfortunate catastrophe which resulted in his death was as totally unexpected to the company's employees in charge of the train as it was to him. It may be that the train was running at a very high and dangerous rate of speed, but certainly the derailment of the cars could not have been foreseen by any one. It was doubtless a complete surprise, not only to the deceased, but to all the persons on the train. The latter had no more reason than did the deceased to suspect what was about to happen. The truth is, it was a mere accident, and nothing more, and we cannot hold that the defendant company is responsible for the consequences. It is certainly the duty of a railroad company to conduct its business with due regard to the safety of all persons to whom it owes any duty of diligence. In running its trains the company must necessarily expect to find people at road crossings, or at other points where they have a right to be or to travel, and hence it becomes its duty to so regulate the speed of trains at such places as to avoid inflicting injuries. On the other hand, as to an unfrequented point in the country, where there is no road or pathway, naturally the company would have no special reason to anticipate coming in contact with any one, and therefore need not keep a train under such perfect control that it could be stopped immediately in case of a sudden and totally unexpected emergency. Of course, if the presence of any person exposed to peril by the running of the train be actually known to those in charge of the train, no matter at what point upon the company's line of railway, it would be the imperative duty of the train employees to use every reasonable effort to avoid inflicting injury upon such person. In the case before us the deceased was at a place where those in charge of the train had no reason to expect any one, and therefore the company owed him no duty with respect to the speed at which its train approached that point. It does not appear by the evidence that the company's servants saw him, or had any actual knowledge of his presence. Even if this were otherwise, however, there would seem to be no good reason for the employees on the train to anticipate that, if its speed was not checked, injury to him would, or might probably, ensue. He was, when killed, at an apparently safe distance from the rails. Even if he had been seen by the employees of the company, who were on the train, there would have appeared no danger of his being run over or in any manner injured. Indeed, it is certain that, but for the unexpected derailment, he would have been absolutely safe. He evidently, and with good reason, considered his position a safe one. Why should not the same circumstances upon which he relied likewise influence the trainmen in reaching the same conclusion? If the latter were unwarranted in regarding him beyond the reach of all probable danger, and were therefore negligent in failing to take precautions against injuring him, he must have been negligent as well, for doubtless he predicated his erroneous judgment upon precisely the same state of facts. We feel certain that neither he nor the trainmen could even have imagined that the unusual and peculiar disaster which resulted in his death would take place. It would be requiring of him more than ordinary foresight to have foreseen his danger; and, as railroad companies must necessarily depend upon human agencies in discharging the duties devolving upon them, the diligence to be exacted at their hands should likewise be measured by that standard of prevision and sagacity only which is common to mortals. A case based upon somewhat similar facts, and which sustains the ruling now made, is that of Woolwine v. Railway Co., 36 W. Va. 329, 15 S. E. 81. It was insisted for the plaintiff in error that the proof did not affirmatively show that the deceased was upon the company's right of way, and he was therefore not to be regarded as a trespasser. He was upon an embankment artificially constructed by the defendant, and was within 20 feet of the track. In the light of common knowledge, and of these facts, we might safely assume he was in fact upon the right of way; but it is really immaterial whether he was or not. In either view, we are of the opinion that, relatively to him, there was no duty on the part of the company, and consequently no negligence which would make it liable for causing his death. Judgment affirmed.

JENKINS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 9, 1893.)

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGE—LARCENY—INTOXICATION AS DEFENSE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. By virtue of the act of October 19, 1891, a city court comes into legal existence as soon as a recommendation is made by the grand jury; and should this occur during a recess of the senate, and should the governor appoint and commission a judge of the court, who qualifies and enters upon the performance of his duties, he is a judge de facto, if not de jure, although his appointment has not been confirmed by the senate, and the court over which he presides may exercise such jurisdiction as is conferred upon it by law as effectually as if confirmation had taken place.

2. Where drunkenness was set up, not as an excuse for an admitted act, but to show physical inability to do the act at all, there was no error in charging: "While drunkenness is no excuse for crime, it is a fact which may be proven, as any other fact, to throw light on other facts or circumstances in the case."

3. The evidence of guilt was barely sufficient, but, the verdict having been approved by the presiding judge, this court will not reverse the judgment refusing a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Carroll county; W. F. Brown, Judge.

Will Jenkins was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Affirmed.

Cobb & Reese, for plaintiff in error. Edgar Watkins, T. A. Atkinson, Sol. Gen., and Atkinson & Hall, for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. The act of October 19, 1891, (Acts 1890-91, vol. 1, p. 96,) declares "that upon the recommendation of the grand jury of any county of this state having a population of fifteen thousand or more, where the same does not now exist, there shall be, and the same is hereby established, a city court for said county; the powers, jurisdiction, officers and mode of selecting them of said court shall be the same as now prescribed by the act creating the city court of the city of Macon, approved August 14, 1885." The act creating the city court of Macon, above referred to, (Acts 1884-85, p. 471,) provides "that there shall be a judge of said city court of Macon, who shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, whose term of office shall be four years, and all vacancies in the office of judge shall be filled by appointment of the governor for the residue of the unexpired term, such appointment being subject to the approval of the senate which may be then in session, or if the senate be not in session at the time of such appointment, then subject to the approval of the senate at its next session thereafter." It appears from the record that, at the April term, 1893, of the superior court of Carroll county, the grand jury recommended the establishment of a city court for that county, and that soon thereafter the governor appointed Hon. W. F. Brown judge of that court, and issued to him a commission accordingly. At the time this appointment was made the general assembly was not in session, nor had there been any session up to the time of the trial of the accused. The point made by the plea to the jurisdiction filed by the accused was that, there having been no vacancy in the office of judge of the city court, nor any residue of any unexpired term, the governor had no legal right to appoint and commission a judge of this court. This plea recited that Carroll county had a population of at least 10,000. We are not advised as to why the number 10,000 was used. This was probably done by mistake or inadvertence. At any rate, no objection to the establishment of the city court is raised on the ground that this county had a population of less than 15,000. Indeed, the fact that its population was 15,000 or more seems to have been recognized by both sides. The only position insisted upon, so far as related to the question of jurisdiction, was that, the power of the governor being derived from the terms of the act creating the city court of Macon, adopted by the general city court act of 1891, no appointment made by him could be valid until after its confirmation by the senate, except in case of a vacancy, in which event he could appoint only for the residue of an unexpired term, and that if such an appointment should be made while the senate was in session, it must be at once confirmed, or if not in session, then the appointment would be subject to the approval of the senate at its next session. Accordingly, it was argued that, when the court was established by the recommendation of the grand jury, and there had never been a judge of this court in actual commission, there could be no such vacancy as the act of 1885 contemplated, and certainly no residue of an unexpired term in the judgeship; and the conclusion pressed was that a judge of the city court of Carroll county could not be legally appointed and commissioned for the first time unless the senate was actually in session when the appointment was made. It will be observed that the very individual assuming to act as judge of this court was called upon to decide whether or not he had legal authority to exercise the functions of this office, and his decision holding that he was rightly in office is assigned as error in the bill of exceptions brought to this court. It might, perhaps, be proper to dispose of this branch of the case by ruling that the question of the right of the judge to hold the office could not be thus made. The position of the plaintiff in error being that the person before whom he was tried was not a judge, and therefore that he was not tried in any legal court, and this court having no jurisdiction except upon writs of error from certain specified courts legally constituted and established, it would follow that, if the contention of the plaintiff in error is sound, it could only result in this court's declining to entertain the case. We do not, however, care to dispose in this manner of the question presented, nor is it necessary to a proper disposition of it that we should decide whether or not the Honorable W. F. Brown was, at the time of the trial in question, judge de jure of the city court of Carroll county. One thing is certain beyond question, viz. that the city court of that county came fully and completely into legal existence, with all the powers and jurisdiction conferred upon it by law, as soon as the grand jury recommended its establishment. The legal existence of the court, as such, did not in the slightest degree depend upon whether it had a judge or not. As soon as the recommendation of the grand jury was made and promulgated, the court came into being as a legal tribunal; and, though it could not proceed with the transaction of business without a judge, it was not for this reason any less a court than is any other court where there may be temporarily a vacancy in the office of judge. The governor, believing it to be his duty, appointed and commissioned Mr. Brown as the judge of this court. Whether this action, in advance of a session of the senate which could confirm the appointment, was premature or not, we are sure that Mr. Brown became at least a judge de facto. There was an executive order making the appointment, and a commission was delivered to him which, on its face, authorized him to discharge all the duties of this office; and, in our opinion, until it has been judicially determined, upon proper proceedings for the purpose, that he has no right to exercise the functions of this office and discharge its duties, his acts as judge are valid. At any rate, their validity cannot be called into question collaterally. He stands as any other person exercising the functions of office under a commission from the proper source, until that commission has been declared void. In thus disposing of the plea to the jurisdiction we stand upon safe ground, and no good reason requires us to enter upon a discussion and decision of the question as to whether or not the appointment was absolutely legal and proper. Indeed, as already above intimated, we have gone a step further than the plaintiff in error, from his standpoint, had any right to ask, in entertaining this case at all.

2. The court charged: "While drunkenness is no excuse for crime, it is a fact which may be proven, as any other fact, to throw light upon other facts or circumstances in the case." Error was assigned on this charge upon the ground that there was nothing in the evidence to authorize it. The accused did not admit the alleged act of larceny, and set up drunkenness as an excuse for the same, but insisted that he did not commit the act at all, and endeavored to show that, because of drunkenness, he was physically unable to commit the larceny at the time it was perpetrated. Still, we do not think that giving this charge was error. The accused sought, by endeavoring to prove he was drunk, to show that an inference of his guilt could not fairly be drawn from the evidence introduced by the state; and while he did not set up drunkenness as an excuse, literally, for an admitted act on his part, he did, in the manner stated, set it up as a defense in the case. The court, in referring to this subject, might, under the circumstances, have used more apt and appropriate language, but we are entirely satisfied the jury were not misled, and that no injury resulted to the accused from this instruction.

3. Upon the merits, this was an exceedingly weak case. The evidence was barely sufficient to authorize a conviction, and the judge might very properly have granted a new trial. Inasmuch as he did not, but, on the contrary, approved the finding, this court will not depart from its established rule in such cases by ordering the verdict to be set aside. Judgment affirmed.

HAINES et ux. v. FORT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 20, 1893.)

COVENANTS OF WARRANTY—BREACH OF—EVICTION.

1. Section 2706a of the Code, as qualified by the constitution and statutes of this state with reference to the separate estates of married women, has no application to a sale by a married woman of land to which she herself has title, in whole or in part. This section applies only in cases of sales by the husband of land belonging to him, in which the wife has an interest because of the marriage relation; as, for instance, the right of dower in land to which the husband derived title by virtue of the marriage.

2. Where a married woman joins her husband in a conveyance of realty, the presumption, in the absence of proof to the contrary, is that she had, or claimed, title to the realty, in whole or in part.

3. Upon the trial of an action for breach of warranty of land, eviction of the plaintiff under paramount title is not sustained by mere proof that he was sued in ejectment, that a verdict and judgment were rendered against him, and that he surrendered possession in obedience to the judgment, there being no evidence that his warrantor had any notice of the ejectment suit, or any opportunity to defend it, and none as to the title under which the plaintiff was ejected, or the time when that title originated.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Johnson county; R. L. Gamble, Judge.

Action by Arthur P. Fort against A. I. Haines and wife to recover for breach of warranty. There was verdict for plaintiff, and, from an order denying a new trial, defendants bring error. Reversed.

Harris & Rawlings, W. R. Daley, and J. M. Stubbs, for plaintiffs in error. A. F. Daley and Evans & Evans, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Fort brought an action against Haines and wife to recover damages for a breach of warranty in the sale of land by reason of his eviction under an alleged paramount title. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and, the defendants' motion for a new trial being overruled, they excepted. The first and second grounds of the motion, which complained that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence, will be dealt with in the last division of this opinion.

1. The third ground of the motion alleges as error the admission in evidence of the deed from Haines and wife to the plaintiff, for the breach of the covenant of warranty in which the action was brought. The objection to the deed was that it was void as to Mrs. Haines, she not having executed it in accordance with the requirements of section 2706a of the Code, which reads as follows: "Where a feme covert has, or may have, any right in part or the whole of any lands and tenements to be conveyed, and the said feme covert willingly consents to part with her right by becoming a party with her husband in the sale of such lands and tenements, in such cases as these the said feme covert shall become a party with her husband in the deed or conveyance, and sign and seal the same, before an officer authorized to attest deeds, declaring before said officer that she has joined with her husband in the alienation of said lands and tenements of her own free will and consent, without any compulsion or force used by her said husband to oblige her to do so; which declaration shall be made in the following words, or words to the like effect, viz.: 'I, A. B., the wife of C. D., do declare that I have freely, and without any compulsion, signed, sealed, and delivered the above instrument of writing, passed between D. E. and C. D., and I do hereby renounce all title or claim of dower that I might claim or be entitled to after the death of C. D., my said husband, to or out of the lands or tenements therein conveyed. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal.' And the said officer shall indorse upon the deed the acknowledgment of the said feme covert made before him, and sign the same." It has already been settled by this court that since the time when, under the constitution and statutes of this state, the property of married women became vested in them as their separate estates, the act of 1760 (embodied in the above-quoted section) has no application to a sale by a married woman of land belonging to her in her own right. See Brown v. Kimbrough, 55 Ga. 41, holding that the act in question applies only to such conveyances of real estate by the husband of the feme covert as she may have an interest in, and not to conveyances of her separate property of which she is the owner. The same principle is ruled in Wynn v. Ficklen, 54 Ga. 529. Almost the identical question made in the case at bar was decided by this court in Amos v. Cosby, 74 Ga. 793, in which it was held that "where a homestead was set apart to a man as the head of a family consisting of his wife and minor children, and the husband and the wife jointly conveyed it by warranty deed, in a subsequent suit on the warranty the wife was not relieved from liability on the ground that she was a married woman." On page 795, Justice Blandford says: "Nor is Mrs. Amos relieved by reason of her being a married woman. She had the right to make the deed with her husband. There having been a homestead set apart to her husband, under the act of 1868 she was a usee, and was not the surety of her husband, and is equally bound with him." It is not necessary to cite the numerous decisions of this court establishing the general rule that, as to her separate estate, a married woman is to be treated as a feme sole. Nor is it necessary to note here the exceptions to this rule. The act of 1760 is applicable only in cases of sales by the husband of his own lands, in which the wife has an interest because of the marriage relation, but in which she has no title. An example of this kind is presented by the case of Seabrook v. Brady, 47 Ga. 650, cited in Brown v. Kimbrough, supra, on page 43. It does not, in the present case, appear from the deed of Haines and wife to Fort, or otherwise, that Mrs. Haines had, or claimed, title to the land therein described as the sole owner of the same; but there seems to be no doubt whatever that she undertook to convey as owner of the property, either in whole or in part, and in principle it is entirely immaterial which may be true. An interest, by virtue of the marital relation, in land owned by the husband, is quite a different thing from ownership on the part of the wife, either total or partial. What we mean to hold is that when the wife sells and conveys as owner, whether the property belongs to her alone or to her jointly with another person, the act of 1760 does not apply.

2. The fact that Mrs. Haines joined her husband in the conveyance of the land to Fort certainly raises the presumption that she had, or at least claimed to have, title to the land, in whole or in part; and, in the absence of any proof or explanation to the contrary, this presumption must be accepted as the actual truth of the matter. This proposition is too obvious to require elaboration.

3. Up to this point we have found nothing which would require the granting of a new trial, but, in our opinion, the plaintiff's case broke down upon its actual merits. After showing a conveyance to himself by the defendants, he merely proved that an action of ejectment was brought against him by another claiming the land, that in this action a verdict and judgment were rendered adversely to him, and that he surrendered possession of the property in obedience to this judgment. He utterly failed to show that his warrantors had any notice of this ejectment suit or any opportunity to defend it. There was no positive proof that he was evicted under a title paramount to that he received from Haines and his wife; and, in the absence of notice to them of the ejectment suit, there was no presumption to this effect against them. On the contrary, the burden was upon Fort to show affirmatively that the title under which he was evicted was paramount. The rule is thus stated in Martindale on Conveyancing. (section 170:) "But if the grantee purchases an outstanding title, or yields to an adverse claimant without standing suit or being sued, (unless, in case of a suit, he give notice to his grantor of the suit, so that he may defend it,) the burden of proof is upon such grantee to show that the adverse title was good, and that the possession was surrendered only after claim or demand thereof." See, also, the cases there cited. Gragg v. Richardson, 25 Ga. 566, though not precisely similar to the case before us as to the facts, sustains the principle here announced; and the identical question is ruled in Clements v. Collins, 59 Ga. 124. There is absolutely no proof in the record as to the nature of the title under which Fort was evicted, or as to the time that title originated. For aught that appears to the contrary, he may himself, after purchasing the land from Haines and wife, have conveyed it to another, and have been evicted upon suit by the latter, based on his own conveyance. We do not, of course, mean to assert this to be the fact: but the supposition that such might be the case serves most aptly to illustrate the soundness of the rule we have here laid down. On the whole, the plaintiff failed to make out a case entitling him to recover. The verdict was accordingly contrary to law and the evidence, and should be set aside. Judgment reversed.

MATHEWS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 20, 1893.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—LICENSES—WHO AUTHORIZED TO ISSUE.

1. The act of 1879 (Acts 1878-79, p. 334) which confers upon the commissioners of roads and revenues of Putnam county exclusive jurisdiction in fixing the amount of the license for the sale of spirituous liquors, and which, after conferring powers touching the road laws, declares that the commissioners "shall exercise such other powers as are granted by the Code of the state" to the justices of the inferior court, or to that court, with the restriction that they shall have no jurisdiction save and except such as pertains to county matters, invests the commissioners with power to grant or refuse licenses to retail spirituous liquors in the county specified; the Code referred to being that which was of force when the constitution of 1868 was ratified, and which, in section 1432, (Irwin's Rev. Code,) vested this power in the justices of that court. By the general law of 1890. (Acts 1890-91, vol. 1, p. 128,) a license to sell in any quantity is requisite, and power to grant the same is lodged with the same officer or officers having power to grant licenses to retail.

2. The jurisdiction to grant such licenses in Putnam county being exclusively in the commissioners of roads and revenues, and the authorities of no town or city in that county having any power over the subject, an indictment for unlawfully selling spirituous liquors in that county, which negatives the granting of any license by the commissioners, is sufficient, without making any reference to the corporate authorities of any town or city.

3. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in overruling the certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Putnam county; W. F. Jenkins, Judge.

Pomp Mathews was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, and brings error. Affirmed.

H. A. Jenkins and Harrison & Peeples, for plaintiff in error. H. G. Lewis, Sol. Gen., Hines, Shubrick & Felder, and J. S. Turner, for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. The act of 1879 creating a board of commissioners of roads and revenues for Putnam county, and defining its powers and duties, which act is cited in the first headnote, confers upon the commissioners exclusive jurisdiction in "fixing the amount of the license for the sale of spirituous liquors." By section 5 of this act it is also declared "that said commissioners shall have the same power of appointing road commissioners, and enforcing the road laws, the justices of the inferior court had by the Code of this state, prior to the ratification of the constitution of eighteen hundred and sixty-eight of this state, and shall exercise such other powers as are granted by the Code of the state to said justices, or said court, or are indispensable to their jurisdiction; and shall have no jurisdiction, save and except such as pertains to county matters." In order, therefore, to determine whether or not the act in question conferred upon the commissioners of Putnam county the power to grant or refuse licenses to retail spirituous liquors in that county, it is necessary to inquire whether or not, under the Code in force prior to the ratification of the constitution of 1868, the justices of the inferior court, or that court, had this power, and, if so, whether or not the exercise of it pertained to a "county matter." The first inquiry admits of no difficulty. Section 1432 of Irwin's Revised Code, which is the Code above referred to, distinctly provides that "persons, before obtaining license to retail spirituous liquors, must apply to the justices of the inferior court of the county in which they desire to retail, who have the power to grant or refuse such application." The jurisdiction in question, therefore, undoubtedly belonged to the justices of the inferior court. Now, did the subject-matter of that jurisdiction fall within what were termed "county matters?" We think it did. It is true that in section 346 of the Code above mentioned, which conferred upon the inferior court, when sitting for county purposes, jurisdiction over various matters, no reference is made to the subject of granting liquor licenses; but an examination of sections 4052 to 4064, inclusive, with reference to the sessions, adjournments, and proceedings of the inferior court when sitting for county purposes, will show that section 346 is not exhaustive of the powers of this court when thus sitting. Section 4057 provides that the "court may hear and determine all matters over which the law gives the justices jurisdiction." We have already seen that they had jurisdiction over the question of granting or refusing licenses to retail spirituous liquors, and it requires no argument to prove that this particular matter, as distinguished from the trial of causes and the transaction of business coming before the court when in judicial session, is necessarily a "county matter." Our conclusion, therefore, is that under the act of 1879, first above mentioned, the commissioners of Putnam county had the power to grant or refuse such licenses. Under section 1419 of the present Code the jurisdiction to grant retail liquor licenses is conferred upon the ordinary; and it was contended by the state that by the act of December 22, 1884, (Acts 1884-85, p. 42,) this jurisdiction was conferred upon the board of commissioners of roads and revenues in counties where such boards had been established by law. It was replied that the act last mentioned was unconstitutional because it failed to describe, in the manner required by the constitution, the amendments sought to be made to the section of the Code therein referred to, and that this act was not relieved of this defect because of its recognition by the subsequent act of October 16, 1885, (Id. p. 59.) We deem it unnecessary to enter into any discussion either as to the constitutionality of the first of these acts, or as to their effect, considered together, upon the section of the Code last mentioned, because the act of December 24, 1890, to regulate the sale of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors in this state, relieves the matter of all difficulty. See Acts 1890-91, vol. 1, p. 128. By the plain terms of this act it is requisite, in order to lawfully sell spirituous liquors in any quantity, to obtain a license, and such license must be obtained "from the authorities now authorized by law to grant licenses for the sale of such liquors by retail." We have seen that the local act for Putnam county, without reference to section 1419 of the Code, or the above-recited acts amendatory of the same, authorized the commissioners of that county to grant retail licenses, and consequently the general law of 1890 confers upon them the authority to grant licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors in any quantity, as this enactment also provides that "the laws now in force in this state with reference to the granting of license to retail dealers in spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, in the several counties, and the penalties attached for the violation of the same, are hereby made applicable to dealers who sell in any quantity whatever." Consequently, it was, at the time Mathews is charged with having sold spirituous liquors in Putnam county, a misdemeanor to do so without a license from the board of commissioners of that county.

2. There is, in Putnam county, no incorporated city, town, or village except Eatonton, and its charter does not confer upon the authorities thereof any jurisdiction to grant liquor licenses. So far, then, as Putnam county is concerned, this jurisdiction is vested solely and exclusively in the county board of commissioners, and consequently, without a license from them, it would be unlawful and indictable to sell spirituous liquors even in Eatonton. It was therefore sufficient for the indictment against Mathews for unlawfully selling spirituous liquors in Putnam county simply to negative the granting to him of a license by the commissioners, and there was no occasion to make any reference in the indictment to the corporate authorities of any town or city. It would be otherwise if, in the county of Putnam, there was a town or city whose authorities had the power to grant such licenses, because, if that were so, every allegation in the indictment might be true, and yet the accused would be guilty of no offense, provided the selling by him was in such a town or city, and under a proper and regular license from its municipal government. There being, however, no such town or city in Putnam county, the allegations of the indictment before us could not possibly be true without making the accused guilty of the offense charged. Hence, we think the indictment, as to this question, was sufficient.

3. The evidence fully warranted the verdict, and this court is unable to say that the court below erred in overruling the certiorari. Judgment affirmed.

DOSTER v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 20, 1893.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—ILLEGAL SALES—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. As ruled in Mathews v. State, (this term,) 18 S. E. 996, the authority to grant licenses to sell spirituous liquors in Putnam county is vested exclusively in the commissioners of roads and revenues of that county.

2. Delivery, whether made by the seller or his employe, if requisite to complete a sale the contract for which, with payment of the purchase price, was made elsewhere, is contrary to law if the seller has no license authorizing him to sell in the county where the delivery takes place. In such case the sale is to be treated as made, not where the contract was entered into, and the purchase money paid, but where it was completed by delivery.

3. The propounding of a leading question to a witness is no cause for a new trial, especially when the answer is harmless.

4. It is the duty of the presiding judge to instruct the jury substantially in the terms of the statute, touching the prisoner's statement, when he makes a statement, and in no case should this be omitted; but where the statement is entirely silent touching one of the transactions covered by the evidence for the state, and the proof as to that transaction is uncontroverted and sufficient to warrant and uphold the conviction, the omission will not require a new trial. If, after giving the prisoner the full benefit of his statement by allowing it to outweigh all the evidence opposing it, or which it opposes, the verdict is correct, it may be left to stand.

5. There was no error in overruling the certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Putnam county; W. F. Jenkins, Judge.

J. M. Doster was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, and brings error. Affirmed.

H. A. Jenkins, Calvin George, and Harrison & Peeples, for plaintiff in error. H. G. Lewis, Sol. Gen., Hines, Shubrick & Felder, and J. S. Turner, for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. Under the ruling in Mathews v. State, (decided this term,) 18 S. E. 996, there was no error in overruling the demurrer to the indictment. It was held in that case that the authority to grant licenses to sell spirituous liquors in Putnam county was vested exclusively in the board of commissioners of roads and revenues, and that it was a misdemeanor to sell such liquors in any quantity in that county without a license from that board.

2. In one view of the evidence introduced by the state, the jury were warranted in finding that the accused, whose place of business was in Morgan county, had in that county bargained to one Tom Davis a quantity of whisky at a price agreed upon and paid; that the whisky so contracted for was not separated from the general stock of the accused, or delivered to Davis, but it was understood between the parties that the same was to be sent by express to Davis in Eatonton, which place was in Putnam county; that the delivery was not, however, made in the manner contemplated by the parties, but that afterwards one Bob O'Neill, an employe of the accused in his barroom, took the whisky to Putnam county, and there delivered it to Davis in person. Had the whisky been delivered to the express company, which was a common carrier, it would have been a constructive delivery to the purchaser, Davis, and therefore the sale would have been complete in Morgan county; but, as the delivery was not thus made, but in the manner above stated, the sale was never consummated in Morgan county, and only became complete when Davis received the whisky in Eatonton. Therefore, according to the principle laid down in Bagby v. State, 82 Ga. 786, 9 S. E. 721, the sale, in contemplation of law, took place in Putnam county. This, in substance, though not in the clearest terms, the trial court charged. In the charge as given we see no error requiring a new trial.

3. The third headnote presents nothing requiring comment.

4. The fourth headnote succinctly, but with sufficient clearness, states the duty of the trial judge in reference to charging concerning the prisoner's statement. In the performance of this duty the judge should never fail to instruct the jury that they may believe the statement in preference to the sworn testimony in the case. The omission to do so, however, will not, in every case, render necessary the grant of a new trial. The present case affords an instance of this kind. Two witnesses swore positively they had purchased whisky from the accused in Putnam county. In his statement he denied the truth of their testimony. A third witness (his own employe above mentioned) testified concerning the sale to Tom Davis, discussed in a previous division of this opinion. In his statement the accused made no reference whatever to the testimony of this latter witness, which was, of itself, sufficient to warrant a conviction. Therefore, giving the prisoner the full benefit of his statement by allowing it to outweigh and overcome the testimony of both of the two witnesses first above referred to, there would still be left uncontroverted evidence sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty. On the supposition that the jury utterly rejected the testimony of the first two witnesses, (and this is certainly conceding to the accused all he is entitled to,) enough was left to support a conviction, and we therefore do not feel constrained to set it aside.

5. It appears from the foregoing that the verdict of guilty was warranted by the evidence, and, no error of law having been committed by the trial judge which would authorize the grant of a new trial, his judgment overruling the certiorari must stand. Judgment affirmed.

DAVIS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 20, 1893.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALES BY DRUGGIST.

1. The question raised by the demurrer in this case is ruled in Mathews v. State, (this term,) 18 S. E. 997.

2. A druggist who has no license to sell spirituous liquors cannot knowingly sell them for use as a beverage, even after they are compounded with other ingredients into medicines; and where the evidence clearly shows that he must have known the purchasers bought them for consumption as a beverage, and for the sake of their intoxicating property, it was not reversible error for the court to charge the jury that "the party selling must use an ordinary degree of caution and diligence in ascertaining for what purpose they [the medicines] are wanted."

3. The evidence was sufficient to warrant the verdict, and there was no error in overruling the certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Putnam county; W. F. Jenkins, Judge.

Alf Davis was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, and brings error. Affirmed.

H. A. Jenkins and Harrison & Peeples, for plaintiff in error. H. G. Lewis, Sol. Gen., Hines, Shubrick & Felder, and J. S. Turner, for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. The question raised by the demurrer in this case was discussed and ruled in the case of Mathews v. State, (this term,) 18 S. E. 997.

2. A druggist who has no license to sell spirituous liquors certainly cannot knowingly sell them for use as a beverage, notwithstanding they may have been compounded with other ingredients into medicines. To do so is plainly and squarely a violation of our statutes prohibiting the sale of such liquors in certain jurisdictions. It is evident that, in such cases, treating the liquors as medicines is a mere pretense to evade the law. The evidence in this case shows that parties were in the habit of going to the drug store of the accused, and buying "tincture of ginger" and "cherry bitters," composed largely of alcohol, at 10 cents a drink, and also by the bottle, and then treating each other out of the quantity purchased. It must, therefore, have been obvious to the accused that these parties were not purchasing these compounds, in good faith, as medicines. Certainly, it would be a singular coincidence if several persons should become similarly sick at the same time, and require precisely the same treatment for their ailments; and the idea of sick people going to a drug store in crowds, and treating each other to a medicine at 10 cents a drink, is unique in the extreme. Among other things, the court charged the jury that "the party selling must use an ordinary degree of caution and diligence in ascertaining for what purpose they [the medicines] are wanted." Abstractly, this may not be an entirely correct presentation of the law applicable; but, if erroneous, it would not, in the present case, require, or even justify, the granting of a new trial, because it is plainly apparent that the accused, under the pretense of selling medicines, was really selling intoxicating liquors, and it is quite certain that he knew the purchasers were buying and using the liquors, not in good faith for use as medicines, but solely for the sake of their intoxicating properties. This being so, his conduct amounted to an open and inexcusable violation of the law prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors without a license. The charge complained of was certainly as favorable to him as he had any right to expect under the evidence, and, even if erroneous, did him no injury.

3. The evidence disclosed the above state of facts beyond question. The verdict of guilty was unquestionably proper, and the court below did right in declining to sustain the certiorari. Judgment affirmed.

SIMMONS v. EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 6, 1893.)

INJURIES TO EMPLOYE—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

If, by reason of the negligence of a railway company, a collision of its trains becomes imminent, and an employe upon one of them, whose life is consequently exposed, is prompted by the conductor to run forward over intervening cars to give warning to the engineer, and in so doing, without imprudence or negligence on his own part, falls and is injured, the company is liable to compensate him in damages. In such case the negligence, whatever it may have been, which occasioned the perilous situation, is not too remote, provided a collision of the company's trains was so imminent as to render the conduct of the employe necessary and proper, under all the circumstances of the occasion; and whether it was so or not is a question of fact for the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by C. W. Simmons against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company for personal injuries. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

P. L. Mynatt and Mynatt & Willcoxon, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. It appears from the declaration that the plaintiff, while on the defendant's train, where he was employed as a brakeman, was placed in a position of imminent peril by the conduct of the engineer in not turning the engine into a switch, and in going forward without slackening speed, when another train from an opposite direction was due and about to meet this train; that the conductor of the train the plaintiff was on, becoming alarmed at this, attempted to signal to the engineer with a lantern, and directed the plaintiff to do the same thing, and he did so, but their lanterns went out, and the only means of communicating with the engineer and stopping the train was for some one to run forward on the cars to the engine and tell the engineer to stop; that the conductor shouted excitedly and repeatedly to the plaintiff to run forward and do this, saying, "Go, go! go quick! we will hit before you can get there."—whereupon the plaintiff ran with the greatest possible speed from one car to another towards the engine, in order to avoid the apprehended collision, but while passing over a coal car he lost his footing, and fell over a large lump of coal, injuring himself severely in the manner alleged in the declaration,—all of which, it is alleged, was caused by the negligence and improper conduct of the defendant; the negligence being alleged to consist in the engineer's allowing his train to get behind the schedule time, and in not turning the train into the switch, but passing on, when he knew, or ought to have known, that the other train was due there. We think the court below erred in holding that the declaration does not set forth a cause of action. The case is within the principle of the decisions which authorize a recovery where one jumps from a train to save himself under circumstances of imminent danger, and is injured. According to the declaration the plaintiff found himself in a position of great peril, and this peril was brought about by the negligence of the engineer, the emergency having been precipitated by the latter's failure to turn the train into the switch when he ought to have done so. The alleged negligence in being behind time counts for nothing, for it cannot be regarded as a direct cause of the emergency. The case must stand or fall upon the allegation of negligence in passing the switch. In this emergency two modes of avoiding the impending danger were before the plaintiff,—one to jump from the train, and the other to run forward to the engine and stop it. The peril of the situation, and the necessity for instant action in the mode adopted, were impressed and urged upon him by the conduct and commands of his superior officer, the conductor in charge of the train. If he had jumped from the train to avoid a collision, and had been injured in so doing, and if the danger which led him to jump was brought about by the negligence of the defendant's engineer, and was so imminent as to render his conduct necessary and proper under all the circumstances of the occasion, he would be entitled to damages. See Railroad Co. v. Paulk, 24 Ga. 356; Railroad Co. v. Crosby, 74 Ga. 738, 748, et seq.; and see the leading case of Jones v. Boyce, 1 Starkie, 493; also, Beach, Contrib. Neg. (2d Ed.) §§ 40, 42; Patt. Ry. Acc. Law, (1st Ed.) 14. And the principle is the same if, for the same reason, instead of jumping to the ground, he jumps, so to speak, to another part of the train, the difference being that in the one case he resorts to flight, and in the other to prevention, as the mode of escape. See Railroad Co. v. Crosby, supra, and other authorities cited. It was contended, however, that the proximate cause of the injury was the plaintiff's falling over the lump of coal, and that the alleged negligence did not contribute to his fall; and it is sought to analogize the case to that of Railway Co. v. Suddeth, 86 Ga. 388, 12 S. E. 682, where a brakeman in the course of his duty, while passing over cars loaded with ore, stepped upon a piece of ore, which turned his foot, precipitating him from the car. It was there said that, prima facie, such an occurrence is a mere accident, and that such casualties pertain to the risks of the service in which the person injured was engaged. In that case, however, there was no act of negligence on the part of the defendant which led to the plaintiff's passing over the ore. The risks which an employe assumes by entering the service of the railroad company do not embrace the risk of another employe's negligence, which he is not bound to anticipate; and if the negligence of the engineer in this case placed the plaintiff in imminent danger, and it was to escape this that he passed over the coal car, thus encountering a risk which he would not otherwise be compelled to encounter, that negligence was just as much the cause of his injury as it would have been if he had adopted the alternative of jumping to the ground, and in doing so had fallen on a lump of coal or any other object that might happen to be in the way. The principle which governs in such cases is stated by Judge Thompson, in his work on Negligence, thus: "If the negligence of B. compels A. to adopt a particular course which he would not have adopted but for such negligence, and, in so acting with ordinary prudence, A. is injured, he may recover damages from B." 2 Thomp. Neg. (1st Ed.) 1092. The negligence, whatever it may have been, which occasioned the perilous situation, is not too remote if a collision was so imminent as to render the conduct of the plaintiff necessary and proper, under all the circumstances of the occasion; and whether this was so or not was a question for the jury. Judgment reversed.

NAVASSA GUANO CO. v. COMMERCIAL GUANO CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 8, 1894.)

INTERPRETATION OF CONTRACT.

Where, by the terms of a plain and unambiguous written contract, one party purchased from another a certain and designated pile of fertilizer in bulk, the same being then stored in a named warehouse, and "estimated to be 253½ tons, more or less," the contract stipulating that the purchaser should pay for the same at a specified price per ton, and that if there should be more than 253½ tons the purchaser should pay for the excess at that price, and if less than 253½ tons the seller should refund the shortage at the same rate, the purchaser was bound to pay the contract price for the entire lot, although by actual weight it proved to be 702.7 tons, it not appearing that the seller practiced any actual fraud in the representations made by him as to the quantity, and the evidence showing, as found by the judge, who tried the case without a jury, that the purchaser did not, in fact, act upon any representations made by the seller, but relied upon his own judgment as to the quantity of fertilizer in the pile.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Savannah; A. H. MacDonnell, Judge.

Action on a contract by the Navassa Guano Company against the Commercial Guano Company. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Following is the official report:

The facts of this case are sufficiently reported in the decision of Judge MacDonnell, who presided on the trial in the court below. It is as follows:

On November 9, 1891, Coleman & Ray, of Macon, Ga., entered into the following written contract with the Commercial Guano Company:

"Georgia, Bibb County. Know all men by these presents that we, Coleman & Ray, a firm composed of Robert Coleman and Bolivar Ray, of said state and county, for and in consideration of the sum of fifty-seven hundred dollars, cash in hand paid to us by the Commercial Guano Co., existing as a corporate body under the laws of said state, of the county of Chatham, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, have granted, bargained, and sold, and by these presents do grant, bargain, and sell, unto the said Commercial Guano Co., its successors and assigns, all their ammoniated fertilizers in bulk, and now stored in the guano house in the northwest corner of the warehouse of said Coleman & Ray, in the city of Macon and the county of Bibb,—said ammoniated fertilizers estimated to be 253½ tons, more or less. Should there be more than 253½ tons, the said Commercial Guano Co. to pay for all over said 253½ at the rate of $22.50 per ton, but should there be less than 253½ tons, then the said Coleman & Ray are to pay back to said Commercial Guano Co., for such shortage, at the rate of $22.50 per ton; that being the price per ton at which said fertilizer was sold. The title to which said bargained property, to the said Commercial Guano Co., its successors and assigns, we hereby warrant and defend against the claims of all other persons whatsoever, and we do further covenant with and warrant to the said Commercial Guano Co., its successors and assigns, that said bargained property is the same as made up by Coleman & Ray, and called by them "Coleman & Ray's High Grade," and guaranteed by them to run according to the standard required by the laws of this state.

"Witness our hands and seals this 9th day of November, 1891.

"Coleman & Ray. [L. S.]

"Robert Coleman. [L. S.]

"Bollivar H. Ray. [L. S.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of

"J. G. Wilburne.

"Isaac Hardeman,

"Not. Pub., Bibb Co., Ga."

The Commercial Guano Company accepted this bill of sale, and had it recorded in the clerk's office of the superior court of Bibb county. They also sacked up and carried away and paid for 265 1/5 tons of said fertilizer, but subsequently declined to accept and pay for any more of it. Coleman & Ray, being financially embarrassed, on November 28, 1891, transferred, in writing, for a valuable consideration, to another creditor, the Navassa Guano Company, all their rights under the contract, and gave it an order on the Commercial Guano Company for any and all surplus funds due for excess of guano over 253½ tons as per the contract of November 9, 1891. On November 28th the Commercial Guano Company notified Coleman & Ray for the first time that it would not accept the remainder of the fertilizer; the "more or less" meaning that there might be a few tons over or under the estimated quantity of 253½ tons. On December 18, 1891, the Navassa Guano Company notified the Commercial Guano Company that it would, after advertising, sell at public sale, on December 30, 1891, the balance of the fertilizer to the highest bidder, and hold it, the defendant, for the difference between the contract price and the market price. The sale took place as advertised, and the fertilizer was sold at $17 per ton; the agent of the Commercial Guano Company being present and bidding $16.95 per ton. The balance of fertilizer thus sold was, upon sacking and weighing, found to contain 437½ tons. The contract price having been $22.50 per ton, and the market price $17, thus making a difference of $5.50 per ton, or a total of $2,406.25, the Navassa Guano Company brought its suit against the Commercial Guano Company for this sum, with interest thereon from January 1, 1892, and also for $19.80, the cost, paid to the Macon Telegraph, a newspaper, for advertising the resale. The defendants filed their plea, alleging that they were not bound by the contract because they were induced to give their assent to it by the fraudulent misrepresentations of Coleman & Ray that the pile contained only about 250 tons, with possibly a few tons over or under, and not more.

The court was requested to construe the contract. We have experienced some difficulty in arriving at conclusions with which we are entirely satisfied. The goods are sold in bulk, and the pile is completely identified by reference to independent circumstances. The quantity sold is "estimated to be 253½ tons, more or less." Should there be more than 253½ tons, the defendant agrees to pay for all over said 253½ tons at the rate of \$22.50 per ton, but should there be less than 253½ tons, then the said Coleman & Ray are to pay back to defendant, for such shortage, at the rate of \$22.50 per ton. The consideration is thus put on a sliding scale, to adjust itself and keep pace with the possible variations from the estimated quantity; preserving, in any event, equality in this respect between the parties. The contract is clear and unambiguous. The trouble is between the entire pile and the estimated quantity. They are widely at variance. To which term of the contract shall be given the greater importance? Can they be harmonized? If not, which should prevail? The words, "estimated to be 253½ tons, more or less," in the bill of sale, mean that this was the mutual estimate of both parties. It amounted to an express declaration on the part of Coleman & Ray that this was their estimate, they executing the instrument; and the defendant, by accepting the bill of sale, stipulated that it was its estimate. It was thus the intention of both parties, expressed on the face of the contract. It is true that apt words express the intent of both parties, likewise, to convey the entire pile; but this is a case where we think the general intent is restrained by the particular intent. The only intent as to the measure of the quantity intended to be conveyed is contained in the estimate, and on that particular question it should be controlling. According to the great weight of the authorities, the words "more or less" are put in to allow for accidental variations that are not unreasonable. The Code (section 2642) lays down a rule of construction as to what deficiency the words "more or less," in a sale of lands, will cover. It does not depend solely on the Code. Substantially the same law is recognized in the English and American cases. It applies to sales of personalty as well as realty; to questions of excess as well as deficiency. Briefly stated, it is that a wide variance from the mutual estimate of the parties should not be allowed, but a reasonable latitude should be permitted in the performance. The exact estimate is not warranted, but only a reasonable conformity to it. In this case the mutual estimate was 253 $\frac{1}{2}$ tons, more or less. The actual amount in the pile was afterwards found to be 702 $\frac{7}{10}$ tons. The excess over the estimate amounted to 449 $\frac{1}{2}$ tons. One of the witnesses characterized this as "a horrible excess." We think it is so great that some willful deception or gross mistake is suggested to the mind by a mere comparison of that amount with the estimate. We cannot think that the parties, by the use of the words "more or less," contemplated or intended such a wide variation from the mutual estimate as this. The decision in the case of Brawley v. U. S., 96 U. S. 168, to the effect that, in such cases, the goods being identified by independent circumstances, the contract applies to the specific lot, and the naming of the quantity is not regarded in the nature of a warranty, but only as an estimate of the probable amount, in reference to which good faith is all that is required of the party making it, is high authority, and seems against the views we entertain. But is there no limit to its application? Shall it hold in cases where the excess shocks the reason? To do so would be to violate the rule which looks to the whole contract in arriving at the construction of any part, and which prefers to uphold a contract in whole and in every part. Why deliberately insert an estimate of the quantity in the contract, if no effect is to be given to it? A sale of the pile, identified by independent circumstances, silent as to quantity, would effectuate this intention as well. The more just and liberal rule of construction is that followed by the Code of Georgia where the deficiency is gross. The words "more or less" will not cover such deficiency, or, by like reasoning, such an excess. Even the rule in Brawley v. U. S. requires good faith in reference to the estimate of the probable amount from the party making it. Why should not equal good faith be required of them in conforming to the estimate, especially where, as in the present case, it was in the power of Coleman & Ray to do so? We think it bad faith in them to depart from it, and to endeavor to force upon defendant the gross excess over the estimate expressed in the instrument. If these views are correct, we think that the defendant has reasonably complied with its contract in accepting and paying for 265 $\frac{1}{3}$ tons of the fertilizer, and cannot be required to accept or to pay for the balance of the excess, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. We realize, however, that the supreme court, in its wisdom, may adhere more stringently to the rule of construction laid down in the case of Brawley v. U. S., and subordinate the estimated quantity to the other important intention expressed,—that of conveying "all their ammoniated fertilizer in bulk," etc., as identified by reference to the independent circumstances; in which event the defendant would be held bound to take and pay for the contents of the entire pile. If that construction should be followed, it would necessitate an examination into the defense set up in the pleadings; and, in order to facilitate as far as we can the final adjudication of the rights of the parties, we will next consider such defense.

The issue made by the pleadings, that the contract was induced by the fraudulent misrepresentations by Coleman & Ray, raises questions that are to be determined by the evidence. Is it true that such misrepresentations were made, and that they were the considerations which caused the defendant to enter into the written contract? The first intention of defendant undoubtedly was, not to buy fertilizers, but to take from Coleman & Ray, their debtors, so much only of the fertilizers as would pay their debt of \$5,700, at \$22.50 per ton, the agreed value, to do which 253 $\frac{1}{2}$ tons would have been sufficient; Coleman & Ray being in failing circumstances, and these being the only assets in their hands available for such settlement. This proposition was made by Coleman & Ray, and accepted by defendant. Under this agreement it would have been immaterial to defendant how much more the pile contained after taking out their 253 $\frac{1}{2}$ tons. But it must have been apparent that the pile contained more. The debtors being in failing circumstances, other creditors might levy upon the pile to satisfy their debts, and the defendants be put to expense, delay, and annoyance in having to file claims and sustain litigation. After consultation with their legal counsel, in which these contingencies were discussed and considered, defendant, to obviate such difficulties, came to the distinct second intention of acquiring title to the entire pile, and so notified Coleman & Ray that it would buy all or none. The contract was then written, or dictated, by defendant's own attorney. Col. Isaac Hardeman, who remembers that Huger said there was not much more than the 253 $\frac{1}{2}$ tons in it,—there might be a little more or a little less,—and whose understanding was that Huger was buying the entire pile, upon the terms and conditions stated in the bill of sale. It is contended by defendant that it would never have entered into such an agreement if Mr. Coleman had not repeatedly asserted that the pile contained only about 250 tons, with possibly a few tons over or a few tons under. In the language of Mr. Battey, "If we had known for one instant that there was such a horrible excess, we would not have made it." It is admitted, in plaintiff's amended declaration, that Coleman "said in his opinion there was about 250 tons, perhaps more and perhaps less, and he did not know how much was there." Coleman, in his testimony, admits that he did tell Battey and Huger repeatedly that there were 250 tons in there, and that he told them to the best of his knowledge; that he did think there were 250 tons there, and that he was honest in that; that he could not tell, as Mr. Wilburne (the bookkeeper) kept the books. These are strong admissions. The statements necessarily conveyed the impression that, in Coleman's opinion, this was about the true amount, and it proceeded from one who ought to have known the truth. Was it an innocent statement? It seems incredible that this debtor could have been in failing circumstances, and had on hand in daily sight such a valuable asset as this,—a mixture which he had himself compiled, worth about \$15,444, or, deducting 250 tons, still worth, at \$22.50 per ton, \$10,162.66,—and yet be in utter ignorance of it; still it is not impossible that such might have been the case. The very fact that they were in failing circumstances might indicate that the business was conducted carelessly. In either event, however, whether the statement was made knowingly and willfully, with intent to deceive, or by mistake and innocently, it would still be a fraud (Code, § 3174) if it was acted on by the opposite party, and would furnish good ground for annulling or apportioning the contract. Nor do we see much in the suggestion that the subsequent statement of Ray, that he thought there was in the neighborhood of 500 tons in the pile, could offset the reiterations of Coleman. They would still have the right to act on Coleman's representations. "All the partners are responsible to innocent third persons for damages arising from the fraud of one partner in matters relating to the partnership." Code, § 1915. Both would be misleading as to the true quantity, and the firm would be bound for that statement which made most strongly against it, provided it was acted upon by the opposite party.

And this brings us to another question. Assuming that there was such misrepresentation, was it, in fact, acted upon? Did it determine the conduct of the defendant in entering into the contract? The Code seems to regard this as essential (sections 2634, 3174) to afford ground of relief. To the same effect, Tied. Sales, § 161: "It is also necessary, to constitute ground for the charge of fraud, that the deceit should be successful, in that the party intended to be influenced actually relied upon the misrepresentation. If the other party did not rely upon the misrepresentation, but was induced by other considerations to make the contract, then he was not deceived, and he could not afterwards secure a release from the contract on the ground of fraud in the negotiation, for he was not defrauded." We have already seen that the defendant desired to get title to the entire pile, to avoid the annoyance and delay of having to contest with the claims of other creditors who might levy upon the pile, and that, after consultation with counsel on the subject, they desired and asked for a sale of all or none. Huger was the secretary, treasurer, and general manager of the defendant, the Commercial Guano Company. Did he rely on his own judgment as to the quantity in making the contract? The evidence is conflicting. He had been in the business of manufacturing fertilizers eight or nine years. Battey had been connected with the business, either as salesman or local agent, for fourteen years. They had considerable experience in fertilizers. Both had examined the pile before the bill of sale was drawn up. Battey and Huger, on the witness stand, assert that they went on what Coleman said; Wilburne and Ray are positive that Huger relied upon his own experience and judgment, even after they had expressed to him their opinion that there was much more than 250 tons in the pile,—Ray claiming that he said he thought there was double that quantity, or in the neighborhood of 500 tons. Battey and Huger deny that they heard any such statement. Col. Hardeman's testimony coincides with that of Ray and Wilburne. We think his testimony is entitled to special weight. He is a disinterested witness, was attorney for defendant in the transaction, dictated the bill of sale, and was present during the negotiations immediately preceding its execution. The other conflicting witnesses are, as far as we know, equally credible and intelligent. It is of course difficult always to read one's mind, and tell with accuracy what influences or controls it in a given action. In this case, Huger says he asked Coleman repeatedly,—he may have asked him 20 times,—how much was in the pile, and he kept on saying there were about 250 tons. A pertinent inquiry would be, why, if Coleman's statement was at all definite and reliable, or in the nature of a warranty, would not one answer have sufficed? Also, he asked Coleman & Ray to get their books and estimate to ascertain how much crude stuff went into the pile, and how much had been taken out; but they would not help him. Why the anxiety to get at the quantity in other ways, if he was relying on Coleman's statement? The plain inference seems to be that Coleman's statements were too indefinite and unsubstantial to be acted upon. Huger's letter of November 28, 1891, to Coleman & Ray confirms this. This letter was written not three weeks after the negotiations, when his recollection of the transaction was fresh. It was the first letter repudiating liability for the excess of fertilizers. His language was probably guarded, and his words weighed, because he had then been notified of the transfer of the contract to plaintiff, and a lawsuit was in prospect. In this letter he writes: "As a matter of fact, you [Coleman & Ray] would not help the writer in any way to estimate the number of tons, stating you knew nothing about it." The conclusions to be drawn from this letter, and which seem inevitable, are—First, that Coleman & Ray did disclaim all knowledge as to the actual number of tons in the pile; second, that whatever representations were in fact made by them, they did not assist Huger in any way, and were not relied upon by him in making up his mind; and, third, having been denied help from them in forming his estimate, he was thrown back upon his own judgment, and he did, in fact, rely and act solely upon his own experience, judgment, and responsibility. This letter, we think, exonerates Coleman & Ray from any responsibility for Huger's conduct. We think that, by the preponderance of the evidence, he appears to have been influenced by other considerations,—by his own estimate, by the necessity for prompt action, by the desire to collect a debt and at the same time avoid complications,—and in the absence of accurate knowledge of the quantity, having sought it from them and failed to get it, but believing it to be in the neighborhood of 253½ tons, he voluntarily took a bill of sale of the entire pile, "estimated to be 253½ tons, more or less," as the best thing to be done under all the circumstances, instead of a bill of sale of the exact amount to settle his debt, as he could have done. We therefore find that the defendant's plea is not sustained. Our views, however, on the whole case are controlled by the construction we have put upon the contract, and the effect to be given to the words "estimated to be 253½ tons, more or less," and we think that the defendant, in accepting and paying for 265½ tons under the contract, has reasonably complied with it, and that more cannot be required of it. Wherefore it is considered, ordered, and decreed by the court that judgment be rendered in favor of the defendant, with costs of suit.

Fleming & Alexander and Erwin, Du Bignon & Chisholm, for plaintiff in error. Charlton, Mackall & Anderson, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. This case, by consent, was tried by his honor, Judge MacDonnell, without the intervention of a jury. He rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant, and this is the main error complained of in the bill of exceptions. The opinion delivered by the trial judge is set forth in full by the reporter, and it contains all that is necessary to a clear understanding of the case. We fully agree with the judge that the contract was plain and unambiguous, and shall deal with the case upon the assumption that all his findings upon issues of fact are correct. There can, we think, be no question that this is the proper course for us to pursue. His conclusion that the Commercial Guano Company, in making, through its agents, the purchase from Coleman & Ray, did not act upon any representations made by the sellers, but that these agents relied entirely upon their own judgment as to the quantity of fertilizer in the pile, is clear and unequivocal, and undoubtedly well supported by the evidence. Upon the question whether or not the sellers, or either of them, practiced any actual fraud in the representations made by them as to quantity, the conclusion of the judge is not distinctly stated; but it is certainly fair to say he does not find that any such fraud was practiced. We are therefore authorized in saying that the existence of such fraud was not made to appear, and we think the case should be decided upon the theory that it was not proved at all. Assuming this to be true, we are constrained to hold that the learned judge erred in the conclusion he reached. We adopt as the true law of the case the doctrine laid down in Brawley v. U. S., 96 U. S. 168, cited in the judge's opinion. We do not think the doctrine of section 2642 of the Code, in relation to the sale of land, nor the various decisions of this court construing this section, applicable to the facts of this case. It must not be overlooked that the entire pile of fertilizer was bought not at a fixed total sum, but for a stated price per ton, and enforcing the contract as made gives to the purchaser precisely what he bought, and at the price agreed upon. An express provision was made in the contract for any variation in the estimated quantity; hence, there can be no legal fraud simply because there was, in fact, an excess over the quantity it was supposed the pile contained. That the defendant company did not intend, simply, to take enough fertilizer to settle its debt is conclusively shown by the fact that they agreed to take more than 253½ tons; that being the exact quantity which would have canceled their debt of $5,700, at the agreed price of $22.50 per ton. On the whole, we are satisfied that the plaintiff was entitled to a recovery, and that the judge below erred in holding otherwise. Judgment reversed.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 6, 1893.)

GARNISHMENT—CITY OFFICERS NOT SUBJECT TO—INJUNCTION.

1. For reasons of public policy, neither the chief nor any member of the municipal police of a city or town is subject to garnishment for effects which come to his hands by color of his official authority, and without the consent of the owner, whether he obtains them lawfully or unlawfully.

2. The pendency of the garnishments against the plaintiff presenting no legal reason for enjoining the action brought against him by Cooper to recover the property taken from him, and it appearing from the pleadings and evidence submitted to the judge below that the plaintiff had a complete and perfect defense by answer to each of the several garnishments, there was no error in denying the prayers for injunction and interpleader.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; M. J. Clarke, Judge.

Petition by A. B. Connolly against the Thurber-Whyland Company and others for an injunction and other relief. There was judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

From the bill of exceptions, it appears that one George Cooper, having been arrested by a policeman of the city of Atlanta on the charge of violating an ordinance, by being drunk and disorderly, was brought to the station house for keeping until his trial or release on bail; and, in accordance with the law in such case, the valuables on such person were taken in charge by the station-house keeper for safe-keeping until they should be restored to him. The articles were delivered by the station-house keeper to plaintiff, who received them as chief of police. The articles so taken from Cooper and delivered to plaintiff consisted of $421.95 in money, a promissory note for $100, a purse, a pistol, and a watch. Afterwards, and while the articles so taken from Cooper were in plaintiff's possession as chief of police, defendants herein other than Cooper, brought separate civil actions against Cooper, as principal defendant, and plaintiff herein, as garnishee. Plaintiff having refused to deliver up the articles on demand, Cooper brought an action against plaintiff for conversion. The action herein was then brought by plaintiff to restrain the action by Cooper, and to require the other defendants to interplead for the determination of the rights of the parties to the property in plaintiff's hands taken from Cooper. Plaintiff's action was dismissed on the ground that he was not liable as garnishee.

J. A. Anderson and Fulton Colville, for plaintiff in error. Culberson & Hunt, Haygood, Lovett & Plyer, Bigby, Reed, Berry & Foote, H. M. Patty, Mayson & Hill, and J. W. Cox, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. It can scarcely be doubted that, where one charged with drunkenness and disorderly conduct is arrested by a policeman in a city, it is the duty of the officer, if the prisoner is so intoxicated as to be incapable of properly caring for money or other valuables on his person, to take possession of the same, for safe-keeping, and for the purpose of restoring them to the owner upon or before his discharge from custody. This duty might also devolve upon the arresting officer, in some cases, when the prisoner was not intoxicated, as, for instance, when he was about to be confined among other prisoners who might steal from him the articles in question. In the view we take of the law applicable to the case before us, however, it is entirely immaterial whether Cooper was or was not intoxicated, or whether he was deprived of his money and other valuables lawfully or unlawfully. In neither event was the officer who first took possession of the property, or his superior officer, to whom it was afterwards delivered, liable to the process of garnishment at the instance of Cooper's creditors. In a case of this kind, the property is in custodia legis; and it is contrary to public policy that an officer of a court or of a municipal corporation be subjected to the process of garnishment, under such circumstances. See Kneel. Attachm. § 410; Mechem, Pub. Off. §§ 875, 876; Drake. Attachm. (7th Ed.) § 509b. The doctrine laid down by these text writers is supported by Morris v. Penniman, 14 Gray, 220; Bank v. McLeod, 65 Iowa, 665, 19 N. W. 329, and 22 N. W. 919; Robinson v. Howard, 7 Cush. 257. And the same conclusion is announced in 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1132-1135, under the title "Garnishment." The reason for the rule is that public corporations are created for the public benefit, and public policy demands that such bodies and their officers should not be subjected to such interruptions, inconvenience, and delay as would prevent that prompt and efficient discharge of official duties so necessary to the public welfare. In this connection, attention is called to the apt and appropriate language of Chief Justice Bleckley in Born v. Williams, 81 Ga. 798, 7 S. E. 868. A very strong case in point is that of Davies v. Gallagher, defendant, and Cassidy, garnishee, reported in 17 Phila. 229. We have not quoted from any of the authorities above cited, but any one who will take the pains to examine them cannot fail to be convinced that our judgment in the case at bar is correct. Besides the authorities above mentioned, many others to the same effect could doubtless be found. Exemption from the process of garnishment is not for the benefit of the officer, but for the benefit and protection of the public, whose interest it is that he shall not be subjected to the necessity of leaving his post of duty to answer in a proceeding in which he has no official concern. The present case affords a striking illustration of the necessity of a rule of this kind. It is obvious, without elaboration, that to attend to the numerous lawsuits now pending against Connolly, the chief of police, must necessarily require a very large portion of his time and attention, which should be devoted to the public service; and, if he were liable to garnishment in every case of this kind which might arise, it is easy to perceive that he would be subjected to constant danger of heavy personal loss, or else be forced to seriously neglect his official duties. The former would be a great hardship upon him, and the latter a serious and entirely unwarranted hardship upon the public. The policy of the law forbids that either of these things should occur. It will be observed we have not touched upon the question as to whether or not a policeman would be liable to the process of garnishment in a case where a prisoner voluntarily deposited with him money, or other valuables for safe-keeping. Nor is it necessary, in the present case, to decide this question. It distinctly appears that Cooper's property was taken from his possession without his consent, and that the taking of the same by the officer was under color of his official authority.

2. It follows conclusively from what has been said that Cooper had a plain and undoubted right to maintain the action of trover brought by him for the recovery of his property; and it has also been made apparent that Connolly, by an answer in each case simply setting forth the facts under which he came into possession thereof, had a complete and perfect defense to the several garnishment suits brought against him. Consequently, there was no good reason to enjoin the action brought by Cooper, or to require the several plaintiffs in the garnishment suits to interplead with each other; and the court was therefore right in denying the prayers in Connolly's petition for injunction and interpleader. Judgment affirmed.

FLOWERS v. FLOWERS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 20, 1893.)

ADMINISTRATION—ASSIGNMENT OF DOWER—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

1. Where commissioners appointed upon the application of a widow for dower have made their return, assigning dower in certain land, and a traverse is entered by a person who claims the land as his own, and sets up that the husband of the widow was not seised and possessed of it at the time of his death, this person, although he is the executor of the husband's estate, is not incompetent, under the evidence act of 1889, to testify on the trial of the issue thus formed, as a witness in his own behalf, as to transactions and communications with the deceased touching a sale and conveyance of the land by the latter to himself, the traverse being made in his own interest, and not in behalf of his testator's estate. In such case the proceeding is not a suit instituted or defended by the personal representative of the deceased, within the meaning of that act. The estate would not be bound by a judgment rendered in favor of the claimant, the estate being unrepresented as against his alleged title.

2. Inasmuch as the nature and extent of the right of dower was not involved in the litigation, any error of the court in charging on that abstract subject was immaterial.

3. It is error, in charging the jury, to direct their attention specially to the relevancy of a particular portion of the testimony favorable to one side, no special reference being made to any of the evidence favorable to the other side. For this reason the court erred in charging as follows: "I also charge you, in reference to this case, upon a particular branch of this testimony,—a particular portion of this testimony. As you will observe, I have charged you in reference to the testimony in general. Everything here is evidence for you to consider and to weigh; but I charge you in particular that evidence of family disturbances between the husband and wife, and between her and one or more of his children by a former marriage, is relevant. I mean it is testimony for you to consider and weigh, along with all the other testimony, and see to what conclusion it brings your mind upon the issue here as to whether this lady is entitled to her dower or not."

4. The requests to charge, in so far as they are legal, were covered by the charge of the court; and there was no error in the charge except as stated in the preceding headnote.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, De Kalb county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

To the report of commissioners appointed to assign dower to Catherine B. Flowers, George N. Flowers filed a traverse. From the judgment rendered, the executor brings error. Reversed.

Candler & Thomson, for plaintiff in error. John A. Wimpy and W. J. Speairs, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. 1. The widow of John Y. Flowers applied for dower, and the commissioners appointed to assign dower made their report, assigning to the applicant certain lands. A traverse was entered by George N. Flowers, upon the ground that John Y. was not seised and possessed, at the time of his death, of the land out of which the dower had been assigned, but that he (George N.) was the owner. George N. claimed the land under a deed made to him by John Y. in August, 1875, the consideration expressed in the deed being $5,500. Upon the trial of the issue thus made, George N. offered to testify as to the payment to John Y. of the consideration recited in the deed, and of a note made in connection therewith, and as to what was the real transaction evidenced by the deed and the note; but the court, on objection thereto, declined to allow the witness to testify as to these matters, holding that, George N. being a party to the suit, and John Y. being dead, the former was an incompetent witness as to transactions with the latter. We think the court erred in so holding. It was contended that such testimony is rendered incompetent by the evidence act of 1889, § 1, subsec. a, by which it is provided that, "where any suit is instituted or defended by * * * the personal representative of a deceased person, the opposite party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor against said * * * deceased person, as to transactions or communications with such * * * deceased person." Acts 1889, p. 85. Although this witness was a party to the case on trial, and was the executor of John Y. Flowers, and, as such, his "personal representative," the traverse was not made in his representative character, or in behalf of his testator's estate, but was made solely in his own interest; the ground of the traverse being that the land was his own, and that John Y. Flowers was not seised and possessed of it at the time of his death. Nor, on the other hand, was the estate represented as against his alleged title. In the claim of dower the widow represented herself only. The estate, therefore, would not be bound by a judgment rendered in his favor. Under these facts it is clear that the proceeding is not a suit "instituted or defended by the personal representative of the deceased," within the meaning of the statute. In the statement of facts, when the case was here before, (89 Ga. 633, 15 S. E. 834,) it was said that the traverse was made by George N. Flowers "as executor of John Y. Flowers and individually," but in the record now before us it does not appear that he either acted, or assumed to act, in this litigation as executor. As between the widow and the estate of her deceased husband, there was no dispute or litigation when the last trial of the case was had. In so far as the executor was concerned in his representative capacity, he had yielded to the widow's claim, and to the action of the commissioners. The sole issue on trial was between the widow, as one party, and George N. Flowers, in his individual capacity, as the other. There is no other provision of the statute under which the testimony offered could be held inadmissible.

2. Inasmuch as the nature and extent of the right of dower was not involved in the litigation, any error of the court in charging on that abstract subject was immaterial.

3. The following instructions of the court to the jury are complained of: "I also charge you, in reference to this case, upon a particular branch of this testimony,—a particular portion of this testimony. As you will observe, I have charged you in reference to the testimony in general. Everything here is evidence for you to consider and to weigh; but I charge you in particular that evidence of family disturbances between the husband and wife, and between her and one or more of his children by a former marriage, is relevant. I mean it is testimony for you to consider and weigh, along with all the other testimony, and see to what conclusion it brings your minds upon the issue here as to whether this lady is entitled to her dower or not." We think this was error. The main issue in the case was whether the conveyance by John Y. Flowers to George N., under which the latter claimed the land in question, was intended to pass the title absolutely and without reservation, or whether it was intended to defeat the right of the grantor's wife to dower without his parting with dominion and real ownership; and, as tending to show that the latter was the real motive and object of the conveyance, testimony was introduced by Mrs. Flowers relating to family disturbances between herself and her husband, and between her and his children by a former marriage. To this testimony the judge directs the attention of the jury specially. He tells them that he has charged them in reference to the testimony in general, but that he now charges them with reference to a particular portion of the testimony; and then, after charging that they are to consider and weigh all the testimony, he adds, "But I charge you in particular that evidence of family disturbances between husband and wife, and between her and one or more of his children by a former marriage, is relevant." No special reference is made, anywhere in the charge, to any of the evidence favorable to the other side. To single out, in this manner, a portion of the testimony favorable to one side, and give it a degree of prominence not given to any of the other testimony, saying to the jury, in effect, that, while they are to consider all the testimony, they are to consider this particularly, is to discriminate in favor of that evidence, and is calculated to impress the jury that it is of special weight and value. Why should one part of the facts merit more marked attention than other parts equally material? The case is a close one under the evidence, and we cannot say that the stress placed by the court upon this particular part of the evidence did not operate in producing the verdict rendered.

4. The requests to charge, in so far as they are legal, were covered by the charge of the court as given, and there was no error in the charge except as stated in the preceding part of this opinion. Judgment reversed.

SMITH v. OATTS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 20, 1893.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — IMPOUNDING OF ANIMALS.

The general assembly, after having conferred power upon the authorities of an incorporated town to "regulate or prohibit the running at large in said town of any horses, mules, cattle, hogs, dogs or other animals or fowls, and prescribe penalties therefor," may, by a subsequent amendatory statute, curtail these powers by enacting that "the authorities of said town shall not exercise the powers conferred by this section over or upon the property or live stock of such persons as do not reside within the corporate limits of said town." The act of September 7, 1891, amending in this respect the charter of Swainsboro, is not unconstitutional. 2 Acts 1890-91, p. 733.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Emanuel county; R. L. Gamble, Judge.

Action in replevin by C. W. Smith against B. F. Oatts. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Warren & Warren, for plaintiff in error. J. F. Haley and Williams & Smith, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. Smith sued Oatts for the recovery of two hogs, and the case was submitted to the court below upon the following agreed state of facts: Oatts bought the hogs at a sale by the marshal of Swainsboro, Ga., under an ordinance passed by the mayor and council of that town, in pursuance of the powers granted by the charter of the town, authorizing its local authorities to impound hogs, etc., when found running at large on the streets. The plaintiff's hogs were found by the marshal on the streets, and impounded. The plaintiff refused to pay the impounding fees or charges when called upon, claiming that the town authorities could not enforce the ordinance against his property, under an act of the legislature which amended the charter of the town by providing that the powers granted the town in its original charter, relative to the impounding of hogs, etc., should not be exercised against the live stock of those who do not reside within the corporate limits of the town. The plaintiff did not reside within the corporate limits. The marshal, after advertising the hogs, sold them to Oatts, who refused to deliver them to the plaintiff on demand. The court below held that the amendment to the charter (2 Acts 1890-91, p. 733) was unconstitutional, and to this ruling the plaintiff excepted.

The tenth section of the charter declares that the mayor and council "may regulate or prohibit the running at large in said town of any horses, mules, cattle, hogs, dogs or other animals or fowls, and prescribe penalties therefor." Acts 1887, p. 527. To this the amendatory act in question added the following: "Provided, that the authorities of said town shall not exercise the powers conferred by this section over or upon the property or live stock of such persons as do not reside within the corporate limits of said town." And it is enacted "that all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be and the same are hereby repealed." It was contended that the amendment is void (1) because it is unreasonable, it being impossible for the town authorities to distinguish between the property of nonresidents and that of residents of the town when found at large on the streets; and (2) because it is class legislation, as it discriminates in favor of nonresidents. Whether it be true or not that the amendment and the section amended cannot stand together for these reasons, it does not follow that the amending act itself is ineffectual. The legislature had the right to curtail, or to take away entirely, the power granted in the original act; and, by adding this proviso and repealing all laws or parts of laws in conflict therewith, it meant that the power granted in the section amended should be exercised only upon the condition stated in the proviso. To hold the amending act void because the power could not be exercised at all, if dependent on this condition, would be to set aside a later, in order to sustain a former, expression of the legislative will; and it is well settled that this cannot be done. As was said by Bleckley, C. J., in Railroad Co. v. Gibson, 85 Ga. 19, 11 S. E. 442, in discussing the effect of an amending act which was in the form of a proviso: "We see no reason why an amending act, passed by a subsequent legislature, or at a subsequent session of the same legislature, could not modify or repeal anything whatsoever in the act amended, and in any form the legislature might choose to adopt. * * * In so far as an act passed by a subsequent legislature, or at a subsequent session of the same legislature, is inconsistent with a prior act on the same subject, a repeal of the prior act is effected; and it seems to us to make no difference that the later act may, in whole or in part, consist of a proviso. The rule, so far as we know, is universal that, where there is an irreconcilable conflict between two statutes, the later of the two must prevail, and the former give way." Here the legislature, in its final expression on the subject, says to the authorities of the town, in effect: "You may continue to regulate or prohibit the running at large of hogs, etc., if you confine the exercise of this power to the property of persons residing in the town, but upon this condition only." Such being the clear intention of the law-making power, the courts cannot set that intention aside, upon the ground that to carry it into effect would prevent any exercise by the town authorities of the power which the legislature made dependent on the condition stated. But non constat that the local officers could not distinguish between the property of residents and that of nonresidents. Doubtless they could in some instances, and in others not. Where they could not, they would simply have to forbear. Another objection to the amending act was that "it is repugnant to that clause of the constitution which inhibits any special legislation that contravenes a general law," inasmuch as section 4065 of the Code empowers the authorities of any town or city to abate and remove nuisances, and as the running at large of hogs, etc., is a nuisance. The act, however, does not seek to limit the powers granted by this general law, but only such as are granted by another special act; and the power to take up and sell hogs found running at large in the streets is not granted by the general law. These being the only objections urged against the validity of the amending act, and no other ground appearing which would require us to hold it invalid, it follows that the court below erred in so holding. Judgment reversed.

STAMEY v. WESTERN UNION TEL. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 8, 1894.)

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES — FAILURE TO DELIVER MESSAGE—RULES OF COMPANY.

1. Where a message, intended for transmission over the lines of a telegraph company, was written upon one of the regular blanks prepared and furnished by the company for the use of its customers, and upon the face of the blank, above the space left for the message, the following words were printed in plain type, "Send the following message, subject to the terms on back hereof, which are hereby agreed to," and below this space, in still plainer type, were printed the following words and signs, "Read the notice and agreement on back." The writer of the message and consequently the contemplated sendee were bound by any reasonable rule or regulation printed on the back of the blank.

2. A regulation so printed, and in the following words, "No responsibility regarding messages attaches to this company until the same are presented and accepted at one of its transmitting offices, and if a message is sent to such office by one of the company's messengers, he acts for that purpose as the agent of the sender," was reasonable, and the company is not liable to the proposed sendee of such a message because of the failure of the messenger to whom it was intrusted to deliver it at one of the company's transmitting offices, and the company's consequent failure to transmit and deliver to the person addressed. This is so, notwithstanding the delivery of messages to such a messenger was usual and customary in the regular line of the company's business, and, according to its usage, it paid its messengers for every message delivered, and "for every message so received to be transmitted." By express stipulation, the messenger was, as to the service he undertook, the agent of the sender and not of the company.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court, Richmond county; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by D. A. Stamey against the Western Union Telegraph Company for failure to deliver a message. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. R. Lamar, for plaintiff in error. J. S. & W. T. Davidson, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The declaration in this case claims damages for the nontransmission and nondelivery of a telegram which, it is alleged, Gooding & Co., of Charleston, S. C., had written on one of the defendant's day telegraphic blanks and handed to a messenger of the defendant, who had just delivered a telegram to them from the plaintiff, to be carried to the office of the defendant in Charleston for transmission to the plaintiff, at the latter's expense, but which message was never in fact delivered by the messenger at the transmitting office of the defendant in Charleston. The pivotal question is: Was the message delivered to the company for transmission? One of the rules and regulations of the company, printed on the back of the blank upon the face of which the message was written, was in these terms: "No responsibility regarding messages attaches to this company until the same are presented and accepted at one of its transmitting offices, and if a message is sent to such office by one of the company's messengers, he acts for that purpose as the agent of the sender." Just above the space left for the written message are the following words, in large type: "Send the following message, subject to the terms on back hereof, which are hereby agreed to." And at the bottom of this space is the following notice, in larger type: "Read the notice and agreement on back." The declaration avers that this rule is not obligatory upon the senders of the message, because it was not read by them or known to them. This position is clearly untenable, for reasonable diligence was all that was necessary to acquaint them with this rule. Therefore, the moment the senders wrote and signed the message on the blank, they became, in legal contemplation, aware of the rule, whether they read it or not, and thereby signified "both their knowledge of it, and their assent to it." Hill v. Telegraph Co., 85 Ga. 425, 428, 429, 11 S. E. 874, and cases cited on the latter page. See, also, Gray, Com. Tel. 52, 53; Scott & J. Tel. § 149; note in 71 Am. Dec. 406, to case of Camp v. Telegraph Co., beginning on page 461. A telegraph company is not subject to the extraordinary limitations and responsibilities imposed by law on common carriers. Telegraph Co. v. Fontaine, 58 Ga. 433; Telegraph Co. v. Blanchard, 68 Ga. 307, and note to same case in 45 Am. Rep. 487, 488. It therefore has the undoubted power to make reasonable rules and regulations regarding the conduct of its business with the public; and the reasonableness of such rules and regulations is a question for the courts to decide. Gray, Com. Tel. §§ 13, 20; Scott & J. Tel. § 104; note in 71 Am. Dec., supra. This being true, is the rule in controversy reasonable? We think it is. The work performed by the messenger in carrying the message from the office or residence of the sender to the transmitting office of the company forms no part of the transmission of the message by the company, for which latter purpose alone the company makes a charge. There is nothing onerous or one-sided about the rule. It dictates no terms to the sender, and gives no advantage to the company. It is neither obligatory nor arbitrary. In a word, it gives the sender the alternative of delivering his dispatch to the messenger, to be delivered by him at the office of the company, on the condition prescribed, or of making such delivery either in person or by his own servant. We have been unable to find a direct adjudication upon this rule by any court, and we think this shows, or tends to show, the consensus of public and professional opinion in favor of its reasonableness. The rule is held to be reasonable in the work of Gray on Communications by Telegraph, (section 13, top p. 23.) Assuming, then, the reasonableness of the rule, it follows, in the absence of other facts to the contrary, that the message was not delivered to the company, because it was not presented at one of its transmitting offices by the agent of the senders, and was not accepted by the company. Now, is there any fact in this case, not yet mentioned, which should vary the above conclusion? The plaintiff in error alleges in his declaration that a local usage of the defendant at Charleston authorized its messengers, delivering telegrams, to receive answers for delivery at the company's office for transmission, for which they were paid by the company two cents for each message so received and delivered, (i. e. at the company's office,) and that such local usage made the messengers the agents of the company to receive messages for transmission, and superseded the above-recited rule or stipulation. Taking into view all the allegations of the declaration, and the blank attached, the answers referred to as being within the operation of this alleged usage were, presumably, written upon the company's blanks, similar to the one in question. We cannot accept as correct the plaintiff's position as to the effect of this alleged usage. If the usage was unknown to the senders of the telegram, they did not act, and could not have acted, on it; and if they had known of such usage, and, nevertheless, entered into a written agreement by which the messenger should act as their agent for the sole purpose of carrying the message to the company's office for transmission, they and the plaintiff in error were thereby estopped from showing such usage, because custom or usage, while admissible to explain an ambiguous written agreement, is inadmissible if repugnant to or inconsistent with a clear, express agreement. Grinnell v. Telegraph Co., 113 Mass. 299, 307, and cases there cited. See, also, Park v. Insurance Co., 48 Ga. 601, 606; Werner v. Footman, 54 Ga. 128, 137; Tilley v. Cook County, 103 U. S. 155, 162; Moran v. Prather, 23 Wall. 492, 503; and note to Insurance Co. v. Munger, 33 Am. St. Rep., on page 368, (30 Pac. 120,) citing ample authority and saying: "A local usage, inconsistent with an express contract made at the place where such usage prevails, or contradicting its terms, is not a part of such contract, and cannot be given in evidence to contradict or avoid it."

There is nothing in the rule under consideration contrary to public policy. Aside from the reasons already given, others in its favor may be stated: (1) Messengers of a telegraph company are not sent out from the company's office to solicit telegrams, and, being engaged in a most subordinate work of the company's service, it is to be presumed that they are not invested by the company with the powers of receiving the company's charges or fees for the transmission of telegrams, and that they have no powers of rejecting telegrams offered to them, either for the nonpayment in advance of the company's charges for transmission, or for being illegibly written, or for containing matter which would make the company liable, in tort or otherwise, for transmitting an indecent or immoral telegram,—all of which are powers reserved by law to the company for its protection, and with which, it is known to the public, or should be, the receiving agent of the company at its transmitting offices is invested. (2) The carriage of telegrams from the office or residence of the sender to the transmitting office of the company is not a part of the duty or business of a telegraph company. (3) Neither the sender nor addressee of a message pays anything for such carriage to the transmitting office of the company. (4) The liability against which a telegraph company cannot stipulate, as shown by the adjudications of all courts, is confined to its negligence in connection with the transmission of messages from its transmitting offices, and the delivery of such messages to the sendee; and it has even been held, in Clement v. Telegraph Co., 137 Mass. 463, 466, 467, that there are no principles of public policy which should prevent a telegraph company from stipulating against the negligence of its messenger boys as to the delivery of messages to its patrons. (5) And the transmission of a message "means its transmission from the office or station at which it is received to the one to which it is sent;" and delivery means "the delivery of it to the person to whom it is addressed." Scott & J. Tel. § 264.

Therefore, delivery to the messenger, without acceptance by the company, should not fix any liability on the company. If delivery to the messenger were delivery to the company, acceptance by the messenger must be held to be acceptance by the company, and this would take from the company its undoubted right to refuse to transmit a message for any one or more of the reasons above stated. No analogy between such a case as this and that of a life insurance agent can justly be drawn, because none of the reasons which have impelled the courts, in modern decisions, to treat the agent of the insurance company as the agent of the insurer, where a somewhat similar rule or stipulation is printed upon the back of the application or policy of insurance, have any application here. For the reasoning of the courts in such insurance cases, see the opinion of Miller, J., who announced the decision of the court in the case of Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. 222, 234, 236. The foregoing disposes of the case, and the question raised as to the measure of damages need not be considered. Judgment affirmed.

ATLANTA JOURNAL v. MAYSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 30, 1893.)

LIBEL AND SLANDER—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Code, § 3749, declares that "in all civil cases the preponderance of testimony is considered sufficient to produce mental conviction." This phraseology includes actions for libel in which a plea of justification presents the issue to be tried, although such plea imputes to the plaintiff the commission of a crime as charged in the publication alleged to be libelous. In order to sustain the plea, it is requisite that the jury shall have a mental conviction of its truth, but they need not be "convinced beyond a reasonable doubt," as this phrase is commonly understood in criminal procedure. This question was not directly presented in Ransone v. Chris- tian, 56 Ga. 351, nor was it directly decided in Williams v. Gunnels, 66 Ga. 521.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action for libel by C. C. Mayson against the Atlanta Journal. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. P. Andrews and Ellis & Gray, for plaintiff in error. Mayson & Hill, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. This was an action for libel, the alleged libelous matter consisting of publications in the defendant's newspaper charging the plaintiff with the crime of forgery. The defendant admitted the publications, and pleaded justification. There was a verdict for the plaintiff of $1,000. The main question before us is whether or not the trial court erred in charging that "the burden is on the defendant to sustain the plea of justification by the same degree of evidence that would be required to convict the plaintiff if he were charged with a crime; that is to say, beyond a reasonable doubt." We think this was error. In order to sustain the plea of justification, it is requisite that the jury shall have a mental conviction of its truth, but they need not be "convinced beyond a reasonable doubt," as this phrase is commonly understood in criminal procedure. In respect to the degree of mental conviction required, our Code places all civil cases upon the same footing. Section 3749 declares: "In all civil cases the preponderance of testimony is considered sufficient to produce mental conviction. In criminal cases a greater strength of mental conviction is held necessary to justify a verdict of guilty." The decisions in civil cases cited for the defendant in error, in which it is said that the proof on certain points must be such as to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, are explained in the case of Schnell v. Toomer, 56 Ga. 169, as meaning simply that the jury must be clearly satisfied. In that case, Judge Bleckley says: "In regard to the evidence of adverse possession, etc., the court was requested to charge the jury, as laid down in Durham v. Holeman, 30 Ga. 619, that the plea of the statute must be supported by proof so conclusive as to exclude reasonable doubt. The court declined so to charge, but seems to have given what we think is the true meaning of the cases on the subject, namely, that it is only necessary for the proof to clearly satisfy the minds of the jury of the truth of the plea. In civil cases, as in Wyche v. Greene, 11 Ga. 160; Durham v. Holeman, 30 Ga. 619; and Printup v. Mitchell, 17 Ga. 559,—the exclusion of reasonable doubt means that, and no more, (Code, § 3749;) and as 'reasonable doubt' is a phrase more appropriate to criminal cases, its employment to instruct the jury in civil cases had best be avoided. There is certainly a difference in the strength of conviction required by the law in the two classes of cases; and, that being so, it is desirable not to confound in language what should be distinguished in thought." Moreover, the cases referred to were decided prior to the adoption of the Code. It was contended, however, that cases in which there is a plea charging the plaintiff with a crime stand upon a different footing in this respect from other civil cases; and in support of this view the cases of Ransome v. Christian, 56 Ga. 352, and Williams v. Gunnels, 66 Ga. 521, are cited. In Williams v. Gunnels, one of the exceptions was that the trial court refused a request to charge that, to support a plea of justification, it requires the same degree of evidence as would be required to convict the plaintiff if he were charged with a criminal offense; but as it appeared from the judge's certificate that this request was not in writing, and no error being assigned on the charge given on this point, the court declined to consider it, and simply "suggest" that the rule as embodied in the request is "seemingly recognized" in Ransome v. Christian, supra. Upon looking to Ransome v. Christian, we find that nothing is said as to the degree of mental conviction the jury must have, to authorize a verdict in favor of the plea. In that case there was a plea of justification of a libel charging perjury; and the question was whether it was error to instruct the jury that, where but one witness testifies to the truth of the charge, the corroborating circumstances must be sufficient to amount to another witness, or to support the one witness to that extent. It was held that this instruction required too much, and that it is enough if the circumstances corroborate the one witness to the satisfaction of the jury. It was not held that the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt. So it will be seen that these cases do not decide the question now before us.

In some of the decisions elsewhere, the distinction is made that, while it is necessary to support the plea with such proof as would be sufficient to convict the plaintiff on an indictment for the offense, yet it is not necessary, as in a criminal prosecution, that it should be of that degree of certainty requisite to remove all reasonable doubt from the minds of the jury. See Newell, Defam. (1890,) p. 795. In Ellis v. Buzzell, 60 Me. 209, the court, in holding that the proof need not be such as to exclude reasonable doubt, say: "It is worthy of remark that, with a very few unimportant exceptions, the cases in which it has been held that, to sustain a plea of justification, the defendant in an action of slander must adduce such proof as would suffice for the conviction of the plaintiff upon an indictment, have been cases in which the words used imputed perjury to the plaintiff, and in most of them the matter more directly under consideration has been the propriety of regarding the plaintiff's testimony upon the occasion referred to as evidence in the case, to be overcome by the production of more than one witness to prove its falsity,—the necessity of showing that his testimony was false in intent as well as in fact,—its materiality, or some point affecting the truth of the charge, and not the necessity of proving the commission of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. We have no occasion to question those decisions, so far as they enforce the necessity of proving all the elements necessary to constitute the crime charged by an amount of evidence sufficient to overbalance the plaintiff's side of the case. It may be and probably is true that the compendious phrase, 'sufficient to convict the plaintiff upon an indictment,' has had reference more frequently to matters which it was necessary to establish than to the degree of assurance upon which the jury should act." See, also, the note of Judge Redfield to this case in 12 Am. Law. Reg. (N. S.) 431. In 2 Greenl. Ev. § 426, after stating that "to support a special plea in justification, where crime is imputed, the same evidence must be adduced as would be necessary to convict the plaintiff upon an indictment for the crime imputed to him," the author adds, "and it is conceived that he would be entitled to the benefit of any reasonable doubt of his guilt, in the minds of the jury, in the same manner as in a criminal trial." But in recent editions of this work it is said, in a note to the paragraph quoted, that while "the evidence to support this justification must include all the elements necessary to prove the accused guilty of the crime in a prosecution therefor, e. g. both the intent and the criminal act, * * * it seems to be the established rule now that a preponderance of the evidence tending to convict him of the crime is enough, and that the statement in the text that he is entitled to a reasonable doubt is not well supported." It is by no means certain that Chalmers v. Shackell, (1834,) 6 Car. & P. 475,—the English case cited on this point by the author,—is authority, even in England, for the rule that in such cases the crime charged in the plea must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. See 10 Am. Law. Rev. 642, where the cases cited by Mr. Greenleaf are reviewed at some length. At any rate, we believe we are safe in saying that no such rule was laid down in any of the English cases prior to the time of our adopting statute. If, however, such was the rule in England, the reason upon which it has been supposed to rest does not exist with us. On this subject we quote from Newell on Defamation, Slander, and Libel (page 795) as follows: "In England there was a substantial reason for requiring a more conclusive degree of certainty of the truth of the charge in a civil action for defamation, which does not apply in this country. There, if the plea of justification, where a felony had been charged, was sustained by the verdict of a jury, the verdict stood as an indictment. Lord Kenyon said: 'Where the defendant justifies words which amount to a charge of felony, and proves his justification, the plaintiff might have been put upon his trial by that verdict without the intervention of a grand jury.' In the United States no such result follows, and the reason for the rule ceases to exist. Neither life nor liberty is in any degree imperiled by such a verdict. No other consequences follow it than follow a verdict in any other civil cause. It does not take the place of an indictment. If the truth of the words published is, by a preponderance of evidence, proved to the satisfaction of the jury, the plea is sustained. The adoption of this rule does not change or modify the presumption of innocence which the law raises in favor of the plaintiff, nor does it waive the necessity of proving every element that enters into the crime charged by evidence of a kind and quantity that, in the minds of the jury, overthrows the case made by the plaintiff." In 2 Whart. Ev. § 1246, it is said: "The doctrine that reasonable doubt should produce an acquittal sprang from the hardship of a system which inflicted capital punishment on all felonies, and is, in any view, defensible only on the ground that where penal judgments are to be inflicted, and where the state, with all its power, prosecutes, then proof of guilt should be strong. * * * The better view is that in civil issues the result should follow the preponderance of evidence, even though the result imputes crime." Judge Cooley, in his work on Torts, (2d Ed., p. 208,) says: "Where the charge complained of imputes to the plaintiff criminal conduct, and the truth is relied upon as a justification, it is sufficient to support the plea by a preponderance of evidence. It is not necessary that the crime be made out beyond a reasonable doubt."

Of the cases cited as opposed to this view, Polston v. See, 54 Mo. 291, was expressly overruled in Edwards v. George Knapp & Co., (1888,) 97 Mo. 432, 10 S. W. 54, and Fountain v. West, 23 Iowa, 9; and other cases to the same effect were overruled in Riley v. Norton, 65 Iowa, 306, 21 N. W. 649. Several Indiana cases cited by counsel for the defendant in error lay down the rule as given in charge by the court below in this case, but the rule thus laid down is disapproved in the recent case of Fowler v. Wallace, (1892,) 31 N. E. 53, 131 Ind. 347, though a majority of the court hold that they are required to follow those cases. They say: "We are satisfied that the rule grew out of a misconception of principle, and, if we were not compelled by duty, we should decline to give it our adherence." "It is with reluctance and regret that we yield to the decisions upon this point." A minority of the judges dissented, upon the ground that it was the duty of the court to correct the error, and apply the rule regarded as the proper one; and it was also maintained that the prior decisions referred to had already, in effect, been overruled in Insurance Co. v. Jachnichen, 110 Ind. 59, 10 N. E. 636, and in other cases. The case last cited was an action upon an insurance policy, in which the defense was that the plaintiff had willfully set fire to the premises insured in order to defraud the defendant; and the court held that to establish this defense a preponderance of evidence was sufficient, and an instruction that its truth must be established beyond a reasonable doubt was erroneous. The decisions to this effect in cases of the same class are numerous, (see May, Ins. § 583, and note;) and in our opinion there is no substantial reason for the distinction which some of the courts have made between those cases and libel or slander cases, in respect to the strength of mental conviction required to authorize a verdict sustaining the charge contained in the plea. Whether the charge is made in an action of the one kind or the other, the injury to the reputation, if the charge is sustained, must in either case be the same. And undoubtedly the decided weight of authority is opposed to such a distinction. In addition to the authorities already cited, which hold that in this respect no exception exists in libel or slander cases to the general rule in civil actions, see Peoples v. Evening News, 51 Mich. 11, 16 N. W. 185, 691; Sprull v. Cooper, 16 Ala. 791; Bell v. McGinness, 40 Ohio St. 204; Sloan v. Gilbert, 12 Bush, 51; Downing v. Brown, 3 Colo. 571; Kidd v. Fleck, 47 Wis. 443, 2 N. W. 1121; Barfield v. Britt, 2 Jones, (N. C.) 41; Klincade v. Bradshaw, 3 Hawks, 63; McBee v. Fulton, 47 Md. 403; Currier v. Richardson, 22 Atl. 625, 63 Vt. 617; Folsom v. Brawn, 25 N. H. 114; Baker v. Kansas City Times, 18 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 101, Fed. Cas. No. 773. Judgment reversed.

LUMPKIN, J., heard the argument, but, being disqualified by relationship to one of the stockholders in the corporation sued, took no part in the decision.

BENTLEY v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 30, 1893.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—LIABILITY TO ABUTTING OWNERS—PLEADINGS.

1. A tenant of premises situated in a city, although he has no estate in the land, is the owner of its use for the term of his rent contract, and can recover damages for any injury to such use occasioned by the erection and maintenance of a public nuisance in the street, adjacent to or in the immediate neighborhood of the premises.

2. The duty, both with respect to the general public and the occupants of premises along the streets of a city, of keeping the streets free from permanent or long-continued nuisances, rests primarily on the municipal government; and this duty cannot be evaded by urging the right and duty of a railway company to bridge its line at street crossings, and maintain the bridges and crossings in proper condition. If the city authorities suffer a railway company to erect a bridge at a street crossing, and maintain it, together with the approaches thereto, in such manner as to render the same a public nuisance, the city is liable for the consequences, just as it would be if the improper work had been done by the city itself.

3. The declaration set forth a cause of action. The court erred in disallowing the amendments offered, and in sustaining the demurrer. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; Howard Van Epps, Judge.

Action by Moses H. Bentley against the city of Atlanta. From a judgment for defendant on demurrer to the declaration, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

Action against a municipal corporation for damages resulting from the raising of a bridge in a street. On demurrer the court ruled that the declaration set forth no cause of action, and, on objection by the defendant, disallowed two amendments offered by the plaintiff. Upon these rulings the plaintiff took a bill of exceptions. The declaration alleges the following: The plaintiff had leased a house and lot in the city, fronting 50 feet on Peters street, and running back 100 feet to the right of way of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad, bounded on the northeast by McDaniel street, and adjoining the McDaniel street bridge. His term of lease will not expire until the 1st of September, 1893. He uses the premises as a dwelling, restaurant, ice-cream factory, and family grocery. At the time he rented the same there was a bridge over the track of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad on McDaniel street, which was near to and adjoining his premises. It was easily passed over, and was a safe thoroughfare, and used as such by the public. It had been erected by the city, which had and exercised control of the same as a part of the public street. On the 1st of January, 1892, the use of the premises was worth to plaintiff $50 per month; and a part of this value depended on the free and unobstructed use of McDaniel street, and the bridge over the railroad on that street, as then constructed and in use. He used the rear room of the house as a restaurant and dining room, where he and his family and his customers, many of whom came across the bridge, took their meals, etc. In January, 1892, the city wrongfully permitted the railroad to raise the grade of the street by raising the bridge in the middle thereof five feet, and, with full knowledge of said act of the railroad, has ratified the same. This raising of the grade has resulted in a public nuisance, which result must have been known as a reasonable result by the defendant, which now, after all possible doubt has been removed, continues the wrongful grade. The passage over the bridge is not only difficult, but dangerous, both ascending and descending from the middle of the bridge towards Peters street; and for loaded wagons and other vehicles it is almost impassable, and diverts passage and travel to other streets. The city has recognized the danger of ascending and descending the bridge as thus raised, and the railroad put the city on notice of its danger by putting strips across the bridge to prevent horses and other animals, as well as pedestrians, from slipping while going over the bridge, and to prevent loaded wagons from running down it, but this device has not prevented the wrong it knew it was doing. Plaintiff has been damaged in the use of said premises, by the wrongful acts of defendant, $40 per month, from the 1st of January, 1892, and said damage will last until the end of his term, all of which have been caused by the raising of the grade of the street over the bridge. He has been especially injured by the erection of the bridge over McDaniel street, in that shortly after said erection a wagoner undertook to drive over it with a wagon loaded with lumber, coming from Peters street, and started up the same, but, owing to the steepness of the bridge, he was unable to do so; and because of the steepness, alone, his wagon was forced backward down the slope towards plaintiff's house, and ran against the dining room, broke through the wall of said room, forced pieces of lumber therein, injured an organ belonging to him, knocked over a table at which he and his family were eating, and went on further with such force that it struck and knocked down a frame that he had at his front window on Peters street, and tore up the plank of his front veranda, facing Peters street. In passing by his dining room, it struck the wall, and knocked out two planks,—to his actual damage in the sum of $50. Since that time, three other wagons, from the same cause, have run backward down the bridge against his house, and struck it, and caused great and constant alarm to his family; and the city, well knowing these injuries, takes no steps to protect him,—to his damage $500. He complained to the officers of the city of these injuries, but they paid no attention to his complaint; and the city, well knowing the dangerous condition of the bridge, a few days ago, loaded up one of its own scavenger carts with all manner of filth gathered up from the streets, and by its driver, well knowing the danger of trying to go over the bridge, and that there was danger of injuring plaintiff, undertook to drive the cart over the bridge, and negligently let it run back against his dining-room door, and empty its contents at his very door, breaking two planks of his wall, and frightening and insulting his family. The amendments offered by the plaintiff set forth that prior to the raising of the bridge his side entrance was easy of access, and used as much as the entrance fronting Peters street, but since the raising of the bridge the access to his side entrance has been so left as to make it accessible alone by the use of a plank from his side door to the street, a distance of three feet, the grade being raised to correspond with the abutment of the bridge, which is only a few feet from his side door, leaving it in a dangerous condition; that the bridge was negligently and improperly constructed, and amounts to an obstruction of the street; and that the railroad track should have been lowered, instead of interfering with the bridge, as the grade from Whitehall street below McDaniel street to the intersection of or near Fair street by the railroad would have permitted the lowering of the railroad track.

W. A. Tigner and Jordan & Robinson, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Anderson and Fulton Colville, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. Bentley sued the city of Atlanta for damages resulting from the raising of a bridge in a street near to and adjoining his premises. On demurrer the court ruled that the declaration set forth no cause of action, and, on objection by the defendant, disallowed two amendments offered by the plaintiff. The declaration and the amendments are set out in the report prefixed to this opinion.

1. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff had no right of action because he was a mere tenant of the premises alleged to have been damaged. There is no merit in this contention. A tenant, although he has no estate in the land, is the owner of its use for the term of his rent contract; and he can recover damages for any injury to such use occasioned by the erection and maintenance of a public nuisance in the street adjacent to, or in the immediate neighborhood of, the premises. See 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 719; Crowell v. Railroad Co., 61 Miss. 631.

2. It appears from the declaration that the bridge was raised by a railroad company whose line crossed the street under the bridge; and it was contended that the plaintiff, instead of suing the city, ought to have sued the railroad company. The duty, both with respect to the general public and the occupants of premises along the streets of a city, of keeping the streets free from permanent or long-continued nuisances, rests primarily on the municipal government; and this duty cannot be evaded by urging the right and duty of a railway company to bridge its line at street crossings, and maintain the bridges and crossings in proper condition. If the city authorities suffer a railway company to erect a bridge at a street crossing, and maintain it, together with the approaches thereto, in such manner as to render the same a public nuisance, the city is liable for the consequences, just as it would be if the improper work had been done by the city itself. Certainly, this is so where the law expressly gives the city control of the matter, as was the case here. The charter of the city, after prescribing the duty of railroad companies as to the erection and repair of bridges across their tracks or roadbeds, where the same cross the streets of the city, declares that the mayor and general council "shall have the authority to regulate the building and repair of such bridges in so far as to declare the general character of such bridge or repairs suitable to be made, and to provide for the drainage, light and comfort of said bridge, and the street adjacent thereto or thereunder, and to provide for the least obstruction by supports and otherwise of any portion of the street practicable and consistent with safety. In case of the failure of any railroad or railroad company, after reasonable notice to do so, to build or repair a bridge or the approaches thereto or otherwise, as provided above, said mayor and general council shall have the authority to do such building, repairing or putting in safe and comfortable condition at the expense, with interest and costs, of such railroad or railroad company," etc. Acts 1889, p. 819. On this subject, see Jones, Neg. Mun. Corp. § 119. And see Elliott, Roads & S. (Ed. 1890,) p. 44 et seq.; Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) §§ 1027, 1037.

3. The declaration set forth a cause of action, and the court erred in disallowing the amendments offered, and in sustaining the demurrer. The question of the measure of damages was not made in the court below, and we do not deal with it. The demurrer was a general one, and did not raise the question as to whether all the particular elements of damage alleged were good or bad. As some of them were good, there was enough to withstand such a demurrer. Judgment reversed.

CHATTAHOOCHEE BRICK CO. v. BRASWELL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 30, 1893.)

INJURIES TO EMPLOYEES — ASSUMPTION OF RISK — INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

1. In the trial of an action for physical injuries against two defendants, as joint tortfeasors, an instruction by the court that there was no evidence warranting a finding against one of them wrought no injury to the other, it appearing from the record that the defendant discharged by the instruction of the court would not be liable to contribution in favor of the one against whom the verdict was rendered.

2. The rule forbidding a recovery from his master by a servant who subjects himself to injury by going, without objection, into a place known by him to be dangerous is not applicable to a convict, whose movements are controlled and directed by a guard or boss having and exercising the power of compelling the convict to obey his orders.

3. The plaintiff, a convict, having been leased by the state to a penitentiary company, and that company having hired him, with other convicts, to another corporation engaged in the work of constructing a railroad, and he having been put to work under the control of a guard, employed and paid by the latter corporation, and being required to obey the orders of such guard, this corporation is liable to the plaintiff for injuries received in consequence of his having gone, under orders from the guard, into a place where a dangerous explosive was being used, although all the convicts so hired may have been under the general charge of a "captain," appointed by the governor. This is true whether it was, or was not, lawful for such convicts to be placed under the control and management of the guard.

4. The evidence was conflicting, but taking as true the version of it most favorable to the plaintiff, the verdict was warranted, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; Howard Van Epps, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Dock Braswell against the Chattahoochee Brick Company and another. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brick company brings error. Affirmed.

Ellis & Gray, for plaintiff in error. Broyles & Son, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. The plaintiff brought an action for personal injuries against the Chattahoochee Brick Company and Georgia Penitentiary Company No. 2, as joint tortfeasors, which resulted in a verdict in his favor against the company first named. One ground of the motion for a new trial is that the court erred in charging as follows: "There is no evidence warranting a finding against the Penitentiary Company No. 2, and I confine your attention to the case as developed in reference to the Chattahoochee Brick Company." If it appeared from the evidence set forth in the record that the penitentiary company would be liable to contribution to the brick company, the complaint as to the charge quoted might be meritorious; but, under the undisputed facts of this case, it is clear that there is no such liability on the part of the penitentiary company. It did not cause, and was in no way connected with or responsible for, the injuries sustained by the plaintiff; indeed, was guilty of no wrong whatever, unless the hiring by it of the plaintiff, along with other convicts, to the brick company was an unlawful act. It is not necessary to decide whether this hiring was lawful or not, and we do not wish to be understood as making any ruling upon this question. If it was lawful, then the penitentiary company had nothing whatever to do with the infliction of the injuries upon the plaintiff, and most clearly is not, and could not be in any view, liable to the brick company. Even if it was unlawful, still there was no liability by the former to the latter company, because the evidence shows conclusively that, as between themselves, there was no fault or blame attaching to the penitentiary company. While, under certain circumstances,—possibly, in this very case,—both may have been liable to the plaintiff, the corporation which committed the tort and was, so far as the other was concerned, exclusively responsible for it, would not, upon paying the damages, have any right to exact contribution from that other. At common law, joint trespassers were not liable for contribution to each other. This rule was changed by our Code. See sections 3075, 3076. It must be remembered, however, that in making joint trespassers liable for contribution, the principle of contribution, as stated in section 3132 of the Code, (though that section is not expressly applicable to suits founded on torts,) is to be observed. That principle is that where all are equally bound to bear the common burden, and one has paid more than his share, he is entitled to contribution from the others; but where, as among themselves, one should bear a less portion of the burden than the others, he should be subjected to no more than his fair share, and where, as to his codefendants, one should bear no portion of the burden at all, he should, as to them, contribute nothing. This being so, discharging the penitentiary company was not a matter of which the brick company had any right to complain, and the charge excepted to, therefore, resulted in no injury to the brick company, and is no cause for a new trial.

2. Counsel for the plaintiff in error sought to apply to this case the well-settled rule of law that a servant who voluntarily, and without objection, goes into a place which he knows to be dangerous, cannot hold his master liable for injuries to himself thus sustained. This rule, in our opinion, has no bearing upon a case like the one now under consideration. The plaintiff was a convict, and, according to the evidence, his movements were absolutely controlled and directed by a guard, or "boss," whose orders he was compelled to obey. This guard had and exercised over him the most complete dominion and authority. The plaintiff's position, so far as the power of the guard was concerned, was more that of a slave than a mere servant, and it is apparent that he dared not disobey any of the guard's commands. According to the evidence introduced in the plaintiff's behalf, and which the jury evidently believed, he was forced by the guard to expose himself to the danger resulting from the explosion of the dynamite blast. The evidence for the defense was directly and emphatically to the contrary, but we are constrained to accept as correct the finding of the jury. Ordinarily, where a servant is ordered by his master to engage in a work, or go into a place, which the servant knows to be dangerous, the latter is not bound to obey the order, and if he does so, with full knowledge of the impending peril, the master may not, in law, be liable for the consequences. In the present case, however, the plaintiff had no election. When the guard said "Go," he was obliged to go; and there is no hardship in compelling a corporation of which the guard was an employe to compensate the plaintiff for injuries received because of his obedience to the guard's commands.

3. The record discloses that the convicts hired by Penitentiary Company No. 2 to the Chattahoochee Brick Company were under the general charge of a "captain," appointed by the governor, but it also discloses that these convicts, including the plaintiff, were put to work under the immediate control and supervision of another person, who was employed and paid by the brick company, and that all the convicts were peremptorily required to obey the orders of this person. This being so, we can conceive of no reason in law or justice why this corporation should not be held liable to the plaintiff for injuries resulting directly from the unlawful conduct of its own employe in forcing the plaintiff to expose himself to mutilation from the dangerous explosive which was being used in the company's service. The mere presence of the "captain" at or near the scene of the calamity, even though he may, in a sense, have been a state official, certainly cannot relieve the brick company of responsibility for the tortious and wrongful conduct of its own servant. It is entirely immaterial whether it was, or was not, lawful for these convicts to be thus placed under the control and management of the brick company and its bosses. This company will surely not be heard to say that, although it injured the plaintiff through the grossly improper conduct of its own employe, it is not liable because it was unlawful to put the plaintiff under this employe's control. To do this would be to allow the company to avail itself of its own misconduct in doing one wrong in order to shield itself from the consequences of another wrong still more grievous and unlawful.

4. As already intimated, the evidence was conflicting. If the jury had believed the testimony of the defendant's witnesses, they could not properly have found for the plaintiff; but if they accepted as the truth of the transaction what was sworn to by the plaintiff and his witnesses, the verdict was well supported. It is not the province of this court to settle disputed issues of fact. The trial judge approved of the verdict, and we will allow it to stand. Judgment affirmed.

VAN PELT v. HURT et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 6, 1893.)

CONTEMPT—DISCRETION OF COURT.

A tenant having obtained a temporary injunction restraining his landlord from turning him out on a dispossessionary warrant, and, pending the proceeding, having abandoned possession and suffered other parties to enter, and then dismissed the proceeding, the court has no jurisdiction, on summary petition by the landlord, to turn these persons out, and put either the tenant or the landlord in; and, as the landlord could not be put in possession as the result of a proceeding against these persons for contempt, there was no abuse of discretion by the judge in declining to call upon them to answer as for a contempt at the instance of the landlord.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; M. J. Clarke, Judge.

Petition by F. M. Van Pelt for a rule against Joel Hurt and others to show cause why they should not be attached as for contempt, and for other relief. The petition was denied, and petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

J. A. Wimpy, for plaintiff in error. Glenn & Slaton, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Elliott, being in possession, as tenant, of certain premises, was about to be dispossessed under a warrant sued out for the purpose by Van Pelt, who claimed to be the owner. The property was also claimed by Hurt and others. Thereupon Elliott filed an equitable petition setting forth these facts, and praying that further proceedings upon the warrant sued out by Van Pelt be enjoined, and that he and the other claimants of the property be required to interplead for the purpose of having it adjudicated to whom the premises really belonged. The petition was sanctioned, a restraining order granted as prayed, and a day appointed for the hearing. Before the hearing actually took place the plaintiff abandoned the premises, immediate possession of which was taken by Hurt and his associates, and, on the day appointed for the hearing, Elliott, of his own motion, in term time, and without objection by any party, dismissed his petition. Under the order above mentioned, Hurt and his associates were not enjoined from taking possession of the property. After the petition had been dismissed, Van Pelt presented to the judge a petition against Hurt and his associates, praying for a rule nisi requiring them to show cause why they should not be attached for contempt, and why the property described in the petition should not be restored to the condition in which it was when the previous restraining order was passed. The prayer for the rule nisi was denied, and this is the error complained of.

The dismissal of the petition filed by Elliott took that case entirely out of court. Nothing was left upon which the court or the presiding judge could act. Certainly, no valid order could be passed, or valid judgment be rendered, in this cause, the court having, by allowing the dismissal of it, parted with all the jurisdiction it ever had over both the parties and the subject-matter involved. It may be that the court had the power to punish Elliott as for contempt if it had seen proper to do so; but Elliott is not a party to the present proceeding, and, viewing it merely as a remedial procedure, in which sense alone the plaintiff in error can claim to be interested, the relief for which he prays cannot be granted. It is no concern of his whether Hurt and his associates, if themselves in contempt of the court, be punished for contempt or not. The only relief to which Van Pelt, in any view of the matter, would be entitled, is that he, as the landlord of Elliott, be put in possession of the property. This certainly could not result from a proceeding against Hurt and his associates for an alleged contempt; and, the only case in which such relief could possibly have been granted having been finally disposed of, there was no case pending before the court which would authorize a judgment turning Hurt and his associates out of possession, and putting in possession either Elliott or Van Pelt. It follows inevitably that the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in denying the rule nisi. Judgment affirmed.

ANDREWS v. MITCHELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 30, 1893.)

WRONGFUL EVICTION—PLEADINGS—NEW TRIAL.

1. The declaration, in an action to recover damages for the wrongful and malicious suing out and execution of a warrant to dispossess the plaintiff of certain premises, having attached thereto a copy of the affidavit and warrant, the latter sued out by Manley, as agent of Mitchell, dated February 8, 1892, with an entry by an officer on the same showing the fact of execution on the 2d day of March, 1892, a plea to this action by both defendants, alleging that "the premises were not rented to plaintiff longer than the 1st of December; that it was understood that plaintiff was to move out by that time, as the premises had been rented prior to plaintiff's moving in; that plaintiff's plunder was in the depot, and he urged the defendant Manley to allow him to move it into said house with above understanding as to length of time he was to occupy same; said plaintiff refused to vacate said premises as he agreed, and defendants did what they could to get said plaintiff out without resorting to legal steps, but, failing in this, said Manley swore out a dispossessionary warrant, and still leniency was shown plaintiff several weeks thereafter before the same was executed; that no violence was used on the part of defendants or the officer executing said warrant; the swearing out of the warrant, and having the same executed, was done in the utmost good faith, and without malice and with probable cause,"—was, in substance, a plea of justification, and, in the absence of a special demurrer thereto for want of sufficient fullness and certainty, was rightly so held, and this holding was, therefore, no cause for granting a new trial.

2. The newly-discovered evidence discloses important and material admissions by the plaintiff, inconsistent with his right to recover; and, not being merely cumulative, or of an impeaching character, there was no abuse of discretion in granting a new trial on this ground.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by William A. Andrews against Mrs. E. J. Mitchell and others. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial he brings error. Affirmed.

W. J. Albert, for plaintiff in error. R. J. Jordan, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, J. 1. This was an action to recover damages for the wrongful and malicious suing out and execution of a warrant to dispossess the plaintiff of certain premises; and to the declaration filed in the case was attached a copy of the affidavit and warrant, the affidavit being sworn to by Manley as agent of Mrs. Mitchell. The defendants filed a special plea, which is set out in the first headnote. The question is whether this plea is a plea of justification, or a plea of the general issue, or not guilty. At the trial the court below held that it was a plea of justification, but, upon a motion for a new trial, reversed this ruling. We think the court erred in holding the former ruling erroneous. A plea of the general issue, or not guilty, to an action of this kind, is a denial of the allegations in the plaintiff's declaration, and no other evidence is admissible under that plea except such as disproves the plaintiff's cause of action. Code, § 3458. Under such a plea the facts set up by the defendants in this case could not have been proven. In order to introduce these facts it was necessary to file a special plea. A plea of justification admits that the act complained of was done, but sets up that the defendant was authorized by law to do the same. Id. § 3051. In this case the plea admits that a warrant was sued out; that it was executed by dispossessing the plaintiff of the premises in dispute; and also sets out the facts which led to the suing out and execution of the warrant, and claims that the defendants were authorized by law, under these facts, to have a warrant issued and executed, and that they did so in good faith, and without malice, and with probable cause. While the plea does not state, in so many words, that they were justifiable in so doing, yet, from the matter set out, justification is plainly implied or inferable. We therefore think the plea is, in substance, a plea of justification. Rigden v. Jordan, 81 Ga. 668, 7 S. E. 857, and cases there cited; Steph. Pl. (9th Am. Ed.) p. 109 et seq. If, in the opinion of counsel, the plea was not sufficiently full and certain as to some of the admissions contained therein, he should have demurred specially thereto, so that it could have been amended in those respects; but upon a general demurrer the court was right, in the first instance, in holding it a plea of justification. The case of Phelps v. Thurman, 74 Ga. 837, is distinguishable from this case. In that case the plea did not admit that the warrant was executed, but merely stated that the defendant was authorized by law to have it executed, and was justified in taking out the same; and it failed to set out any facts to show upon what the defendant relied as justification. See Rigden v. Jordan, 81 Ga. 671, 7 S. E. 857, where the case here referred to is distinguished.

2. One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial was newly-discovered testimony. Some of this testimony disclosed important and material admissions by the plaintiff, inconsistent with his right to recover, and they were not merely cumulative or of an impeaching character. This being true, the court did not abuse its discretion in granting a new trial on this ground. Judgment affirmed.

ROBINSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 18, 1893.)

HOMICIDE—RESISTING ARREST—JUSTIFICATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Persons orally "deputized" by the sheriff to assist him in making an arrest for felony are neither officers nor mere private persons while co-operating with the sheriff and acting under his orders, but their legal position is that of a posse comitatus.

2. A person summoned by the sheriff to act as one of a posse to aid in the execution of a warrant for felony in the sheriff's hands is protected, in any lawful act done by him to promote or accomplish the arrest of the accused person, to the same extent as he would be were he himself an officer having personal custody of the warrant, and charged with its execution; and, in order for him to have this protection, it is not necessary that he should be and remain in the actual presence of the sheriff, but if the two are in the same neighborhood, and acting in concert, the sheriff giving orders, and the other obeying them, either literally or according to their general spirit and purpose, with a view to effect the arrest in pursuance of the common design, it is sufficient.

3. One other than a known officer, who makes an arrest for felony without having the warrant in his own possession, ought to make it known, on demand, that the warrant exists, where it is, and that he claims to be acting under its authority or by command of the officer who has it in possession; but the omission to do so will not justify the party arrested, or sought to be arrested, in resisting the arrest, if he in fact already knows, or on reasonable and probable grounds believes, that he is under a charge of felony, that a warrant is out for his arrest, and that the arrest attempted is really in consequence of the warrant, and in execution of the same. If, however, the demand for authority be made under real ignorance of these things, and in good faith for the purpose of eliciting information actually wanted and needed, failure to comply with the demand would justify resistance to any reasonable and proper extent; and, even if carried so far as the slaying of the person endeavoring to make the arrest, the homicide might amount to manslaughter only, or, if such person made the first demonstration with a deadly weapon, the killing might be justifiable homicide.

4. The court, in its charge, having made the case turn chiefly on the right and power of the deceased to make the arrest, irrespective of the manner in which the power was executed and of the failure of the deceased to respond fully to the demand made upon him for his authority, and without reference to the good or bad faith with which that demand was made, the charge was erroneous, and the accused is entitled to a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Whitfield county; T. W. Milner, Judge.

George Robinson was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

W. K. Moore, for plaintiff in error. A. W. Flite, Sol. Gen., and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. Where it is the duty of a sheriff to arrest one charged with a felony, we know of no law which authorizes this officer to "deputize" a private citizen either to make, or assist in making, the arrest, and thus constitute the person so "deputized" an officer. Under section 4722 of the Code, every officer charged with the execution of a penal warrant has the authority to summon to his assistance, either in writing or verbally, any citizen of the county. When citizens are thus summoned by the sheriff, they are, while co-operating with him and acting under his orders, not themselves officers, nor are they mere private persons, but their true legal position is that of a posse comitatus. A posse may be summoned under the form of "deputizing" the person or persons composing it. The mode is immaterial, so that the object be to require or command assistance.

2. A member of a posse comitatus summoned by the sheriff to aid in the execution of a warrant for felony in the sheriff's hands is entitled to the same protection in the discharge of his duties as the sheriff himself; and to this end a person so summoned may do any act to promote or accomplish the arrest which he could lawfully do were he himself the sheriff, having personal custody of the warrant, and bound to execute the same. See 13 Cr. Law Mag. p. 198, § 30. In order to have the benefit of this protection it is not essential for a member of the sheriff's posse to be and remain in the actual physical presence of the sheriff. It is sufficient if the two are in the same neighborhood, actually endeavoring to make the arrest, and acting in concert with a view to effect this, their common design. The evidence in the present case shows that the deceased, Powell, had been summoned by the sheriff to aid him in making the arrest of Robinson, under a warrant charging the latter with felony. It is quite likely that the sheriff supposed that by "deputizing" Powell he had, in a sense, been made an officer for this purpose. If the sheriff really entertained this idea, he was, as already stated, mistaken. Be this as it may, however, the sheriff was near the scene where it was expected the arrest would take place, and had given orders to Powell, obedience to which would tend to accomplish the arrest. Powell was obeying these orders, not literally, it is true, but certainly according to their general spirit, and the variance by Powell from the precise instructions given him by the sheriff were evidently necessitated by a change in the movements of the accused which had not been anticipated. Under these circumstances we hold that the conduct of Powell was substantially in obedience to the sheriff's orders, keeping in view the real object of their presence in the vicinity, which was undoubtedly the arrest of Robinson. It was seriously contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that as the sheriff was not in sight when Powell laid his hand on Robinson to prevent his leaving the house of his brother, and as the warrant was not then in Powell's possession, the attempted arrest was unauthorized and illegal. The law applicable to this contention is thus aptly stated by Mr. Bishop in the first volume of his work on Criminal Procedure, (section 186:) "To justify the private person who thus assists the officer, the latter must be in some sense present, commanding him. There is no precise distance which the two may be apart; but where a sheriff is endeavoring to make an arrest or preserve the peace, and he has called in others to help him, he is, though absent from the particular place occupied by them, to be deemed constructively present, within this rule, if his absence is in furtherance of the common design." The text of this distinguished author is admirably supported by the case of Coyles v. Hurtin, 10 Johns. 85, as will appear from the following extract from the opinion of Chief Justice Kent: "The sheriff is, quodam modo, present by his authority, if he be actually engaged in efforts to arrest dum fervet opus, and has commanded, and is continuing to command and procure, assistance. When he is calling upon the power of the county, or a requisite portion of it, to enable him to overcome resistance, it would be impossible that he should be actually present in every place where power might be wanting. The law is not so unreasonable as to require the officer to be an eye or ear witness of what passes, and to render all his authority null and void except when he is so present. He could not, upon that construction, use the power of the county with effect, and it would be attended with great inconvenience and danger to the administration of justice. The question in these cases does not turn upon the fact of distance, so long as the sheriff is within his county, and is bona fide and strictly engaged in the business of the arrest." In this connection, see, also, Com. v. Field, 13 Mass. 321, cited by Mr. Bishop. There is an obvious distinction between the officer's calling one to his assistance, and merely attempting to delegate his authority, and accomplish the arrest through the agency of third persons acting alone, as in the case of Rex v. Patience, 7 Car. & P. 775, where a constable, without attempting himself to execute a warrant in his hands, employed his two sons to make the arrest. In Kirbie v. State, 5 Tex. App. 60, it was held that persons called upon by an officer holding a warrant to assist in the arrest of a party charged with crime were protected, whether they had the warrant at the time of the attempted arrest or not. Under the facts as disclosed by the record now before us, we think the sheriff was at least constructively present when Powell was attempting to arrest Robinson, although the officer was not in sight at that time. He was using Powell to accomplish the arrest, just as though he had reached out his own arm, supposing it was physically possible for him to do so, over the entire distance, and had taken hold of the person of Robinson himself. Powell was really a mere physical agency employed by the sheriff, by means of which the officer was enabled to extend his presence to the scene of action. It was undoubtedly the right of the sheriff to do this, he, of course, being responsible for the consequences of Powell's acts so long as the latter conformed literally or substantially to the sheriff's orders. A sheriff on foot might be unable to overtake a fleeing prisoner who could run faster than the officer; but if he shouted to a bystander to seize the fugitive, and this was done, it would be a seizure by the sheriff; and this, we think, would be undoubtedly true, even though the fugitive ran out of the sheriff's sight before the bystander succeeded in overtaking and catching the escaping prisoner. The case before us is, in principle, within the class covered by this illustration. There is nothing in the case of Croom v. State, 85 Ga. 718, 11 S. E. 1035, contrary to what is here ruled. A warrant for the arrest of Croom was in the hands of the marshal of Ty Ty, who, without delivering it to Hamlin, a bailiff, showed it to him, and told him if he would arrest Croom, he (the marshal) would divide with Hamlin a reward of $25 which the former had been offered for making the arrest. Hamlin, without the warrant, and on his own account, went with a posse summoned by himself to the house of Croom's father, and was there killed by Croom. Under these circumstances, Chief Justice Bleckley very properly said, on page 722, 85 Ga., and page 1036, 11 S. E.: "The warrant, not being in the hands of Hamlin, but in the possession of the marshal of Ty Ty, who was not present, was no authority to Hamlin to make an arrest." Hamlin was in no sense acting as one of a posse summoned by the marshal. Indeed, the latter had nothing whatever to do with the attempted arrest, either in its inauguration or in the method adopted for its execution. Croom's Case, therefore, is similar to that of Rex v. Patience, supra; and Hamlin did not bring himself within the rule as stated in Whart. Hom. § 242, "that the warrant must be executed by the party named in it, or by some one assisting such party, either actually or constructively;" nor within the principle of Codd v. Cabe, 13 Cox, Cr. Cas. 202. There is also a distinction between the authority of an officer to arrest without a warrant in cases of felony and of misdemeanor. Thus, it has been said that "he may arrest any one of whom he has a reasonable suspicion that he has committed a felony, without waiting first to procure a warrant," but without first procuring such warrant "he may not arrest one who has committed . . . a misdemeanor out of his presence." See 13 Cr. Law Mag. pp. 177, 178, and cases cited. On the same line is the case of Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 169, in which it was held that a constable, having knowledge that a warrant had been issued for the arrest of a person charged with felony, could lawfully make the arrest without having the warrant in his possession. This case will also be referred to in connection with the question discussed in the next division of this opinion. We are fully convinced that the rule announced in the second headnote is both sound in principle and well supported by authority.

3. It appears that, when Powell grasped Robinson by his right arm, the former said, "I am deputized to arrest you," to which Robinson replied, "Show your authority," and the answer which Powell made to this demand was, "It don't make any difference; I have got to take you." Under these circumstances we think it was the duty of Powell to have informed Robinson of the existence of the warrant in the sheriff's hands, and also that he (Powell) was attempting to make the arrest under authority of this warrant, or at least that he had been commanded by the sheriff to do so. As a general rule, a known officer, in making an arrest, is not bound to exhibit his authority. Certainly, he is not absolutely required to do so before the accused person has submitted to the arrest; but after the submission the officer ought to make known the substance of the warrant, and for what cause and whence it issued. Where, however, one not a known officer is specially summoned to make an arrest, he ought, unless prevented by the conduct of the accused from so doing, to show the warrant upon demand, or, if it is not in his possession, it is his duty to state the authority under which he is acting. State v. Curtis, 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 471; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 191; Murfree, Sher. §§ 152, 153. Accordingly, it was said in Drennan's Case, supra, that a constable attempting to make an arrest for a felony without having the warrant in his possession ought to inform the person arrested of the facts, or at least of the offense for which he was apprehended. In this connection, see, also, 13 Cr. Law Mag. 343. Assuming, however, as sound law, that it is the duty of one who has been summoned by an officer to assist in making an arrest for a felony to explain to the person sought to be arrested the cause for which his apprehension is attempted, and the nature of the process under which the arresting party assumes the authority to act, the omission to perform this duty will not necessarily justify the person sought to be arrested in resisting the attempted arrest. If he in fact already knows, or on reasonable and probable grounds believes, that he is under a charge of felony, that a warrant has been issued for his arrest, and that the arrest attempted is really in consequence of the warrant and in execution of the same, he ought to submit peaceably to the arrest. If he refuses to do so under such circumstances, his resistance will be at his peril. "One who is guilty of a felony has no right to kill one who pursues him if he has notice of the object of the pursuit, whether the pursuer be an officer or a private person, or whether he be with or without a warrant." Kerr, Hom. § 189. See, also, the cases cited under this section. This doctrine is in complete harmony with that announced by this court in Snelling v. State, 87 Ga. 50, 13 S. E. 154, where it appeared that the accused killed one who was attempting to arrest him for a felony for which he had been indicted three years; the deceased being in fact an officer, though he did not disclose his character as such, or exhibit or mention the warrant under which he was acting. It was accordingly held in that case that, the circumstances showing that the accused, who was a fugitive from justice, must have apprehended the arrest, and realized the intention of the arresting party, the killing was murder. It was manifest that the accused was not in good faith resisting an attack which he had any right, under the circumstances, to believe was a mere unauthorized assault, it further appearing that before he fired the fatal shot the deceased had said to him, "Consider yourself under arrest." The same principle controlled the case of Ramsey v. State, (Ga.) 17 S. E. 614, in which it distinctly appeared that the accused knew the official character of the policeman attempting his arrest, and also that this policeman had been summoned by the wife of the accused to arrest the latter for beating her; and the officer plainly and distinctly announced his purpose to make the arrest for this breach of the peace, which had just taken place in his presence or hearing. If the demand made by Robinson for Powell's authority was a mere pretense, and he really knew, or ought to have known, why Powell was attempting to apprehend him, he had no right whatever to resist the arrest, and his conduct in so doing was totally unauthorized and unlawful. If, however, the demand for authority was made in good faith, and under real ignorance of the facts, for the purpose of eliciting information actually wanted and needed, resistance by Robinson, to any reasonable and proper extent, upon the failure of Powell to comply with this demand, would have been justifiable; and even the slaying of Powell might, under these circumstances, have been manslaughter only. It has been said that, "unless the slayer knows the official character of the deceased, the homicide is only manslaughter, where committed without deliberation; but, if the killing was clearly malicious and premeditated, the fact that the officer was acting under a void process is no mitigation or excuse. The same is true if the defendant had knowledge that the intended arrest was one which the officer had a right to make without a warrant." Kerr, Hom. § 98. The following is a correct and concise statement of the law applicable in such cases: "Notice of the official character of the officer to the person charged with killing him is a material question in all these inquiries. This notice may be express or implied. If there is no notification, either express or implied, by which we may say if the prisoner has no information of the officer's powers and intentions, or of the character in which the person is acting, the killing will be manslaughter only; otherwise, it will be murder." 13 Cr. Law Mag. p. 516, § 57, citing cases. If Robinson was acting in perfect good faith in making the demand and resisting the arrest, honestly believing Powell was making a totally unauthorized assault upon him, and if Powell made the first demonstration with a deadly weapon, and thus put Robinson in danger of life or limb, the killing by Robinson might have been altogether justifiable. Of course, we do not mean to express, or even intimate, what the real truth was. The killing of Powell by the accused presents a case of murder, voluntary manslaughter, or justifiable homicide, according to the facts as they may be found by the jury, in the light of the principles announced in this opinion.

4. Taking into view the charges of the court complained of and the refusals to charge, in connection with the entire charge of the court as sent up in the record, it is quite clear that the case was made to turn chiefly on the right and power of the deceased to make the arrest, irrespective of the manner in which that power was exercised, and of the failure of the deceased to respond fully to the demand made upon him for his authority, and without reference to the good or bad faith with which that demand was made. The case, therefore, was not properly submitted to the jury, and there should be a new trial. While it is true that the court read to the jury the sections of the Code defining voluntary manslaughter and justifiable homicide, he did not give appropriate instructions for applying either of these sections in conformity to the principles which ought, in view of the issues of fact involved, to have controlled the determination of the case.

Some other questions were made in the motion for a new trial, but, as they cannot possibly arise upon the next hearing, they require no notice at our hands. Judgment reversed.

2. A principal and an accessory before the fact may be charged jointly in one count of an indictment for murder.

3. Const. U. S. Amends. 4, 5, providing that the rights of the people to be secure in their persons and effects from unreasonable seizure shall not be violated, and that no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal case, have no application to the power of the state governments, but apply only to the powers of the federal government.

4. Nor does Const. U. S. Amend. 14, providing that no state shall make any law abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, extend the operation of the fourth and fifth amendments to the states.

5. In a murder trial, pieces of a newspaper found in defendant's room, which were apparently a part of the same paper from which gun wadding found at the place of the murder was torn, were competent evidence, where neither defendant was present when the pieces were discovered in the room, and there was no showing that defendants were compelled to furnish them as evidence against themselves.

6. The admission of evidence against themselves furnished by defendants under compulsion is not prejudicial error, where the court directed it to be stricken out, and instructed the jury not to consider it.

7. Circumstantial evidence is sufficient to support a verdict, if the jury believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, from such evidence, that the accused is guilty.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Fairfield county; W. H. Wallace, Judge.

Jasper Atkinson and John Atkinson were convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hanged, and they appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the indictment: "Indictment. State of South Carolina, County of Fairfield. At a court of general sessions begun and holden in and for the county of Fairfield, in the state of South Carolina, at Winnsborough, in the county and state aforesaid, on the third Monday of February in the year of our Lord 1893, the jurors of and for the county of Fairfield aforesaid, in the state of South Carolina aforesaid, that is to say, upon their oaths, present that Jasper Atkinson, on the 28th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1893, with force and arms, at Winnsborough, in the county of Fairfield and state aforesaid, in and upon one John H. Clamp, with a certain loaded shotgun, then and there, feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, did make an assault, and that the said Jasper Atkinson, him, the said John H. Clamp, with the loaded shotgun aforesaid, then and there, feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, did shoot, strike, penetrate, and wound, giving to the said John H. Clamp, thereby, in and upon the right side of the head of him, the said John H. Clamp, one mortal wound, of which said mortal wound the said John H. Clamp then and there instantly died. And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said Jasper Atkinson, him, the said John H. Clamp, in manner and form and by the means aforesaid, feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, did kill and murder. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that John Atkinson, late of the county and state aforesaid, before the said felony and murder was committed in manner and form aforesaid, to wit, on the 28th day of the same month of January aforesaid, with force and arms, at Winnsborough, in the county and state aforesaid, feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, did incite, move, procure, and hire, counsel, and command, the said Jasper Atkinson the said felony and murder in manner and form aforesaid to do and commit. Against the form of the act of the general assembly of the said state in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the same state aforesaid. M. J. Hough, Solicitor."

The exceptions of the defendants are as follows: "(1) Because his honor erred in sending the defendants back to the jail pending the consideration of the motion to quash the indictment; the defendants being thereby deprived of a constitutional right to be fully heard by themselves or their counsel, or by both, as they should elect. (2) Because his honor erred in refusing the defendants' motion to quash the indictment. (3) Because his honor erred in overruling the demurrer entered by the defendants to the said indictment. (4) Because his honor erred in that he should have held that the indictment, as to the defendant Jasper Atkinson, is fatally defective, in that it does not conclude, 'Against the peace and dignity of the state.' (5) Because his honor erred in that he should have held that the indictment as to the defendant John Atkinson, is fatally defective, in that it does not fully, fairly, plainly, substantially, and formally describe the offense for which he was held to answer. (6) Because his honor erred in admitting in evidence at the trial of this cause papers which had been illegally and wrongfully taken from the room of the defendant John Atkinson without a search warrant, and without authority of law, the rights of the said defendant under the constitution of this state, and under the constitution of the United States, being thereby violated. (7) Because his honor erred in admitting incompetent testimony against the defendants, over the objection of the said defendants duly taken. (8) Because his honor erred in admitting testimony against the defendants which was procured by compelling the said defendants to give evidence against themselves. (9) Because his honor erred in admitting testimony that the tracks leading from the place where the body of the deceased was found to the house of the deceased were the tracks of the defendant Jasper Atkinson, after it had been made to appear that the said defendant was forced to place his foot in the said tracks. (10) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'By way of illustration, these papers that were picked up there were circumstances. They have been proved before you. It has been argued to you by counsel what they point out, and you are to say what these papers prove; and if they, taken with all the other facts in the case, satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt, it is good testimony, and sufficient to support a verdict.' (11) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'It has also been suggested that I charge you that the circumstantial evidence must be consistent with the guilt of the defendants, and inconsistent with any other reasonable hypothesis. Of course, that is established law, and that is a question which a jury must determine for itself,'—the defendants imputing error to so much of this as remits a question of law to the jury, and leaves the jury to abide by the rule or not, at discretion.

James G. McCants and Ragsdale & Ragsdale, for appellants. M. J. Hough, for the State.

McIVER, C. J. The defendants were charged in the same indictment—Jasper Atkinson as principal, and John Atkinson as accessory before the fact—with the murder of one John H. Clamp, and the case came on for trial before his honor, Judge Wallace, and a jury. It is stated in the case, as prepared for argument here, that: "The defendants, through their counsel, at the proper time, before the jury was sworn, and before pleading to the indictment, entered a demurrer thereto, and moved to quash the same upon the following grounds: First, that, as to the defendant Jasper Atkinson, the indictment does not conclude, 'Against the peace and dignity of the state.' Secondly, as to the defendant John Atkinson, that the indictment does not state facts sufficient to constitute the offense, inasmuch as it does not fully, fairly, and formally describe the offense with which he is charged." Pending the hearing and consideration of this motion, the defendants were remanded to the jail; and, when the hearing and consideration of the motion were concluded, his honor directed that the prisoners be brought into court, and thereupon announced that the motion be overruled, and that the trial should proceed. During the progress of the trial, testimony was introduced on the part of the state, tending to show that tracks were found at the scene of the homicide, and going in the direction of the house at which the defendants were staying on the night when the deceased was shot and killed, which tracks witnesses undertook to identify as the tracks of the defendant Jasper Atkinson by reason of the fact that, when he placed his foot in one of the tracks, it fitted the same. But when it was made to appear that this defendant had been required by the officer in charge to put his foot in the tracks discovered, and to make other tracks by running, which could be compared with the others originally found, the circuit judge, on the motion of defendants' counsel, ordered the testimony as to the tracks, obtained by compulsion, to be stricken out, adding these words: "I will say to the jury now that no defendant can be compelled to make evidence against himself, just as he cannot be compelled to testify as to his guilt. If the defendant did anything voluntarily, that is competent.' Testimony was also offered on the part of the state tending to show that certain pieces of paper, parts of a newspaper, which were found in the room occupied by the defendant John Atkinson by some of the witnesses, corresponded with the paper picked up at the scene of the homicide, supposed, from the stains upon it of blood and brains, to have been the wadding of the gun with which the fatal shot was fired, inasmuch as the printing on these papers indicated that they were taken from the same newspaper article. After much other testimony, which need not be adverted to here, the case was submitted to the jury, after hearing the argument of counsel and the charge of the judge, who found both of the defendants guilty, and the defendants appealed upon the several grounds set out in the record, which need not be stated here in totidem verbis, but which should be so set out in the report of this case.

The first exception raises the question whether there was error in depriving the defendants of the alleged right to be present at the hearing of the motion to quash the indictment. The right of the accused to be present during every stage of his trial for a capital felony has long been settled, and is still fully recognized, but the question here is whether the motion to quash the indictment constitutes any part of the trial. As it seems to us, this motion is intended to test the question whether the defendants should be put upon their trial, for there can be no trial, in the legal sense of the term, until a valid indictment is presented. State v. Ray, Rice, 1. And hence the hearing of this motion cannot be regarded as any part of the trial, but rather a preliminary inquiry as to whether there should be a trial. Indeed, it cannot properly be said that a trial is commenced until the jury has been sworn and impaneled to try the issues presented by the pleadings, and duly charged therewith. This is shown by the form of proceeding laid down in Miller's Comp., at page 156, (a very useful publication, said to have been prepared under the supervision of one of our most distinguished judges,) where the language used is: " * * * Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and upon his arraignment he hath pleaded not guilty, and for trial hath put himself upon God and his country," etc. Then and from that time forward, during every stage of the trial, the accused has the right to be present, under the well-settled doctrine above stated. Of course, this does not preclude the right of the accused to be present while the jury is being impaneled, but that does not rest upon the general doctrine, but upon the necessity of the accused being present, so as to be able to exercise his right of challenge.

But it is urged that the defendants were denied the right secured to them by section 13 of article 1 of the constitution, to wit: "the right to be fully heard in his defense, by himself or by his counsel, or by both, as he may elect." Passing by the very obvious consideration that the accused cannot be assumed to have elected to be heard both by themselves and by their counsel upon a purely legal question, without some evidence to show that they had elected to be heard by themselves as well as by their counsel, it is sufficient to say that they have elected, in this case, to be heard only by their counsel, for the record so shows, as it is there stated "that the defendants, through their counsel, entered a demurrer thereto, and moved to quash the same;" and it is furthermore there stated that the demurrer was interposed and the motion was made "before the jury was sworn, and before pleading to the indictment." It seems to us clear, therefore, that the first ground of appeal cannot be sustained.

The second, third, fourth, and fifth exceptions all relate to the alleged insufficiency of the indictment, and may therefore be considered together. These exceptions proceed upon the unfounded assumption that there are two counts in the indictment; one charging the defendant Jasper as principal, and the other charging John Atkinson as an accessory before the fact. We cannot take this view of the indictment; and, on the contrary, we regard it as an indictment containing but a single count, in which the principal and accessory before the fact are charged jointly in the same count. This is not only approved, but recommended, by standard authorities on criminal law. See 1 Chitty Cr. Law, 272; 1 Russ. Crimes, 40; 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 7 et seq. The form of the indictment in this case (which should be incorporated in the report of the case) substantially conforms to the forms prescribed in 2 Chitty Cr. Law, 5; 1 Archb. Cr. Pl. & Pr. 77, (and see note at page 317, 7th Ed.) also, Bish. Cr. Proc. And as is said by Evans, J., in State v. Rabon, 4 Rich. Law, at page 263: "There is no doubt that the forms given in books of pleadings afford very strong evidence of legal principles. They are such as have been long used and approved in practice, and have stood the test of legal criticism." We do not think there was any error in overruling the demurrer and refusing the motion to quash the indictment.

The sixth exception imputes error to the circuit judge in admitting in evidence the pieces of paper found in the room of defendant John Atkinson, upon the ground that they were taken without a search warrant, and without authority of law, and in violation of the rights of the defendant, as secured to him by the constitution of this state and of the United States. The provisions of the constitution of the United States relied upon are the fourth, fifth, and fourteenth amendments, and the provisions of the constitution of this state may be found in sections 13 and 22 of article 1. In the fourth amendment of the constitution of the United States, it is declared that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated," etc. In the fifth amendment, it is declared that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," etc., while in the fourteenth amendment the declaration is: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," etc. In the first place, we do not understand that the limitations imposed by the fourth and fifth amendments have any application to the powers of the state governments, but apply only to the powers of the federal government. As was said by Waite, C. J., in Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S., at page 166, 8 Sup. Ct. 21: "That the first ten articles of amendment were not intended to limit the powers of the state governments in respect to their own people, but to operate on the national government alone, was decided more than a half century ago, and that decision has been steadily adhered to since;" citing numerous cases. Nor can it be said that the fourteenth amendment has the effect of extending the operation of the fourth and fifth amendments to the states; for, as was held in Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall., at page 171: "The amendment [speaking of the fourteenth] did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen. It simply furnished an additional guaranty for the protection of such as he already had." And the same doctrine was held in U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542. Besides, the same rights which are guaranteed by the fourth and fifth amendments to the constitution of the United States are expressly declared by sections 13 and 22 of article 1 of the state constitution; for in the former section the declaration is that no person shall "be compelled to accuse or furnish evidence against himself," while the language in section 22 is: "All persons have a right to be secure from unreasonable searches or seizures of their persons, houses, papers or possessions." The question now presented for our decision is, not whether the persons who found the pieces of paper in the room of the defendant John Atkinson violated any of his legal rights by entering his room without authority, but whether the papers there found could be offered in evidence in this case; for, while it may be possible that it was a technical trespass to enter his room without authority, yet it does not by any means follow that the pieces of paper there found could not be offered in evidence, for, as is said in 1 Greenl. Ev. § 254a: "It may be mentioned, in this place, that though papers and other subjects of evidence may have been illegally taken from the possession of the party against whom they are offered, or otherwise unlawfully obtained, this is no valid objection to their admissibil-ity, if they are pertinent to the issue. The court will not take notice how they were obtained, whether lawfully or unlawfully, nor will it form an issue to determine that question." There was nothing in the evidence tending to show that the defendants, or either of them, were compelled to furnish these papers, or that they were even asked to do so. Indeed, it seems that neither of the defendants were present, or even knew that the papers were found in the room, when they were found; and there can, therefore, be no pretense that the defendants were compelled to furnish these papers as evidence against them. The case of Boyd v. U. S., 118 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. 524, relied on by appellants, was a case in which the court was called upon to determine the validity of an order issued by the United States circuit court requiring the defendant to produce before the court his books and papers, to be used in evidence against him on the trial of a criminal case; and the court held that the circuit court had no power to issue such an order, as it was equivalent to an order compelling the defendant to testify against himself, in violation of the provisions of the fifth amendment of the constitution of the United States. This case, therefore, while very interesting, as furnishing an able and elaborate discussion of the right of exemption from unreasonable searches and seizures, has no application to the present inquiry. We are of opinion that the sixth exception cannot be sustained.

The seventh exception is too general to warrant any consideration at our hands.

The eighth and ninth exceptions—complaining, as they do, of the reception of evidence obtained by compelling the defendants to testify against themselves—may be considered together. They must be regarded as only relating to the testimony as to the tracks which were required by the officer to be made by the defendant, and putting his foot into one of the tracks. But this testimony, as we have seen, having been stricken out by the order of the circuit judge, together with his express direction to the jury that the testimony obtained by compulsion could not be considered by them, leaves these exceptions without any basis to rest upon, and must therefore be overruled. While, therefore, we do not propose to consider or decide the point, it may not be amiss to say that we find no little conflict among the authorities upon the subject, as may be seen by reference to the following cases: State v. Garrett, 71 N. C. 85; State v. Graham, 74 N. C. 646; Stokes v. State, 5 Baxt. 619; Walker v. State, 7 Tex. App. 245; State v. Ah Chuey, 14 Nev. 79; Blackwell v. State, 67 Ga. 76.

The tenth exception imputes error to the circuit judge in charging upon the facts. But we think this is an entire misconception of the charge. The quotation relied upon to sustain this exception plainly means that circumstantial evidence is quite sufficient to support a verdict, if the jury believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, from such evidence, that the accused is guilty. The circuit judge, clearly, did not express or even intimate any opinion whatever as to the force and effect of the circumstantial evidence relied upon, but left that to the jury.

The eleventh exception was not urged in the argument, but, as it was not abandoned, it becomes necessary for us to consider it. We are unable to perceive how it can be said, with any propriety, that any question of law was left to the jury, and hence there is no foundation for this exception.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose of having a new day assigned for the execution of the sentence heretofore imposed.

McGOWAN and POPE, JJ., concur.

STATE v. EZZARD.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 13, 1894.)

BREACH OF TRUST WITH FRAUDULENT INTENT — By AGENT—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Testimony that defendant "told me he had been consulting with some lawyers, and began fixing up some defense," warranted a charge that defendant saw fit, after taking advice, to stand his ground.

2. It was not error for the court to make general observations to the jury, which were insufficient as definitions, showed the advances in the law relating to the crime with which defendant was charged, had no direct bearing on such crime, and were not so intended.

3. Where defendant offered no evidence, and that offered by the state was uncontradicted, and consisted largely of defendant's admissions, the recital of such evidence in the charge was not obnoxious to the constitutional provision which forbids a charge on the facts.

4. A charge that defendant was guilty of a breach of trust if he retained money which belonged to the vendor of land, and which he received as his agent, was warranted by evidence that he received from the vendee $2,500 and an offer to buy at that price, and that he concealed such facts from the vendor, and induced him to accept $800 as the whole offer, and to execute to the vendee a deed which recited a consideration of $2,500.

5. An agent was guilty of breach of trust with fraudulent intent who knowingly received money which belonged to his principal, and converted it to his own use with a purpose to deprive the principal thereof.

6. The agent was guilty though the person who gave him the money did not direct him to deliver it to the principal.

7. On trial of an agent for breach of trust with fraudulent intent, the court properly refused to charge that, before larceny can be committed, the property must have come into the possession of the person from whom it is alleged to have been stolen, without a qualification to show that possession by the agent is possession by the principal.

8. Where a person assumes to act as agent, and both principal and agent act on such relation in the absence of any writing between them, such person is as guilty of breach of trust with fraudulent intent in receiving money of the principal and converting it to his own use against the principal's consent as though the relation between them arose by deed.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Barnwell county; J. H. Hudson, Judge.

T. W. Ezzard was convicted of breach of trust with fraudulent intent, and appeals. Affirmed.

The following are defendant's grounds of appeal: That the judge committed an error: (1) In stating in his charge to the jury that the defendant "saw fit, after taking advice of counsel, to stand his ground," when there is no evidence in the case warranting such a statement. (2) In charging the jury that one might commit a breach of trust by the act of counseling and advising another. (3) In charging the jury that "the heirs of Lewis Hill, owning certain lands in the state of Georgia, desired to get possession of the land, or rather convert the land into money. 'Well, with that view they saw fit and had to employ agents to set in motion certain agencies in order to get the facts in regard to their territory, and to effect the sale. They empowered no one to sell,—that is, to convey. There was no power of attorney. It is not pretended that there was. They employed counsel here. The legal counsel here could not spare the time and expense of going to Georgia and looking up all this land and titles thereto. They corresponded with and secured the services of this firm of gentlemen in Atlanta, and that firm, as one of them has stated to you, could not spare the time away from their office to travel in different portions of Georgia to look up the lands and to negotiate sales, and they called upon the defendant here, who it is said by this witness was probably more universally acquainted with the lands in all parts of the state of Georgia than any one he could pick up. He was engaged for his knowledge in that respect. He was selected therefor as the trusted agent, to search out and ascertain the facts in regard to these lands, and secure bids,'—when it was a material question in the case whether the Hill heirs had ever authorized or empowered any one to sell the land, or intrusted any one with the sale thereof, and there is no evidence in the case to prove that they did, but, on the contrary, the evidence is that they did not. (4) In charging the jury as follows: "He in turn spoke to others,—a Mr. Norman,—and through Mr. Norman this Mr. Perry was spoken to. Perry goes to work and makes a contract, after negotiation with Mr. Pope, who concluded he would pay a certain price for this land, ($2,500;) and the $2,500, in the shape of five checks, were intrusted to Mr. Perry by Mr. Pope. Perry engaged with Mr. Ezzard to come and meet him in Augusta. The two met in Augusta, and came on to Blackville; spent a short time there. They conferred together, and conspired to cheat these people out of their money. Now, that is the testimony of Perry. That is the sum and substance of it." And in so charging his honor charged facts which there was no evidence to support; and, even if the evidence sustained the charge, it was error of law to so charge upon the facts. (5) In charging the jury further as follows: "He had the $2,500 to pay for this land if the Hills would accept it. They concocted a plan by which they would get the land from the Hills for less—for $800—if they could, and pocket the balance, and make a division of it. They came over, and so managed their plans,—Ezzard and Perry,—and fooled the other parties by their false statements and false representations. They induced first the attorneys—the legal attorneys—to believe that $800 was the highest bid, who also impressed that upon the Hills; and, although it was a matter of surprise,—a matter of regret,—yet, confiding in these representations, the Hills made the titles as Perry drew them, and received their little pittance of the money, to wit, $400, according to the arrangement made with the attorneys here. This is a part of the representation of the facts as described a recital of the substance." And in so charging his honor is not sustained by the evidence, and committed error of law in charging the facts to the jury. (6) In charging the jury as follows: "The testimony of the state is that you have heard, however, the testimony of Mr. Maddox as to what occurred in Atlanta after the accomplishment of this swindle; that Mr. Ezzard gave his note for $1,500; the testimony of Mr. Perry as to the division of the spoils betwixt them after the $200 had been carried to the firm of Glenn & Maddox, and $100 to Ezzard. Perry says he got $500, and the balance ($1,000, I believe it was) Ezzard got. Now, these are the facts. And, in so charging, his honor is not sustained by the evidence, and committed an error of law in charging the facts to the jury. (7) In charging the jury as follows: "I instruct you, gentlemen, that any part of that money which he got here in South Carolina, delivered into his hands for the purpose of delivering to the Hills, it was a breach of trust for him not to deliver it to the Hills if they accepted the proposition of Pope,"—when there was no evidence whatever that any money was ever delivered to him to be delivered to the Hills, but, on the contrary, the evidence was that the money in question was not delivered to him for the purpose of delivering it to the Hills, but for a totally different purpose, and he applied it to the purpose for which it was delivered to him. (8) In charging the jury as follows: "It was money that belonged to the Hills, and he and Perry were both the agents of the Hills." (9) In charging the jury as follows: "Now, when Ezzard joined Perry in Augusta, and came with him here to Blackville, and from Blackville to Barnwell, the very time that that money passed into the hands of Ezzard it passed into his hands as agent of the Hills,"—when the evidence does not sustain the facts charged, and it was error of law to charge the facts, even if the proof sustained him in so doing. (10) In charging the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that that money went into his hands here, and he appropriated it to his own use, and he ought to have given it to the Hills, when he knew he ought to have given it to the Hills, he committed a breach of trust, and committed it with the deliberate intent to defraud the Hills." (11) In charging the jury as follows: "The question for you is that one hundred dollars which Ezzard appropriated here with a view to take up that check here, and Perry had no right to give to that money any other direction than the sacred trust with which it was given to him, and that sacred trust Ezzard knew, and they were united together to defraud these people of their money, and accomplished it to a large extent." And said error consists as well in charging the facts to the jury as in misstating the law on the subject under consideration. (12) In charging as follows: "I instruct you that if you are satisfied from the testimony that that one hundred dollars went into Ezzard's hands here, and it ought to have gone to the Hills, when he knew it ought to have gone to the Hills, that was a breach of trust, and he did it with a view to defraud them here in Barnwell county." (13) In refusing to charge the jury, as requested by defendant's attorney, as follows: "That to make out the crime charged in the indictment, namely, breach of trust with a fraudulent intent, three things must concur: First, a trust must have been reposed in relation to something of which the crime of larceny could be committed; second, there must have been a breach of that trust; third, the breach of trust must have been committed with a fraudulent intent." (14) In refusing to charge the jury, as requested by the defendant's attorney, as follows: "That the indictment charging that the sum of one hundred dollars was delivered by Perry to Ezzard, to be by him delivered to the Hills, and the breach of trust consisted of his failure to deliver it to the Hills, but, on the contrary, he appropriated it to his own use,—that if the jury find from the evidence that the one hundred dollars in question was not delivered to Ezzard to be by him delivered to the Hills, that then and in that event the charge laid in the indictment is not sustained by the evidence, and the defendant should be acquitted." (15) In refusing to charge the jury, as requested by defendant's attorney, as follows: "The statute under which the defendant is indicted did not create any new offense, but only extended the crime of larceny at common law to cases in which the property stolen was in the legal possession of the accused at the time of the conversion." (16) In refusing to charge the jury, as requested by defendant's attorney, as follows: "That before larceny can be committed of any property it must have come into the possession of the person from whom it is alleged to have been stolen." (17) In refusing to charge the jury, as requested by the defendant's attorney, as follows: "That joint tenants or tenants in common have not an ownership as against each other upon which an indictment for larceny can be sustained." (18) In refusing to charge the jury, as requested by defendant's attorney, as follows: "That, if the Hills never had any legal title to the money—the $100—in question, the crime charged in the indictment could not have been committed as of their goods, and that they could not have any claim or right to the money until after they conveyed the land of which it is claimed to be a part of the purchase money; and, since they received for the land all that they contracted to take, they never acquired such a title to the balance, of which the $100 in question formed a part, as will support the charge laid in the indictment, if the jury find from the evidence that such are the facts." (19) In refusing to charge the jury, as requested by defendant's attorney, as follows: "That if the jury find from the evidence that the Hills never authorized the defendant to sell their land, or otherwise constituted him their agent to sell their land, then, and in that event, the defendant did not commit a breach of trust with a fraudulent intent in failing to account to them for any portion of the money for which the land was sold."

Robert Aldrich and W. P. Price, for appellant. Mr. Murphy, for the State.

POPE, J. The appellant was convicted of the crime of breach of trust with fraudulent intent in the court of general sessions for Barnwell county, in this state, at the November term, 1892, of such court, and, after having been duly sentenced, appealed to this court on 19 grounds. These grounds may be thus classified: First, errors in the charge of the circuit judge to the jury; second, errors in the refusal of the circuit judge to charge certain requests to charge made by defendant. The first class contains the first to the twelfth exceptions, inclusive. The second class contains the thirteenth to the nineteenth exceptions, inclusive.

In effect, the first exception imputes error to the circuit judge in stating to the jury that the defendant saw fit, after taking advice of counsel, to stand his ground, when there was nothing in the evidence to warrant such a statement. In this conclusion the appellant is not supported, for in the testimony of the witness C. D. Maddox this appears: "He (Ezzard) told me he had been counseling with some lawyers, and began fixing up some defense" This statement of the witness had been preceded by an explanation as to defendant, Ezzard, having executed a note secured by a mortgage of land for the $1,700 in question between Ezzard and the Hill heirs. The exception is overruled.

Appellant next assails the charge of the judge when he stated that one might be guilty of breach of trust by counseling and advising another. By reference to the charge of the judge it will be seen that he indulged in some general observations tending to the information of the jury of the different advances in the law looking to the repression of violation of trusts. The expression complained of by the appellant is one of such expressions as is made manifest by reproducing this part of the judge's charge: "Counseling and advising another is breach of trust. Obtaining goods under false pretenses is; and so, likewise, he who sells property under a lien without the permission of the holder of the lien, and who withholds property under levy. The statutes have multiplied so as to cover all species of dishonesty in dealing with our fellow men." While, in some instances, these expressions are not full enough to answer as definitions, still they have no direct bearing upon the offense with which the defendant is charged. They were not so intended by the judge. It will be observed that when the circuit judge undertakes to define the offense of breach of trust with fraudulent intention he is much more careful. This exception, therefore, is not well taken.

The next point raised in this group of exceptions is that set up in appellant's third exception, embracing three-quarters of a printed page of the judge's charges, wherein is set forth a narrative of the matters testified to by the witnesses which were uncontradicted in this case. The appellant suggests, in this connection, that by this course on the part of the judge the question of the employing of any one by the Hill heirs to sell their lands situated in the state of Georgia was practically settled by him in the absence of any testimony to support such employment. The testimony clearly shows that in the absence of any express authority, such as a power of attorney from the Hill heirs, or a written direction, signed by them, the defendant, Ezzard, as the agent of the Hill heirs, did not only attempt to sell their lands by making a bargain therefor, subject, of course, to their ratification of such bargain, but that by his fraudulent representations the Hill heirs did actually sign a deed of conveyance carrying into effect this bargain so made by Ezzard, as their agent, with a Mr. Pope, of Albany, in the state of Georgia. There was no denial of these facts. Under such circumstances we can see no error on the part of the judge in this particular.

In the fourth, fifth, sixth, and ninth exceptions it is suggested that the judge charged upon the facts in the particulars therein enumerated. Let it be remembered that in this case the defendant offered no evidence. It was all offered by the state. No contradiction was attempted. Much of it related to the admissions of the defendant to several persons before his trial, and which were not denied by him. Under such circumstances the recital by the circuit judge in his charge to the jury of such uncontradicted testimony was not obnoxious to that provision of our constitution forbidding a judge from charging upon the facts. We do not know that we can any more clearly express our meaning in relation to this matter than by quoting the language in the judgment of this court as it is set out in the case of Moore v. Railroad Co., 16 S. E. 791: "What is meant by the judge charging upon the facts? It seems to us it may be said to occur when, in the progress of a trial, the circuit judge conveys by word his opinion of the sufficiency or insufficiency of certain testimony necessary to the determination by the jury of some fact at issue between the parties litigant. * * * This court, in construing this section of the constitution, has held that any expression of the circuit judge in his charge that did not relate to the issues being tried by the jury, that were not pertinent to such issues, did not fall within the interdicted action on the part of the judge. State v. Sims, 16 S. C. 495; State v. Corbin, Id. 545. * * * But great emphasis is laid on the manner employed by the judge in stating the testimony. This court has decided that, while he may not charge upon the facts, yet he may state the testimony in its logical order, and as bearing upon certain issues. In Benedict v. Rose, Id. 630. It was said: 'Accordingly the constitution declares that he has the right to state the testimony and declare the law. What is the proper scope and extent of this power? It has been properly held that stating the testimony means more than repeating it. It includes the idea of stating it in its logical relations to the propositions it is to support or contradict, as well as to the principles of law by which it bearing and force ought to be controlled, or, as it is expressed by the technical phrase, "summing up."'" All difficulty in overruling these objections vanishes when they are carefully considered in the light of these decisions.

The seventh exception imputes error to the circuit judge for having charged that if the defendant, as the agent of the Hill heirs, received any money belonging to his principals it was a breach of trust in the defendant to retain such money, on the ground there was no evidence adduced at the trial to support such a proposition. We take a different view of the testimony relating to this branch of the case from that entertained by the learned counsel of the appellant. No doubt his error arises from the standpoint he occupies, for it is evident he views his client's relation to the Hill heirs to be circumscribed by the $800 for which they were actually selling their lands in question while their minds were being controlled by the false representations of the defendant; whereas the true position is this: This agent had induced Judge Pope, of Albany, Ga., to send an offer of $2,500 for said lands, which said sum of $2,500 actually accompanied said offer, and was in the power and control of said defendant as the agent of the Hill heirs at the very moment said Hill heirs, ignorant of these last facts, accepted a part thereof ($800) as the whole of Judge Pope's offer, and the deed, signed by the Hill heirs, to Judge Pope, for their lands, covered in amount, as the consideration therefor, not only $2,500, but really $5,000. Thus it is apparent that the purchaser, Pope, had in the hands of Ezzard, as the agent of the heirs of Hill, the sum of $2,500 of cash, or its equivalent, which became the property of the heirs of Hill the moment they made a deed for the lands in question at or over the sum of $2,500. There was an abundance of testimony in support of all these facts to avoid the claim of the appellant that such was not the case. Let this exception be overruled.

The eighth exception imputes error in the charge of the judge as to the money in the hands of Ezzard and his accomplice as the agents of the heirs of Hill. The statement we have made in the consideration of the seventh exception, taken in connection with the other evidence in this case, justified the circuit judge in charging this legal proposition if the jury found the facts, sworn to by every witness, and denied or contradicted by no one, to be true. If the facts sworn to were true, the circuit judge was right. Every dollar of the $2,500 was the property of the heirs of Hill, and the attorneys would have had an equity against these proceeds of sale. This exception must be overruled.

The tenth exception must be overruled because of our views already expressed in treating of seventh and eighth exceptions.

The eleventh exception relates to the unfolding of the law by the circuit judge that the accomplice of Ezzard, and Ezzard himself, both being agents of the heirs of Hill, and as such holding funds that became the property of their principals, the heirs of Hill, the moment they signed the deed for the land in question to Judge Pope, of Albany, Ga., at a consideration in said deed equal to or beyond $2,500, could not give a direction to said funds by which its legal ownership could be changed, certainly as long as it remained in the hands or control of Ezzard as the agent of the heirs of Hill. It made no possible difference that the accomplice of Ezzard, while on the stand as a witness, stated that he paid no $100 to Ezzard for him (Ezzard) to pay to the Hill heirs. If the money belonged to the heirs of Hill, which fact was known to Ezzard, and he received it while the agent of such heirs, and converted such money to his own use, with a purpose to defraud and deprive such heirs of Hill of their money, it was a breach of trust with a fraudulent intent. This was no error.

The twelfth exception relates to the judge's charge as to the law provided the jury found a certain state of facts. We think the circuit judge committed no error here. In his charge, as before remarked, he had indicated to the jury what the law included in the charge of a breach of trust with a fraudulent intent. This language, here complained of, does not militate against such definition.

2. By the case, as agreed upon by both appellant and respondent, it nowhere appears that the circuit judge refused to charge any of the requests of the defendant (appellant.) We are bound by the case, and, if it fails to show any matter, we cannot allow counsel in their argument to bring it to our attention for the first time. It is a dangerous practice. But we will waive this matter.

The fourteenth exception relates to an alleged refusal by the circuit judge to charge defendant's request. The circuit judge was right in not charging this request in the form it was presented. The $100 paid by the accomplice to Hill as the agent of the heirs of Hill may not have been paid to said Ezzard to be delivered to the Hills, yet, if it came into the hands of Ezzard with a full knowledge that it was the property of his principals, the heirs of Hill, and he deliberately converted said sum of money to his own use, with a fraudulent intent, he would still be guilty. We know the indictment charged that Ezzard committed this breach of trust which consisted in not delivering the sum of $100 which had been delivered to Ezzard to be delivered to the heirs of Hill. The crime, to exist, even under this indictment, did not need that the accomplice of Ezzard had any purpose or gave any direction that Ezzard would deliver this $100 so delivered to him to be by him delivered to the heirs of Hill. The duty of delivery of that money existed independent of any will or intent in the accomplice of Ezzard when he turned it over to Ezzard.

The fifteenth exception is not sustained by the charge of the judge, for he did explain that the old crime of larceny had become too narrow to catch some of these latter-day bad men, and that the legislature had in its wisdom extended the boundaries of larceny at the common law.

The sixteenth exception complains that the circuit judge did not hold that before a larceny can be committed of any property it must have come into the possession of the person from whom it is alleged to be stolen. We are very glad the circuit judge did not charge this proposition without ample qualification. What will amount to the owner's possession when he has agents employed to gather in his money or other property? Surely it will not be contended that the owner must first lay his hands on such property, and then from his hands turn it over to the agent, so that thereafter, if he steals such property, he may be found guilty of breach of trust with a fraudulent intent. Would not such agent be just as guilty if he received as the agent of the owner the personal property, and committed a theft of it before it actually ever touched the principal's hands? Or, in other words, is not the possession of the agent the possession of the principal? If the last be correct law, the circuit judge would have been charging an abstract or speculative question of law if he had followed appellant's suggestion as to this request.

Appellant asked the judge to charge that joint tenants or tenants in common have not an ownership, as against each other, upon which an indictment for larceny would be sustained. The judge very properly refused to charge an abstract proposition of law. No doubt the learned judge realized that it was good law. Unfortunately for appellant, there was no testimony to this effect in the case, and the law implied no such relation. Let the exception be overruled.

Appellant, by his eighteenth exception, imputes error to the circuit judge because of his failure to charge as requested: "That, if the Hills never had any legal title to the money, —the $100 in question,—the crime charged in the indictment could not have been committed as of their goods, and that they could not have any claim or right to the money until after they conveyed the land of which it is claimed to be a part of the purchase money; and, since they received for the land all that they contracted to take, they never acquired such a title to the balance, of which the $100 in question formed a part, as will support the charge laid in the indictment, if the jury find from the evidence that such are the facts." The circuit judge very properly refused to charge this request. The facts testified to do not support such a proposition. As before remarked, Judge Pope, of Albany, Ga., agreed to pay, and did pay, the sum of $2,500 for this land. The deed executed by the heirs of Hill was for $5,000,—a consideration. In no case did the heirs of Hill recite in their deed $800 as their consideration therefor to Judge Pope. This $2,500 was actually received of Judge Pope by Ezzard and his accomplice as the agents of the Hill heirs, and the $100 in question was a part of such $2,500, every dollar of which belonged to the Hill heirs.

The nineteenth exception alleges error in the trial judge in refusing to charge "that, if the jury find from the evidence that the Hills never authorized the defendant to sell their land, then, and in that event, the defendant did not commit a breach of trust with a fraudulent intent in failing to account to them for any portion of the money for which the land was sold." This request was too narrow to fit the facts in testimony. Ezzard could get into possession of the money of the Hill heirs without any formal power of attorney. An agency can be created in other ways than that created by deed. If an agency actually exists, if such a relation as principal and agent is recognized and acted upon by both principal and agent, in the absence of any writing between the parties, the consequences are just as fixed in the one case as in the other; and he who, as agent of his principal, receives the property of such principal, and, if personal property, converts it to his (the agent's) use, against the consent of the principal, and with a felonious intent, is just as guilty as if the relation of principal and agent arose under a deed.

It follows, therefore, that the exceptions must be overruled. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

GIVINS et al. v. CARROLL.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 23, 1894.)

SUBROGATION TO LIEN OF MORTGAGE — PARTITION — ACCOUNTING.

1. When a sale under a power is void for irregularity, the purchaser is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, which are regarded as assigned to him; and one who buys in the land at a judicial sale under partition proceedings by the purchaser's heirs, though the deed given him is without warranty, acquires all the rights of the heirs at the time of sale.

2. He can only enforce the mortgage, however, to the extent of the amount paid by the purchaser at the illegal sale under the power.

3. Where A. owes B. a debt bearing interest, and B. owes A., for the rent of land, a sum payable annually, but in excess of the annual interest due on the debt to A., on an accounting each year's rent shall be applied, first, to extinguish the interest, and the balance on the principal.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Barnwell county; L. B. Fraser, Judge.

Action by I. M. Givins and others against E. D. Carroll for the possession of land and for rents and profits. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs' appeal. Modified.

Patterson & Holman and B. T. Rice, for appellants. Laurie T. Izlar and L. G. Mayfield, for respondent.

POPE, J. On the 16th day of February, 1878, one W. R. Lard executed a mortgage of a plantation of land in Barnwell county in this state, containing 255 acres, to secure a debt of $1,000, to one Allen J. Weathersbee. The said Lard died in November, 1879, survived by the plaintiffs as his only heirs at law and next of kin. In January, 1880, Allen J. Weathersbee, claiming to act under a power of attorney embodied in the mortgage, sold such lands at public sale, and at the price of $700 conveyed said lands to one W. D. Bist as the highest bidder. Subsequently, W. D. Bist died, (in the year 1883.) All his heirs at law united in an action of partition, under which such tract of land was sold and conveyed by the master for Barnwell county to the defendant, E. D. Carroll, at the price of $1,025. The plaintiffs, as the heirs at law of said W. R. Lard, deceased, brought action to recover said lands from the defendant, as well as rents and profits. The defendant contested their right to recover, interposing for his protection his subrogation to all the rights of Allen J. Weathersbee under the mortgage of W. R. Lard to him, (Weathersbee.) The matters came on to be heard before his honor, Judge Fraser, at the spring term of the court of common pleas for Barnwell, on an agreed state of facts and exceptions to the report of the master, Patterson. The decree of the circuit judge sustains the right of defendant, Carroll, to be subrogated to all the rights of Allen J. Weathersbee under his mortgage for $1,000; that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the rents and profits from the year 1880, which were fixed at the sum of $877; but required interest to be paid on the mortgage debt of $1,000 from 5th January, 1880, to date of decree, with an allowance for improvements and taxes for $173.35. These items allowed the defendant aggregated $2,094.24, from which he deducted $877, before referred to, thus leaving the land liable, when sold, to pay defendant $1,217.24. The land was ordered to be sold. The plaintiffs contend that such decree was erroneous, and should be reversed, on four grounds, which we will now notice, but not in their order.

First, "Because his honor erred in holding that the sale of the land, mentioned and described in the complaint herein, by the mortgagee, Allen J. Weathersbee, and the conveyance by him to W. D. Bist, and the sale of the land by the master in a partition among the heirs of the said Bist, and the purchase of the same at the said sale by the defendant, Carroll, operated as a transfer of the Weathersbee mortgage to the said Carroll." We have been unable to agree with the appellants in this proposition, and will now give our reasons therefor. It may be proper to observe, at the outset, that the parties to this contention recognized the fact that under the decisions of this court the sale of the lands attempted to be made by Allen J. Weathersbee to W. D. Bist was void for two reasons: First, because the power of sale contained in the mortgage of Lard was revoked by the death of said Lard, (Johnson v. Johnson, 27 S. C. 309, 3 S. E. 606;) and, second, the deed executed by Weathersbee, the donee of the power, was executed in the name of the donee, and not in that of his principal, (Webster v. Brown, 2 S. C. 429; De Walt v. Kinard, 19 S. C. 292; Dendy v. Waite, 36 S. C. 569, 15 S. E. 712.) Let us now resume the consideration of this ground of appeal. The intention of Weathersbee, in his attempt to sell the lands in question on the 5th of January, 1880, was to obtain the payment of his mortgage, and when, in furtherance of this intention, he received $700 in cash from Bist, it was intended by him, in law and in fact, to part with his whole interest in his mortgage, so far as the same was a lien upon this tract of land. That his deed did not operate to convey a legal title to said land was Bist's misfortune, but that deed certainly operated to assign in equity such mortgage to Bist so far as such land was concerned. In Lard's mortgage to Weathersbee there is a general warranty extending to Weathersbee, his heirs and assigns, forever. Such a covenant extended to Bist. Mr. Jones, in his work on Mortgages, at section 1902 (volume 2) says: "If the sale under the power is subsequently declared void for any irregularity, a purchaser who has paid the purchase money is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee under the mortgage, which is regarded as assigned to him. * * *" This doctrine has been fully recognized and enforced by this court. Stoney v. Shultz, 1 Hill, 465; Bredenberg v. Landrum, 32 S. C. 215, 10 S. E. 958. But it is contended by the appellants that however true this may be as to Bist, yet the defendant, Carroll, purchased at a judicial sale, in an action by Bist's heirs at law, and he only holds the deed of the master, which is confessedly without warranty. While all this is true, it must be remembered that the defendant, Carroll, as the purchaser at such judicial sale, became invested with all the rights and equities touching this land that were owned, at the time of its sale, by the heirs of Bist. A very interesting statement of the law in this state on this matter is embodied in the opinion of the present chief justice in the case of Lowrance v. Robertson, 10 S. C. 31, where he said: "Now, by what alone do these plaintiffs [Lowrance had bought at a sale made by the clerk of court for partition among Pearse's heirs at law] bring this action? Certainly, as the assignees of Pearse, for, though the deed was not made directly to them by Pearse, yet Miller, as the clerk, under the order of the court conveyed to the plaintiffs all the right, title, interest, and estate of Pearse, including the right of action on Caldwell's covenant, upon its breach; as fully and completely as if Pearse himself had conveyed directly to the plaintiffs. This was distinctly decided in the case of McCrady v. Brisbane, 1 Nott & McC. 104, as to a purchaser at sheriff's sale, and the doctrine has been repeatedly recognized since, down to the case of McKnight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. Eq. 222; and, if this be true as to purchasers at an involuntary sale made by the sheriff under execution, how much more true it would be as to a purchaser at a sale made by the proper officer, under an order of the court for partition, or some other purpose necessary to the settlement of an estate, where all the parties in interest are before the court." It follows, therefore, that this difference here suggested does not alter the status of this defendant, Carroll, as to this mortgage.

We will next consider the exception numbered by the appellant as third: "Because his honor should have held, admitting that the doctrine of subrogation could and did apply in Carroll's favor, that he could only hold and enforce the mortgage to the extent of seven hundred dollars, the amount paid by Bist at the illegal sale made by the said Allen J. Weathersbee, as the said Carroll claimed immediately under the said Bist." We think this exception should be sustained. When Bist paid Weathersbee $700 he thought he was purchasing the land in question at that price as its value. Such price so paid was not an extinguishment of the debt due Weathersbee by Lard, but only such portion of the debt as was secured by the land pledged to secure the debt. Equity would only subrogate Bist to such a proportion of the debt as was secured by the mortgage. The sale ascertained the portion of the debt so secured by the mortgage. This view does not, when well considered, impeach the correctness of the rule laid down by this court in the cases of Lowrance v. Robertson, supra, or Bredenberg v. Landrum, supra. In the first-cited case the inquiry was confined to the construction of the statute of this state fixing a rule for damages for breach of a covenant arising under a general warranty where a vendee had been evicted by title paramount; and the court there decided that the words of the statute, "In any action or suit for reimbursement or damage upon covenant or otherwise, the true measure of damages shall be the amount of the purchase money at the time of alienation, with legal interest," should be applied to the alienation by Caldwell to Pearse, and not that of Miller, as clerk, to Lowrance, (Caldwell had received $5,000 as the purchase money from Pearse, while Miller, as clerk, had only received $4,000 from Lowrance,) because it was Caldwell's contract that was being enforced, and any liability of his executor, Robertson, only existed by reason of Caldwell's contract. In its last analysis it seems to us this cited case tends to sustain the view we here suggest and maintain; for it is Weathersbee's contract with Bist which connects Carroll with this mortgage, and in that view $700 was the portion of the debt, as secured by this mortgage, that was assigned, by operation of law, by Weathersbee to Bist, and through Bist's heirs to Carroll. In the case of Bredenberg v. Landrum, supra, it is true this court did hold that "where a party, at the instance of the mortgagor, advances less than the mortgage in the purchase of a mortgage, judgment creditors of the mortgagor cannot object to the recovery of the full original debt by the assignee;" but this was in a case where all the mortgagees had expressly assigned, in writing, all their interests in the mortgage to Landrum, and where Landrum had only paid $3,000 for a $4,000 mortgage. This court only recognized in that case the right of persons under no disabilities to contract for the sale of their property at their own price, and denied to strangers any right to question such conduct when it was confessedly bona fides. In the case at bar we are called upon to enforce an equity growing out of a contract, and for which equity the parties themselves made no direct provision. Under such circumstances it seems to us that such equity should be confined and made operative within the limits of the transaction of the parties to it.

The second exception seems well taken. Its language is: "Because his honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs were not entitled to interest on the rents of said land as the same accrued, whereas it is submitted that his honor should have held that the rents should have been applied in the accounting annually to the satisfaction and discharge of the mortgage debt, and that he should have overruled the master's report in this respect." We do not mean to sustain the exception in the form in which it is presented. The underlying idea embodied in the exception amounts to this: If A. is indebted to B. by an obligation bearing interest, and B., at the same time such indebtedness subsists, is indebted to A. for sums of money that accrue and become payable at the beginning of each year, when an account is taken in chancery of such mutual indebtedness, if the sums of money due by B. to A. exceed the interest due on the contract of A. to B., this excess should be applied to the extinguishment of interest, and thereafter to the principal, as far as it will do so. Take this as an illustration of our views: If A. owes B. a debt of $700, evidenced by a note wherein interest is fixed at 7 per cent., at the end of the first year A. owes B., on such debt, $749. But suppose, when the debt is contracted, B. is in possession of a tract of land belonging to A., whose rental value is $50 for that first year, and for any cause this mutual indebtedness is carried into chancery; will not A. be held to have his debt due to B., of $749, reduced by the $50 due by B. to A. for rent? Would not the same principle be applied if the debt had run at interest for several years, on the one hand, and the indebtedness for rent had run on for a corresponding period? This would be so, not because the rent bears interest, (the payment of interest is a matter of contract,) but because in equity such mutual indebtedness, accruing and maturing at stated intervals, is subject to such a rule. Now, in the case at bar, on the 1st day of January, 1880, the heirs at law owed, so far as the assets of their ancestor descended to them would pay, to Carroll, the defendant, the sum of $700 at 7 per cent. interest, and therefore this indebtedness on the 1st January, 1881, amounted to $749. But, on the other hand, Carroll owed these heirs at law, on the 1st January, 1881, the sum of $50 for the rent of their lands. The true amount of this indebtedness on the 1st January, 1881, was the $749, less the rent of $50, to wit, $699. This last amount of $699, with interest, amounted, on the 1st January, 1882, to $747.93, but Carroll owed the heirs rent on that day, $50. The true amount due by plaintiffs to Carroll on the 1st January, 1882, was $697.93. Plaintiffs owed Carroll, on the 1st January, 1883, $746.79, less $50 for rent,—really, $696.79. Plaintiffs owed Carroll, on the 1st January, 1884, $745.57, less $50 for rent,—really, $695.57. Continuing this process to the amounts due by the parties to each other, and governed by the findings of fact, from which there is no appeal, down to the 1st January, 1892, the plaintiffs will owe, as the balance of the mortgage debt due at that date, $382.55. But at that date the plaintiffs also owed Carroll $173.35 for improvements and taxes. The whole indebtedness at that date would be $555.90, and this sum, with interest to the 1st January, 1893, would amount to $594.81. Applying the rent for 1893 at $90 per annum would leave the lands in the heirs' hands liable to pay Carroll $504.81. The decree in the circuit court should provide that if the heirs at law of Lord (the plaintiffs) do pay to the defendant the sum of $504.81, and the costs of this action, by a day certain, to be named in the decree, the lands should be turned over to the plaintiffs with any rents for the year 1894, but that, in the event of their failure to pay these sums, then the lands in question should be sold, and the proceeds of sale applied to costs and the debt of Carroll, and thereafter such proceeds as remain be paid to the plaintiffs.

The last exception relates to the findings of fact by the circuit judge and master. When scrutinized under the light of the decisions of this court regulating the same, no error is manifested. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be modified in the particulars herein indicated, and for that purpose that the action be remanded to that court, with directions that such modifications be there decreed.

STATE v. McINTOSH.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 17, 1894.)

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—DEFENDING HOUSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In a murder case, where the killing by defendant was admitted, an instruction that to make out a case of self-defense it is necessary for defendant to prove his innocence by a preponderance of the evidence, followed by an instruction that the state must make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt, is not open to the construction that defendant, in the first instance, is bound to prove his innocence.

2. That defendant may avail himself of the plea of self-defense, it must appear that he was so assaulted that he believed that there was no other probable means of escape.

3. Defendant cannot avail himself of the right to protect his house, where he shoots his invited guest in his house without notice to leave.

4. An instruction that, if the jury believed certain things, then it would be manslaughter, does not charge on the facts.

5. Error in an instruction on murder as to malice, which does not enter into manslaughter, is not available where the conviction was merely of manslaughter.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Abbeville county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

Singleton A. McIntosh was convicted of homicide, and appeals. Affirmed.

The charge of the court was as follows:

"Mr. Foreman and Gentlemen of the Jury: The defendant in this case is charged in this indictment with the murder of a fellow being, and it involves, of course, questions of fact as well as questions of law. The first question for your consideration is, did the defendant kill the person who is alleged to have been killed, and, if he is guilty of any offense, what offense is he guilty of, if he did the killing? There are two degrees of murder which are offenses against the law,—murder and manslaughter,—but justifiable homicide, the third degree, is no offense against the law; and therefore you will take notice particularly of these three different grades of homicide. The highest grade of homicide is murder. Murder is the felonious killing of any person with malice aforethought, either express or implied. Excusable homicide is rendered so by several reasons which operate to a justification or excuse in law that is wholly excusable. And, gentlemen, some confusion might, perhaps, be in your mind to distinguish the manner of proof as to the different grades of homicide. Now, there have been different witnesses sworn upon the stand. I don't mean to say that they have all been consistent in their statements. But the defense, in not putting up any testimony, insist that the case has not been made out by the state; that is to say, if you take that testimony,—so much of it as you can possibly believe, and do believe,—and formulate a theory out of which it will show a state of facts which would excuse this defendant as to the killing, which is admitted to have occurred, and you would not have any doubt about that if it were presented to you singly, as in the case where a man is executed, and it is brought to your attention that he had been executed under a proper mandate of the court, it would appear clearly that it was a justifiable homicide; and so you need not be confused when the question comes up for your consideration in locating the character of the crime as between self-defense and justifiable homicide, or whether or not it was by reason of self-defense. Don't let that confuse you in the one case or the other. It would be necessary for it to appear that the defendant had not been proven to be guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. In the case of the sheriff, if he would hang a man, and if he did not produce the authority, although he had it, but if he did not produce it, he might be considered guilty of murder; or, if he hung the man at a different place from where he was ordered to hang him, he would be guilty of murder; but you would say that the sheriff had not been proven legally guilty by the teatimony offered by the state. Now, gentlemen, in order to make out a case of self-defense, it is necessary for the defendant to prove his innocence by a preponderance of the testimony; and the state must make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt, when you take all of the testimony in the case into consideration, and you must believe all of it beyond a reasonable doubt before you can convict him. Now, in order to avail one's self of the plea of self-defense, it must appear that he was without fault in bringing about the difficulty,—that at the time he struck the fatal blow he was so assaulted that he believed that he had no other probable means of escape from immediate death or from immediate serious bodily harm. And the defendant must not only have believed that himself, but he must act upon that belief, subject to your judgment that a man of ordinary firmness and resolution, endeavoring to obey the law, would have believed the same thing under similar circumstances, in which the defendant was placed at the time.

“Now, gentlemen, you are ready to begin to apply the more minute definitions of the different degrees of homicide. Murder is the killing of any person with malice aforethought, either express or implied. ‘Malice’ is a technical term. Ordinarily we use the term as if it was a grudge or hatred. If there was any grudge or hatred, and the killing is upon that grudge or hatred, that is express malice; and that express malice is evidenced by certain deliberation,—by such deliberation as lying in wait and shooting from ambush. That would be a very great evidence of express malice. And so, gentlemen, if one deliberately and intentionally poisons another, it must be upon an old grudge. Implied malice is malice implied from the law itself. Every killing, if nothing more occurred except the killing, would be upon an implied malice. But you are to take into consideration that that is implied by law,—it is a presumption of the law. And, whenever the facts and circumstances attending the killing have been developed before you, the law does not imply any malice, but it affords you room for the exercise of your judgment, and it gives you certain rules of law which will aid you in determining whether there is or is not malice. If all of the circumstances in the case gave you no more light than the mere fact that the killing occurred, you would not be helped at all, but would still be left to your presumption of law, because, if the fact of the killing is made out beyond a reasonable doubt, then you must be able to say, from the facts and circumstances, whether it was a malicious killing or not; and if the circumstances throw no light at all on it, then you would still be left to the presumption of the law; but, if the circumstances throw any light upon the character of the transaction at all, then you must determine from these circumstances what the character of those transactions was, and you are to say whether it was from malice, or upon sudden heat and passion, or whether it was justifiable or excusable. Then, gentlemen, malice is defined, also, to show the deliberation. But the deliberation need not be any longer than enough to determine whether or not he will take the life of his adversary. If long enough to determine, then it will be long enough to be malicious. If nothing more appears for it to be malicious,—if it is only for a moment, and that is sometimes without any apparent motive or deliberation, but upon the impulse of the moment; sometimes a person takes up an axe, and inflicts the fatal blow, or shoots one down,—that impulse, then, without any provocation, it is said in the law, would be sufficient to imply the malice, nothing else appearing. But malice does not always exist when there is a killing with a deadly weapon,—a weapon which causes death. But the presumption may be rebutted when it is highest. Certainly it can be rebutted when the act has been committed with a deadly weapon, which is the very highest. This presumption can be rebutted only with reference to the facts which have been testified to in this case. But, not attempting to determine for you what facts have not or have been proven, where the killing is with a gun, as in this case, the killing may be reduced to manslaughter if it is done in sudden heat and passion. For instance,—without being able, if I desired to do so, to go all over all the testimony for the purpose of illustration—But I say to you that if the defendant here did as he says he did, and, not having any malice, got up from a table at which the deceased was sitting, for the purpose, bona fide, of avoiding a difficulty, and the conduct of the deceased was so provoking as to arouse his blood,—to temporarily lose control of his passions,—then it would be manslaughter, even if adhered to still further to reduce it. But the law don't allow the defendant, when slightly touched, to put up the excuse that his blood was so inflamed that he had lost control of his passions, unless it was really so, or unless the circumstances justified the jury in believing that it was so; that is, there must be sufficient legal provocation. If there was merely a light touch or blow, he would not have the right to say that his blood was inflamed so that he had lost control of his passions. The law would not excuse him if he got in that uncontrollable fit, but it would judge him by a man of ordinary firmness and courage. But, gentlemen, even a slight blow, or even no blow at all, when it is accompanied by menace to serious bodily harm or life of the defendant, if it was, in your judgment, sufficient to excite the defendant's passions beyond control, would reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter. Now, when you go to consider that subject, you inquire whether the deceased was making towards the defendant, and whether it was under such circumstances after a threat, and under such circumstances as would have induced him.

and would have induced a reasonable man, to have lost the control of those passions, you are to determine. You are to determine, gentlemen, what knowledge the defendant had of the surroundings of the deceased, what opportunities he had of knowing how much he was in danger by being armed or not being armed, or any other circumstances that he may have known, and that in your judgment the testimony shows that he must have known of the condition of the deceased; and you are to determine from that what the degree of menace to his body was, because I don't think he told Mr. Mann, the sheriff, that he was actually struck, but that he was making at him as if he was trying to do him serious bodily harm. I don't remember the exact words, but you do. You will get the real meaning of the words, and apply it.

"Then, gentlemen, are you satisfied from the surroundings of the case that the defendant was guilty of murder, or that he was guilty of manslaughter? If you come to the conclusion that the law of self-defense has not been sufficiently minutely laid down for you to come to a conclusion, then I desire to state it to you more particularly. A man must be without fault in bringing about a difficulty. That is the first element to be shown to constitute self-defense, no matter whether it comes from the state's witnesses or from the defendant's witnesses; but you view the whole testimony in determining the question. Was the defendant without fault in bringing about the difficulty? You may review all of the evidence; you may go back to the first time we hear of those parties being together,—to the time that they were at Bordeaux, and to the time that the invitation was extended to go to his house. Was the invitation genuine? Was it for the purpose of having mutual enjoyment? Or was it for the purpose of getting the deceased to his house, and then slay him there? Those are the questions that are to be considered by you; and they might not be worthy of consideration, but I suggest the possibilities which you may consider in reaching your conclusions. You may consider, when they were there that night, and the next morning, what was the conduct of the defendant. Was it collected and scheming for the purpose of inveigling the deceased into some trap whereby he would kill him? The law would not tolerate any such thing as that. And then, at the very moment, gentlemen, when the defendant left the table, did he go, as he says he did, for the purpose of avoiding a difficulty? Is that true? Now, you are to determine what is true, not by the words that the witnesses state upon the stand merely, but you are to determine what is the truth of the matter, not only by the words, but by the witnesses themselves, and the opinion you have as to what is the truth in the matter. Well, if you conclude that it was feigned at the time, and he changed his mind. bona fide, he had a right to do it. If it was not feigned, it would not be conclusive, because it does not deprive it of all of the elements of self-defense. But on that one point, if you believe that the assault was made upon the defendant by the deceased for the purpose of doing him harm, did he use threatening language, and follow it up with threatening acts? When a great many men carry concealed weapons, it is not safe to require of every defendant that he shall sit still and wait until the assault is actually made upon him,—that is, a weapon drawn and aimed at him. Then it might be too late for one to save himself. But you are to look carefully on both sides of this case, and you are to determine. Now, if you conclude that that was an assault, and the defendant really did believe, and had a right to believe, that the deceased was approaching him to do him violence, then you are to determine the question what that violence was; that is to say, the extent to which the defendant believed, under all of the circumstances, so far as they were known to him, and so far as you judge they were known to him. What would he have believed the extent of the injury about to be inflicted upon him by the deceased? Could the deceased, in his opinion, have then had an opportunity to have used the weapon? Did he have time, at that time, to have attacked him, and do him serious bodily harm, at the short distance that they were from each other, before he could do anything except what he did? What did the defendant really believe would be the injury that was likely to be done to him by the deceased? But, gentlemen, you are not to take what the deceased would have done, or yourself, but you are to take a man of ordinary firmness and resolution,—a man trying to carry out the law; and you are to say what a man of that kind would have believed under the circumstances. What would such a man have believed under the circumstances, if he knew as much as the defendant did, under the circumstances and possibilities of the deceased to do him serious bodily harm? If the defendant really thought and believed that the deceased would do him serious bodily harm, that would be another step in the direction towards making out self-defense; or if a man of ordinary firmness and courage, or a weak man, believed that, it would be made out.

"There is still one other element of self-defense to be shown by the testimony, before the defendant would be entitled to rely upon it; that is, if all these other circumstances concurred to have made this condition, and for a man of ordinary firmness to believe that he was in danger of serious bodily harm, and that there was no other probable means of escape, not, gentlemen, that there was no possible means of escape; men might run around the corner and escape the bullet of the assassin, although it was probable that they could not,—yet, if the word 'possible' was used in the definition of the term 'murder,' then, to make out the plea of self-defense, running around the corner would be required. But it is not required. Having all these other elements in your favor, you have the right to shoot him down to prevent the execution of that probability, and you would not be required to take the means of escape. Now, gentlemen, what were the means of escape for this defendant? You are to take into consideration whether or not any persons were present, and whether or not the defendant, in making up his chances for life or the prevention of serious bodily harm, believed that he could have controlled other persons in time to have saved him, or could have avoided being killed himself or killing his neighbor and friend; and, if you come to the conclusion that he thought that there was any other means of escape, then you ought not to give him the benefit of self-defense, but, if you come to the conclusion that there was no other probable means of escape than to shoot him, then you ought to give him the benefit of the plea of self-defense, if you think he was a man of ordinary firmness. I cannot say, as I have not been able to listen to all of the testimony, what inconsistencies are in the testimony, if any; but that is for you to say. You are to take all of the testimony into consideration, and if, upon a review of the whole testimony, you have any reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant arising out of the testimony, then you ought to give him the benefit of that doubt, and find a verdict of not guilty.

"I am requested to charge you: '(1) That under the plea of not guilty, interposed by the prisoner in this case, he is not compelled to rely upon the plea of self-defense, which is an affirmative defense; but if the jury, after their consideration of all the testimony in the case, have a reasonable doubt as to any material fact necessary to constitute the crime of murder or of manslaughter, then the jury must find a verdict of not guilty.' I so charge you, gentlemen. It is in accordance with what I have already said. '(2) That, although the law ordinarily presumes malice from the use of a deadly weapon, this is not the case where the state introduces testimony as to the facts and circumstances attending the homicide.' I so charge you, gentlemen; but you take it in connection with what I said to you in the direct charge. You are to be governed by the facts and circumstances, if they throw any light upon it. '(3) That, if the jury find from the testimony that the prisoner left the state immediately after the homicide for the purpose of avoiding arrest, this is not to be construed as evidence of guilt, but would be only a circumstance to be considered by the jury.' I so charge you, gentlemen,—that it would only be a circumstance to be considered by you in connection with all of the testimony in the case. Counsel explained very fully to you what I said upon this subject, and he stated it correctly,—that it might be no evidence at all, because a very timid man might jump up and run off, and it would be no evidence of guilt at all. A man might be suffering from some particular disease, and he might think that confinement might be injurious to him, and he might not want to be confined; and it might not be a circumstance to consider at all, because there might not be a judge near by that he could apply to for bail. And, on the other hand, it might be a circumstance to be considered; and, if so, you are to determine what weight is to be given to it. '(4) The conduct of the prisoner, in surrendering himself to the sheriff, is a circumstance to be weighed by the jury.' Of course, gentlemen, you will take that into consideration, too. And, while upon that subject,—it came out without objection,—but ordinarily a defendant cannot make evidence for himself when he is out on bond. He could not have introduced that testimony of Mr. Mann. And, in one view of it, that operates in his favor, because Mr. Mann could not, at his suggestion, tell that he did it in self-defense. But, if you believe every word that Mr. Mann said, yet you do not have to arrive at the conclusion that he did it in self-defense.

"I am sorry that every citizen in the land does not know the law as to homicide. Even lawyers and judges make mistakes as to the law. At the last trial of this case, the judge who tried the case made a mistake, and one of the supreme court judges failed to agree with the others. But in this case, now, you cannot make a mistake. You have to take the law from me. It imposes a responsibility upon me at this stage of the case to know what the supreme court has decided, and to deliver it to you; and, when I have done so, you must apply the facts to it. If I have made a mistake in the law, you must apply it, and leave it to a superior tribunal to correct that law.

"And then, gentlemen, the attribute of mercy; that is placed in the power of the governor. If we follow out our duty, endeavoring to know neither friend nor foe,—if we did that, I feel sure the law would be more faithfully carried out in the future than it has been in the past, and we would have fewer homicides. Remember, gentlemen, you are to divest yourselves of all prejudice in the case; and I believe that you will do so, as I judged from your manner of testifying on your voir dire. The form of your verdict will be, 'guilty,' which means guilty of murder; or, 'guilty of manslaughter,' which means that he killed the deceased in sudden heat and passion; or 'not guilty,' which means that neither charge has been proven to your satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt.

"Mr. McGowan: Will your honor charge the jury as to a man's rights in his castle?

"Certainly. Gentlemen, counsel asks me to charge you as to a man's rights in his own house. It is a high and exalted privilege to be a master of one's own house. It is the right of the master of the home to keep every intruder out, with or without cause. He doesn't have to consult with his neighbors, and ask them who he shall admit into his house. He does not have to consult anything except his own wishes. And, when one has intruded himself into one's house, he has the right to remove him from it. He has the right, as the law says, to gently lay his hands upon him, and tell him to go; and he has the right to use so much force, under the circumstances, as is necessary to eject the trespasser. If a trespasser assails him with violence, he has the right to not wait to use that gentle means, but he has the right to use such force as is necessary to eject him. Of course, in all these cases involving these questions, he must use that right subject to a review by your panel. There is no dispute, gentlemen, as to how the deceased entered the house. He entered it upon the invitation of the defendant; and, having so entered, before he could be rudely driven from it or shot down, it was the business of the defendant here to have notified him to leave, or else he must make out a plea of self-defense as if he had notified him. In other words, gentlemen, when one of you invites a friend to his house, that friend is entitled to notice before you have a right to eject him from your house. The law requires that, when you have allowed a friend to enter your door, you must give him reasonable notice to leave your door before you eject him; reasonable notice depending upon the violence of his conduct, or the loss of the power to understand the notice to leave. Take the record."

The jury not having agreed, the judge ordered the jury into court.

"Clerk of Court: Have you agreed upon a verdict?"

"Foreman of Jury: We have not. Some of the jurors don't understand the law in reference to excusable homicide. And Sheriff Mann's statement seems to bother some of the jurors, as to whether they should accept that as a matter of consideration or not.

"The Court: In regard to the testimony of Sheriff Mann, there would be no doubt in the world that you should take that. Suppose he would come to you and say to you that the defendant here had told him that a certain state of facts existed at a certain time, as he tells you that the defendant did tell him what occurred,—well, you will exercise your common sense in that matter. But you would not be obliged to take everything that he says as absolutely and perfectly true. He may be a man of the strictest veracity, but he might be mistaken. It is very difficult to lay down the exact words one hears sometimes, and therefore you are to determine, if you can, whether Sheriff Mann was exact. The presumption is that he was. But you are to review that testimony just as you would any other testimony in the case, to see if it corresponds with your knowledge of human nature, and see as to its accuracy. You get at the exact sense of what he heard, and, when you get at the exact sense of what he heard, you apply it all to the test of common sense. Then you are to determine how much of that statement of the defendant was true, and how much of it was not true. The presumption is, if nothing else appeared, that it was all true. You would not be justified in saying that it was not all true, unless it was so plain that it was untrue that you could not believe it. Now, I don't remember that there was a word to contradict it; and if you come to the conclusion that there was not, and it was properly given to you, then you will take that as true as if it was by a witness on the stand. But you are to test that testimony, and say if it is true, because it is the degree of conviction which it produces upon your mind as to the weight of the testimony.

"Now, as to excusable homicide. When a homicide has been committed, it must occupy either the degree of murder, or of manslaughter, or of excusable homicide. Justifiable homicide is the equivalent of it, but in stronger terms. Excusable homicide is not a crime,—very often a duty. In a case where self-defense is relied upon, then the circumstances must show, before the defendant can receive the benefit of it, that he was without fault in bringing about the difficulty. Consider all of the circumstances of the case. At the time of the homicide he must have believed that the deceased was assaulting him, and assaulting him in such a manner that he had no other probable means of escape from that assault except by taking the life of his assailant, or by doing what he did do, to prevent the loss of his own life or serious bodily harm to himself. Then another step in the direction of self-defense is made out; but it is not necessary that a person should believe that himself only, but that a man of ordinary firmness would do the same as the defendant here did. If you desire anything further, I have no objection to stating it.

"The Foreman: As this evidence of Sheriff Mann has been a stumbling-block in our way, we would like to know if we have not the right to give this evidence the same consideration as we do the other witnesses?

"The Court: Why, certainly, sir. It would be hard to call upon the state, having fifty witnesses, to say that every word of every witness is true. If that were so, there could be no telling what the verdict would be. But you are to take that into consideration just as you do the sworn testimony of Calaham, or of Dr. Muller, or whoever the other witnesses are. The state says, "That is testimony, which I adduce to you as credible testimony. I don't require that it shall be sworn to by the defendant in order to make it credible testimony. My witnesses heard him say so, and I am satisfied to introduce it to the jury as facts in the case.' Under the circumstances under which it was introduced in this case, there was nothing for him to contradict; and there was only one interpretation to put upon it, and that is that it was as credible as any other testimony. Now, if the defendant had gone upon the stand before Mr. Mann's testimony, and had been allowed to give a version of the conversation which Mr. Mann detailed, and he had varied that conversation in any material particular, and the solicitor, for the purpose of contradicting him in that material particular, would then introduce Mr. Mann, then I would not require that you could attack the unsworn testimony of the defendant, and put it in as good testimony and uncontradicted. But here it is to be considered along with all of the other testimony in the case. The state gave the jury the right to give credit to the unsworn statement of the defendant as detailed by Mr. Mann. It must be taken in connection with all the other testimony in the case."

Parker & McGowan, Benet & Caron, and E. B. Gary, for appellant. M. F. Ansel, for the State.

McIVER, C. J. Under an indictment for the murder of James N. Newby, the defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and, having been sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary at hard labor for the term of five years, appeals upon the several grounds which will hereinafter be considered. These exceptions impute to the circuit judge sundry errors in his charge to the jury; and, as they are based upon detached quotations from the charge, it is necessary that the entire charge should be set out in the report of this case, in order that the connection in which the words quoted as the basis of the several exceptions were used may be seen, for it has been repeatedly held that the correctness of the charge must be determined, not by detached sentences, but by a consideration of the charge as a whole. It should also be observed that there was no controversy as to the fact that the deceased was killed by the prisoner, and the only question for the jury was as to the character of the homicide,—whether it was murder, manslaughter, or excusable as done in self-defense.

The first exception imputes error to the circuit judge in using this language to the jury: "In order to make out a case of self-defense, it is necessary for the defendant to prove his innocence by a preponderance of the testimony." From the connection in which this language was used in the charge, it is very manifest that it was not used, and could not have been understood by the jury, as conveying the idea that the accused is ever called upon to prove his innocence in the first instance; but the meaning plainly was, and was so undoubtedly understood by the jury, that, while the state was bound to prove its case beyond all reasonable doubt, the defendant who sets up a plea of self-defense is only bound to prove the facts necessary to sustain such plea merely by the preponderance of the evidence, and, when that degree of evidence is offered, his innocence is established. The manifest object and effect of the language objected to was to draw the distinction, well recognized in the law, between the degree of evidence required to sustain the plea of self-defense,—that is, the innocence of the accused,—and that which is required to sustain the charge made by the state. This is manifest from the language used by the judge in the same sentence, immediately after the language quoted as objectionable, where the jury are explicitly instructed that the state must make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt. We do not think that the jury could have failed to understand, from that portion of the charge here under consideration, that, while the defendant was only bound to prove the facts necessary to sustain his plea of self-defense by a mere preponderance of the testimony, the state was bound to prove every material element of the charge beyond all reasonable doubt; and this is in direct conformity to the rule as laid down in State v. Bodie, 33 S. C., at pages 132, 133, 11 S. E. 624. The first exception cannot, therefore, be sustained.

We will next consider that portion of the charge which is objected to in the second, fourth, and seventh exceptions, which may be considered together, as they all complain of the instructions given to the jury as to what was necessary to sustain the plea of self-defense; for in the second exception the complaint is that the jury were instructed that, in order to avail one's self of the plea of self-defense, it must appear that "at the time the prisoner struck the fatal blow he was so assaulted that he believed that he had no other probable means of escape from immediate death, or from immediate serious bodily harm;" in the fourth exception the language objected to is: "If you come to the conclusion that he [the defendant] thought that there was any other means of escape, then you ought not to give him the benefit of self-defense;" and in the seventh exception the language pointed out as objectionable is this: "At the time of the homicide the prisoner must have believed that the deceased was assaulting him in such a manner that he had no other probable means of escape from that assault except by taking the life of the deceased, or by doing what he did do, to prevent the loss of his own life or serious bodily harm to himself." In the case of State v. Wyse, 33 S. C., at page 504, 12 S. E. 558, it is said that "the plea of self-defense rests upon the idea of necessity,—a legal necessity; that is, such a necessity as in the eye of the law will excuse one for so grave an act as the taking of human life." In other words, one cannot claim indemnity or excuse for taking the life of another unless he makes it appear, by the preponderance of the evidence, that it was necessary for him to do so in order to protect his own life, or to protect his person from some grievous bodily harm; and of course, where it appears that there were other probable means by which the shedding of human blood might have been avoided, it cannot, with any propriety, be said that there was any such necessity to take human life as would excuse the slayer. We do not think, therefore, that either of these exceptions can be sustained.

The sixth exception is in these words: "Because his honor erred in charging the jury that the deceased having entered defendant's house upon defendant's invitation, it was the business of the defendant to have notified him [the deceased] to leave, or else he must make out a plea of self-defense as if he had notified him." It seems to us that, when the language here objected to is read in connection with that portion of the charge in which it appears, all objection to it must disappear; for the judge, while fully recognizing the sacredness of one's home, and the right of the owner to protect it from all intruders, very properly drew a distinction between a case of a trespasser intruding himself into the dwelling house of another, and a case in which one enters the house of another by the invitation of the owner, for here the undisputed evidence was that the deceased was urgently invited to the house of the prisoner for the purpose of engaging in a Christmas frolic, and that they did engage in a drunken debauch, which doubtless gave rise to the difficulty which terminated in bloodshed. It does not seem to us that the defendant can claim anything from that well-recognized right which allows one to protect his house, where his invited guest was shot down in his own house, without any notice, even, to leave. This exception must therefore be overruled.

As to the third and fifth exceptions, we are somewhat at a loss to understand how they are pertinent to the present appeal. These exceptions seem to relate to so much of the charge as contained instructions to the jury in reference to the charge of murder, but, as the defendant was convicted of manslaughter only, we do not see what application they can have to the present appeal; for, even if we could hold that the jury were improperly instructed as to the charge of murder, (which, however, we must say is not the case,) we are unable to perceive how such error, if there was error, could affect an appeal from a conviction of manslaughter, which practically amounts to an acquittal of the charge of murder. The language objected to in the third exception is taken from that portion of the charge in which the judge was explaining the distinction between murder and manslaughter; and the instruction there given, in case the jury took a certain view of the facts, that it would be manslaughter and not murder, can in no sense be regarded as charging on the facts, as it did not intimate, in the slightest degree, what was the judge's opinion of such facts, but expressly informed the jury that, if they believed certain facts, then it would be manslaughter. The language upon which the fifth exception is based manifestly relates to the charge of murder, of which the defendant was practically acquitted, and could not possibly relate to the charge of manslaughter, of which the defendant has been convicted, for certainly malice is not an ingredient in the last-named offense. Besides, the mere failure to repeat what had been already stated to the jury was certainly no error of law. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

Act Dec. 14, 1805, relieving certain lands from the statute, no defense to claim by adverse possession and presumption of grant from owner. (S. C.) 257.

The law presumes that a grantee in possession claims up to the boundaries of the tract described in his grant. (N. C.) 52.

For 20 years under recorded deed from tenant creates presumption of grant from landlord. (S. C.) 257.

As against grantee from state. (N. C.) 339.

Will not run while a claim case is pending as between the claimant and the defendant in fi. fa. (Ga.) 404.

A grantee of certain tenants in common could acquire title adverse to a cotenant only by possession for 20 years. (N. C.) 691.

Sufficiency of evidence showing adverse possession for seven years by one who entered as tenant of holder of legal title. (Ga.) 37.

Cannot exist against cotenant while she is under disability of coverture. (Va.) 914.

Affidavit.

For attachment, see "Attachment."
Of illegality, see "Execution."

AFFRAY.

Where evidence shows no deadly weapon used or serious injury inflicted, a conviction for assault before a justice is a bar to indictment for affray. (N. C.) 321.

When case on appeal bears date within specified time, presumption is that notice of appeal was given. (N. C.) 254.

A statement on case on appeal cannot be contradicted on argument. (N. C.) 254.

A certificate of a trial judge that a brief was filed within the time prescribed by law will be taken as true. (Ga.) 830.

Question whether, on second appeal, the subject of the amount of interest on amount recovered was res judicata as having been fixed by first appeal. (S. C.) 5.

A judgment by the trial court after affirmation adds no validity to a trial judgment, or to the judgment of the supreme court. (N. C.) 77.

Appellate jurisdiction.

Where issue in county court involves more than $50, losing party may appeal from judgment to superior court, whether or not certiorari could be brought. (Ga.) 156.

Where amount really involved is only $150, the appellate court has no jurisdiction. (Va.) 189.

Jurisdiction on appeal from the circuit court does not attach till the return is filed. (S. C.) 790.

On appeal from the board of county commissioners' disallowance of a claim, the circuit court may review the facts returned. (S. C.) 794.

Where plaintiff appeals, the amount claimed determines the amount in controversy, though judgment be for less or for defendant. (W. Va.) 476.

Where interests are separate on appellants' part, a decree may be reversed as to one, and dismissed as to another, because subject as to him is of less than jurisdictional amount. (Va.) 899.

Where amount involved equals $500 as to one appellant, appeal will not be dismissed as to other appellants because claims of some are less than $500, if all the claims were consolidated and heard together. (Va.) 899.

On appeal from a county court to a superior court, no judgment can be rendered which would be outside of the powers of the county court. (Ga.) 159.

On appeal from justice, it is immaterial whether the judgment be void or valid, if appellee does not question it, appellant having recognized the judgment by the appeal. (Ga.) 530.

A decision as to the right to open and close is not appealable. (N. C.) 328.

A nonsuit entered by plaintiff is not a final judgment. (Va.) 438.

A decision on certiorari is reviewable on error. (W. Va.) 476.

A finding that one has no personal property subject to levy is not reviewable on appeal. (S. C.) 517.

A judgment for plaintiff on the pleas in bar in action for an accounting is appealable. (N. C.) 701.

Right of appeal from justice's judgment is fixed by amounts claimed in pleadings. (Ga.) 647.

Requisites.

An appellant in forma pauperis need not state his desire to appeal at time of trial. (N. C.) 711.

Where an appeal bond from a justice recites the appeal as taken by B. F., but the docket recites that H. H. F. appeared and filed bond, and the bond is approved, it is a good bond on appeal from a judgment against B. F. (W. Va.) 492.

Judgment rendered in justice's court 10 days before superior court term must be docketed at that term. (N. C.) 78.

Though the case of brief for argument has been properly made and served, an appeal may be dismissed if the return has not been filed. (S. C.) 941.

Will be dismissed if case and exceptions are not filed as required by rule 49. (S. C.) 942.

Appellant, who serves notice of intention to appeal without waiting for notice of filing of judgment, thereby waives such notice. (S. C.) 888.

Denial in vacation of motion to dismiss motion for new trial is cause for writ of error, and exceptions must be entered within 30 days from decision. (Ga.) 29.

Record.

An objection to evidence must be preserved by bill of exceptions. (W. Va.) 782.

On judgment by default, the evidence is not a part of the record. (W. Va.) 724.

It is sufficient if exceptions to the charge be set out in the case on appeal. (N. C.) 94.

Appellant may disregard an objection to the case on appeal not served on him within five days after service of case on appellee, as required by statute. (N. C.) 170.

— Time of transmission and filing.

Transcript of the record must be transmitted within 15 days after service of bill of exceptions. (Ga.) 287.

A case and return are not too late because not delivered at clerk's office till after he had left it on 20th day after agreement to file. (S. C.) 889.

Application for extension of time for filing return must be made within time allowed by rule for such filing. (S. C.) 942.

Rule 1, requiring return to be filed within a certain time after return is completed, does not allow that length of time after case is agreed on. (S. C.) 942.

— Service of case.

A case on appeal must be served by an officer unless appellee's attorneys accept service otherwise. (N. C.) 170.

Review.

Objection to evidence which does not point it out, and only refers to it as found on certain pages of record, cannot be considered. (Ga.) 13.

Agreed facts copied in record by clerk, and certified as facts on which the judgment rested, cannot be considered in absence of bill of exceptions. (Va.) 36.

Where there is no case settled, nor any served, the court can only look at the record proper. (N. C.) 600.

Where there is no brief of evidence in bill of exceptions, granting of nonsuit is not reviewable. (Ga.) 525.

The setting aside of a verdict and ordering a new trial not reviewable where evidence is not certified. (Va.) 438.

To bring up for review a ruling on evidence, there must be a bill of exceptions, or the ruling must have been made the ground of a motion for a new trial. (W. Va.) 953.

Where the evidence has not been briefed, it will not be closely examined on appeal. (Ga.) 548.

Defendant's exception that, on all the evidence, plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict, cannot be considered on appeal if taken after the verdict. (N. C.) 655.

— Objection not raised below.

An objection that a lease was not recorded will not avail when first made on appeal. (N. C.) 669.

Where money is attached in the hands of the debtor, another claiming the fund under an assignment cannot contest a subsequent judgment for plaintiffs, where he does not except to refusal of lower court of leave to contest ownership thereof. (N. C.) 665.

Where, by consent, several appeal cases have been consolidated, it is too late for appellant to attack the jurisdiction as to one of the cases as involving too small an amount. (Ga.) 530.

— Presumptions.

Where motion for new trial, assigned as erroneous, charged that plaintiff had made admission, the motion not alleging and the court not certifying that admission was not made, the court's charge will be assumed to have been correct. (Ga.) 13.

A judgment will be presumed to be correct where error does not appear on the face of the record. (W. Va.) 724.

Where documents are received in evidence over objections, the presumption is that their execution was proved. (Ga.) 363.

Where defendant failed to except to the overruling of motion for new trial, it will be presumed that judgment was right. (W. Va.) 443.

If the issues made on the pleadings were submitted to the jury without objection, or tender of others, appellate court will presume that they were satisfactory. (N. C.) 655.

— Discretion of trial court.

The first grant of a new trial will not be reviewed on appeal. (Ga.) 351.

The discretion of the court in granting a first new trial will not be reviewed. (Ga.) 429.

The discretion of court in refusing a new trial will not be reviewed. (Ga.) 292.

An appellate court will not reverse because of the refusal of a motion that was within the lower court's discretion, where no abuse of this discretion is shown. (W. Va.) 953.

— Weight and sufficiency of evidence.

A decree entered on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed. (W. Va.) 810.

A verdict based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed. (Ga.) 826, 829.

Where a verdict is without evidence on a point essential to a finding, it will be set aside. (W. Va.) 729.

Where evidence would have warranted a larger verdict, judgment will not be disturbed. (Va.) 901.

A judgment will not be reversed because the court might have given a different verdict. (W. Va.) 478.

— Harmless error.

A new trial will not be granted for the admission of irrelevant harmless testimony. (W. Va.) 478.

Where the issue was not as to the existence of a bill of lading, but the effect of indorsing it to third party, the fact that secondary evidence of its contents was received is harmless error. (Ga.) 363.

The refusal to allow a question to be answered is not reversible error, where it does not appear that the answer would be material. (W. Va.) 575.

— Objections waived.

If defendant proceeds after denial of its motion to exclude plaintiff's evidence as insufficient, such motion will be disregarded on appeal, unless whole evidence insufficient to justify verdict. (W. Va.) 596.

Where defendant, after plaintiff had rested, moves the court to direct judgment for defendant, he waives the petition by going on with the case. (W. Va.) 782.

Rehearing.

Rehearing will not be granted on ground that certain results might follow from previous judgment and opinion, if the points were not previously raised. (S. C.) 889.

Rehearing will not be granted when no material fact or principle of law was overlooked. (S. C.) 886.

Effect of appeal.

Notice of appeal from a judgment obtained on a money demand does not stay the execution of the judgment. (S. C.) 790.

Decision.

Entry by trial court after affirmance on appeal of "judgment as per transcript filed from the supreme court" terminates action. (N. C.) 77.

Decision—Affirmance.

Where the court is evenly divided, the judgment below is affirmed. (N. C.) 208.

Where there is no case on appeal, the judgment will be affirmed unless error appears on record. (N. C.) 170.

— Modification and reversal.

Where in trespass there was judgment for plaintiffs, and some of defendants are shown not to have committed any trespass, the judgment will be modified. (N. C.) 91.

A decree, though void, may be reversed. (W. Va.) 468.

Where the charge is not set out in full, the court cannot reverse for want of more specific instructions, in the absence of exceptions. (N. C.) 708.

The denial of a new trial for newly-discovered evidence will not be reversed where the evidence was known at time of trial. (Ga.) 313.

Where, in action for injuries, a verdict for plaintiff has been twice reversed on appeal, and there is a verdict for plaintiff on the third trial, on the same evidence, the appellate court will dismiss the action. (Ga.) 850.

— Dismissal and reinstatement.

Appeal will be dismissed when there is no person present to represent appellant on call of case. (S. C.) 886, 889, 891.

Will be dismissed where appellant has allowed two terms to pass without remedying defects in record. (N. C.) 199.

A motion to docket and dismiss for failure to file transcript, made after call of the docket, and after the appeal is docketed, is too late. (N. C.) 714.

If dismissed for default in filing return, will not be reinstated merely because each of the two counsel expected the other to do the filing. (S. C.) 942.

Sufficiency of showing for reinstatement of appeal dismissed because return was not filed within prescribed time. (S. C.) 893.

Appeal dismissed by clerk for failure to file return will not be reinstated when neither unavoidable cause for default nor mistake is shown. (S. C.) 943.

Indorsement on "the case" of acceptance of service by counsel does not show waiver of right to dismiss because not docketed in time. (N. C.) 212.

Liabilities on appeal bonds.

On withdrawal of a claim in superior court on appeal from a justice's court, the claimant being the appellant, no judgment can be rendered on appeal bond except for costs. (Ga.) 547.

Application.

Of payments, see "Payment."

ARBITRATION AND AWARD.

Question whether notice of time and place of hearing was given is to be determined by trial judge, with aid, if he desire, of jury. (N. C.) 87.

Where an arbitrator admits new parties at request of one defendant, and against the objection of the others, his award will be set aside. (N. C.) 672.

ARREST.

Indorsement on warrant of arrest appointing one special constable "to execute the within process" is sufficient. (S. C.) 919.

Whether certain facts constitute probable cause for arrest without warrant, question for the jury. (Ga.) 305.

An officer may use such force as is necessary to arrest one attempting to rescue a person in officer's hands. (N. C.) 394.

Sufficiency of information to justify issuance of warrant for arrest for trespass on land. (S. C.) 919.

Warrant need not set out the offense. (S. C.) 919.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY.

Assault with intent to kill, see "Homicide." Jurisdiction of justice, see "Justices of the Peace."

A warrant charging school teacher with unmercifully whipping and bruising a child charges a battery. (N. C.) 256.

Where defendants, armed, go to a man's house and order him to go with them, they are guilty of assault, though no actual violence is done. (N. C.) 388.

Sufficiency of evidence to sustain conviction. (Ga.) 651.

ASSIGNMENT.

See, also, "Assignment for Benefit of Creditors."

Of debt secured by mortgage, see "Mortgages."

Of note, see "Negotiable Instruments."

Question whether vendor who deposited with bank bill drawn on vendee for price, with bill of lading attached, and got credit therefor, assigned fund to the bank, was for the jury. (Ga.) 188.

When a stranger pays the debt of another, he may take the assignment of it from the creditor. (W. Va.) 456.

A check is equitable assignment pro tanto. (W. Va.) 620.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

See, also, "Bankruptcy;" "Fraudulent Conveyances."

Need not be executed by creditors, but their assent will be presumed. (W. Va.) 611.

An assignment by a firm of the firm property is not void because it does not include the individual property of the partners. (S. C.) 150.

An assignment by the firm of the firm property is not void because one of the partners afterwards confesses a judgment in favor of an individual creditor, which is made a lien on the partner's individual property. (S. C.) 150.

May include property nominally held by assignor in trust, which is in reality his own, and exclude property equitably belonging to others. (Va.) 883.

Question whether releases executed after time fixed in assignment, in connection with previous offer to release, entitle creditor to benefit of assignment. (S. C.) 150.

Omissions in schedules of assets and creditors do not necessarily vitiate the assignment, but intent to defraud does. (Ga.) 47.

Does not defeat holder of check subsequently presented. (W. Va.) 620.

Fraud.

Will not be wholly void because fraudulent in part, unless all the creditors secured or the trustee knew of or participated in the fraud. (W. Va.) 611.

Preferences and reservations.

Preference among creditors. (N. C.) 341.

Evidence sufficient to show that defendant contemplated assignment when he executed certain mortgages, and that hence together they constituted one assignment with preferences. (S. C.) 145.

That assignment provides that the exemptions reserved shall be set apart by grantee does not raise presumption of fraud. (N. C.) 53.

That the two partners assigning reserved, by agreement, such exemptions as the law permits, raises no presumption of fraud. (N. C.) 53.

A creditor who successfully impeaches one of the preferred claims does not thereby obtain the preference originally given such claim. (W. Va.) 611, 620.

The assignee.

The trustee is a purchaser for valuable consideration. (W. Va.) 611.

Assignee who compromises suits under advice of his counsel and counsel of creditor cannot be charged by latter with bad faith in so doing. (N. C.) 103.

Sale of assigned property.

A court of equity in charge of property assigned does not direct sale until all claims and priorities are ascertained. (W. Va.) 611.

Associations.

See "Building and Loan Associations;" "Corporations."

ASSUMPSIT.

Payment of the debt of another, without request, does not give volunteer the right of action. (W. Va.) 436.

When lies for money had and received. (W. Va.) 575.

When brought on a contract under seal in which the covenants are dependent, plaintiff must show a legal excuse for his nonperformance. (W. Va.) 478.

Where nothing remains as to performance of contract but the duty of defendant to pay, plaintiff may recover on the common counts. (W. Va.) 575.

Assumption of Risks.

See "Master and Servant."

ATTACHMENT.

See, also, "Execution;" "Garnishment."

Of property of national banks, see "Banks and Banking."

A gas company can attach in action for damages caused by the wrongful breaking by defendant of its gas pipes. (N. C.) 693.

When court has no jurisdiction of attachment, judgment cannot be rendered on the account on dismissal of the attachment. (Ga.) 295.

Where order of attachment is quashed, property of defendant sold by him after attachment to third party will be restored to such party. (W. Va.) 382.

Defendant cannot complain of a judgment condemning the fund attached, on the ground that he had assigned it before attachment. (N. C.) 665.

A creditor at large of an absconding debtor is not a person interested in disputing plaintiff's claim, within Code, c. 106, § 23. (W. Va.) 753.

Affidavit.

A defective affidavit cannot be supplemented by subsequent affidavit or proof. (W. Va.) 382.

Affidavit against corporation for failure to appoint person to accept service must show failure to comply with requirements of the law. (W. Va.) 382.

An affidavit against a nonresident is not defective because not alleging that defendant "had property in this state." (N. C.) 665.

An affidavit which does not state, in the language of the statute, "the amount at the least, which the affiant believes plaintiff is justly entitled to recover," is defective. (W. Va.) 753.

An affidavit may be amended in a material point, under Code, c. 106, § 1, cl. 8. (W. Va.) 753.

Sufficiency of affidavit. (W. Va.) 924.

Return.

In equity cannot be returned to rules. (Va.) 899.

Writ returnable under Act Feb. 21, 1873, to superior court only. (Ga.) 295.

Wrongful attachment.

Where an attachment is levied by direction of an attorney on property of third person, the attorney believing it was the property of defendant in attachment, his client is liable for actual damages only. (Ga.) 423.

Where property attached did not belong to defendant in attachment, and plaintiff's attorney knew such fact, his client was chargeable with notice, and liable for wrongful attachment. (Ga.) 423.

Where property is wrongfully attached by the officer in presence of plaintiff's attorney, his client is liable for wrongful attachment. (Ga.) 423.

Actual damages for wrongful attachment include expenses in regaining possession, and reasonable hire for the property while withheld from the owner. (Ga.) 423.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

Liability of client for acts of attorney, see "Attachment."

Attorneys for creditors who are not attorneys in fact cannot execute releases under assignment for creditors. (S. C.) 145.

BAIL.

A recognizance to appear "on next Friday," and not to depart without leave of court, is broken if prisoner appear on Friday, and, the trial having been commenced and adjourned, he fails to appear the next day. (Va.) 437.

A recognizance is not defective because it binds defendant "to answer the charge against him," instead of "to answer the felony whereof he stands charged." (Va.) 437.

On recognizance to appear at a county court to answer indictment, an appearance is not necessary until indictment found. (Ga.) 432.

A bond on arrest in a civil action should show sureties to be residents and freeholders within the state. (N. C.) 672.

Bailment.

See "Carriers."

BANKRUPTCY.

See "Assignment for Benefit of Creditors;" "Fraudulent Conveyances."

Title acquired by sale of interest of bankrupt in land. (W. Va.) 744.

A discharge may be set up in state court to stay execution on a judgment against bankrupt, rendered after commencement of proceedings, and before discharge. (W. Va.) 443.

A sale in bankruptcy is not binding on persons claiming an interest who were not served with notice. (Va.) 869.

Persons not served with notice of sale in bankruptcy are not precluded from attacking the sale because the bankrupt was the administrator of the estate through which they claim. (Va.) 869.

BANKS AND BANKING.

The individual account of a firm member cannot be charged with the overdraft of the firm. (N. C.) 513.

Liability of corresponding bank for collections to depositor of insolvent bank. (N. C.) 695.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 5249, seizure of property of national banks by attachment under state law is void. (Ga.) 137.

BASTARDY.

Where the father of a bastard, on conviction and commitment to county jail for failure to pay fine imposed, is released on taking poor debtor's oath, he cannot, at subsequent term, be sentenced to imprisonment. (N. C.) 657.

BOUNDARIES.

Sufficiency of secondary evidence of location of boundaries in deeds; witness testifying what a person, deceased, pointed out to him as to the location. (N. C.) 52.

Plaintiff's testimony that corner tree was marked on boundaries in dispute, and that plaintiff marked tree to take the place of one which had disappeared, was competent. (N. C.) 52.

Declarations as to boundaries made by the adjacent owner ante litem motam are competent. (N. C.) 52.

A plat by a county surveyor, made on receiving an order of survey for a claim, is evidence of its shape and location. (N. C.) 708.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS.

When the foreclosure has realized enough to pay the debt, and the association has allowed nothing for payments on the stock assigned when the mortgage was made, the borrower, after the foreclosure, is entitled to a return of the stock. (N. C.) 965.

A contract by which stock of a borrower, assigned to the association when the mortgage is executed, is forfeited on default, without being credited on the mortgage, is unconscionable. (N. C.) 965.

Burden of Proof.

See "Evidence."

BURGLARY.

Forceful violence is not necessary to constitute burglary. (Ga.) 350.

Tools adapted for opening safes, found in defendant's possession were admissible, though they had apparently not been used. (Ga.) 154.

A shot bag containing money stolen at time of burglary, and found in defendant's possession within four days thereafter, is admissible. (Ga.) 154.

Defendant is bound only to show that he obtained stolen articles by means not involving participation in offense. (Ga.) 154.

Injury to passenger boarding train at unusual stopping place—Contributory negligence. (Ga.) 422.

Ejection.

One buying ticket limited in time cannot recover for ejection after such a time. (Ga.) 650.

A passenger wrongfully expelled from train may recover as for a tort. (Ga.) 315.

In order to recover for wrongful expulsion from train, it is not necessary that conductor put his hands on passenger. (Ga.) 315.

Liability of sleeping-car company.

Liability of sleeping-car company for property stolen from passengers. (Ga.) 364.

CERTIORARI

Is the proper remedy to review the proceedings of a municipal council. (W. Va.) 770.

One is not entitled as of right to a certiorari to review a judgment of a justice. (W. Va.) 926.

Will not issue from circuit court to review a judgment of a justice which is clearly wrong, where the justice has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the person. (W. Va.) 577.

Will not be granted to supply evidence omitted from the case made, where the judge has not intimated a readiness to make the correction. (N. C.) 205.

The pendency of a writ in favor of one party to suit is not ground for dismissing a writ taken out by the other. (Ga.) 365.

Sufficiency of notice of application, and time and place of hearing. (Ga.) 435.

Where petition for writ to the judgment of a justice shows that it was not applied for within 10 days after judgment entered, unless good cause is shown, it should be quashed. (W. Va.) 476.

Where judgment of a justice is removed to circuit court on certiorari, the court should review the judgment on the merits, and render such judgment as justice may require. (W. Va.) 476.

When petition to review justice's judgment for want of jurisdiction does not require magistrate to show by his answer that his court was in lawful session. (Ga.) 138.

CONFLICT OF LAWS.

A contract made and to be performed in another state is governed by its laws. (W. Va.) 456.

A note bearing interest payable in New York is prima facie to be governed by the statute of New York. (Ga.) 131.

Where a mortgagor and his land were in North Carolina, and he executed a mortgage there to a Virginia association having a local board of managers and treasurer, the usury law of North Carolina applies, though the mortgage was sent from the home office, and the bond was payable there. (N. C.) 965.

The fact that a note, not dated at any place but payable in New York, was secured by a deed executed in Georgia, and conveying land therein, does not render the statute of New York inadmissible as evidence to show usury. (Ga.) 131.

A promise to pay, contained in a telegram sent from Massachusetts to South Carolina, is a contract made in Massachusetts. (S. C.) 120.

Chattel mortgage payable where executed will be upheld in court of another state to which property may be removed. (Va.) 899.

In action for tort committed in another state the rules of evidence of the forum govern. (Ga.) 290.

Consideration.

See "Contracts."

To support guaranty, see "Guaranty."

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Act Oct. 21, 1891, providing that it shall go into effect in each county on recommendation by the grand jury, is valid. (Ga.) 28.

Acts 1891, c. 42, making it unlawful to use profane language on the lands of Henrietta Cotton Mills, does not unduly interfere with free speech. (N. C.) 498.

Code, c. 47, § 13, requiring members of municipal councils to be freeholders, is constitutional. (W. Va.) 770.

The power given a certain town by statute to regulate the running at large of animals may be curtailed by subsequent act confining exercise of this power over animals owned by residents of town only. (Ga.) 1007.

The provision of the United States constitution securing persons against unreasonable seizure and searches has no application to the power of the state government. (S. C.) 1021.

Laws 1891, c. 323, § 2, imposing a capitation tax, and devoting a portion thereof to the payment of pensions to indigent Confederate veterans, is valid. (N. C.) 661.

Constitutionality of statute increasing sentence on proof of prior conviction for crime and sentence. (Va.) 439.

Local and special laws.

Act Nov. 26, 1890, providing that in every county and district boundary lines are legal fences, is a general law. (Ga.) 44.

Act Oct. 21, 1891, in relation to public roads, is not special, because it does not go into effect until recommended by grand jury of each county. (Ga.) 28.

Acts 1891, c. 42, protecting the operation of the Henrietta Cotton Mills, is not invalid as a local criminal law. (N. C.) 498.

Jury trial.

A highway act is not invalid because it denies to those who fail to work the roads or pay the commutation taxes the right to jury trial. (Ga.) 28.

Police power.

Act providing for taxation of emigrant agent, and exacting a very large fee, is restrictive of the agent's business, and void as an exercise of the police power. (N. C.) 342.

Regulation of commerce.

A statute providing for a penalty against telegraph company for delay in delivering message not in violation of interstate commerce clause. (Va.) 280.

Taxation.

It is no objection to a highway act that the rates of taxation may vary in different counties. (Ga.) 28.

An act providing for taxing emigrant agents before they can hire laborers in certain counties is void for want of uniformity. (N. C.) 342.

CONTEMPT.

Refusal to pay alimony, see "Divorce."

A mayor has jurisdiction to punish a defaulting witness in a criminal case for contempt. (N. C.) 690.

It is within the discretion of lower court to discharge rule for contempt in instituting action in violation of restraining order against one's ancestor, the rights of the parties being determinable in that action. (N. C.) 78.

CONTINUANCE.

In criminal cases, see "Criminal Law."

Refusal of continuance will not be reversed unless plainly erroneous. (Va.) 195.

Not granted for immaterial amendment to pleading. (Va.) 278.

A decision denying a continuance will not be reviewed where no abuse of discretion is shown. (Ga.) 350.

Will be denied when no diligence to obtain presence of witness is shown. (Va.) 901.

Correctness of charge as to mental capacity necessary. (Ga.) 27.

Sufficiency of consideration. (W. Va.) 575.

A contract by which certain persons agreed to send a certain number to school for a scholastic year must be performed by the teacher before he can recover thereon. (N. C.) 698.

For the purchase of land will not be rescinded because vendee is unable to pay, there being no misrepresentations by him. (Va.) 277.

A contract cannot give rise to a cause of action until there has been a breach. (S. C.) 120.

Action against loan company for recovery of subscription to stock made on promise of loan which was not kept—Sufficiency of complaint. (N. C.) 655.

Conveyances.

See "Chattel Mortgages;" "Deed;" "Fraudulent Conveyances;" "Mortgages;" "Sale;" "Vendor and Purchaser."

CONVICTS.

The fact that a convict is under the general charge of a state officer does not relieve a company employing such convict from liability for injuries received by him by going into a dangerous place by order of a guard of the company who had control of his movements. (Ga.) 1015.

The rule forbidding recovery by a servant who subjects himself to injury by going, without objection, into a place known by him to be dangerous, does not apply to a convict whose movements are controlled by a guard having power to compel obedience. (Ga.) 1015.

CORPORATIONS.

See, also, "Building and Loan Associations;" "Carriers;" "Creditors' Bill;" "Insurance;" "Municipal Corporations;" "Railroad Companies;" "Telegraph Companies."

When validity of franchise cannot be collaterally attacked. (N. C.) 254.

In Pennsylvania, the president of a corporation created there cannot recover on a quantum meruit for services, in the absence of any by law or resolution allowing compensation. (W. Va.) 456.

When notice to the officers of a corporation is notice to stockholders. (S. C.) 680.

Directors of companies chartered under the "Boom Law" must be stockholders, but need not be state residents. (W. Va.) 620.

Sufficiency of evidence to show an executed contract of sale, so as to take case out of statute requiring contract with domestic corporation to be in writing. (N. C.) 705.

The board of visitors of a chartered camp of Confederate Veterans has power to sell land acquired by the camp. (Va.) 839.

Preference by insolvent corporation in favor of directors is prima facie fraudulent. (W. Va.) 620.

A director cannot take advantage of his position to obtain judgment by confession from corporation so as to secure his debt as against other creditors. (N. C.) 107.

The failure of a domestic corporation to maintain its office within the state is an abuse of franchise, authorizing stockholders to institute proceedings for its dissolution. (N. C.) 117.

Right of foreign corporation to sue cannot be questioned by demurrer. (S. C.) 264.

COSTS.

In foreclosure proceedings, see "Mortgages."

Where verdict is rendered for sum admitted by defendant, he is liable only for costs approved before the admission, and for those in judgment. (N. C.) 107.

Of appeal should be taxed to party who is unsuccessful in contention on appeal. (S. C.) 5.

COUNTIES.

See, also, "Highways."

Citizens and taxpayers of county may interpose in proceedings to relocate county seat. (W. Va.) 8.

When result of county seat election is declared by county court, and entered on record book, the place named by electors becomes county seat. (W. Va.) 8.

Special session of county court can be held only when notice of time and purposes have been posted two days before. (W. Va.) 8.

To give special session of county court jurisdiction, the record must show posting of notice and the purposes of session. (W. Va.) 8.

A special meeting of the justices of the peace, not called by the board of commissioners, is unauthorized and void. (N. C.) 84.

County commissioners who have, by mistake of law, directed a greater proportion than one-fourth of the capitation tax to be applied to the support of the poor, are not liable either as individuals or as a corporation. (N. C.) 661.

The nine cents appropriated to the payment of pensions to Confederate veterans, under Laws 1891, c. 323, must be deducted from the 25 per cent. of the total tax appropriated by county commissioners to the support of the poor. (N. C.) 661.

Limitation of powers of county court to contract indebtedness. (W. Va.) 373.

A county court cannot bind levies of future years for improvements on roads and bridges without submission to people. (W. Va.) 373.

A contractor dealing with county court is charged with notice of its limited powers. (W. Va.) 373.

A board of commissioners is not required to hear claims as a court. (S. C.) 794.

Gen. St. § 623, providing that nothing in it shall prevent a board from disallowing, as incorrect, any account, nor from requiring further evidence of its truth, does not require the board to hear other testimony. (S. C.) 794.

An assignee of a void claim against a county court has no greater rights than his assignor. (W. Va.) 373.

COURTS.

See, also, "Justices of the Peace;" "Removal of Causes."

The supreme court of appeals cannot review a decision in matter of correction of tax assessment. (W. Va.) 632.

The lessee of a railroad partly within and partly without the state can be sued in the state for personal injuries sustained in the other state. (Ga.) 306.

Under statute that a city court shall come into existence upon the report of grand jury recommending same, a city court so established has jurisdiction, though senate has not confirmed the judge appointed to preside. (Ga.) 992.

The superior court has jurisdiction of an action not founded on contract, though property sued for is worth less than $50. (N. C.) 341.

The criminal court has jurisdiction of indictment for retailing spirituous liquors, under Code, § 1076. (N. C.) 387.

A circuit court has control over all proceedings had during the same term, or in the office during the preceding vacation. (W. Va.) 748.

Where, at the time of the commission of an offense, jurisdiction was in justices of the peace alone, the superior court does not acquire jurisdiction because it had cognizance of such offense when indictment was found. (N. C.) 707.

The fact that the clerk directed to appoint a special term fails to post a copy of the warrant at the courthouse door does not invalidate the proceedings of the term. (W. Va.) 734.

COVENANTS.

In action for breach of warranty, eviction of plaintiff under paramount title is not sustained by mere proof that he surrendered possession under a judgment against him in ejectment. (Ga.) 994.

Action on covenant—Sufficiency of answer. (S. C.) 229.

CREDITORS' BILL.

See, also, "Fraudulent Conveyances."

May be filed under Code, § 3149, against all corporations not municipal, as well as traders generally. (Ga.) 160.

An accused not in custody may be arrested and confined in jail for the payment of the fine before a fieri facias has been issued. (Va.) 838.

A charge that drunkenness, while not an excuse for crime, is a fact which may be proven to throw light on other facts, is not error, though drunkenness was set up to show physical inability to do the act complained of. (Ga.) 992.

Jurisdiction.

The courts of South Carolina have jurisdiction of defendant for the offense of advising a woman of that state to take a drug to cause her to abort, though the drug was procured in another state, and sent to the woman by mail. (S. C.) 853.

Motion to quash.

Court may refuse to quash indictment because of disqualification of grand juror, if motion made after plea. (N. C.) 507.

The hearing of a motion to quash an indictment is not a part of the trial. (S. C.) 1021.

An indictment will not be quashed because of disqualification of a grand juror. (W. Va.) 748.

Pleas.

It is too late to file a plea of misnomer at the close of the evidence introduced by the state. (Ga.) 545.

On indictment for illegal sale of liquor, the plea of guilty may be entered without formally withdrawing a prior plea of not guilty. (W. Va.) 734.

—Former jeopardy.

The fact that the court discharged a juror because of the death of his mother, and directed a mistrial, is not a sufficient predicate for a plea of former jeopardy. (Ga.) 847.

Continuance.

The grant of a continuance is within the discretion of the trial court. (S. C.) 797.

Continuance at request by prosecution—Right to speedy trial. (Va.) 282.

A continuance for absent witness improperly refused because court does not credit prisoner's statement. (Va.) 273.

Sufficiency of showing on motion for continuance. (Ga.) 553.

When continuance should be granted for the illness of a witness. (Va.) 841.

Conduct of trial.

The court has discretion whether to compel an election between a count for larceny and one for receiving stolen goods. (N. C.) 515.

Where solicitor general is rebuked for improper remarks to witness, there is no new cause for trial. (Ga.) 303.

The prosecution need not call all the witnesses present at commission of crime or named on indictment. (Va.) 440.

A witness present at commission of crime, and named on the indictment, if called by the court, is not a witness for or against defendant. (Va.) 440.

It is not reversible error for a judge to absent himself from the court room without suspending trial for a few minutes, for a necessary purpose, during arguments of defendant's counsel. (Ga.) 536.

Where counsel states irrelevant facts not in the evidence, it is no cause for new trial that the judge, forbidding a repetition of the statement, expresses his own knowledge of the real fact. (Ga.) 536.

A remark by a prosecuting attorney, in reply to one of defendant's counsel that defendant was a respectable white man, that he was a colored man, and, if defendant was, the jury would convict him in five minutes, if error, is cured by an instruction that the question was only whether the evidence satisfied the jury that defendant was guilty. (N. C.) 971.

Where jury were kept under charge of officer from the time they were impaneled until verdict rendered, there was no error in not instructing them, on adjournment at night, not to discuss the case. (Ga.) 536.

An issue to be determined by inspection of the record must be tried by the court. (W. Va.) 748.

A person charged with a misdemeanor may be tried therefor in his absence. (S. C.) 797.

An accused duly summoned may be tried for a misdemeanor in his absence without the award of a capias for his arrest. (Va.) 838.

Evidence.

Where a witness had traced before the jury the peculiarities of the foot of accused, and had shown how such peculiarities were reproduced in a track, it was error for him to express his opinion that the track was made by accused. (S. C.) 933.

There is no presumption as to the truth of a statement of defendant in a criminal case. (Ga.) 154.

Circumstantial evidence is sufficient to convict, if the jury believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, in defendant's guilt. (S. C.) 1021.

— Confessions and admissions.

Confessions by accused—Competency as evidence. (Ga.) 302.

Confessions made by defendant after his arrest by detective, on being told by latter that he knew what he had done, and advising him how to escape, were admissible. (Ga.) 154.

Confession is inadmissible if made under influence of statement by officer that confession may lighten punishment, and magistrate advises him to tell the truth if he tells anything. (N. C.) 166.

A confession by a conspirator after the conspiracy is ended binds him, but not his co-conspirator. (S. C.) 933.

Accused's admissions before magistrate are admissible if previously instructed that he need not answer questions. (N. C.) 507.

Admissions of prisoner are admissible, though officer had pointed pistol at him. (N. C.) 507.

The admission of evidence furnished by defendants against themselves under compulsion is not prejudicial, where it is stricken out, and the jury instructed not to record it. (S. C.) 1021.

Instructions.

It was not error for the court to make general observation showing the advance in the law relating to the crime with which defendant was charged. (S. C.) 1025.

The omission of instruction as to drunkenness, when charge not requested, is not error. (Ga.) 305.

The omission to give an instruction not asked for is not error. (N. C.) 394.

It is not error to say that the law "permits" the prisoner's statement to go to the jury along with the evidence. (Ga.) 140.

It is not error to caution the jury not to be influenced by public opinion in favor of or against the accused. (Ga.) 140.

A charge on reasonable doubt, followed by a statement that in legal investigation, "however," mathematical certainty is not obtainable, is not erroneous. (Ga.) 140.

An instruction that the jury must take the law from the judge is not error. (Ga.) 298.

Where the attention of the court is not called to an omission in charge, and the general charge is full and correct, there is no error. (Ga.) 298.

In charging on the prisoner's statement court should give all the provisions of the statute. (Ga.) 303.

The court may charge that the jury must make a designated finding if they believe certain witnesses. (N. C.) 394.

A charge stating the claims of the state is not an infringement of the rule forbidding the judge to intimate his opinion on the evidence. (Ga.) 536.

Defendant cannot complain of an error in a charge allowing his conviction for a less crime than the evidence warrants. (N. C.) 692.

One convicted of misdemeanor cannot complain of failure to give charges not asked for. (S. C.) 891.

Where defendant fails to appear at trial for misdemeanor, he cannot complain of failure to give charge for his benefit. (S. C.) 892.

Where defendant offered no evidence, and that of the state was uncontradicted, the recital of such evidence in the charge was not a charge on the facts. (S. C.) 1025.

An instruction which has no application to the evidence or the prisoner's statement should be denied. (Ga.) 298.

Testimony that defendant, after consulting lawyers, began "fixing up a defense," warranted a charge that defendant saw fit, after taking advice, to stand his ground. (S. C.) 1025.

An instruction inapplicable to the facts should be denied. (N. C.) 394.

A charge not based on the evidence should be denied. (Ga.) 536.

— Credibility of witnesses.

A charge that there is a prima facie presumption that witnesses not impeached tell the truth is not error. (Ga.) 154.

It is proper to refuse instruction that detective's testimony is to be received with great caution and distrust. (S. C.) 886.

A charge on the credibility of the evidence is error. (N. C.) 692.

Instructions as to credibility of witness tendered by the state and impeached. (Ga.) 550.

Instructions as to credit to be given to testimony of accomplice considered. (N. C.) 515.

— Recalling jury.

A jury may be recalled after they have retired, to be instructed as to the form of the verdict. (Ga.) 536.

Custody and conduct of jury.

That the attending bailiff remained in the room all night with the jury at the hotel where they were lodged will not vitiate the verdict, when the room was used merely as a place for sleeping. (Ga.) 154.

That one of the jurors repeated to the attending bailiff a message to his son, who was with in hearing, will not vitiate the verdict. (Ga.) 154.

That two jurors left the room in charge of bailiff for a short while, and the jurors in the room were not attended by an officer, will not vitiate the verdict, when none of them had intercourse with outsiders. (Ga.) 154.

Remark of bystander overheard by juror.

Question whether the fact that one of the jury who were going to dinner in charge of bailiff heard a remark by a bystander was ground for new trial. (Ga.) 140.

Verdict.

A special verdict in a prosecution for violating a city ordinance, which fails to set forth the provision violated, is fatally defective. (N. C.) 200.

Where the jury rendered a special verdict, and the court adjudge defendant not guilty, no formal verdict is necessary. (N. C.) 700.

Directing verdict.

It is error to direct a verdict of guilty. (N. C.) 657.

Though evidence for state is uncontradicted, court cannot direct clerk to enter verdict of guilty. (N. C.) 168.

Impeachment of verdict.

Recommendation to mercy does not impeach verdict. (S. C.) 886.

— By jurors.

Jurors cannot give evidence to impeach their verdict. (Ga.) 154.

The affidavit of a juror cannot be considered to impeach the verdict. (S. C.) 886.

Judgment and sentence.

A judgment cannot be arrested except for errors apparent in the record. (W. Va.) 748.

One charged with a misdemeanor may be sentenced in his absence. (Va.) 838.

New trial.

A new trial for newly-discovered evidence will not be granted where there is no affidavit that it was unknown at time of trial. (Ga.) 557.

A new trial was properly refused for newly-discovered evidence simply cumulative. (Ga.) 550.

New trial will be granted when newly-discovered evidence, if believed, would warrant acquittal. (Ga.) 303.

A new trial will not be granted for newly-discovered evidence, simply to impeach state's witnesses. (Ga.) 401.

Court may refuse new trial for newly-discovered evidence that witness for state was hostile to defendant. (N. C.) 507.

A new trial will not be granted because bills of indictment were received in evidence, there being no objection made at the time. (Ga.) 435.

That bailiff advised accused to go to trial without counsel and without jury is no cause for a new trial. (Ga.) 550, 551.

The use of improper remarks by counsel for state in argument is not ground for new trial, where verdict is as favorable to accused as evidence warrants. (Ga.) 987.

Appeal and error.

Where a judgment is affirmed, and the case remanded, the appellate court loses jurisdiction; but, on appeal from an order of the lower court refusing to hear a motion for new trial, it retains jurisdiction, and can suspend the appeal, and grant the trial court leave to hear the motion. (S. C.) 676.

Counsel may on appeal agree on and sign brief, and file it as returned, so as to give supreme court jurisdiction. (S. C.) 891.

A request for time to except to a charge should be denied where applicant has had five months in which to prepare his exceptions. (S. C.) 797.

Bill of exceptions must be tendered and signed within 20 days of rendition of decision. (Ga.) 649.

A bill of exceptions must be signed and certified within 20 days from the date of the judgment, and the fact that the judge was absent during that time will not avail. (Ga.) 558.

Where there is a repugnancy between the record and the case stated, the record will control. (N. C.) 707.

Record must be transmitted within 15 days after service of bill of exceptions on adverse party. (Ga.) 648, 649.

An entry on order book that defendant excepted to ruling will not supply the place of bill of exceptions. (Va.) 440.

Alleged error in admitting evidence cannot be reviewed when not set out in motion for new trial or bill of exception. (Ga.) 401.

Where the evidence excepted to is not incorporated into the record, its admission cannot be reviewed. (S. C.) 853.

Appeal and error—Review.

Affidavits on new trial cannot be considered on appeal unless facts have been found and placed on record. (N. C.) 507.

Where several grounds of complaint are made that evidence was admitted over objection, but the objection is not stated, it will not be considered. (Ga.) 545.

Error in rejecting evidence will not be considered where it does not appear what was proposed to be briefed. (Ga.) 553.

Objections to evidence, not stating what the evidence objected to was, will not be considered. (Ga.) 555.

Error in trying together pleas of former conviction and not guilty will not be reviewed where no exception was taken. (N. C.) 657.

Where the evidence, though not conclusive, authorizes the verdict, a refusal to grant a new trial will not be reviewed. (Ga.) 555.

A verdict on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed. (Ga.) 979.

Denial of a new trial for insufficiency of evidence cannot be reviewed. (S. C.) 886.

On prosecution for misdemeanor, variance cannot be first objected to on appeal. (S. C.) 891.

Increasing punishment on appeal.

On appeal from conviction before justice, the superior court may impose a heavier punishment. (N. C.) 256.

Cruelty.

As ground for divorce, see "Divorce."

CUSTOM AND USAGE.

In action for injuries through misplaced switch, defendant cannot show the custom of railroads as to providing watchmen for each switch. (Ga.) 18.

In action against a railroad company for injuries received while crossing a street, evidence of the custom of pedestrians in crossing a street is incompetent. (Ga.) 816.

DAMAGES.

Caused by exercise of power of eminent domain, see "Eminent Domain."

For malicious prosecution, see "Malicious Prosecution."

For wrongful attachment, see "Attachment."

A passenger injured by negligence of carrier's servants may recover for the pain he will probably endure in the future. (Ga.) 64.

As the earnings of a wife belong to her husband, her personal damages can be measured only by the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury. (Ga.) 11.

$7,500 not excessive where plaintiff's thigh is crushed and his leg shortened. (Va.) 278.

Evidence of damage—Error in telegram. (Ga.) 287.

In action for damages, plaintiff may write off from her recovery any sum she may desire. (Ga.) 406.

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT.

The right of action under the statute is not confined to residents of the state. (Ga.) 406.

It is no bar to suit by a mother for death of minor child that the father has a suit pending. (Ga.) 406.

Evidence of the father's inability to labor is admissible in behalf of the mother. (Ga.) 406.

Where father, mother, and minor children live together, and are dependent upon the labor of the family, a child of 15 years, whose labor contributes to the mutual support, is to be considered as contributing to support of mother. (Ga.) 406.

DEED.

See, also, "Fraudulent Conveyances;" "Vendor and Purchaser."

Acknowledgment of, see "Acknowledgment."

On issue as to capacity to make deed, charge as to law of testamentary capacity is rightly refused. (Ga.) 527.

The presumption is that the grantor was sane, and competent to execute. (W. Va.) 383.

Where grantor, though old and feeble, understands the nature of his act, his deed is valid. (W. Va.) 383.

A description of the vendees as "trustees," where no trust is declared, is surplusage. (Ga.) 548.

A stranger to a deed cannot urge, as an objection to its validity, that it was executed for the sole purpose of enabling the grantee to maintain ejectment. (Ga.) 830.

Deed or will.

Instrument construed to be a deed reserving a life estate, and not a will. (Ga.) 527.

Description.

Deed conveying portion of timber on certain swamp, and providing that grantor may retain enough for certain purposes, is void for indefiniteness. (N. C.) 72.

Sufficiency of description to cover three separate tracts which are mentioned as lying in one body, but of which the specific boundaries are given. (N. C.) 165.

Presumption from misdescription in deed. (Ga.) 404.

A description of a tract as "left me by 'P.,'" and as "adjoining the land of 'S.,'" containing 180 acres, is not void for uncertainty. (N. C.) 339.

Sufficiency of description. (Ga.) 830.

Recording and delivery.

A prior recorded deed takes precedence of a deed afterwards recorded, though the latter was executed first. (N. C.) 964.

The recording of a deed does not constitute delivery where there was no intention so to do. (Ga.) 404.

Construction and effect.

Construction—Rights conveyed. (Ga.) 370.

By accepting a conveyance of land "more or less," grantee waives any mistake and exception as to quantity. (Ga.) 355.

A provision that the land is not to be sold during the grantee's life, and then to belong to her heirs, is void, as a restraint on power of alienation. (N. C.) 668.

By a deed of trust in fee of a wife's land to secure the joint indebtedness of the husband and wife, who join in the deed, the trustee takes fee simple, though deed recites that wife's joinder is for purpose of releasing dower and homestead. (N. C.) 668.

By a deed to a person and her heirs and assigns, forever, with a provision that the land is "not to be sold during her life, then to belong to her heirs," the grantee takes a fee simple. (N. C.) 668.

Sufficiency of deed to convey an equitable fee, though words of inheritance are omitted. (N. C.) 713.

DISCOVERY.

A borrower of money may compel a discovery on oath of the money lent, and the interest and consideration of the same. (W. Va.) 810.

Evidence of adverse party taken before trial need not be used. (N. C.) 328.

An order to furnish papers for inspection should not be granted on affidavit alleging that they "contain evidence relating to the merits of the action." (S. C.) 929.

An order to furnish papers for inspection will not be granted where no demand and refusal are shown. (S. C.) 929.

A penalty for refusing to obey order to produce papers for inspection should not be imposed, until it is shown that refusal was without good reason. (S. C.) 929.

Dismissal.

Of appeal, see "Appeal."

Dissolution.

Of corporation, see "Corporations."

DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC SCHOOL.

To take possession of a schoolhouse, when there are no pupils present, and forbid the teacher to use the building, is not disturbance of a school, within the statute. (N. C.) 700.

DIVORCE.

Evidence of brutal treatment justifying a divorce, and the grant to plaintiff of the custody of the children. (Va.) 193.

The provision that allegations of complaint shall be deemed denied though no answer is filed, does not apply to application for alimony. (N. C.) 334.

Notice of application for alimony not invalid because it does not specify time and place of hearing. (N. C.) 334.

In fixing alimony for wife, when she is granted custody of children, the education of the latter may be considered as item of expense. (Va.) 193.

Case in which allowance of $1,000 annually for wife's maintenance and education of children was considered excessive, in view of amount and character of husband's property. (Va.) 193.

A sentence of imprisonment for contempt in refusing to pay alimony, affirmed where order for alimony not appealed from. (N. C.) 334.

Documents.

See "Evidence."

DOMICILE.

The presumption is that one's domicile remains unchanged. (N. C.) 691.

DOWER.

A wife in her husband's lifetime cannot have dower allotted to her in land sold on execution against him. (Ga.) 318.

Druggists.

Ejection.

Of passengers, see "Carriers."

EJECTMENT.

See, also, "Adverse Possession."

In ejectment by a wife, defendant cannot object to evidence that plaintiff's husband, who had paid for the land, had assigned to her a contract of purchase. (S. C.) 690.

Sufficiency of evidence to support. (Ga.) 830.

Character of judgment when defendant claims undivided one-third as tenant in common with plaintiffs, and latter show title to undivided two-thirds only. (N. C.) 73.

Election.

Between counts, see "Criminal Law."

ELECTION OF REMEDIES.

The fact that a party to a contract sues to reform it does not defeat his right to sue for its specific performance. (N. C.) 947.

EMINENT DOMAIN.

Where landowner institutes proceeding to assess damages for taking of railroad right of way, he need not allege that parties are unable to agree as to value of land. (N. C.) 171.

Under Code, §§ 1947, 1949, rights of all parties interested in land taken for railroad right of way should be adjusted in one proceeding. (N. C.) 171.

After grant of right of way by joint owner, his cotenant may begin suit to assess damages sustained by him. (N. C.) 171.

If all persons interested make themselves parties, a demurrer will not be sustained to petition for defect of parties. (N. C.) 171.

The record need not show in terms that a jury in a proceeding to take land for public use were freeholders. (W. Va.) 957.

Use of street by railroad under license from city—Rights of abutting owner. (N. C.) 330.

If market value of abutting property after building railroad in street is same as before, owner cannot recover damages. (W. Va.) 604.

The owner of land abutting on a street may recover for depreciation in value caused by building railroad in street. (W. Va.) 604.

Evidence of donation of similar property to plaintiff cannot be shown. (Va.) 901.

Measure of damages in condemnation of land and improvements thereon. (Va.) 901.

Construction of charter of railroad company. (Acts 1854-55, c. 225, §§ 24, 26, 28.) Presumption of grant of right of way arising when there is no contract with landowner. (N. C.) 653.

EQUITY.

See, also, "Creditors' Bill;" "Fraudulent Conveyances;" "Injunction;" "Mortgages;" "Partition;" "Partnership;" "Receivers;" "Specific Performance;" "Trusts."

Remedy for erroneous taxation, see "Taxation."
Suit by master for specific performance, see "Specific Performance."

Jurisdiction.

A bill for an accounting will be dismissed where plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law. (W. Va.) 579.

Equity alone has jurisdiction of an action in which the petition alleges that land was purchased with trust funds belonging to plaintiffs; that it was sold by the court with knowledge of this fact; and that the purchasers had constructive information of the trust. (Va.) 869.

Reformation of contract.

Deed will not be reformed to correct alleged misdescription when true construction of description gives plaintiff all the land he claims. (N. C.) 165.

Rescission of contracts.

To justify rescission for fraud, concealment must be willful suppression of facts party is bound to disclose. (Va.) 916.

A deed given in consideration of future support will not be canceled where the only ground is dissatisfaction with the character of the support furnished. (W. Va.) 732.

Where a mining lease was entered into under a mutual mistake as to the existence of coal, it will be rescinded. (W. Va.) 493.

A mistake of law is no ground for relief from covenants in mortgage. (S. C.) 229.

Old age is not evidence of incapacity to make deed. (W. Va.) 383.

If deed is made partly for love and affection, disproportion of money consideration raises no presumption against validity. (Ga.) 527.

There is no presumption against validity of deed to one who is in effect an adopted son, because there is no blood relationship. (Ga.) 527.

Pleading.

Pleading may follow the chancery practice used before enactment of Code, c. 125, § 37. (W. Va.) 468.

Sufficiency of pleading in action to set aside deed as obtained by undue influence, and for an accounting. (Ga.) 421.

Two distinct grounds of relief must not be joined in the same bill. (W. Va.) 611.

A bill may be framed with a double aspect, and ask relief in the alternative, but the states of facts must not be inconsistent. (W. Va.) 611.

Bill must in some way make parties plaintiff or defendant. (W. Va.) 468.

Where plaintiffs desire any relief other than that specially prayed for, the bill must contain a prayer for general relief. (W. Va.) 757.

A demurrer may be incorporated in answer. (W. Va.) 468.

Special demurrers are abolished. (W. Va.) 468.

A demurrer need not specify causes. (W. Va.) 468.

Where causes of demurrer are not specified, court may ask an assignment of errors, or, on overruling demurrer, state that none were assigned. (W. Va.) 468.

Answers and other pleadings, except in case of injunction, can be filed only at rules or in court. (W. Va.) 611.

It is error to refuse permission to file answer after rendition of final decree, but before its entry. (Va.) 914.

A bill to prevent a third party from removing trust property from the state may be amended by making new parties defendant, and showing the necessity for an accounting and for aid in administering the trust. (W. Va.) 757.

Parties.

In suit between sureties for contribution, the heirs of a dead insolvent cosurety are not necessary parties. (W. Va.) 485.

Intervention.

In an accounting as to certain lands, one claiming an interest, under a deed from plaintiff, as having paid for the lands, can intervene. (N. C.) 701.

Decree.

Where, on accounting, plaintiff owes defendant a certain sum yearly, in excess of the interest due on the debt owed by defendant to plaintiff, the sum due by plaintiff should be applied each year on the interest of the debt due by defendant, and the balance on the principal. (S. C.) 1030.

Error, Writ of.

See "Appeal;" "Certiorari;" "Exceptions, Bill of;" "New Trial."

ESCAPE.

Where prisoner was allowed to escape by assistant of defendant officer, the question was whether defendant was duly careful in selecting assistant. (N. C.) 69.

ESTOPPEL.

See, also, "Election of Remedies."

Res judicata, see "Judgment."

To deny landlord's title, see "Landlord and Tenant."

In an accounting for proceeds of land conveyed to defendant, and sold by her, plaintiff is not estopped by a prior deed of an undivided interest to defendant's agent. (N. C.) 701.

A junior chattel mortgagee who induces the senior mortgagee to release his mortgage and take another is estopped from asserting his mortgage as the prior lien. (N. C.) 203.

A tenant in common is not estopped by declarations of a cotenant made without authority. (N. C.) 73.

When mortgagee is not estopped by representations of his attorney to mortgagor as to the legal effect of the terms of the mortgage. (S. C.) 229.

By acquiescence and retention of benefits. (W. Va.) 744.

That plaintiff consented that title to land which he bought should be taken by defendant will not defeat his right to have a resulting trust declared. (N. C.) 712.

EVIDENCE.

See, also, "Boundaries;" "Damages;" "Death by Wrongful Act;" "Deposition;" "Fraudulent Conveyances;" "Negligence;" "Payment;" "Witness."

Declarations, see "Boundaries."

In criminal cases, see "Burglary;" "Criminal Law;" "Homicide."

Parol, see "Negotiable Instruments."

Secondary, see "Boundaries."

Tax deed as evidence, see "Taxation."

Testimony of plaintiff as to his conversation with another is admissible as corroborative of his testimony on the trial. (N. C.) 209.

Plaintiff cannot testify as to data for which he has to refer to certain books which were kept partly by himself, and partly by another. (Ga.) 24.

Relevancy. (Ga.) 311.

The fact that boys pointed out a hole to plaintiff's husband as the one into which she fell is inadmissible. (Ga.) 11.

Information furnished by agent of railway company as to past transactions is inadmissible, when furnishing such information is not within agent's employment. (Ga.) 24.

Where issue is as to usury, and the testimony is conflicting, defendant cannot ask his own witness if plaintiff has not the reputation of suing for usury. (N. C.) 711.

Where witness states that he went to scene of the tort after making certain purchase, the opposite party can show that he made no such purchase. (Ga.) 22.

Judicial notice.

The court cannot take judicial notice that rice beer is intoxicating. (Ga.) 288.

Presumption.

It will be presumed that a married woman who joined her husband in a deed of land had, or claimed, title. (Ga.) 994.

In replevin, evidence by plaintiff that the articles in controversy were given to her before her marriage to defendant raises the presumption that it was solemnized under statutes enabling a married woman to acquire a separate estate. (N. C.) 200.

Sale on execution having been acquiesced in for 20 years, and the minutes having been destroyed, it will be presumed that the proper verdict was entered. (Ga.) 425.

It will be presumed that a debt for which land was sold without allotment of homestead was contracted after the constitutional provision for a homestead exemption. (N. C.) 691.

Secondary evidence.

Records of foreclosure proceedings may be shown by secondary evidence if loss is proven. Facts sufficient to show loss considered. (N. C.) 501.

A certified copy from the record after the original deed has been lost, though the copy be recorded where the land lies, is insufficient. (Ga.) 542.

Hearsay.

That it was generally reported that a certain person had become a resident of another state is hearsay. (N. C.) 691.

Declarations and admissions.

A party's declarations, made soon after the transaction in question, are only competent to corroborate his testimony. (N. C.) 701.

Declarations of payee of note after assignment as to amount due are inadmissible. (N. C.) 252.

Declarations of a deceased person cannot be received to defeat a title by prescription, complete in persons who never heard of such declarations. (Ga.) 13.

In suit by widow on antenuptial contract of husband, will of latter is not evidence as to discharge of contract by him. (Ga.) 39.

If contract sued on is claimed to be one of partnership, declarations of deceased, after his death, showing whether plaintiff was his partner, are not admissible. (N. C.) 79.

Declarations by agent having authority to borrow money are admissible to show the purpose of the loans. (Ga.) 366.

Conversation between the parties is admissible, though brought about by plaintiff through a proposition of settlement. (Ga.) 366.

Admissions in answer are admissible against defendant in another suit. (Ga.) 311.

Defendant may make use of allegations in plaintiff's declaration without offering the declaration in evidence, or proving the allegations. (Ga.) 18.

Opinion evidence.

Of attorney as to intention of parties as to covenants in a mortgage inadmissible. (S. C.) 229.

The opinion that defendant in an action for negligence was not as careful as he should have been, inadmissible. (Ga.) 311.

A witness need not have peculiar scientific knowledge to testify whether a certain person has African blood. (N. C.) 55.

In action by passenger on freight train, person present, who has had experience on same railway, can testify that car was not going fast, and that the jolt which injured plaintiff was not unusual, or sufficient to throw a man down. (Ga.) 64.

Where a surveyor, as an expert, has fully explained the plat, he cannot testify whether any other person than those he mentioned got any land, it being an opinion as to facts. (S. C.) 680.

Documents.

EXECUTION.

See, also, "Attachment;" "Garnishment;" "Judicial Sales."

Leave to issue execution against decedent's estate on judgment rendered against him in his lifetime will not be granted. (N. C.) 329.

An execution on a judgment two years after its rendition, without an order of court, is void. (W. Va.) 476.

An estate for life by will in land, which can be enjoyed without interfering with remainder, is liable on execution. (Ga.) 425.

A judgment creditor whose debt is secured by conveyance of the land, he having made a bond to reconvey, cannot levy on the land until reconveyance to debtor. (Ga.) 399.

Goods delivered to agent, to be sold on commission, are not liable on execution against agent. (W. Va.) 482.

Where animal levied on, and released to claimant on giving bond, falls into hole on claimant's premises, the latter is not freed from liability. (Ga.) 23.

In action on forthcoming bond, a plea alleging the death of the animal levied on, but not averring that it arose from the act of God, should be stricken out. (Ga.) 23.

An execution and a levy in the circuit court after appeal, but before the return is filed, are not void for want of jurisdiction. (S. C.) 790.

Sale.

Personal property should be present at sale in officer's possession. (N. C.) 335.

Sale under writ issued after owner's death is void if no scire facias is issued. (N. C.) 505.

A sale of interest in land of one entitled to a homestead without allotting it is void. (N. C.) 691.

Affidavit of illegality.

Where a judgment is wholly void, an affidavit of illegality is a proper remedy as to an execution issued thereon. (Ga.) 137.

An affidavit of illegality to an execution issued upon foreclosure of a chattel mortgage, alleging that defendant is not legally indebted to plaintiff, and that the mortgage foreclosed is without consideration, is good. (Ga.) 830.

v.188.E.—67

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

See, also, "Descent and Distribution;" "Wills."

The appointment of an administrator with will annexed not void because executor had duly qualified. (Ga.) 311.

The right of a husband to administer his wife's estate is not affected by a contest over her will, which named no executor. (N. C.) 689.

A husband may have another appointed co-administrator with him of his wife's estate. (N. C.) 689.

Where an executor, having power to sell, withdraws from the estate more than is his share, judgment against him personally is no lien upon the estate. (Ga.) 402.

Liability of surety on bond to pay costs and damages—Release by administrator of plaintiff. (N. C.) 327.

Claims against estate.

An executor who has notice of claim cannot justify his failure to produce assets to pay it by setting up that what he retained depreciated in value, pending suit. (Ga.) 39.

Claim for deficiency on foreclosure sale does not rank as judgment, if sale not made till after deceased's death. (S. C.) 640.

Settlement and accounting.

Where there is no evidence of appropriation of assets by executor he is not chargeable with interest. (N. C.) 96.

Where administrator reduced personalty to money from 1862 to 1864 and paid the debts, the balance was properly scaled at three dollars for one dollar. (N. C.) 96.

Executor should not be allowed fee for attorney if he does not ask it. (S. C.) 640.

Sales under order of court.

An order of sale granted to an administrator, but not executed by him, may be executed by an administrator de bonis non who succeeds him. (Ga.) 62.

Though separate sale of timber on testator's land is not authorized by order, the order is admissible in favor of the purchaser, together with receipt of the purchase money, as against later purchaser of land. (Ga.) 62.

Allowance to widow.

Allowance of support for five years to widow entitled to it for only one year is void as against a creditor of remainder-man. (Ga.) 63.

A widow, having whole estate for life, who, of her own will, keeps it together for over a year, there being no minor children, is entitled to allowance for only one year. (Ga.) 63.

EXEMPTIONS.

See "Assignment for Benefit of Creditors;" "Homestead."

Holder of a specialty executed by deceased before 1868 has no prior claim on proceeds of property exempt under act of that year. (S. C.) 640.

FACTORS AND BROKERS.

See, also, "Principal and Agent."

Where the contract had been made by a broker of purchaser, the goods consigned, and bill of lading sent by mail, the broker cannot rescind the contract. (Ga.) 363.

A single sale of land for a commission, without anything to show that the agent professed to follow the business of selling for commission, will not make him a broker, under Code, c. 32, § 2. (W. Va.) 575.

An agent's right to a lien for commissions is not transferable. (W. Va.) 482.

FALSE PRETENSES.

Evidence of other similar transactions by defendant is admissible. (N. C.) 945.

It is no defense to a charge of inducing a county treasurer to cash an order as genuine that the order was for stationery for a county officer, where it had not been authorized by the county commissioners. (N. C.) 945.

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

As a defense must be pleaded. (N. C.) 337.

A receipt of part payment, coupled with possession, takes an oral contract out of the statute. (S. C.) 680.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

What constitute.

Conveyance from parent to child, 21 years old, is not presumed to be fraudulent. (N. C.) 81.

Fraud may be inferred from deceptive statements, and from facts which would lead a reasonable man to believe that the conveyance was fraudulent. (W. Va.) 451.

Actions to set aside.

Unnecessary that execution should first issue on judgment, and return nulla bona should be had. (W. Va.) 375.

Action to set aside—Parties. (N. C.) 328.

Where land sought to be subjected as fraudulently conveyed is described only as in a certain county, it is too indefinite to authorize any proceedings therein. (W. Va.) 485.

Evidence.

Acts and declarations of the agent of alleged fraudulent grantee after execution of conveyance not admissible to show bad faith of grantee. (Ga.) 309.

The fact that the grantee did not return land for taxation admissible to show fraud. (N. C.) 328.

On an issue as to the good faith of a mortgage, the tax lists are competent to show that the mortgagee had no solvent credits. (N. C.) 206.

Sufficiency of evidence to establish fraud. (Ga.) 309.

Evidence as to the validity of a conveyance to wife considered. (Ga.) 525.

Sufficiency of evidence—Conveyance, without consideration, to son-in-law. (W. Va.) 451.

Where a mortgage was set aside as fraudulent, the sufficiency of the evidence of judgment debts, which were liens on the property, did not concern the mortgagee. (N. C.) 206.

Instructions.

An instruction that the law looks with suspicion on a conveyance by a debtor to a brother-in-law for an alleged pre-existing indebtedness is correct. (N. C.) 206.

Priorities on setting aside.

A party filing a bill to set aside fraudulent conveyance should be first satisfied out of proceeds, unless they are prior liens. (W. Va.) 375.

GAMING.

Tenpins is not a game of chance, the playing of which is a misdemeanor. (N. C.) 169.

Sufficiency of evidence under charge that defendant knowingly permitted persons to play at prohibited games in his house. (Ga.) 186.

On prosecution for betting on game of dice in public place, it is proper to charge that to allow money to be staked on game of dice is gambling. (S. C.) 891.

HIGHWAYS.

A road surveyor may change a county road with the consent of the owner of the land, and the former road is discontinued to the extent of such alteration. (W. Va.) 782.

In action for damages for defects in road, complaint must disclaim contributory negligence. (S. C.) 936.

A criminal prosecution will lie against a railway for obstructing a county road. (W. Va.) 582.

HOMESTEAD.

Is liable on a judgment on a note given in renewal of note for purchase price. (Ga.) 313.

One is not entitled to homestead, as infant child of debtor, in land never lived on by such debtor. (S. C.) 636.

To entitle one to a homestead exemption, he must be an actual resident. (N. C.) 510.

Where, in action by judgment creditor to recover his reversionary interest in homestead of deceased judgment debtor, it does not appear that the debtor's children have attained majority, a nonsuit is proper. (N. C.) 666.

Burden of proof on issue as to the right to a homestead exemption, defined. (N. C.) 510.

HOMICIDE.Murder.

If an officer, without warrant, and without stating that he is an officer, attempts to arrest one for breach of the peace, the arrest is illegal, and, if the officer kills the person while resisting arrest, the crime is murder. (N. C.) 394.

One may be convicted of murder for aiding, though the person who did the killing has been acquitted. (N. C.) 715.

Where an officer, in resisting rescue, shoots a rescuer, the burden is on him to show matter of excuse. (N. C.) 394.

To reduce killing to homicide in self-defense, the accused must prove retreat, and killing to preserve life or save from great bodily harm. (Va.) 440.

Drunkenness of defendant cannot be considered in determining intent. (S. C.) 937.

Murder—Sufficiency of evidence. (Ga.) 298.

Sufficiency of evidence to establish crime of murder. (Ga.) 552.

Manslaughter.

Sufficiency of evidence to warrant conviction of manslaughter. (Ga.) 552, 553.

Sufficiency of evidence. (Ga.) 823.

Sufficiency of evidence to sustain conviction of manslaughter. (Va.) 440.

A conviction of manslaughter cannot be sustained if an instruction reciting facts as negating murder, which facts would negative manslaughter also, does not so state. (Ga.) 44.

Assault with intent to kill.

Shooting at an officer to prevent illegal arrest is not an assault with intent to kill. (Ga.) 305.

One who willfully inflicts on another a dangerous wound, from which death ensues in a year, is not relieved because the wound was aggravated by unskillful treatment. (Va.) 440.

Sufficiency of evidence of assault with intent to kill. (Ga.) 435.

Excusable and justifiable homicide.

The killing of another because of a past attempt to debauch the slayer's wife is not justifiable homicide. (Ga.) 987.

Defendant cannot avail himself of the right to protect his house, where he shoots his invited guest without notice to leave. (S. C.) 1033.

Justification of the killing another to resist arrest. (Ga.) 1018.

When justifiable—Killing paramour of wife. (Ga.) 298.

Where only one's safety is in question, he is bound to avoid bloodshed, if possible, by retreat. (S. C.) 940.

Where defendant puts himself in a position to defend against an attack by deceased, and his gun goes off accidentally, he is not guilty if he took care in holding the gun. (S. C.) 937.

An officer can use force to resist one attempting to rescue person lawfully in his charge. (N. C.) 394.

Excusable and justifiable homicide—Self-defense.

Where the accused goes into a room where deceased is, and provokes the quarrel, there is no question of self-defense. (S. C.) 940.

That defendant may avail himself of the plea of self-defense, it must appear that he believed there was no other probable means of escape. (S. C.) 1033.

Indictment—Joining principal and accessory.

The principal and the accessory before the fact may be charged jointly in one count of an indictment. (S. C.) 1021.

Evidence.

Testimony that, immediately after a fight, deceased said that he was shot and was killed, that he could feel the blood running inside of him, is admissible. (N. C.) 715.

Declarations of deceased shortly after injuries received, admissible. (Ga.) 301.

Competency of declarations by third persons as evidence. (Ga.) 553.

Paper found at defendant's room, of the same kind as used for gun wadding at the killing, was competent, where there was no evidence that defendant was compelled to furnish the paper as evidence against himself. (S. C.) 1021.

Admissibility of evidence. (N. C.) 394.

One who flees on approach of officer has no right to express information as to intent of officer to arrest him. (Ga.) 305.

Evidence admissible on trial for homicide in resisting arrest. (Ga.) 536.

Clear evidence of the corpus delicti will corroborate a confession by the accused which will serve as corroboration of evidence of an accomplice. (Ga.) 552.

— Expert testimony.

A practicing physician is presumably competent to testify as to probable effect of wounds. (Ga.) 301.

Instructions.

Where the killing was admitted, an instruction that, to make it self-defense, defendant must prove his innocence by the preponderance of the evidence, with the instruction that the state must make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt, is proper. (S. C.) 1033.

Where evidence shows defendant killed his wife by throwing her down and stamping on her, the charge on the law of manslaughter is unnecessary. (Ga.) 301.

When there is no evidence that the killing was involuntary, an instruction as to involuntary manslaughter should not be given. (Ga.) 298.

An instruction that, if the jury believed certain things, then it would be manslaughter, is not a charge on the facts. (S. C.) 1033.

An instruction illustrative of the law of accidental killing is not erroneous where the defense is of that nature. (S. C.) 937.

Question for jury.

Whether, on the evidence, an attempt by an arresting officer to commit serious injury on another reduced to manslaughter the homicide committed by the latter, is for the jury. (Ga.) 536.

Verdict.

Where indictment charges killing feloniously and with malice aforethought, a verdict finding accused guilty as charged is a conviction of murder in the first degree. (Ga.) 319.

A verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to the mercy of the court, is good. (Ga.) 823.

Appeal—Review.

Where the evidence was circumstantial and in some degree conflicting, the judgment will not be reversed, where there was some evidence to support it. (Ga.) 545.

Error in an instruction as to malice is not available where the conviction was of manslaughter. (S. C.) 1033.

The court will assume, in absence of evidence to the contrary, that trial judge passed on admissibility of dying declarations before submitting to jury. (Ga.) 301.

An objection that a sentence of 20 years for manslaughter is cruel and unusual will not be considered. (Ga.) 553.

Where a husband sells household furniture, his wife need not be examined privately, as in conveyances of land. (N. C.) 81.

In action for loss of wife's services, occasioned by a tortious personal injury to her, the husband can recover the reasonable value of her services. (Ga.) 816.

A husband, acting as agent for his wife, has no authority to receive real estate in payment of a debt due her, and take conveyance to himself. (Ga.) 545.

A personal decree against a married woman for a debt contracted during coverture before Acts 1893, c. 3, § 15, is void. (W. Va.) 561.

A married woman may sign an administrator's bond as principal, and administer an estate. (S. C.) 935.

A married woman is bound by contract for purchase of interest of her husband's partner. (S. C.) 3.

It is no excuse for nonperformance of purchase by wife that seller purchased goods from husband fraudulently. (S. C.) 3.

Under a trust deed for married woman, providing that trustee shall convey property as she may direct in writing, a deed of the property by her and her husband is invalid. (N. C.) 85.

Wife's separate estate.

Property purchased by a married woman from one other than her husband is her separate property, though purchased on credit, and paid for from profits arising from its use. (W. Va.) 726.

A note is not within Act Dec. 24, 1887, providing that instruments in writing by a married woman shall convey or charge her separate estate, when the intention so to do is declared therein. (S. C.) 125.

Validity of mortgage executed by wife to secure debt of husband. (Ga.) 348.

Loan to firm by mortgage on property of wife of one member; evidence as to whether said wife assumed position of principal debtor. (Ga.) 65.

Conveyances and gifts between.

Where wife transfers her separate estate to her husband, she cannot avoid the transaction because of her ignorance of the law. (Va.) 285.

A married woman may bestow her separate estate upon her husband. (Va.) 285.

Testimony of a husband and wife that money delivered by the wife to the husband was a loan will not, as against the creditors of the insolvent husband, rebut the presumption of gift. (W. Va.) 960.

To show that money of the wife delivered to the husband was a loan, the wife must prove an express promise of the husband to repay. (W. Va.) 960.

Crimes of wife.

A wife is not excused by the mere presence of her husband for the voluntary doing of a criminal act. (Ga.) 186.

Wife is not liable criminally because gambling took place in house in which she and her husband resided, unless she was active in granting permission. (Ga.) 186.

Impeachment.

Of witness, see "Witness."

INDEMNITY.

Construction of a mortgage by a trustee to the sureties on his bond, as to whether it was one of indemnity. (S. C.) 224.

INSURANCE.

Delivery of policy without requiring payment of premium is a waiver of condition of prepayment. (Va.) 195.

Company cannot, on request of insured for new policy covering same period, without his knowledge, issue policy for shorter period, and so avoid liability for loss occurring after its expiration. (Va.) 911.

A policy procured by a religious society on life of one of its members is void as a wagering contract. (N. C.) 175.

After delivery of policy as valid contract, company's liability thereon can only be terminated, in case of nonpayment of premium, by giving stipulated notice of cancellation. (Va.) 195.

Insured cannot impeach application for insurance by showing that he could not read, and that it was filled up by agent who did not read it to him. (Va.) 191.

Where premium is charged to agent personally by the company, and the former credits the insured, it is equivalent to payment. (Va.) 195.

Statement in application that insured would keep his book of account in secure place construed to be a warranty. (Va.) 191.

Where policy provides that it is made and accepted subject to the "foregoing stipulations," the materiality of a warranty cannot be inquired into. (Va.) 191.

Where company furnishes blanks to a man, responds to his acts, approves removal permits given by him, and pays his rent, it is bound by his acts. (Va.) 911.

If company gives person apparent authority to deliver policy and receive premiums, it cannot defend on ground that he is without written authority, as required by statute. (Va.) 195.

Question in action on insurance policy whether the premium was paid by plaintiffs through intervening broker. (Va.) 195.

An agent of a foreign unincorporated insurance association is not personally liable for doing business without license. (Ga.) 14.

INTEREST.

See, also, "Usury."

What law governs, see "Conflict of Laws."

On recovery against surety company for default of corporate officer, interest should be allowed on amount of the default from time it was demanded and refused. (S. C.) 5.

An agreement for a higher legal rate after maturity than that on note which specifies no rate is valid. (N. C.) 251.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Judicial notice, see "Evidence."

Jurisdiction of prosecution, see "Courts."

What are. (Ga.) 288.

Prohibition of sale—Title to act. (Ga.) 288, 289.

A legal option law does not vary the prior general law relating to license. (Ga.) 288.

Sale by practicing physician—Evidence. (Ga.) 289.

Authority to grant licenses to sell in Putnam county is vested exclusively in the commissioners of roads and revenues of such county. (Ga.) 996.

Where delivery is effected in county where sale is unlawful, the contract of sale will be deemed to be made there, though negotiations for sale were carried on in another county. (Ga.) 997.

A druggist who mixes liquors with other ingredients, and sells same as a beverage, is liable for unlawful sale, if he has no license. (Ga.) 998.

On indictment for an illegal sale, the burden is on accused to show that he comes within the exception as to licensed physicians. (Ga.) 558.

An indictment for unlawful selling in Putnam county need only negative the grant of a license by the commissioners of such county. (Ga.) 996.

An allegation that the sale charged was in the "714th District Georgia Militia" is established by proof that the offense was committed in the "714th District G. M." (Ga.) 558.

Sufficiency of evidence to sustain a conviction for unlawfully selling liquors considered. (Ga.) 526.

Judge.

See "Courts;" "Justices of the Peace."

JUDGMENT.

Defective service of process, reversible error, see "Writs."

Presumption in favor of, see "Evidence."

Proof of foreign, see "Evidence."

Where partner dies pending action against firm, and his death is not suggested before rendition of judgment, it is a lien on the partnership estate. 268.

Judgment rendered by justice, without due notice to defendant of time and place of hearing, cannot be set aside by suit in the superior court. (N. C.) 55.

It is no ground for setting aside a judgment that the property alleged to have been converted was loosely described in petition. (Ga.) 433.

Setting aside default—Laches of attorney. (Ga.) 430.

Where the clerk improperly enters an order for a writ of inquiry in action for debt at rules, the court may enter judgment in disregard of such order. (W. Va.) 724.

Act 1893, c. 81, authorizing a judgment on verdict taken in defendant's absence to be opened in certain cases, applies only to judgments rendered after its passage. (N. C.) 704.

A judgment in an action on a judgment merges the old judgment in the new. (S. C.) 861.

An action on a judgment by regular summons and complaint, wherein a money judgment alone is prayed for, is not in the nature of a scire facias. (S. C.) 861.

In action to charge a tax collector personally is not vitiated by the addition of "tax collector" to defendant's name. (Ga.) 981.

Order in foreclosure proceeding for sale of land cannot be amended at later term without rehearing, so as to include another tract. (S. C.) 220.

Res judicata.

The overruling of a motion to attach for contempt, not having been appealed from, is a bar to a subsequent motion to punish on an affidavit identical with that in the first proceeding. (N. C.) 715.

A decree by consent a bar to action between the same parties. (N. C.) 339.

Where, in an action against principal and surety, the latter alone defends, and the verdict is against the principal only, the legal effect is a finding in favor of the surety. (Ga.) 132.

An erroneous decision of a state court is binding on the parties, though on a similar case the judgment of the state court has been overruled by the United States supreme court. (N. C.) 606.

Where a lease provided for its termination on sale of the land, and the landlord conveyed his interest to his wife, and she to a third person, a judgment in an action by the wife, before her conveyance, that there was no sale, is not binding on the wife's grantee in an action by him to recover possession. (N. C.) 971.

Lien.

The right of the former owner of land to the excess of the proceeds of the sale for taxes is property which is liable to the lien of a judgment against him. (W. Va.) 807.

The lien of a judgment on the land of an insolvent is superior to that of a trust deed executed by the insolvent to his wife, pending the action for which the judgment was obtained, where the sum secured by the trust deed was barred by limitations, and the only evidence of the validity of the trust deed was the testimony of the husband and wife. (W. Va.) 960.

A judgment against one whose land has become forfeited to the state, rendered after such forfeiture, is no lien on such land. (W. Va.) 807.

Collateral attack.

Where records do not show jurisdictional infirmity, parol evidence is inadmissible to collaterally attack judgment. (S. C.) 636.

Where record shows that court had jurisdiction, on subsequent proceedings to renew defendant cannot show lack of summons. (S. C.) 33.

In collateral attack on judgment ordering sale of intestate's land, the sheriff's return showing a proper service on the heirs is conclusive. (N. C.) 174.

Question whether a person whose title was divested by previous action could show that summons therein was not served, as stated in return. (S. C.) 220.

Question whether, in action on indemnity bond given by trustee to his sureties, the latter could claim that order previously given by the probate court as to the trust fund was without jurisdiction. (S. C.) 224.

Foreign judgments.

The judgment of a sister state is entitled to the same faith and credit it has in state where rendered. (W. Va.) 456.

In action on foreign judgment, the court will inquire as to jurisdiction of court rendering the same. (W. Va.) 456.

Of a sister state, without process of any kind, and without appearance, is void. (W. Va.) 456.

In a suit on foreign judgment, defendant cannot show that judgment was excessive. (N. C.) 500.

Revival.

The proper proceeding to revive a judgment is to issue a summons and renew execution. (S. C.) 861.

On revival of judgment by scire facias, the writ must pursue the terms of the judgment. (Ga.) 443.

A judgment entered in 1879 can be revived in 1891, under Act 1873. (S. C.) 247.

May be revived against the executor of a deceased judgment debtor. (S. C.) 247.

An action on a judgment obtained in 1871 may be maintained without first reviving it, where plaintiff does not seek to maintain a lien growing out of it. (S. C.) 861.

JUDICIAL SALES.

See "Bankruptcy."

Foreclosure sale, see "Mortgages."

Under execution, see "Execution."

A sale made at a time other than that fixed in the decree is void. (S. C.) 233.

A decree for sale of land need not direct execution of deed. (S. C.) 237.

Where a sale is set aside after payment by purchaser and use of the money so paid, on ordering a new sale the rights of purchaser will be protected. (S. C.) 233.

A purchaser is not protected on reversal of the decree where record shows that necessary parties were not parties when the sale was ordered and confirmed. (W. Va.) 561.

A judgment that the purchaser shall pay into court $3,000, to be applied, etc., and that, on payment to the commissioner of $3,000, the latter shall make him a deed, does not direct the money to be paid twice. (N. C.) 600.

Jurisdiction.

See "Courts;" "Criminal Law;" "Equity."

JURY.

Custody and conduct, see "Criminal Law."

Misconduct of juror, see "New Trial."

Right to jury trial, see "Constitutional Law."

Question whether juror's statements, made before criminal trial, were ground for his rejection. (Ga.) 154.

A juror not incompetent because his step-daughter married the brother of the plaintiff. (Ga.) 315.

Opinions of jurors adverse to prisoner, based on rumors only, do not disqualify if they can render a fair verdict. (N. C.) 507.

An objection to a juror for want of qualification comes too late after verdict. (W. Va.) 957.

No list need be furnished sergeant of another county on summoning jurors for trial in adjoining county. (Va.) 440.

That a sheriff was allowed to amend his return showing the number of men summoned is no ground for a challenge to the array. (N. C.) 715.

A juror may be challenged if he attended court in expectation of being called as witness. (N. C.) 515.

That one of the men named in the special venire was dead, and another had removed from the county, is not ground for a challenge to the array. (N. C.) 715.

It is no ground for a challenge to the array that one named in venire was not summoned. (N. C.) 715.

Defendant in criminal case is not entitled to have panel full or entirely read over before entering on his right of challenge. (S. C.) 919.

The court may excuse juror before he is accepted. (N. C.) 515.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

Separating accounts to give jurisdiction, see "Account Stated."

A warrant charging that defendant inflicted bruises on child does not allege a crime beyond jurisdiction of justice. (N. C.) 256.

Where defendant answers summons made returnable to another justice than the one who issues it, and proceeds to trial without objection, the justice acquires jurisdiction. (N. C.) 76.

Justice's court may be held from day to day until its business is disposed of. (Ga.) 649.

Original summons to recover personalty which fails to state value may be amended, with permission of justice. (N. C.) 212.

When not in court do not act judicially in answering questions of counsel. (Ga.) 138.

A bill of particulars attached to a summons will not be established instantaneously. (Ga.) 138.

Where on certiorari from a verdict of a jury in a justice court the case is remanded, the new trial must be by jury. (Ga.) 293.

Error of justice in issuing a venire for jury before summons returned, waived where defendant appears, and has case continued and the jury adjourned. (W. Va.) 380.

When pending case is suspended to give opportunity for settlement, which fails, neither party is entitled to notice of subsequent trial. (Ga.) 649.

Justifiable Homicide.

See "Homicide."

KIDNAPPING.

A man is not guilty because he persuaded a female, 14 years old, to run away with him, and get married without the consent of her parents. (Ga.) 10.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

Mining leases, see "Mines and Mining."

A tenant may recover damages for injury to his use of premises caused by the maintenance of a nuisance in the street adjacent to such premises. (Ga.) 1013.

Where a tenant obtains a temporary injunction restraining his landlord from evicting him, and, pending hearing, abandons possession, suffers others claiming title to enter, and then dismisses proceeding, the court cannot, on summary petition by landlord, turn such others out. (Ga.) 1016.

A lease in which the tenant stipulates to make all needful repairs at his own expense exempts the landlord from making any repairs. (Ga.) 815.

One who, while in possession of land, accepts a lease thereof, is estopped to deny his lessor's title. (N. C.) 325.

Leases.

Where both parties to a lease have violated its provisions, the damages therefrom should on distress be set off against each other. (Ga.) 350.

Measure of damages for breach of lessor's covenant to clean out certain ditches, whereby crop was diminished. (N. C.) 167.

A contract for a term of years at a fixed rental, providing that all crops made shall be bound for the rent, is a lease. (N. C.) 669.

Where premises are leased for one year, with the privilege of retaining them the following year, at such price as any one would give, it is a jury question whether the contract of renewal embraced an agreement to apply certain terms of the first lease to the second. (Ga.) 815.

Where a lease provided for its termination on sale of the land, and for the removal of the building, the notice by the purchaser that the lease was ended was sufficient, without a demand for the removal of the building. (N. C.) 971.

Where a lease provided for removal of the building on sale of the land, and the owner conveyed his life estate to his wife, with the remainder to others, and the wife conveyed her interest, there was a sale, within the lease. (N. C.) 971.

Where a lease provided for termination on sale of the land, a notice from the purchaser of the life interest of the landlord was sufficient, without a joinder by the remainder-men. (N. C.) 971.

Where a lease provided that it should continue until lessor sold the land, and that the lessee should have 30 days thereafter to remove the building, a sale terminated the lease, and the lessee had 30 days in which to remove the building. (N. C.) 971.

Where a lease provides for forfeiture on nonpayment of rent, and lessee, on nonpayment, agrees to surrender his lease, the tenancy is ended. (W. Va.) 378.

Holding over.

Where a landlord permits tenant to remain in possession after expiration of his lease, it will be presumed he holds under the terms of the original lease. (W. Va.) 762.

A tenant holding over without paying rent becomes either a trespasser or a tenant, at the option of his landlord. (W. Va.) 762.

Landlord's lien.

A landlord is liable to his tenant for value of property converted in excess of his lien. (N. C.) 341.

Under a lease providing that crops shall be bound for the rent, the landlord retains a statutory lien superior to agricultural lien for advances. (N. C.) 609.

Recovery of possession.

Where a tenant disavows his tenancy, the landlord has the right to recover possession. (S. C.) 257.

Possession under a recorded deed from a tenant is notice to the landlord of disavowal of tenancy. (S. C.) 257.

That during the tenancy the title of the landlord has been forfeited for nonpayment of taxes is no defense to an action to dispossess the tenant. (W. Va.) 762.

In unlawful detainer, where no fraud is shown in procurement of a lease, the landlord need not prove title. (W. Va.) 762.

LARCENY.

See, also, "Robbery."

If ownership is laid in C. as agent, and there is no exception that evidence does not show special property in C., verdict of guilty establishes his ownership. (N. C.) 517.

Under indictment for larceny and receiving stolen goods, a general verdict of guilty is good if either count be good. (N. C.) 515.

It is not necessary to show an attempt to conceal the taking. (N. C.) 971.

Sufficiency of proof of ownership. (Ga.) 436.

Sufficiency of evidence. (Ga.) 303.

Evidence showing malice in charging plaintiff, a Democratic candidate, with having requested Populist support. (N. C.) 209.

In libel for imputing crime, truth as a justification need only be established by a preponderance of the evidence. (Ga.) 1010.

LIENS.

See, also, "Mechanics' Liens."

Of judgment, see "Judgment."

Of landlord, see "Landlord and Tenant."

Of vendor, see "Vendor and Purchaser."

One furnishing machinery in steam sawmill is entitled to a lien. (Ga.) 359.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

See, also, "Adverse Possession."

When statute applicable.

For fees due an officer by the judgment of a court. (N. C.) 329.

Specific performance of contract of purchase at judicial sale is not barred, although statute has run against action for price. (S. C.) 237.

The lien of a mortgage securing a note is not affected because the statute of limitations has run against the note. (N. C.) 696.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 155, 164, determine the time within which an action may be brought against the representative of a deceased surety on a note under seal. (N. C.) 50.

Under Code 1863, c. 35, § 20, the statute runs against the state. (W. Va.) 470.

Code 1868, c. 35, § 20, subjecting the state to the statute of limitations, as amended and re-enacted by Acts 1882, c. 18, is retroactive upon judgments rendered in favor of state before its re-enactment. (W. Va.) 470.

The two-years limitation of actions against an assignee in bankruptcy do not apply to actions against a purchaser from the assignee. (Va.) 869.

Running of statute.

Begins to run against a demand for money had and received for the use of another from the receipt of the money. (W. Va.) 575.

The statute does not begin to run on a chattel mortgage until the condition is broken. (N. C.) 205.

Action by one plaintiff is not recommencement of former action by him and another which was dismissed. (Ga.) 13.

The statute does not run against an action on a bond of a deputy sheriff for default until the sheriff has paid the debt occasioned by such default. (W. Va.) 737, 740.

Acknowledgment.

In order that delivery of specific articles be part payment, stopping running of statute, they must be received as payments, or by agreement applied as such. (N. C.) 84.

A letter proposing to settle bill may be sufficient acknowledgment to prevent the running of the statute. (N. C.) 504.

Payment on mortgage bond within 10 years before suit brought prevents operation of statute. (N. C.) 501.

Indorsement of a payment on sealed note, with statement by payer that he makes it as heir of maker of note, stops running of statute. (S. C.) 640.

Pleading.

In action to recover land, defendant may prove possession for seven years under general denial without pleading statute. (N. C.) 92.

Pleading exception, on ground of mistake. (N. C.) 387.

Liquor Selling.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

Of civil suit by landlord against tenant for recovery of premises—Rights of tenant. (Ga.) 296.

In action for malicious suing out and execution of a warrant to dispossess plaintiff, a plea setting up facts that led to such action, and claiming that it was authorized, is a plea of justification. (Ga.) 1017.

A suit charging defendants with fraud, unaccompanied by attachment of property or person, is no ground for the action for malicious prosecution. (N. C.) 943.

A counterclaim for malicious prosecution should allege facts showing want of probable cause in instituting suit. (N. C.) 947.

Measure of damages for illegally dispossessing tenant. (Ga.) 296.

MANDAMUS.

And injunction, are not appropriate remedies in the same case. (Ga.) 548.

Will not lie to compel a county court to issue an order against county funds for a county debt. (W. Va.) 895.

MASTER AND SERVANT.

See "Convicts."

Where employer violates contract with employe, the latter has cause of action for damages. (Ga.) 309.

Where a breach of contract of employment would result in reduction of employe's compensation, he is justified in rescinding contract. (Ga.) 309.

Contract of employment—Construction. (Ga.) 309.

Negligence of master.

An employe cannot recover for injuries from running a machine, safe when properly operated, in absence of evidence that the employer failed to give warning of the dangers of operation. (Ga.) 974.

Duties of master operating coal mine. (W. Va.) 584.

Railroad companies have a right to presume that cars delivered by connecting lines are in good condition. (Va.) 274.

Proof that the cars which plaintiff was coupling were pushed together with undue force by engineer did not make a prima facie case of negligence. (S. C.) 213.

Where expert evidence showed that accident could not have occurred if bumpers had been in repair, a nonsuit was properly refused. (S. C.) 213.

Whether master, at time of hiring, should have inquired as to experience of servant, is a question for the jury. (Ga.) 300.

Action for injuries caused by incompetency of fireman in charge of engine—Sufficiency of evidence. (W. Va.) 596.

Railroad company is liable for injuries to employes caused by engineer placing incompetent fireman in charge of engine. (W. Va.) 596.

Negligence of master—Pleading.

Sufficiency of declaration in action for death of brakeman through negligence. (Va.) 559.

Negligence of fellow servants or vice principals.

A conductor, having the entire control of a train, is a vice principal, for whose negligence the railroad is liable. (W. Va.) 748.

Neither a conductor nor a signal operator are fellow servants of a section hand going to work on a train. (W. Va.) 748.

An assistant fireman of one train is a fellow servant of the conductor of another. (S. C.) 182.

Servant's neglect to warn approaching train of car standing on track is not a breach of master's duty to furnish a safe place. (S. C.) 182.

Assumption of risks.

Injury to employe—Assumption of risk. (Ga.) 290, 292.

Railroad company is not liable for injury to an employe knowing the inexperience of the fireman whose negligence caused the injury. (Ga.) 361.

Where engineer fails to go on siding to pass train about due, and brakeman goes forward on top of cars to warn him to stop, and is injured, the company is liable. (Ga.) 999.

Contributory negligence.

An engineer who leaves his place in the cab to look at a hot journal that he could have seen without leaving it, and is injured, cannot recover. (Ga.) 976.

Action for injuries to railroad employe—Contributory negligence. (Va.) 837.

A servant has a right to assume that the appliances furnished him are safe. (S. C.) 213.

Injury while coupling cars by hand—Construction of rule. (Ga.) 290.

Injury to railroad employe—Contributory negligence. (Va.) 274.

Where a servant knows of defects in machinery, and continues in service, by reason of the promises of his employer, he is not guilty of contributory negligence. (W. Va.) 584.

Mere continuance in service, with knowledge of defects in appliances, is not per se negligence in the servant. (W. Va.) 584.

A servant, knowing of the danger, if he willfully encounters it, cannot recover from his employer for an injury caused thereby. (W. Va.) 573.

Where a collision is caused by the negligence of the conductor or the signal operator, a section hand, who jumps from the car to avoid it, is not guilty of contributory negligence. (W. Va.) 748.

Train conductors cannot maintain action for injuries caused by their disobedience of rules. (Va.) 274.

A brakeman who willfully violates a reasonable rule cannot recover for injury caused by such violation. (W. Va.) 573.

Where a brakeman knows a rule of the company to report all defects in brakes, etc., and, knowing of a defect, fails to report it, and is injured, he is guilty of contributory negligence. (W. Va.) 729.

Measure of Damages.

See "Damages."

MECHANICS' LIENS.

Cannot be enforced against a county building. (W. Va.) 895.

A failure to claim and record lien not excused because property was put in hands of a receiver before time of recording had expired. (Ga.) 359.

Mental Capacity.

See "Contracts;" "Deed;" "Equity."

MINES AND MINING.

Where nothing has been done for 17 years under a mining lease for 99 years, which provides for the payment of royalty on coal mined, the lease may be considered as abandoned. (W. Va.) 493.

MORTGAGES.

See, also, "Building and Loan Associations;" "Chattel Mortgages;" "Subrogation."

Of indemnity, see "Indemnity."

Where intestate has conveyed land as security, a purchaser from his administrator gets title only on redemption from the conveyance. (Ga.) 134.

The estate for life of a married woman, with the remainder to her children, is subject to levy and sale on foreclosure of a mortgage thereon given by her. (Ga.) 546.

Whether mortgage or charge on separate estate of married woman. (N. C.) 323.

The word "convey" is sufficient to transfer property. (N. C.) 323.

Description.

The words "such an interest" in property already described is sufficient description of interest mortgaged. (N. C.) 323.

Sufficiency of description of property. (N. C.) 323.

A description of the premises, though meager and vacant, if sufficient to identify premises, will not render mortgage void. (Ga.) 31.

Assignment of debt and mortgage.

A transfer of a note carries with it the mortgage securing it, without assignment or delivery. (N. C.) 696.

Foreclosure.

Subsequent incumbrancers are not necessary parties. (N. C.) 501.

One who has had possession under title paramount to that of the mortgagor, but from the same common source, is a necessary party to an action to foreclose. (S. C.) 798.

One not recording his deed until after foreclosure suit is brought is bound by the judgment. (N. C.) 501.

A provision for possession by mortgagee after default until the rights of the parties are determined, does not prevent sale under foreclosure. (N. C.) 320.

Personal judgment for deficiency on foreclosure cannot be rendered till after sale and report. (S. C.) 636.

A decree in foreclosure directing payment of "costs of this action" authorizes payment of costs of second mortgagee, made defendant therein. (S. C.) 677.

Right to tax costs of foreclosure against homestead. (S. C.) 677.

Sale under power.

The place of sale of land under deed of trust is within the discretion of the trustee, where there is no provision in the deed for the place of sale. (Va.) 843.

Trustees in deeds of trust must act in person. (Va.) 843.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

See, also, "Counties;" "Highways;" "Schools and School Districts."

Power of city to prohibit sale of certain articles elsewhere than in city market established after passage of act giving power. (Ga.) 143.

Statute empowering city to prohibit sale of certain articles elsewhere than in the market will be construed to apply only to sales during reasonable market hours. (Ga.) 143.

Sufficiency of evidence to show that defendant sold marketable commodities during market hours elsewhere than at the city market. (Ga.) 143.

A city is not liable for injuries by negligence of its officials in the discharge of governmental duties. (W. Va.) 447.

Where an injury is alleged to have been caused by negligent use of corporate property, the burden of proof is on plaintiff. (W. Va.) 447.

A city with power over the sewers thereof cannot maintain a manhole from which poisonous gases escape in dangerous quantities. (Ga.) 135.

Injury from defective street—Sufficiency of declaration. (Ga.) 351.

A city is liable for failure to keep its streets in repair. (W. Va.) 447.

A city that permits a railroad company to erect a bridge at a street crossing in such a way as to injure the premises of an abutting owner is liable therefor. (Ga.) 1013.

Issuance of bonds.

A city will not be restrained from issuing bonds where there has been a majority vote therefor. (S. C.) 792.

Application of constitutional limitation as to bonded debt is to be determined by the last tax assessment before the bond issue. (S. C.) 184.

Murder.

A railroad is not responsible for the negligence of United States postal clerks on its trains. (W. Va.) 782.

Where one, by the negligence of another, is compelled to choose instantly, in the face of grave peril, between two hazards, he is not guilty of contributory negligence, though the one he selects results in injury, and he might have escaped if he had chosen the other. (W. Va.) 748.

A declaration is good which contains the elements of the cause of action, the duty violated, and the breach thereof. (W. Va.) 782.

A prima facie case of negligence on defendant's part, covered by plaintiff's declaration, cannot be answered by a state of facts involving a breach of diligence by defendant. (Ga.) 18.

In action for death of engineer, it cannot be shown that he was habitually reckless in running too fast by witness who had knowledge of only two instances. (Ga.) 18.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

See "Alteration of Instruments."

Where, at time of indorsement of note in blank, another between the same parties was folded in it, there was only equitable assignment of the latter. (Ga.) 32.

A note may be transferred by delivery without indorsement. (N. C.) 696.

A note given for usurious interest is void in the hands of an innocent purchaser. (N. C.) 717.

A holder of a note by equitable assignment cannot sue without equitable pleadings setting up facts. (Ga.) 32.

Action on note — Pleading want of consideration. (Ga.) 293.

In an action on a note by indorsee against a payee and joint makers, plaintiff's failure to allege a purchase before maturity relieves the joint maker from alleging notice by plaintiff of fraud in obtaining the note. (N. C.) 687.

A plea by maker of a note that he executed with understanding that he was not to be bound therefor is insufficient. (Ga.) 354.

An answer to a complaint in action on a note, which denies that plaintiff is the owner and holder, is not frivolous. (N. C.) 703.

NEW TRIAL.

Discretion of trial court, see "Appeal." In criminal cases, see "Criminal Law."

A motion for a new trial may be filed in recess. (Ga.) 830.

Where notice of motion for errors in charge does not state what the charge was it cannot be reviewed. (Ga.) 308.

It is error to dismiss a motion because movant declined to furnish a brief of evidence made from official report. (Ga.) 986.

Under Act Nov. 12, 1889, the brief of evidence must be filed within 30 days from the trial, or within time allowed within such 30 days. (Ga.) 11.

Should not be granted because juror assisted plaintiff who was suing for personal injuries to go downstairs during a court recess, no prejudice being shown. (Ga.) 187.

In action for personal injury and suffering, but not for loss of earning capacity, a new trial should be granted, if verdict is excessive. (Ga.) 11.

A new trial for excessive damages in condemnation proceedings is properly denied where the record contains data from which compensation can be estimated, and appellee remits all above just compensation. (W. Va.) 957.

The propounding of a leading question is no ground for new trial, if answer was harmless. (Ga.) 997.

If writing purporting to be signed by party is admitted without objection, subsequent discovery that it is not genuine is no cause for new trial, unless adverse party knew it was spurious. (Ga.) 65.

When granted for newly-discovered evidence. (W. Va.) 953.

For newly-discovered evidence which disclosed material admissions by prevailing party, inconsistent with his right of recovery, was properly granted. (Ga.) 1017.

No more than two new trials can be granted to the same party in the same case. (W. Va.)

Debtors by open account are not subject to suit jointly with one who has guarantied, in writing, payment of the account. (Ga.) 158.

Claimants under a contract of personal property mentioned in a deed of trust are proper parties to suit to set it aside. (W. Va.) 611.

In suit between sureties for contribution, and to sell land as the property of one surety, where the wife of the surety claims the land as hers, and held by her vendor for her, her vendor should be made a party. (W. Va.) 485.

PARTITION.

Where the pleadings contain no proper prayer therefor, it is error to give affirmative relief. (W. Va.) 568.

PARTNERSHIP.

See "Banks and Banking."

Action by surviving partner to compel accounting, see "Trusts."

Assignment for creditors, see "Assignment for Benefit of Creditors."

An agreement to employ one as clerk, the latter to have half the net profits, and become a half owner, constitutes partnership. (N. C.) 940.

One advancing money to enable another to carry out certain contract, repayment to be contingent on profits, can be charged as partner only as to that contract. (N. C.) 113.

In action on notes signed by defendant, with the addition "& Co.," where defendant files sworn plea of no partnership, he is liable, whether he had a partner or not. (Ga.) 354.

Part Payment.

Negligence of master, see "Master and Servant."

Objections taken by demurrer, see "Corporations."

A plea containing merely allegations of law is bad. (N. C.) 946.

It is proper to refuse to strike special plea when it contains some good allegation. (Ga.) 25.

The striking of a plea that notes sued on were without consideration is harmless where evidence shows full consideration given. (Ga.) 364.

Will not be stricken out for failure of plaintiff to support some of his allegations by evidence. (Ga.) 361.

Where there is no demurrer to a declaration, it is not error to refuse to strike out certain words therein. (Ga.) 406.

Sufficiency of allegations in pleading that note in suit was procured by fraud or mistake, and was in excess of the proper amount. (Ga.) 41.

A judgment will not be set aside because the petition described the court as city court of F. county, while the process described it correctly, as city court of A., which court is the only city court in F. county. (Ga.) 433.

Where defendant has taken depositions, and there has been a full hearing, the decree will not be reversed because complainant did not file reply to an answer asking for affirmative relief. (W. Va.) 765.

Demurrer.

The joinder of unnecessary parties is not ground for demurrer. (N. C.) 76.

Laches may be raised by demurrer where pleading shows the facts on which the defense rests. (W. Va.) 765.

A general demurrer to the sufficiency of an affidavit will not reach a defect in the jurat. (Ga.) 830.

Answer.

Where answer to amended complaint denies indebtedness, admission in original answer as to part of debt is not conclusive. (N. C.) 170.

Averment in answer that defendant has no knowledge of fourth paragraph of complaint, and demands proof, does not deny such paragraph. (N. C.) 655.

Amendment.

Amendment to declaration in replevin construed not to assert a cause of action wholly different from that in original complaint, nor to change the subject of action. (N. C.) 110.

A complaint in an action for injuries, from defective machinery, is amendable to show the particulars in respect to which the machinery was defective. (Ga.) 817.

The court can allow an amendment to a complaint which fails to allege that plaintiff is in possession. (N. C.) 973.

Objections waived.

Objection not raised below cannot be raised on appeal. (N. C.) 337.

An objection to the entry of final judgment that there are no pleadings is waived where the case has been referred, and judgment entered in it without objection. (N. C.) 694.

Exceptions to an answer are deemed waived if a replication to it is filed. (W. Va.) 810.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

See, also, "Master and Servant."

Declarations of agent, see "Evidence."

The mere fact that plaintiff was attorney of mortgagor in proceedings to foreclose does not make him his agent. (S. C.) 517.

Proof of agency. (Ga.) 354.

The actions of an alleged agent, not acquiesced in by the alleged principal, are not sufficient to establish an agency. (S. C.) 125.

An agent to rent premises for owner may, after the notes for rent have been taken, become agent to sublet for tenant. (Ga.) 354.

Evidence of scope of authority. (Ga.) 366.

Failure of agent to keep principal's property insured—Liabilities. (Ga.) 312.

Where plaintiff knew that rules of defendant railroad required payment of demurrage and storage, he cannot sue for breach of contract made by him with defendant's station agent, by which no such charge should be made. (Ga.) 159.

A recovery can be had against a concealed principal of a person acting in his own name, though the fact be not alleged in pleading. (Ga.) 366.

Merchants employing a broker are chargeable with notice received by such broker that a member of a firm, with whom they have dealt only through the broker, has withdrawn from the firm. (Ga.) 975.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

See "Subrogation."

Sureties on the bond of a constable are not relieved from liability by the fact that the bond was not approved by the county court. (W. Va.) 949.

Where husband and wife include, in trust deed to secure former's debt, property both of husband and wife, her property stands as surety, and will be discharged by extension to husband, without her knowledge. (N. C.) 56.

The release of a surety of note because of usury concealed from him is not affected by a subsequent arrangement between the creditor and the principal debtor purging the note of usury. (Ga.) 132.

Where a defaulting ex-sheriff, with taxes collected, has taken up county orders, and is selling them to third persons, an injunction will lie at suit of sureties. (W. Va.) 449.

RAILROAD COMPANIES.

See, also, "Carriers;" "Eminent Domain."

Obstruction of highway, see "Highways."

Action against lessee of road—Pleading. (Ga.) 306.

A complaint in action against lessee of railroad alleging that its principal office is in county where suit is brought shows jurisdiction. (Ga.) 306.

A railroad contractor has no priority as against the lien of a mortgage upon the railroad, duly recorded and foreclosed, because he supplied the materials which went to make up its real value. (Ga.) 540.

Penalty for failure to fence.

The erection of a legal fence by the landowner, where railroad company is required by law to fence, does not relieve the company from penalty for failure to fence. (Va.) 909.

Liability for negligence.

A railroad company is only liable for wanton injury done by the gross negligence of the company or its servants, to a licensee standing on a platform. (W. Va.) 782.

Are liable for the injury of person calling at depot for freight. (Va.) 278.

The fact that a railroad fails to recover from a discharged employe a switch key does not make it liable for the act of such employe in misplacing a switch to wreck a train. (Ga.) 18.

In action for death resulting from misplaced switch, defendant cannot show the common experience of railroads in obtaining a return by employes of switch keys. (Ga.) 18.

An engineer is justified in assuming that man on track will step off to avoid collision when danger signals are given. (N. C.) 114.

Injuries at a railroad crossing by being thrown from a vehicle by the frightening of a horse are not caused by "collision," within Gen. St. § 1529. (S. C.) 119.

Evidence showing that plaintiff, when about to cross a track, failed to look and listen carefully. (Va.) 35.

Injury to boy at railroad crossing—What constitutes contributory negligence. (Ga.) 304.

Sufficiency of evidence upon issue as to whether one injured by falling from wagon on defective railroad crossing could have avoided the accident. (Ga.) 652.

Accident to person on track—Evidence—Contributory negligence. (Ga.) 358.

A railroad company is not liable for the killing of the driver of a mule, where the mule, in running away, attempted to cross the track in front of a locomotive. (Ga.) 825.

A railroad company is not liable for the killing, by the derailment of a car, caused by fast running, of one walking outside the track at a point not customarily used by pedestrians, if the company's servants did not see such person. (Ga.) 990.

Stock-killing cases.

A railroad company is not liable for killing a horse at a crossing, where the engineer blew the whistle after the horse got on the track, and the train could not be stopped in time to prevent the killing. (W. Va.) 896.

Are liable for horses killed owing to their concealment from the view of the engineer by bushes growing inside of the side ditches. (N. C.) 211.

A charge requiring railroad to use all possible care to avoid killing live stock is cause for new trial. (Ga.) 22.

Where statute requires railroad to fence its right of way, the fact that the landowner had built a fence does not relieve railroad company from liability for stock killed on its track. (Va.) 909.

Liability for stock killed by failure to maintain guards. (W. Va.) 926.

RAPE.

Sufficiency of evidence that defendant, a negro, came to a white woman's bed at night, and got upon her bed, to show assault with intent to rape. (Ga.) 132.

RECEIVERS.

Where a controversy is as to whether a tenancy in common exists between the parties, a receiver is properly appointed to take possession of the property. (Ga.) 417.

After appointment of receiver on petition in nature of bill of equity, a creditor should assert his claim for equitable relief in original suit. (Ga.) 160.

A creditor secured by a solvent indorser cannot join in a petition as one of three unsecured creditors to obtain the appointment of a receiver. (Ga.) 136.

A petition for the appointment of a receiver may be amended by adding another unsecured creditor. (Ga.) 136.

It is error to appoint a receiver when neither petition nor answer is verified, and no evidence is taken to establish the facts alleged. (Ga.) 435.

The act of a stockholder, in ignorance of the rights of the corporation, does not estop the receiver of the corporation, afterwards appointed. (Ga.) 134.

Where a receiver was appointed for a corporation, and, on the expiration of its charter, another receiver was appointed, with authority to sue, a defendant, in ejectment by the second receiver, cannot set up outstanding title in the first. (Ga.) 134.

Of railroads are subject to suit in any county in which the road may be sued on like cause of action. (Ga.) 64.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

An alien defendant, who is a resident, cannot remove a case to the federal court, under Act Cong. March 3, 1887. (N. C.) 56.

Act Cong. Aug. 13, 1888, § 3, which provides for actions against the federal receiver in the court which appointed him, does not affect the jurisdiction of a state court over an action on his bond to which he is not a party. (N. C.) 202.

The fact that the United States is a formal party plaintiff does not render a cause removable to the federal court. (N. C.) 202.

The fact that the state has been improperly joined as relator does not authorize a removal. (N. C.) 202.

Whether the liability of sureties on the bond of a receiver appointed by the federal court is joint or several does not involve a federal question. (N. C.) 202.

The construction of a decree of a federal court does not involve a federal question. (N. C.) 202.

Where a removal is asked on the ground of prejudice, the order may be granted, upon a proper showing, at any time before trial. (N. C.) 698.

STATUTES.

When statute is amended and re-enacted with the words "so as to read as follows," the new part is law from the time of the amendment. (W. Va.) 470.

Act 1882, c. 18, being "An act to amend and re-enact chapter 35, Code W. Va., concerning the recovery of claims due the state," is not unconstitutional because it embraces in its provisions a clause as to the effect of the statute of limitations on claims due the state. (W. Va.) 470.

"An act to regulate and restrict the rate of interest in the state, and for other purposes," restricting the rate to 8 per cent., and providing penalty for violation, states the object in the title. (Ga.) 403.

In action involving the meaning of a statute, evidence of a member of the legislature that passed the statute as to the legislative intent is incompetent. (Ga.) 981.

Of limitations—Must be given only prospective construction. (W. Va.) 470.

In interpreting statutes, they must be construed as prospective, unless the intent to act retrospectively is clearly expressed or necessarily implied. (W. Va.) 470.

Act Sept. 27, 1891, in relation to rate of interest, amending Act Oct. 14, 1879, does not modify the second section of the latter act, save as to contracts made after its passage. (Ga.) 403.

A statute revising the subject-matter of a former one, though it contains no express words to that effect, operates as a repeal. (W. Va.) 470.

A packing house using cold storage to preserve its own commodities is not subject to a tax imposed on "packing houses doing a cold-storage business." (Ga.) 981.

Where the surface or the coal underlying the same is leased, such land and coal should be assessed to the owner. (W. Va.) 566.

Private bank stock is assessable to holder in the district where he resides, when not included in assessment of capital of bank. (W. Va.) 467.

A municipality which does not assess the capital stock of incorporate bank therein, cannot assess a nonresident shareholder. (W. Va.) 467.

Where coal underlying a tract of land is sold, it should be assessed separately from the surface to the owner of the coal. (W. Va.) 566.

Assessment for municipal purposes in municipalities of less than 10,000 inhabitants must be identical with state, county, and district assessments. (W. Va.) 466.

A county court cannot maintain writ of error from supreme court to decision of circuit court on appeal from county court in regard to reassessment of lands. (W. Va.) 632.

Title to land forfeited for nonentry on the assessor's land books vests in the state on the forfeiture, by the mere force of the statute. (W. Va.) 807.

Remedies for erroneous taxation.

Injunction will lie to prevent city officers from collecting taxes illegally assessed. (W. Va.) 466.

Equity has jurisdiction to remove a cloud from the title to real estate caused by the illegal levy of a tax. (W. Va.) 489.

Where a town has taxed property beyond the limit fixed by the organic law, a collection of the taxes will be enjoined. (W. Va.) 489.

Liability of tax collector.

A tax collector is personally liable for issuing an execution under which a levy is made, for a tax against one not subject to it. (Ga.) 981.

Priority of lien.

A sale of mortgage chattels to satisfy taxes due from the mortgagor does not pass title free from the mortgagee lien. (N. C.) 205.

Sale for nonpayment.

Act Dec. 23, 1879, authorizes a sale of land delinquent for 1880 taxes. (S. C.) 802.

An affidavit for authenticating a tax sale, silent as to advertisement, but deposing that all the notices required by statute had been given, is insufficient. (Ga.) 830.

Advertisement of sale of delinquent lands for taxes made in a daily paper on January 28th and February 4th is made weekly for two weeks, and authorizes a sale February 6th. (S. C.) 802.

That sheriff sold tract without trying to divide it does not render sale invalid. (S. C.) 517.

That unpaid poll tax is included in treasurer's warrant for sale does not invalidate sale. (S. C.) 517.

Treasurer's failure to try to collect taxes does not render invalid sale for nonpayment. (S. C.) 517.

Redemption.

A tender by person seeking to redeem is waived when redemption refused because party offering has no right to redeem. (W. Va.) 379.

Statute as to redemption from tax sale must be liberally construed. (W. Va.) 379.

Tax deed as evidence.

Sheriff's deed is prima facie evidence of regularity of proceedings. (S. C.) 517.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

The board of railroad commissioners has power to inquire what particular corporation owns telegraph line. (N. C.) 389.

Regulation of rates for telegraph companies—Amendment of proceedings on appeal. (N. C.) 389.

The board of railroad commissioners cannot direct offices of a telegraph company to be opened for commercial business. (N. C.) 389.

Regulation of rates between points in the state, not an interference with interstate commerce, though the line passes out of the state between the points, it all being owned by one company. (N. C.) 389.

A suit to enforce penalty for failure to deliver dispatch need not be brought in the name of the commonwealth. (Va.) 280.

Are under no obligation to transmit and deliver messages on Sunday unless a work of necessity or charity. (Ga.) 297, 298.

The transmittal of dispatch to his mother that the sender and a friend will dine with her, not a work of necessity or charity. (Ga.) 297, 298.

There can be no recovery for failure to deliver message offering employment when addressee was already under contract with another. (Ga.) 647.

Under Act Oct. 22, 1887, providing a penalty for failure to deliver a message with impartiality and due diligence, a company is not liable for a material inaccuracy in the message. (Ga.) 979.

Where sender erroneously gives street address of sendee, and message is taken to such address, the company is not liable for penalty for delay in delivery, unless it knew or could have ascertained same. (Ga.) 980.

One who gives a messenger a telegram, written on a blank containing a condition that "no responsibility regarding a message attaches to the company until the same is presented at a transmitting office," cannot recover of the company for the messenger's failure to deliver to a transmitting office. (Ga.) 1008.

Damages for error in message as to condition of market are the difference between actual state of the market and that stated in the message. (Ga.) 287.

TENANCY IN COMMON.

See "Eminent Domain."

Persons claiming undivided interest, who are in possession, cannot claim whole tract by adverse possession for seven years. (N. C.) 73.

Tenpins.

See "Gaming."

Testamentary Powers.

See "Powers."

Title.

Of acts, see "Statutes."

Torts.

See "Assault and Battery;" "Death by Wrongful Act;" "Fraud;" "Libel and Slander;" "Negligence;" "Trespass."

TRESPASS.

The fact that land on which trespass was committed was covered by water does not prevent application of doctrine of constructive possession. (N. C.) 91.

Where, to preserve himself from loss, a person damages the property of another, the latter is entitled to compensation. (W. Va.) 740.

The amount of compensation to be paid for damage to real property is for the jury. (W. Va.) 740.

TRIAL.

See, also, "Appeal;" "Certiorari;" "Continuance;" "Evidence;" "Exceptions, Bill of;" "Judgment;" "Jury;" "New Trial;" "Pleading;" "Practice in Civil Cases;" "Witness."

Where witness has been ordered to remain out of court room, his excuse for disobedience may be heard in presence of jury. (Ga.) 29.

Effect of disobedience by witness, through mistake of his counsel, of order that he stay out of court room. (Ga.) 29.

Where the judge, during the trial, in overruling objections to evidence, expressed an opinion as to the material facts in the presence of the jury, it may be taken advantage of on motion for new trial, though not objected to when made. (W. Va.) 563.

Where plaintiffs do not show that they were prevented from explaining to the jury the law applicable to the facts, they cannot question the discretion of the court in making up the issues. (N. C.) 706.

A motion to postpone submission to the jury is addressed to the discretion of the trial court. (W. Va.) 953.

Demurrer to evidence.

On demurrer to evidence, it is not necessary to state that the evidence set forth is all that was offered. (W. Va.) 737.

Remarks and arguments of counsel.

Improper statements by counsel, to which no objection is made at the time, will not require the granting of a new trial. (Ga.) 406.

Pleadings considered in action on note, and held that there were such admissions of execution as gave defendant the right to open and close. (S. C.) 125.

Comment of counsel not objected to when made cannot be complained of on appeal. (N. C.) 209.

It is within the discretion of the court to permit counsel to read to the jury from law books. (W. Va.) 926.

Instructions.

Refusal to give special instructions after time prescribed, not reviewable. (N. C.) 328.

Failure to submit issue to jury is waived by neglect to ask for such submission. (N. C.) 320.

Instructions based on facts not in evidence erroneous. (Ga.) 290.

A request to charge, not adjustable to a proper theory of the evidence, is properly refused. (Ga.) 525.

Instructions are properly refused if there is no evidence on which they can be based. (N. C.) 81.

Question whether instruction placed the burden of proof on plaintiff considered. (N. C.) 655.

An instruction that, while court has felt bound to say "so much" as to the law, the case must turn in great measure on the questions of fact, is not improper. (S. C.) 177.

It is error to direct the especial attention of the jury to the relevancy of a particular portion of the testimony favorable to one side. (Ga.) 1006.

Question whether instruction as to right of recovery was erroneous as ignoring plaintiff's burden of proof when this had already been explained to the jury. (S. C.) 177.

Question whether an instruction as to plaintiff's right of recovery was erroneous, as charging on the facts, when it was given only in considering question of plaintiff's diligence. (S. C.) 213.

It is not error to refuse to interrupt an argument to give an instruction to the jury. (Va.) 901.

An exception to a charge containing several propositions that there was a misdirection is too general. (N. C.) 328.

An erroneous instruction on a material point is presumed to be prejudicial to the party against whom it is given. (W. Va.) 591.

An erroneous instruction, which did not affect the verdict, is no ground for reversal. (S. C.) 680.

In action for injuries against two defendants, as joint tort feasons, an instruction discharging one is not injurious to the other, if the one discharged is not liable to contribution in favor of the other. (Ga.) 1015.

Directing verdict.

Where defense alleged and proved is plainly insufficient, a verdict should not be directed for defendant. (Ga.) 159.

On default in action on note, a verdict may be directed without proof of the account. (Ga.) 430.

Validity of verdict.

A verdict on foreclosure of a railroad mortgage declaring a lien on a part, instead of the whole, of the railroad, is void, and not amendable. (Ga.) 540.

Inconsistency between special findings.

Verdict will not be set aside where findings, though inconsistent, would each support judgment. (N. C.) 252.

Trover and Conversion.

Sufficiency of bond, see "Replevin."

Trustee Process.

See "Garnishment."

TRUSTS.

Where plaintiff paid for land, and title was taken by defendant, the fact that, when defendant prepared a deed to plaintiff, the latter allowed title to remain in defendant, to avoid payment of his debts, will not defeat his right to establish a trust. (N. C.) 712.

A purchaser of an insane married woman's property, under a void decree, with knowledge of the fraud of the committee, vitiating his title, is a trustee of such property for the insane married woman. (W. Va.) 721.

Where one pays for land and causes conveyance to be made to his brother, it does not constitute resulting trust. (Ga.) 311.

In action to establish resulting trust, the burden is on plaintiff. (N. C.) 712.

A trust results to a widow and children in land purchased by the administrator with money of the estate, and sold by him to pay his private debts. (Va.) 869.

A resulting trust must arise at the execution of the conveyance, and payments subsequent to the purchase will not attach a trust to the original purchase. (Va.) 869.

The burden is on the executor claiming under a deed from a distributee made before final settlement to show absence of fraud. (N. C.) 321.

A trustee, of his own motion, may apply to the court to remove any impediment to a proper execution of the trust. (W. Va.) 810.

Unless expressly authorized, trustee of married woman and minor children cannot sell land without order of superior court. (Ga.) 159.

Power of trustee to sell trust estate under the terms of the trust. (Ga.) 543.

Where trustee with authority has agreed in lease to keep shelving in repair, trust estate is liable for his failure to do so. (Ga.) 46.

Where surviving partner has conveyed to administrator of deceased partner assets of firm on certain trusts, he may sue latter individually for accounting. (N. C.) 943.

Action to establish—Sufficiency of evidence. (Va.) 869.

Action to establish resulting trust—Defense of laches. (Va.) 869.

USURY.

Rights of bona fide purchasers of notes, see "Negotiable Instruments."
What law governs, see "Conflict of Laws."

A note given for an old note tainted with usury and a new debt is not usurious. (S. C.) 229.

Notes given when there was no statute as to amount of interest are not usurious. (Ga.) 530.

Evidence of lending at a usurious rate of interest to other persons is not competent to prove a usurious rate in the case at bar. (W. Va.) 810.

A counterclaim for usurious interest is inadmissible in action for breach of warranty in a mortgage securing usurious note. (S. C.) 229.

Plea of usury considered and held sufficient, in the absence of a demurrer, to admit the statute of evidence. (Ga.) 131.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

See, also, "Deed;" "Fraudulent Conveyances;" "Judicial Sales;" "Sale;" "Specific Performance;" "Subrogation."

A party to a contract, providing that the costs of survey should be divided, does not forfeit his rights by refusal to pay more than half thereof. (N. C.) 947.

It is no defense to action for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation as to quantity that the land offered was worth more than the price paid. (Ga.) 355.

A vendee is not estopped from recovering for fraudulent misrepresentation as to quantity if actually deceived, though he had some knowledge of boundaries of land. (Ga.) 355.

A purchaser of land "more or less," though aware of deficiency of quantity, is not estopped if the deficiency is much greater than he thought. (Ga.) 355.

In enforcing a vendor's lien, a trustee in a deed of trust and the beneficiary are necessary parties. (W. Va.) 561.

Rights of purchaser of land, with notice that executor making sale had already disposed of the timber thereon. (Ga.) 62.

The possession of land under an oral contract of sale is notice to the vendor's subsequent grantee. (S. C.) 680.

VENUE IN CIVIL CASES.

Where principal debtors and guarantors live in different county, the former are not subject to suit with the latter in the latter's county. (Ga.) 158.

WATERS AND WATER COURSES.

See, also, "Navigable Waters;" "Surface Water."

The right to turn the waters of a river down the canal does not cover the right to dam such waters so as to destroy the water power of mills already established. (W. Va.) 740.

WAYS.

See "Highways."

Right of action to remove obstruction. (Ga.) 365.

WILLS.

See, also, "Descent and Distribution;" "Executors and Administrators."

Testamentary powers, see "Powers."

What constitute, see "Deed."

Admissibility of evidence that testator derived from his wife most of property on which he built up his estate, on issue as to mental capacity. (Ga.) 29.

Question whether one signing for testatrix did so in her presence, and in that of the witnesses. (S. C.) 216.

A person signing will for testatrix may sign also as witness to the will. (S. C.) 216.

Question whether one signing will for testatrix did so by her express direction. (S. C.) 216.

The execution of a foreign will must show by certified probate that it was subscribed by two witnesses, and a recitation in the attestation clause of the will is not sufficient. (N. C.) 208.

Construction.

Construction of will as to whether limitation upon life estate was vested. (Va.) 913.

Construction of devise to "children." (N. C.) 347.

Parol evidence is admissible to show the circumstances of testatrix at time of making her will in order to construe it. (Ga.) 17.

Construction of will as to whether certain nephews of deceased were to take per stirpes, in view of their relation to testatrix at time will was made. (Ga.) 17.

Rights of children of testator's brother, born after making a will but before testator's death, under clause giving land to brother's children after his death. (N. C.) 96.

Construction of will as to whether, on a devise to granddaughter and another, for equal division between them, there was a trust as to granddaughter's interest only. (Ga.) 157.

The estate of a life tenant with testamentary power does not change to fee on failure to exercise same. (N. C.) 251.

A devise to a daughter for her separate use during her life, with an executory devise to her brothers should she die without issue, vests a fee simple in the daughter upon her marrying and having issue. (N. C.) 603.

Under a devise to two children of a deceased son, providing that if they should die "leaving no lawful heirs, either or each of them, of their body," then the remainder should go to other persons, the latter take only on the death of both the children. (N. C.) 969.

Where testator devised a certain sum in trust, the interest to be used, as far as necessary, for the support of an intemperate son, and, in the residuary clause, named several sources from which the residue would arise, but did not specify this fund, the son acquired the entire interest in the fund, and could dispose of it by will. (N. C.) 967.

WITNESS.

See, also, "Contempt;" "Deposition;" "Discovery;" "Evidence."

Absence as ground for continuance, see "Continuance."

Leading question, see "New Trial."

Privilege of witness not to criminate himself continues, though prosecution would be barred by limitation, unless it appears that no prosecution is pending. (Ga.) 40.

In action on guardian's bond given before 1868, where there is reference for an accounting, the guardians are competent witnesses. (N. C.) 96.

Competency because of interest—Action to establish trust. (Va.) 869.

Transactions with decedents.

Testimony of an administrator, on cross-examination, as to transaction not testified to in chief, does not render defendant competent as to such transaction. (N. C.) 213.

If administrator of payee of bond proves its execution by defendant, the latter may testify concerning the same transaction. (N. C.) 213.

In an action to recover money deposited with the decedent, evidence by plaintiff as to the time decedent handed her a memorandum of the deposits is inadmissible. (N. C.) 117.

Plaintiff, in action against administrator, may testify that contract relied on by plaintiff, and signature of deceased thereto, are in latter's handwriting. (N. C.) 79.

Competency as to transactions with decedents. (Ga.) 316.

Competency as to transactions with decedent. (Ga.) 362.

Competency of general agent to testify as to transaction in principal's business with debtor now deceased. (Ga.) 415.

A grantor in a deed, after death of the grantee, cannot testify against his heirs that deed was delivered conditionally. (W. Va.) 765.

A debtor executing deed of trust to secure a creditor cannot testify that it was procured by fraud of the trustee, both trustee and creditor being dead. (W. Va.) 765.

In an action against a principal on contracts made by defendant's deceased agent, plaintiff may testify as to transactions with the agent. (N. C.) 701.

An alienee by executor's sale of land of deceased person is not deceased's "assignee," within the protection of Code, § 400, as to transactions with decedent. (S. C.) 680.

An executor, claiming title to land by deed from deceased, is competent, in proceedings by widow to have dower assigned her in such land, to testify as to communications with deceased concerning his purchase. (Ga.) 1006.

Examination.

The allowance of a leading question is a matter of discretion. (Ga.) 132.

A question assuming a material collateral fact, and suggesting the answer desired, is improper. (Ga.) 59.

Impeachment.

Plaintiff may be impeached by evidence that he had compromised an action of slander for a small sum. (N. C.) 209.

WRITS.

Authority to accept service, see "Attorney and Client."

Collateral attack on judgment, see "Judgment."

Where an attorney fills out a blank summons and bond, and does not give the clerk opportunity to pass on the bond, but gives the papers to the sheriff, the process is void. (N. C.) 708.

An amendable variance between the writ and declaration can be taken advantage of only by plea in abatement. (W. Va.) 724.

Where previous writs have failed, plaintiff is entitled to an alias writ. (Va.) 278.

Admission of service by authorized attorney binding on defendant. (S. C.) 263.

Where, on motion to reverse a judgment for defective service, the only defendant prejudiced by the defect releases the error, it is no ground for reversal as to other defendants. (W. Va.) 728.

Acceptance of service for partnership by attorney need not be in firm name. (S. C.) 268.

A summons in action against a railroad before a justice may be served upon the freight and passenger agent of the company in the county where suit is brought, and where such agent resides. (W. Va.) 928.

One notified of appointment as director, who receives a writ against the company without remonstrance, will be presumed to have accepted it. (Va.) 278.

Personal service on a foreign corporation in another state gives no jurisdiction in South Carolina if the corporation has no property there. (S. C.) 120.

On appeal to superior court from judgment by a justice, the summons may be amended. (Ga.) 530.

If summons in special proceeding is improperly made returnable to court in term, proceeding may be remanded with directions that summons be amended so as to be returnable before clerk on certain day. (N. C.) 117.

Return.

Sufficiency of return on summons to confer jurisdiction of defendant. (S. C.) 33.

A sheriff's return that a summons was executed by delivering a copy to J. and his wife sufficiently shows that a copy was delivered to each of them. (N. C.) 174.

A sheriff may amend his return to conform to the facts. (W. Va.) 748.

On hearing of motion to reverse judgment by default for defective return of summons, the sheriff may amend his return; and, if the amendment is good, the motion will be overruled. (W. Va.) 728.
